THE PREFACE.

WHEN Mr. Rapin first begun this work, he little thought of writing a compleat History of England. His long stay in our island giving him an opportunity of learning our language; and his post in the army, during the war in Ireland, even obliging him to it, he diligently applied himself to the reading of English books, and, particularly, of such as treated of the government and History of England, after the Norman conquest. As the desire of knowledge continually increases, and being master of his time, he was not satisfied with understanding the nature, but wished also to know the original, of the English constitution. To this end, he thought it necessary to peruse, carefully, the History of the Anglo-Saxons, who introduced this form of government into Great-Britain. He found this study to be very discouraging, the History of the Anglo-Saxons being like a vast forest, where the traveller, with great difficulty, finds a few narrow paths to guide his wandering steps. However, it was this that inspired him with the design of clearing this part of the English History, by removing the the rubbish, and carrying on the thread so, as to give, at least, a general knowledge. For this purpose, he was indispensably obliged to shew, how the Saxons came to send troops into Great-Britian, and why a conquest, which had cost them so much, was abandoned by the Romans. In a word, he fixed the beginning of his History to the time of Julius Cæsar, who first attempted to conquer our island, intending to conclude with the Norman conquest. But not knowing how to employ his time better, and besides finding, that after the conquest, the scene was changed, and from a wild forest he was entered into a cultivated country, where the way was easy, he resolved to proceed. However, when he came to the reign of Henry II, he was upon the point of relinquishing his work, of which the beginning gave him no encouragement, when an unexpected assistance, not only induced him to continue it, but also to form the project of a much larger History than what he, at first, intended. This assistance was RYMER'S FOEDERA, communicated to our author, by the famous le Clerc, to whom, being then publishing at the government's charge, the volumes were sent by the lord Halifax, a great promoter of that noble work.

This Collection, consisting then of 17 folios, which are lately reprinted with two additional volumes, was of infinite service to our author in compiling his History, and enabling him to clear numberless things, which remained in obscurity. It afforded him means, 1. To rectify the dates, in many places; 2. To discover a great number of errors in the best English, Scotch, French, Italian, and Spanish historians. 3. To decide on many occasions, concerning the contrarieties between the historians. 4. To incert in his History, many events, wholly omitted, or but slightly mentioned by others. In a word, it is this, that chiefly distinguishes his History from all that have appeared before this Collection was published. For it is easy to see what an advantage it was to him, since it contains treaties of peace, truce, league, marrages, commerce, made by the kings of England with other princes; ambassadors instructions; their letters and informations, as well concerning their own negotiations, as the affairs of the courts to which they were sent; very instructive memoirs upon affairs confusedly spoken of, by the historians; letters patents; orders; safe-conducts; with numberless other papers, which cannot be ranged under general heads, and which are of great use to a historian. All these Mr. Rapin was so well acquainted with, that he has published abstracts of 17 volumes, to shew the relation of these acts to the History of England. This work to a man less versed in the English History than Mr. Rapin, would require his whole life; but to him, who knew the intent and motive of every act, it was only a diversion. By the way, it may be added, that Mr. Rapin had a thorough knowledge of our parties and factions, as appears in his Dissertation on the Whigs and Tories, published, in 1717, and translated into English, Dutch, Danish, and twice into High-Dutch.

The advantage which the use of RYMER'S Collection, gave Mr. Rapin over all our historians, serves, in great measure, to remove the objection of his being a foreigner, which naturally ariſes in the mind of an Engliſhman. But if it is farther conſidered, that beſides this advantage, he not only carefully peruſed all the Engliſh hiſtorians, but alſo confronted them with thoſe of the neighbouring ſtates, whether they wrote in Latin, French, Italian, or Spaniſh, it muſt be owned this objection entirely vaniſhes, and that ſuppoſing his judgment and capacity equal to the work, (which the publick by an uncommon approbation ſeems to allow) he was in all other reſpects as well qualified as any Engliſhman can be.

As his aſſiſtances were extraordinary, ſo there is reaſon to believe his impartiality uncommon; for beſides his privilege, as a foreigner, of freely ſpeaking the truth, without fear of offending any party, he had no motive or intereſt to induce him to be partial to England, or any of the neighbouring ſtates; for his life was equally ſpent in France, England, Holland, and Germany. During the 17 years he was employed in this work, he had no poſt or penſion, nor exerciſed any profeſſion, which might bias him to one nation more than another, and as he had no particular obligations to any of the forementioned ſtates, ſo he had no reaſon to complain of ever receiving the leaſt injuſtice.

But notwithſtanding his endeavours to be entirely impartial, he plainly foreſaw, people's prejudices in favour of their own nation, would prevent them from doing him juſtice upon ſeveral occaſions. But this was a rock he could not avoid. How is it poſſible, for inſtance, to relate the conteſts between the Engliſh and Scots, to the ſatisfaction of both? The war between them in the XIVth century, concerning the ſovereignty of the kings of England over Scotland, cannot be deſcribed with its cauſes and circumſtances, without exaſperating the one or the other. The Scots are perſuaded, Edward I. acted very unjuſtly with their anceſtors, and that his grandſon Edward III, was not more ſcrupulous. The Engliſh, on the contrary, believe, their kings had then and long before an unconteſtable right of ſovereignty over all Scotland, and that Edward I's war upon that account was very lawful. Our author has declared for the Scots, as believing the truth on their ſide; for which reaſon, he has endeavoured to ſet this whole affair, in the cleareſt light poſſible; thinking it the duty of a hiſtorian, to correct ſuch errors as have gathered ſtrength from time, or from the negligence and prejudices of former writers.

The quarrel between Edward III, and Philip de Vallois, in which ſo much blood was ſpilt, is another inſtance wherein it is almoſt impoſſible to pleaſe both the Engliſh and French. Among the French, the Salick law is a Noli me tangere. To ſatisfy them, not only the antiquity of that law muſt be acknowledged, but the ſenſe and extent muſt alſo be left unexamined. The Engliſh, on their ſide, are no leſs prejudiced. Without conſidering that Edward could have no right to the crown of France, but upon ſuppoſition of the authority of the Salick law, they alledge againſt it ſuch reaſons, as are not only unſerviceable, but even prejudicial, to that prince's right. Our author, however, without being reſtrained by the fear of diſpleaſing either, has explained, in a Diſſertation at the end of Edward III's reign, what is meant by the Salick law, wherein conſiſted the difference between the two kings, and ſhewn, that their rights were ſo litigious, as to be very difficultly decided by that law.

If it is hard to ſatisfy two different nations, in the recital of their conteſts and quarrels, it is no leſs ſo to content the Engliſh themſelves, in things wherein their opinions are divided; as for inſtance, the prerogatives of the king, the privileges of parliament, the ſucceſſion of the crown, and the like. Mr. Rapin obſerves, that diſputes on theſe points were firſt ſet on foot among us, in the laſt century, by two oppoſite parties, one whereof was for an abſolute and arbitrary power in the king, whilſt the other endeavoured not only to diveſt him of his juſt prerogatives, but even to render him dependent on the parliament. Theſe two extremes he equally condemned, and as he had no motive or intereſt to incline him to either party, he has done his utmoſt to diſcover the truth, through the paſſions and prejudices of the writers on both ſides. He has fairly confronted the facts laid down by the ſeveral hiſtorians, received for true, ſuch as they all agree in, and of ſuch as are variouſly related, he has admitted only thoſe that are ſupported by ſtrong evidences. The barons wars are alſo a ſubject that can hardly be treated to the ſatisfaction of all readers; ſome conſidering as rebellion, what others deem a juſt defence of liberty and property. Mr. Rapin has declared for neither of theſe opinions, farther than induced by ſolid reaſons, and, by means of the Fœdera, has clearly accounted for the riſe and progreſs of theſe wars, which, for want of that aſſiſtance, are very confuſedly explained by others.

What moſt embarraſſed our author, is the national partiality of the hiſtorians, chiefly upon two articles, the violation of the treaties, and, the ſucceſs of the battles. For the firſt, where the truth was no other way to be diſcovered, he has frequently made uſe of a very natural maxim; viz. that it is not likely the party, to whom a treaty is advantageous, ſhould be the firſt to break it. As for the ſecond article, nothing is more common than to ſee hiſtorians ſtick to own their nation vanquiſhed, and think it incumbent on them to diminiſh its loſſes, or magnify its victories. On theſe occaſions, when our author could not fix the ſucceſs of a battle by the conſequences, he has taken care to inform the reader of the diſagreement between the hiſtorians.

Mr. Rapin, profeſſing to write for the information of foreigners, was obliged to give a particular account of the Engliſh conſtitution. The following diſcourſe, therefore, was ſolely deſigned for the inſtruction of ſuch as are ſtrangers to our government, which, being different, as he obſerved, from all others, the reader, as well as hiſtorian, muſt always have it in ſight, leaſt wrong ideas lead them into great errors.

Origin and nature of the Engliſh conſtitution.

The government of England is a mixt and limited monarchy, as it is certain, all the governments, in Europe, eſtabliſhed by the northern nations formerly were. They were monarchies, inveſted, not with abſolute and arbitrary, but with a power bounded by the national laws. Such is, ſtill, the Engliſh conſtitution, whatever changes have happened in the other European kingdoms. The king and people make but one body, of which the king is head. He directs and gives motion to all the other members, takes care of their welfare, and ought always to have an eye to the publick, to procure their good, and guard them againſt all impending evils. By watching, thus, for the publick, he conſults his own intereſt, ſince, being ſtrictly united with his ſubjects, he is ſure to be gainer by all the advantages he procures them.

But, to enable the king to labour, effectually, for the good of the kingdom, it was neceſſary, to cloath him with a great power, and aſſign him a revenue ſufficient to live in ſplendor, in order to attract the veneration of the people. It was neceſſary to grant him privileges approaching abſolute power; as the command of the armies, and fortified places; the execution of the laws, and the adminiſtration of juſtice, in his own name; the pardoning of condemned criminals; the diſpoſal of all the high offices; the calling and diſſolving of the parliament; the rejecting of bills he thinks contrary to the publick good; the proclaiming peace and war; theſe are called the prerogatives of the king, or of the crown. I do not pretend to give an exact liſt of them. I am ſenſible, ſome extend them much farther, but all I mean here is, that the king has great prerogatives, which were the effect, or conſequence, of the mutual agreement of the firſt Anglo-Saxon kings, with their people. The king wants nothing to render him happy, and powerful; his revenues are more than ſufficient for his ordinary expences, and to reward thoſe who diſtinguiſh themſelves by their merit, beſides the preferments in the church, ſtate, and army, which he may beſtow as he pleaſes. Has he a juſt war to maintain? He is not obliged to burden his people with taxes and impoſitions. It is the people themſelves, that voluntarily furniſh him with every thing neceſſary. Thus, without ever being under a neceſſity of heaping up riches for the future, he is ſure of finding, in the purſes of his ſubjects, wherewithal to ſupply his preſent occaſions.

There are but two things, the Saxons did not think proper to truſt their kings with, by reaſon of the ill conſequences, for, being of like paſſions with other men, they might, very poſſibly, abuſe them, viz. the power of changing the laws, enacted by conſent of king and people; and, the power of raiſing taxes at their pleaſure. From theſe two articles ſpring numberleſs branches, concerning the liberty and property of the ſubject, which the king cannot touch, without breaking the conſtitution, and they are the diſtinguiſhing character of the Engliſh monarchy. The prerogatives of the crown, and the rights and privileges of the people, flowing from the two fore-mentioned articles, are the ground of all the laws that, from time to time, have been made, by the unanimous conſent of king and people. The Engliſh government conſiſts, in the correſpondence and ſtrict union of the king's prerogatives with the people's liberties. So far are theſe from deſtroying one another, that they are rather the ſtrongeſt cement of that ſtrict union, ſo neceſſary between the prince and people. The king, by means of his prerogatives, is able to protect his ſubjects; to ſee the laws duly executed, and juſtice impartially adminiſtered; to defend the weak againſt their powerful oppreſſors; to aſſiſt the unfortunate, and puniſh the diſturbers of the ſociety. On the other hand, the people, whilſt in poſſeſſion of their liberties, confiding in the laws, and the king's care to execute them, live ſecurely, without any fears for their lives or properties. They enjoy the fruits of their induſtry, which turns to the king's advantage, ſince from the people it is, that the king's occaſions are ſupplied. If they make their court to the nobles, it is only when their intereſt, or aſſiſtance, may be neceſſary, and, not out of fear of being oppreſſed, ſince the greateſt are equally ſubject to the laws, with the meaneſt.

It cannot be denied, ſuch a government is extremely proper to render both prince and people happy; but when kings aroſe, as ſome there were, that aimed at abſolute power; by changing the old, and making new, laws, at pleaſure; by impoſing illegal and arbitrary taxes on the people; this excellent government being, in ſome meaſure, diſſolved, by theſe deſtructive maxims, confuſion, and civil wars enſued, which ſome, very wrongfully aſcribe, to the fickle and reſtleſs temper of the Engliſh. On the other hand, the people have not always been contented, with maintaining their privileges, when once infringed by the king; but, for fear of the like attempts for the future, have proceeded to meaſures very deſtructive of the juſt rights of the crown; and this is the reaſon why the prerogative, abuſed by ſome former kings, runs not, at preſent, ſo high as formerly.

Since then, the Engliſh conſtitution conſiſts in an intimate union between the prince and people, as between the head and body, it is, conſequently, in its utmoſt perfection and ſtrength whilſt this union ſubſiſts, and both, without mutual ſuſpicions, jealouſies, and fears, ſecurely enjoy their reſpective rights. On the contrary, it decays and degenerates, when one endeavours to invade the privileges of the other.

To preſerve a perfect union between the king and the people, it was neceſſary to eſta-bliſh a way of communication between them. This was done by means of a Wittena-Gemot, or aſſembly of wiſe men, who repreſented the whole nation. This method the Saxons brought with them, from Germany, where all publick affairs were decided in ſuch an aſſembly, of which their generals, choſen in time of war, were preſidents. However, they were obliged to make ſome alterations, becauſe in Germany they had no kings, the ſupreme power being lodged in the Wittena-Gemot; whereas in England, their chiefs, or leaders, aſſumed the title of kings. Hengiſt, who firſt led Saxon troops into Britain, as auxiliaries, was the firſt that aſſumed this title, probably, with the approbation of the Saxons, under his command. For, ſince he was not, naturally, their king, how could he become ſo without their conſent? But it muſt be obſerved, Hengiſt may be conſidered in a double capacity. At his arrival, in Great-Britain, he was, certainly, only general of the Saxons; but after receiving the grant of Kent from Vortigern, king of the Britons, he became as much ſovereign of that country, as Vortigern was before him, and accordingly, aſſumed the title of king of Kent; but this new title did not make him king of the Saxons, of whom he was only intruſted with the command. So it is likely, the Saxons, in conſenting their general ſhould become their ſovereign, did not give him an abſolute power over their lives and properties, ſuppoſing, what would be extremely difficult to prove, he was inveſted with ſuch a power over his Britiſh ſubjects. There is a remarkable paſſage, in the Hiſtory of France, to this purpoſe. Clovis was king of the Francs, before he led his army into Gaul, and his large conqueſts there, gave him no more power over his own countrymen, than he enjoyed before. This is evident, from his being prevented, by a common ſoldier, from preſenting the archbiſhop of Rheims, with a piece of plate, taken among the plunder. The ſoldier could not bear, the king ſhould appropriate to himſelf what belonged to all in common, ſo hewed it in pieces with his battle-ax, and took his ſhare. The king, who knew he exceeded his power, did not dare to puniſh him upon the ſpot, and tho' he afterwards took an occaſion to put him to death, it was upon ſome other account, wherein he might lawfully do it. It may then, with good reaſon, be affirmed, that the Saxon generals, in aſſuming the title of king, acquired not a deſpotick power over their own followers, by whoſe aſſiſtance they conquered Britain. Since, therefore, the firſt kings had not ſuch a power, it was neceſſary to eſtabliſh ſome way to prevent their uſurping it; and that could not be done better, than by general aſſemblies, which conſiſting of the king, and the chiefs of the people, kept the balance even betwixt both. It muſt be farther obſerved, there is one material difference between the ſettlement of the Francs, in Gaul, and of the Saxons, in Britain. In Gaul, the number of the conquered was always ſuperior to that of the conquerors. Whereas in Britain, if any Britons remained in the conquered provinces, they were but few, and in a ſtate of ſlavery. So, the country was, properly, inhabited only with Saxons, Juttes, and Angles, over whom, the conqueſts made by their own arms, gave to their firſt kings no power, but what they conſented to. We are ignorant, indeed, of the particulars of the agreement between the kings and their reſpective people; but the proofs that afterwards appear, of the people's liberty, leave no room to doubt, there was, at firſt, ſome regulation thereon.

It is not eaſy to know, diſtinctly, who the Witan or wiſemen were, that compoſed their Wittena-Gemots. At firſt, theſe aſſemblies might only conſiſt of the Saxon officers, among whom the conquered lands were divided, and who, from thence, became the princes, or chiefs, in the ſeveral ſtates. In proceſs of time, the Britons having, entirely, abandoned their country, the conquerors, finding themſelves too few to cultivate the whole, ſent for a great number of families from Germany, to whom the reſt of the lands were given. Theſe diſtributions were thus made. The new king gave, to thoſe of his followers, who were diſtinguiſhed by their birth, ſervices, or perſonal merit, ſuch a portion of land, on condition they ſerved the crown, on certain occaſions; which theſe parcelled out again to others, with a reſervation of ſuch and ſuch ſervices to themſelves. Theſe two ſorts of poſſeſſors were called thanes, that is, ſervants; but the firſt were diſtinguiſhed by the title of king's thanes, which anſwers to that of the immediate vaſſals of the crown. Theſe, after the Norman conqueſt, were called barons, and afterwards, peers of the realm; for earl and duke were only honorary titles, or names of offices. It is not denied, the king's thanes were members of the Wittena-Gemots; but that the other thanes were ſo, is greatly diſputed, as will be ſeen, in the Diſſertation on the government, laws, and cuſtoms of the Saxons. It ſuffices, at preſent, that there was in each kingdom, an aſſembly of Witan, or wiſemen, who, jointly with the king, regulated all important affairs, made laws and ordinances, and impoſed taxes. As nothing was decided, but by the mutual conſent of the king and the aſſembly, their intereſts not being ſeperate, and their views the ſame, viz. the good of the publick, this is a clear evidence, that the eſſence of the government conſiſted in the ſtrict union between king and people. If we look into the Hiſtories of the other European kingdoms, founded by the northern nations, we ſhall find the like aſſemblies, under different names, as Diets, in Germany, and Poland, and Cortez, in Spain. It is not, therefore, ſtrange, the Saxons ſhould eſtabliſh, in England, the only form of government known to them.

After the Norman conqueſt, theſe aſſemblies were called parliaments. If William the Conqueror continued them, which, perhaps, haps, is not very eaſy to prove, it was not with the ſame rights and privileges they enjoyed under the Saxon kings. It is true, in the following reigns, ſome traces of them appear, which made it thought, they were not entirely aboliſhed. However, parliaments were not frequent till king John, and Henry III, in whoſe reign, ſeveral affirm, and, perhaps, not without reaſon, that the commons, for the firſt time, ſent repreſentatives to parliament. Probably, the lords and commons, after their ſeparation, the time whereof is unknown, met in two different houſes, ſince the Engliſh ſtill call houſes the two rooms where they aſſemble, tho' under the ſame roof. They ſay, the upper houſe, or houſe of lords, and the lower houſe, or houſe of commons, to denote what is expreſſed, in French, by the word chamber. It is only ſince the reign of Edward I, ſucceſſor to Henry III, that there has been an uninterrupted ſeries of parliaments.

After the commons became a diſtinct houſe from the lords, they pretended to be the ſole repreſentatives of the people, by whom they were choſen. The lords could pretend only to act for themſelves, or for the body of the nobility, as making a conſiderable part of the nation. However this be, the barons, of whom very likely the parliament at firſt conſiſted, loſt by degrees many of their antient rights, and the houſe of commons came to be conſidered as the guardians of the people's intereſts. However, the lords ſtill retain very great privileges; they are, for inſtance, the higheſt court of juſtice in the kingdom; they have a power to bring in, approve, and throw out bills; in a word, they always make an eſſential part of the parliament. The biſhops and abbots, who had all along a right to ſit in parliament, had it continued to them after the conqueſt. It cannot well be doubted that they ſate in the Wittena-Gemots, as king's thanes, or barons, ſince they were the immediate tenants of the crown; but it is not ſo certain, that they enjoyed this right, as repreſentatives of the clergy.

The commons, as a conſequence of their being the repreſentatives of the people, claim an undiſputed right of laying taxes, and granting money to the king. So that the houſe of lords in this caſe have no other power than to paſs, or throw out, the bill, without offering to make any alterations or amendments.

Thus, the two houſes of parliament compoſe the body of the nation, jointly with the king, who is the head. The cloſe and abſolutely neceſſary union between the king and the parliament, appears in nothing ſo much as in the manner of making an act of parliament, or law. When either of the two houſes deſigns to bring in a bill (for ſo is an act called before it is paſſed) after examining and debating every clauſe, it is ſent to the other houſe for their approbation. If it paſſes there, it is brought to the king for the royal aſſent, after which, and not before, it has the form and force of a law. But if either of the houſes throw it out, or the king refuſes his aſſent, it comes to nothing, as if it had never been mentioned. Nothing more plainly demonſtrates, that the eſſence of the Engliſh government, conſiſts in the union between the king and his people. Take away this union, and it becomes confuſion and anarchy.

Whether the commons originally ſate in parliament, or only ſince the reign of Henry III, it is certain, their power, by degrees, is very much encreaſed, to which the maxim, that their houſe ſolely repreſents the people, has greatly contributed. This maxim was not yet eſtabliſhed in the reign of Henry VIII, ſince we find he applied to the barons for a ſupply of money. But this is not the only new privilege they have acquired: on their ſeparation from the lords, the intereſts of the two houſes were not the ſame upon all occaſions. They have had frequent conteſts concerning their reſpective rights; but generally the commons had the advantage of the lords; and no wonder, ſince they alone diſpoſe of the nation's money.

On the other hand, as great alterations have happened with regard to the lords or peers. Formerly all the immediate vaſſals of the crown were barons, and, as ſuch, had a ſeat in parliament; but now, as there are none of thoſe lands that were called fees of the crown, the right of ſitting in the houſe of lords is annexed to the bare honorary titles of duke, marqueſs, earl, viſcount and baron, which give thoſe that are inveſted therewith, no power over the ſhires, cities, or lands, whoſe names they bear, and which the king may beſtow on whom he pleaſes. However, when once theſe titles are conferred on a family, the head cannot be deprived of his right to ſit in parliament, unleſs he has been judicially condemned by his peers, for ſome crime that renders him unworthy. But it muſt be obſerved, it is in the king's power to extend or limit, many ways, the right of ſucceeding to theſe honours; ſo that ſometimes, tho' rarely, he extends it to the female, in default of the male, line. Tho' a peer only has a right to ſit in the houſe of lords, the king may, if he pleaſes, call the ſon of a nobleman to the houſe of peers, in his father's life-time. The inferior titles are always included in the ſuperior, ſo that every duke is at the ſame time marqueſs, earl, viſcount and baron. Thus, all the lords are barons, and properly as ſuch, are members of the parliament, according to antient uſage; for before and long after the conqueſt, the lords of parliament were conſidered only as the king's thane or barons. For this reaſon, civil wars in the reigns of king John and Henry III, are called the barons wars. The title of duke was firſt conferred, in England, after the conqueſt, by Edward III, on his eldeſt ſon, whom he made duke of Cornwall. The title of marqueſs is much later. In the time of the Saxons, earls or counts were properly governors or chiefs of ſhires or counties, ſo called from them. William the Conqueror having diſtributed the lands of the Engliſh among his followers, they on whom he conferred the title of earl or count, became really and truly lords of thoſe lands whoſe titles they bore, ſo that they were hereditary in their families. Afterwards, but at what time is not known, they loſt this privilege, and the title of earl, as was before obſerved, is become only honorary. The viſcounts, under the Saxon kings, were lieutenants to the earls in their counties. They diſcharged the office of high-ſheriff, which is now left to inferior officers, whilſt the viſcounts are ranked among the peers, and have even the precedence of the barons. This laſt title was formerly general, and included the whole body of the nobility or peers of the realm, of whom the upper houſe of parliament conſiſts. Next to theſe are what they call in England, the gentry, who, tho' diſtinguiſhed by ſeveral titles, as knight, eſquire, &c. are all included in the body of the commons, who in France are called, the third eſtate. From among theſe are choſen the knights of the ſhires, citizens and burgeſſes, who compoſe the lower houſe, to the number of 513; but it ſeldom happens that all are preſent, and 40 are ſufficient to make a houſe.

What has been ſaid ſhews, how the two houſes of parliament are a part of the legiſlature, ſince by them the laws, are made with the royal aſſent. Accordingly, the parliament has ever been very careful to preſerve its privileges, and hinder the leaſt breach, for fear of loſing them inſenſibly, as it has happened in other kingdoms. On the other hand, moſt of the laws tend to maintain the liberty and property of the ſubjects, ſo that they can be deprived of them only by law. There are abſolutely but two ways to deprive the Engliſh of their liberties; either by laying aſide parliaments entirely, or by bribing the members to ſacrifice their country to their ambition or avarice. Both theſe methods have been tried more than once, and for ſome time with ſeeming ſucceſs, but in the end have turned to the confuſion and ruin of the projectors. The Engliſh have ever been extremely jealous of their liberties, and this jealouſy has frequently cauſed violent motions in the kingdom, when they have ſeen or ſuſpected a tendency to undermine their privileges, and they have thereby preſerved the conſtitution of their government in much the ſame ſtate, as in the beginning of the monarchy.

Some PARTICULARS of the LIFE of Mr. RAPIN de THOYRAS.

MR. RAPIN, counted among his anceſtors and relations, many eminent perſons as well of the ſword as the gown. His family is originally from Savoy, where it flouriſhed time out of mind, and enjoyed ſeveral honourable poſts. As I am ignorant of their perſonal qualities, I cannot ſay whether it was through a wiſe precaution, or to perpetuate an ill-grounded enmity, that a biſhop of Maurienne cauſed to be engraved, in the epiſcopal palace, the following inſcription ſtill to be ſeen, Caveant ſucceſſores noſtri a familia Rapinorum, that is, Let our ſucceſſors beware of the RAPINS. On the other hand, this family pretends, that their external luſtre was impaired ſolely by their ſteady adherence to the laws of honour and juſtice. This is inſinuated by the author of the following verſes, which are not quoted for their elegance.

Pour n' avoir ſans beſoin ſu prendre,
On voit tomber cette maiſon:
Si l' Effet eut ſuivi ſon nom,
Elle autoit de quoi ſe defendre.

That is, this family, for being too honeſt to invade the property of others, is gone to decay. Had they been given to what their name implies, they would have wherewithal to ſupport themſelves.

But to draw nearer to Mr. RAPIN, I ſhall proceed to four brothers of that name, who ſettled in France, in the reign of Francis I.

One, a clergyman, was almoner to queen Catharine de Medici, who deſired him of the duke of Savoy. Beſides the preferments he enjoyed in his own country, he was called the king's orator, but what that means I cannot tell.

His brothers (of whom but one has left iſſue) were all three ſoldiers, and embraced the reformed religion; for the ſake of which, very probably, they abandoned their country.

The eldeſt was a colonel of foot, and governor of Montauban, with authority over the neighbouring governors. His name is among thoſe of the viſcounts, who commanded the troops of the reformed, in the ſouthern provinces of France. Letters, ſtill extant, ſhew how well known he was to Henry IV, to Lewis and Henry princes of Conde, to admiral Chaſtillon, and many other perſons of the firſt quality.

All we know of one of his brothers, called Peter, is, that a commiſſion of captain of horſe muſt, by all circumſtances, belong to him; but of this we cannot be ſure, becauſe the name is not expreſſed.

Philibert, another brother, was gentelman to the prince of Conde, and afterwards his ſteward. He had no leſs reputation in military, than capacity in civil, affairs: but both proved fatal to him, as they drew upon him the enmity of the Catholicks, and, particularly, of the parliament of Toulouſe, who cauſed his head to be ſtruck off at the very time he was come, by the king's order, to regiſter the edict of peace of 1568.

The French hiſtorians frequently ſpeak of theſe two brothers. Father Daniel alone does not mention them, and paſſes over in ſilence, this cruel execution. The reaſon does not appear at firſt, for he cannot ſay, this ſentence, how unjuſt ſoever it may be ſuppoſed, is only a private affair, which, therefore, he might omit if he pleaſed; ſince it is viſible, on the contrary, that ſuch an event, rendered memorable by its circumſtances and conſequences, ought neceſſarily to have place in Hiſtory. But when we conſider, we find this able hiſtorian has very artfully managed this omiſſion for two uſes; firſt, to extinguiſh, as far as in him lay, all remembrance of a rage which caſts a blemiſh on the Roman Catholicks; ſecondly, to render the reformed odious, when he comes to ſpeak of the ravages committed by the admiral's army, ſome time after, about Toulouſe. In the interim, with regard to theſe ravages, he was not ſo free as he deſired, but was obliged to ſpeak of them in general terms, for he could not deſcend to particulars, without diſcovering the connexion between theſe ravages and RAPIN's death, by which they were both occaſioned and juſtified. But what he ſlightly mentions, Thuanus and Mezerai relate more at large, and ſet in a true light. Mezerai, who is more circumſtantial, and informs us, there was then in Toulouſe 8000 regular troops, which added to the great number of inhabitants, deprived the reformed of all hopes of becoming maſters of the city, ſays expreſly, that the Hugonots-- "ſet fire

Peter Rapin, baron of Mauvers, ſon to Philibert, was governor of Mas-Granier, one of the cautionary-towns granted to the reformed, in Guienne. He was a ſoldier from his youth, and attended king Henry IV, in all his expeditions. Moſt part of that time, he received not a farthing from his eſtate, which threw him into great ſtraits, as well as many others for the ſame reaſon. The king himſelf, was in no better circumſtances, as may be inferred from his anſwer to Mr. RAPIN, who having loſt his horſe, beſought his majeſty to give him wherewithal to buy another. " I " would, ſays he, withal my heart, but ſee, " I have ſcarce a ſhirt to my back." But Mr. RAPIN's ſufferings in the religious wars were not confined to what paſſed in the army. He thrice ſaw his houſe burnt and battered down in his life, and every thing plundered. It is true, he had amends made him the laſt time, as far as was poſſible, and in a manner which muſt have been very agreeable to him; for the Catholick gentlemen of the neighbourhood, by whom he was eſteemed and beloved, meeting together, reſolved to ſupply him with neceſſaries to plow and ſow his lands; and as thoſe troubles laſted but eight months, when they were appeaſed, he found a crop ready, and all his eſtate, except his houſe, in as good condition as the moſt diligent owner could have kept it. On another occaſion, he had a pleaſure without any allay: upon a rumour of his death, he read himſelf a letter from queen Mary de Medici, expreſſing her great ſorrow to his family. He married a daughter of Mr. de Lupe, lord of Moravat, captain of 50 men at arms, governor of Mauvezin, a cautionary-town, and a major-general.

He left a numerous iſſue, of whom his ſecond ſon James, ſieur de Thoyras *, was the darling of his parents. His father left him more than any other of the younger children, and his mother gave him, moreover, that portion of the eſtate of John de la Ferriere, vidame † of Chartres, and one of the heads of the French Proteſtants, which fell to her in right of her mother. He was deſigned for a ſoldier, like his brothers; but his mother willing to have him near her, was for breeding him a ſcholar, to which the father conſented. After he had finiſhed his ſtudies, he was admitted advocate in the court of the edict of Caſtres, and, contrary to to the cuſtom of the country, were perſons nobly deſcended are never of that profeſſion, he practiſed it both at Caſtres and at Caſtelnaudary, and Toulouſe, above 50 years, to the day of his death. It is true, I include the four years he ſpent at Paris, where he went, upon news of Mr. Pelliſſon, his brother-in-law, being arreſted with Mr. Fouquet. Nothing paſſed in that famous affair, but what he was privy to, and he was very ſerviceable in many reſpects. He was one of the three concerned in the Factum, and ſupplied all we find there relating to the Roman law. I ſaw in France, a letter ſent to him by Mr. Fouquet from the Baſtile, thanking him for it, in the moſt affectionate manner. All that new him, of whom ſeveral are now living, have always deſcribed him as one of the prime advocates of his time, and very eminent for his impartiality and integrity. His wife, who died, at Geneva, where ſhe was ſent by the king's order, for refuſing to turn Catholick, was ſiſter to George and Paul Pelliſſon, whoſe memory is ſtill recent. Her father and grandfather were judges in the parliament of Toulouſe, and in the court of the edict of Caſtres. Raymond Pelliſſon, her great grandfather, after having been maſter of the requeſts, and ambaſſador to Portugal, was, at laſt, firſt preſident of the ſenate of Camberi, and commandant, in Savoy, whilſt in poſſeſſion of the French. I ſay nothing of a very extraordinary affair that befell him, and on which ſeveral authors have enlarged, nor of his deſcendents above-named, becauſe I ſhould only copy what is to be found in the ſupplement to Morei's Dictionary, printed at Amſterdam, in 1716. This family, from whence have ſprung ſeveral illuſtrious perſons, is originally Engliſh, and comes from an attorney-general to the prince of Wales, when in Guienne.

I proceed now to Mr. RAPIN. PAUL RAPIN Sieur de Thoyras, younger ſon of James, was born at Caſtres, March 15, 1661. He began to ſtudy Latin under a tutor, his father kept in the houſe, after which he was ſent to Puylaurens, and from thence to Saumur. At this laſt place, when about 17, he had a quarrel with a friend, upon a ſlight occaſion, and they immediately challenged each other. But whether they loſt time in fetching their ſwords, for being ſtudents they ſeldom wore any, or the duel held long, night came whilſt they were engaged, and then Mr. RAPIN's ſword broke near the hilt, without his perceiving it. His adverſary, immediately ſeeing it, generouſly told him. Whereupon the combat ceaſed, and embracing each other, they returned together to town. Some time after he had another quarrel with a perſon much older than himſelf, who rudely joſtled him, as he was walking through a narrow and difficult paſſage. Mr. RAPIN fell upon him, but they were quickly parted by the people there preſent. He ran for his ſword, and ſpeedily returning, found the perſon gone, neither could he meet with him, tho' he carefully ſought him ſeveral days. Some time after, he heard the man was gone to Paris, where Mr. RAPIN followed him. He was no ſooner arrived, but he was ſeiſed by a guard of the marſhals of France. This accident, which he did not expect, believing his deſign very ſecret, becauſe he had not imparted it, was occaſioned by the advice his uncle Pel-liſſon received from Saumur, from whence he was informed of the ſuppoſed cauſe of his nephew's journey, which might be of ill conſequence, and withal, of the place where his antagoniſt might be heard of. Mr. Pelliſon fearing a duel would enſue, which, however it ended, would ruin his nephew, acquainting the marſhals of France with the matter, Mr. RAPIN, who was yet very young, affording them opportunity to ſecure him, by going directly to his uncle's. The marſhals having heard both parties, condemned the aggreſſor to lie in priſon at Fort-l'Eveque, till Mr. RAPIN ſhould conſent to his diſcharge, which he did about a month after, at the deſire of the prince of Furſtemberg, biſhop of Strasburg, who was then at Paris. In the interim, the next day after the ſentence, the priſoner's brother, who was reckoned a good ſword's-man, meeting Mr. RAPIN in the ſtreet, accoſted him, and talking to him ſo as to renew the quarrel, Mr. RAPIN anſwered him by drawing his ſword, and wounded him before they were parted. But this rencounter was kept ſecret by the advice of the friends of both parties, for fear of incenſing the marſhals.

The beginning of the year 1679, Mr. RAPIN returned to his father's, in order to apply himſelf cloſely to the ſtudy of the law; but before he had made any progreſs, he was obliged, with many other young gentlemen, to commence advocate, upon notice of an edict which was publiſhed ſoon after, that a doctor's degree ſhould not be given to any perſon, who had not ſtudied five years in ſome univerſity.

This ſame year, the courts of the edict were ſuppreſſed, by which Mr. RAPIN's family were forced to remove to Toulouſe. Not long after, Mr. RAPIN perceiving the ill ſtate of the reformed, and that, probably, it would daily grow worſe, deſired his father's conſent to quit the profeſſion of advocate for that of arms. His father, without abſolutely denying his requeſt, returned ſuch a reply, as only tended to gain time. Not that the requeſt ſeemed to him unreaſonable and ill-grounded; but he was apprehenſive this new way of life, where ambition is more fired than in any other, would expoſe his ſon to great temptation, when he ſhould find by daily experience, that it would not be poſſible to riſe to any tolerable poſt, ſo long as he adhered to his religion; whereas that obſtacle being removed, he might hope to be advanced like the reſt. This ſtate of uncertainty, made him very remiſs in the ſtudy of the law. He pleaded however one cauſe as advocate, but ſtopped there, and applied himſelf more cloſely than ever, to the reading of good authors, to the mathematicks and muſick, in which he acquired great skill.

In the year 1685, his father died, and two months after, the edict of Nantz was revoked. Whereupon Mr. RAPIN retired into the country, with his mother and brothers; but as the perſecution, ſoon after, was at the higheſt, he departed with his youngeſt brother, and arrived in England, in March, 1686.

Not long after, there came to London a French abbe of quality, and friend of Mr. Pelliſon, who made Mr. RAPIN frequent viſits, and introduced him to Mr. de Barillon, the French ambaſſador, from whom Mr. RAPIN received great civilities. Theſe gentlemen would have perſuaded him to wait upon the king, aſſuring him of a gracious reception. Mr. RAPIN, who could not ſee what pretenſions he had to ſuch an honour, and beſides, was apprehenſive that a propoſal ſeemingly ſo advantageous, might tend to his prejudice, excuſed himſelf in the handſomeſt manner he could. This affair put him upon ſeriouſly reflecting on his preſent ſituation, continually teazed about his religion, by the marqueſs of Seiſſac and other French Catholicks then, at London, but eſpecially by the abbe, who, tho' extremely courteous and civil, always turned their converſation to controverſy. Perceiving, therefore, it was not poſſible for him to defend himſelf unprepared, againſt a man who was maſter of theſe ſubjects, and managed them with great art, he returned into the country, from whence he was come to viſit the abbe, without taking leave. He knew himſelf guilty of ill manners, but choſe to be ſo, rather than remain any longer expoſed.

As he had then no expectations, in England, he made but a ſhort ſtay, and going over to Holland, where he had relations, he liſted himſelf in a company of French voluntiers, at Utrecht, commanded by Mr. Rapin, his couſin german.

The ſame year, Mr. Pelliſon publiſhed his reflections on religious differences, and ſent them to Mr. RAPIN, charging him to tell him his opinion, which he did very largely, as he ſaid himſelf, retorting, in ſeveral places, Mr. Pelliſon's expreſſions. But nothing of this appears among his papers. Not that I think it either loſt or miſlaid, but rather believe that out of modeſty he never took a copy, imagining that what he could ſay on ſuch a ſubject, was not worth preſerving.

He was ſtill in the company of voluntiers when they went into England, with the prince of Orange. But in 1689, the Lord Kingſton made him enſign in his own regiment, with which he paſſed into Ireland. At the ſiege of Carrickfergus, juſt after his arrival, he had the good fortune to gain the eſteem of the officers of the regiment, and eſpecially of lieutenant colonel Fielding, who, in leſs than a year, procured him a lieutenancy.

In the beginning of 1690, the regiment to which Mr. RAPIN belonged, was given to lieutenant general Douglaſs, who, upon the recommendation of three French colonels of the army, took more notice of him than of the reſt of the ſubalterns, and afterwards put a very great confidence in him.

After the battle of the Boyne, in which Mr. RAPIN was preſent, general Douglaſs was detached with his own, and 12 other regiments of horſe and foot, to make a diverſion about Athlone, and, if poſſible, ſurpriſe the town. He appointed Mr. RAPIN and Mr. Carles, now lieutenant general, in Portugal, to act as quartermaſter general of his little army. This ſiege not proving ſucceſsful, the town being ſtrongly garriſoned, general Douglaſs was recalled. Mr. RAPIN, who was ſent before to receive orders, found the king at the head of a line, who ſtopping him, asked ſeveral queſtions, to which Mr. RAPIN made ſuch anſwers, as ſerved to remove ſome ill impreſſions infuſed into his majeſty, concerning Douglaſs's conduct.

At the aſſault of Limerick, he was ſhot in the ſhoulder, and next day the ſiege being raiſed, was forced to ride four miles on horſeback, in great anguiſh. He was left with the reſt of the wounded, (among whom was his brother, who was ſhot thro' the body) and ſo loſt his regiment, which was ordered to the North. But ſoon after, he heard general Douglaſs had procured him a company, and cauſed him to be admitted, tho' abſent. It was the ſame company where he had been enſign, and where he was ſtill the ſame lieutenant, which made Mr. RAPIN extremely uneaſy.

The next year, general Douglaſs had orders to go to Flanders. Mr. RAPIN, whom he deſigned for his aid de camp, not being in a condition to attend him, by reaſon of his wound, adviſed him to take another, to whom the general ſoon gave a company in the Scotch guards, of which he was now colonel. The campaign opened in Ireland, with the taking of Baltimore, where Mr. RAPIN had the ſatisfaction to be ſerviceable to a poor diſtreſſed captive family, with whom he was acquainted the foregoing year. He was afterwards, at the ſiege of Athlone, and in the aſſault, made through the river that runs under the ſtrongeſt rampart of the town, a bold and brave action, and which ſucceeded, as it is thought, contrary to the expectation of the generals. In this town were left two regiments of different nations, commanded by the lieutenant colonels, who underſtood not each other's language, and were both very jealous of their power, which might have occaſioned diſputes. Happily, Mr. RAPIN belonged to one, and his intimate friend, a captain of good ſenſe, to the other, who were both equally eſteemed by their reſpective commanders; ſo whenever any accident happened that was like to breed a quarrel, theſe two officers, who were unprejudiced, agreed between them upon what was to be done, and adviſed it each with conſtant ſucceſs.

After that, Mr. RAPIN was ſent ſucceſſively to ſeveral garriſons, and among the reſt to Kilkenny, where he frequently waited on the biſhop, who ſeemed pleaſed with his converſation. This commerce would have been very agreeable, could he have peaceably enjoyed it; but the warm and daily conteſts between the mayor and the officers, ſcarce allowed him a moment's repoſe. He often uſed his endeavours to ſtifle them, and prevented their proceeding to extremities. In the interim, his fear that things would be brought to a deſperate paſs, made him gladly embrace the opportunity of commanding two companies in another place. Some time after, he rejoined his regiment at Kinſale, where he contracted an intimate friendſhip with Sir James Waller, who commanded there.

About the end of the year 1693, he received an order to repair to England, without any reaſon aſſigned; but at the ſame time, a letter from Mr. Belcaſtel informed him, he was to be governor to the earl of Portland's ſon. He could not conceive whence this proceeded, having never had any ſuch thoughts; and it was ſome time before he knew, he was recommended by the lord Galloway. He came, therefore, to London, and entered upon his office. Here was an end of all his hopes of riſing in the army, to ſuch poſts as ſeveral younger officers of his acquaintance have obtained. All the amends he received, was leave to reſign his company to his brother, who died, in 1719, lieutenant-colonel in a regiment of Engliſh dragoons. It is true, ſome time after, the king granted him a penſion of 100l. a year, till he ſhould better provide for him, which never happened. So he enjoyed his penſion ſeveral years, but upon that prince's death, it ceaſed, and a place was given him, which brought him in but a moderate income.

His new employment obliged him to be ſometimes in Holland, often, in England, and alſo in France, whilſt the earl of Portland was ambaſſador, till the young lord was fixed at the Hague, where he learned his exerciſes. Whilſt he was there, in the year 1699, Mr. RAPIN married Mariamne Toſtart, an advantageous match, of whom I ſhall ſay nothing, as ſhe is living. This did not hinder him, however, from minding his pupil, and attending him in his travels. He began then with Germany, where they made ſome ſtay at ſeveral courts, and, particularly, at Vienna. From thence they paſſed into Italy, by way of Tyrol, where they ſaw marſhal Villeroy, a priſoner, who gave Mr. RAPIN a letter for cardinal d' Etrees, then at Venice.

At his return, his employment ceaſing, he repaired to his family, who in his abſence lived at the Hague, where he ſpent ſome years. During that time, he improved his leiſure hours, as far as the common duties of life would allow, in reſuming the ſtudy of fortification, and eſpecially of hiſtory, which led him to draw many general and particular genealogical and chronological tables. But what was moſt agreable to him, and, as he thought, moſt inſtructive, was his being member of a ſociety or club, ſtill in being, to the erecting of which he was proud of contributing, where ſeveral perſons of learning and merit reaſoned upon ſuch ſubjects as occurred, and ſpoke their opinion on ſuch queſtions as were uſually propoſed. In the interim, as he found his his family increaſe, he reſolved to ſacrifice to the good of his children the pleaſures of the Hague, by retiring to a cheaper country. Accordingly, he removed, in 1707, to Wezel, in the duchy of Cleves. He found there a good number of French refugees, among whom were ſeveral officers, men of quality, with whom he lived very friendly; and he was alſo received as kindly as could be expected, by perſons of the higheſt rank, who were chiefly concerned in the government of the country, and who, on all occaſions, gave him marks of their favour.

The way of living at Wezel, different in many reſpects from that of the Hague, rendered him more than ever maſter of his time, and allowed him almoſt as much leiſure as he could deſire, to ſtudy the Hiſtory of England, and the nature of the government. This was a more extenſive deſign than, perhaps, it ſeems at firſt; for it obliged him, not only to peruſe all the Engliſh hiſtorians, but alſo thoſe of other nations, who had any affairs with the Engliſh, in order to procure light, and be aſſured of the truth of the facts, by confronting the ſeveral authors. He would have found it very difficult to ſucceed, or rather would, probably, have miſcarried, had he not before qualified himſelf for reading, in their original tongue, all the books he was obliged to conſult. Beſides Greek and Latin, which he learnt at the college, and had ſince improved, he underſtood Italian and Spaniſh, not to mention High and Low-Dutch, of which, indeed, he was not ſo much maſter. As for Engliſh, which was the moſt neceſſary of all, he had made that his particular ſtudy.

Tho' he was of a very ſtrong conſtitution, yet a 17 years conſtant application to compoſe his Hiſtory, entirely ruined his health. About three years before his death, he found himſelf quite ſpent, and frequently ſeiſed with violent pains in his ſtomach. He might have recovered, if he would have relinquiſhed his work, and unbent his mind for a time. Of this he was ſenſible, but could not reſolve it, as he ought. All he indulged himſelf in, was, not to riſe before ſix a-clock, after which it was impoſſible for him to ſleep or lie in his bed. As to his diverſions, of which walking was the moſt uſual, he was quickly tired of them, and, if his indiſpoſition permitted, returned to his work, which was the cauſe of his illneſs, and properly his ſole delight. At laſt, a violent fever, attended with an oppreſſion upon his lungs, carried him off the 7th day, being the 16th of May, 1725.

He has left one ſon and ſix daughters.

From what has been ſaid, it appears that Mr. RAPIN was naturally grave. This led him, whilſt he was in the ſervice, to ſeek the converſation of the ſerious, which prejudiced not only ſeveral of his comrades, but even ſome of his ſuperiors, againſt him, who would have had him partake of all their diverſions. But, on the other hand, it gained him the eſteem and friendſhip of many perſons of merit, who were in conſiderable poſts. We are not, however, to imagine, he was an enemy to mirth; he could be merry on occaſion, tho' not ſo frequently, nor ſo immoderately as many are; nay, he wrote ſeveral little things in proſe and verſe, with humour and gaiety; but as they were on light or ludicrous ſubjects, and deſigned only for a preſent amuſement with his friends, he never thought them worth reviſing, and I queſtion whether there is one to be found among his papers. What has been ſaid of his application to his ſtudy, and works, is alſo to be underſtood with this limitation, that it never hindered him from embracing all opportunities to ſerve his friends, and reconcile their differences.

Thus I have done what lies in my power, to make known Mr. RAPIN's character. I am ſenſible, that to have a compleat idea of him, we muſt, beſides what I have ſaid, conſider him in his writings, but this is what I ſhall not undertake. It belongs to the publick to declare what opinion he there gives of himſelf, and to determine whether he ſhews good ſenſe and judgment in his manner of diſcovering the motives of actions; and above all, whether he has juſtly obſerved an entire impartiality, ſo eſſential to a good Hiſtory.

THE INTRODUCTION.

The extent of Great-Britain, or Albion. Whence ſo called. Its firſt inhabitants. Cuſtoms and manners of the Britons. Their way of fighting and commerce. Their religion. The Druids. Their government. Original of the Iriſh, Scots, and Picts.

The extent of Great-Britain.

GREAT-BRITAIN, the largeſt and moſt conſiderable iſland in Europe, and perhaps in the whole world, is almoſt in the ſhape of a triangle; whoſe ſides, conſider'd as right-lines, are 1500, but, with the windings of the coaſts, about 1800 miles in compaſs. The ſhorteſt ſide, from North-Foreland in Kent to the Land's-End in Cornwall, is 300; the weſtern, from the Land's-End to the moſt northern point in Scotland, 800; and the eaſtern ſide, 700 miles in length.

Original of its names.

The names of Albion and Britain are ſo antient, that the reaſon of them can only be gueſs'd at. Some vainly fancy, that a certain giant, ſon to Neptune, gave the firſt of theſe. Others derive it from the Greek word Alphon, or white; becauſe the coaſts at a diſtance appear of that colour. Some again imagine it comes from the Celtic word Alp, or high, the land ſeeming to be ſo, as you approach it from the continent.

As for the name of Britain, ſome, but without any grounds, derive it from Brutus, a Trojan prince. Somner will have it come from the Britiſh word Brydio, or rage, as if the ſea on the coaſts of Great-Britain raged more than in other places, which is falſe in fact. Cambden and Temple, whoſe opinion is the moſt generally receiv'd, form the word Britain from Brith, which in the Britiſh language ſignifies woad, a plant with which the Britons dyed their skins. But how could foreigners give a Britiſh name to this iſland? which objection affects this as well as Somner's notion; for that Britain was firſt call'd ſo by foreigners is evident from the natives always ſtiling themſelves Cumri, or Cumbri, from whence Cambria, the name of Wales to this day. Bochartus, more probably, thinks the Phœnicians, trading to this iſland for tin, gave it the name of Baratanack, in their language, the land of tin, which the Greeks and Romans changed into Britannia. This conjecture is confirm'd by the Grecians calling the iſlands of Scilly Caſſiterides, which is the ſame in Greek as Baratanack in Phœnician; but, after all, this is no more than gueſs-work. It is notorious how far caprice and ſome trivial accidents were concern'd in naming ſeveral parts of the new world, when firſt diſcover'd. And, perhaps, the conjectures of Cambden and Bochartus are as foreign to their purpoſe, as ours would be, were we ignorant of the occaſion of the names of the countries of America, in tracing them from the language, cuſtoms, or commerce of the natives.

And inhabitants.

The original of the firſt inhabitants of Albion is equally uncertain, becauſe, in all probability, it was peopled at different times, by colonies from different places. However, endeavours have been made uſe of to give us ſome light in this affair, from their cuſtoms, manners, religion, and form of government. But before I proceed to this conſideration, I ſhall juſt touch upon the fabulous original of the Britons, publiſh'd in the twelfth century by Geoffrey of Monmouth, a Benedictin, in his Latin hiſtory of Britain, dedicated to Robert earl of Gloceſter, natural ſon to Henry I. This I the rather chuſe to do, as believing it the part of an hiſtorian, as well to guard his readers againſt fictions, as to relate matters of fact.

The fabulous origin of the Britons.

Brutus, grandſon to Æneas, having kill'd his father Silvius, as he was ſhooting at a wild beaſt, left Italy, and retir'd into Greece; from whence, with the deſcendants of the Trojans, who came thither after the deſtruction of Troy, he put to ſea, and, after many adventures, at laſt landed at Totneſs in Devonſhire. Britain being then inhabited by giants, under the government of Gogmagog; Brutus and his companions, tho' few in number, at length, quite rooted out the native giants, and got poſſeſſion of the whole iſland, which from Brutus was afterwards call'd Britain. Brutus, before his death, divided his dominions among his three ſons. Locrin or Loegrin, had Loegria, the ſame with England now. To Camber's lot fell Wales, thenceforward ſtiled Cambria. Albanact had Scotland, from him named Albania *.

Upon this foundation, the author proceeds to relate the various revolutions in the reigns of Brutus's ſucceſſors; but in ſuch a manner, as evidently ſhews his account to be fictitious.

That Great-Britain was peopled by the Celtæ or Gauls, the poſterity of Gomer, the ſon of Japhet, is allow'd on all hands. Beſides other reaſons, the name of Cumri, which the Welch have to this day, undeniably proves it. Great-Britain had, doubtleſs, its ſhare of thoſe ſwarms of Gauls that over-ran ſo great a part of Europe and Aſia.

The great affinity between the religion and cuſtoms of the Gauls and Britons does farther confirm this point. Some authors, indeed, ſay the Belgæ ſettled in the eaſtern; the Spaniards in the weſtern; and the Hibernians or Iriſh in the northern parts of Britain; but this contradicts not the common opinion, for the Belgæ were Gauls, and the Spaniards, as well as the Iriſh and Scots, were Celtiberians that inhabited along the weſtern coaſt of Spain. But tho' it were doubtful that theſe Spaniards were Celtiberians, it is, however, certain that England or South-Britain was peopled by the Celtæ or Gauls.

Cuſtoms and manners of the Britons.

The Britons were, for the moſt part, tall and well-made, and, as the Iriſh generally are at this day, red-hair'd. Such was their natural conſtitution, that Plutarch ſays they often lived to an 100 or 120 years; to which the ſobriety of their lives contributed, as much or more than the temperateneſs of the air. They all went naked, except thoſe along the ſouthern coaſt, who cover'd themſelves with the skins of wild beaſts, thrown careleſly over them, more to avoid giving offence to ſtrangers, than to defend themſelves from the weather. As an ornament, they us'd to cut their bodies in the ſhape of flowers, trees, and animals, which they dyed blue with the juice of woad.

They lived in woods, in hutts covered over with skins, boughs, or turf. Some people now, in the north of Scotland, are ſaid to have none but ſuch houſes. When I was in Ireland, I ſaw there little hutts cover'd only with green turf, inhabited by poor people, who, I was inform'd, ſpent their days contentedly, never caring to go abroad, but to provide themſelves with milk and potatoes. This may ſhew us the way of living among the antient Britons, as well as other nations; their uſual food was milk, and the fleſh they got by hunting. As for domeſtick fowls, ſuch as hens and geeſe, if they bred any, it was merely for pleaſure; their religion ſtrictly enjoining them to abſtain from that ſort of food, as Cæſar expreſly affirms †; neither did they eat any fiſh, tho' they had them in plenty. Their towns, or rather villages, were a parcel of hutts, confuſedly placed at a ſmall diſtance one from another; and commonly in the middle of a wood, the avenues of which were defended with ſlight ramparts of earth or trees laid athwart one another. Tho' they lived in this plain and ſimple manner, they were as quick of apprehenſion as the Gauls, nay of greater penetration, according to Tacitus; and, for their morals, Diodorus Siculus declares they even excelled the Romans themſelves. One cuſtom, however, among them, for ten or a dozen brothers to live all together, and enjoy their wives in common, was odious in the eyes of other people. This practice prevailed long among them, tho' they were otherwiſe pretty much civilized, by converſing with the Romans. A Britiſh lady being reproached on this account by Julia, the empreſs of Severus, made this ſmart reply: "The Roman ladies ought not to "upbraid us on this ſcore, ſince what we "do publickly with the beſt of our men, "they do in private with the worſt of theirs, "freed-men and ſlaves." The Britons had, doubtleſs, other cuſtoms different from thoſe of other nations; but ſo ſmall was their correſpondence with foreigners, that we know little of them, before the arrival of the Romans.

Their way of fighting.

Cæſar ‡ highly applauds the bravery and valour of the Britons; but his account of their way of fighting is ſomewhat ſurprizing. He ſays, they uſually fought in chariots, which they furiouſly drove among their enemies, throwing their darts; but, when they engaged the horſe, they quit their chariots, to fight more advantageouſly on foot, ſword in hand. But this ſeems to me altogether impoſſible.

Trade.

Tho' the Britons were well ſituated for trade, they had no large ſhips, nor even

* Loegria is quite loſt; and tho' Cambria in Wales and Albania in Scotland ſtill remain, yet they do not prove Geoffrey's fiction.

ventur'd to ſea, farther than the coaſt of Gaul. They chiefly dealt with the Phœnicians, who exported yearly great quantities of tin, with which they alone ſupply'd diſtant nations, till the Greeks at laſt found their way hither alſo.

This trade reaching no farther than the extreme parts of Cornwall, foreigners could not eaſily know exactly the ſtate of Great-Britain; and therefore it is we have ſo little recorded of the government and religion of the antient Britons. It is certain, however, they had in a manner the ſame gods with the Gauls. Dis and Samothes were equally worſhiped by both; but the Britons paid a particular veneration to Andate, the goddeſs of victory, in whoſe honour they ſacrificed their priſoners of war.

Druids. The druids, among both nations, had the care and direction of all religious affairs. They were ſo called from the Celtic word, Deru or oak, the ſame as Drus in Greek*; for miſletoe they look'd upon as moſt ſacred, and the greateſt bleſſing they received from the gods. So highly were the druids honour'd by the people, that no publick matters were tranſacted, nor could a malefactor be executed, without their conſent. Nay, they made religion an engine to procure the management of private as well as publick affairs. The diſobedient they excluded from their ſacrifices; and a man being thus, as it were, excommunicated, was not only avoided by all, as a profane wretch, but deprived of the benefit of the law, and incapable of any employ. The chriſtian clergy, in this reſpect, have too cloſely copied after the druids. They had a ſort of pontiff or high-prieſt, which dignity was elective; and ſometimes, when the candidates were of equal merit, they have fallen to blows, before the election was over.

Bards. The Britiſh bards were inferior to the druids; they celebrated the praiſes of their heroes in verſes and ſongs, which they ſung to their harps. There were ſome of theſe in being, even after the Romans had entirely quitted Britain.

Eubates. The eubates, both in Britain and Gaul, were a third ſort of prieſts, who, as Marcellinus tells us, were altogether employed in the ſtudy of natural philoſophy.

Religion. As the religion of theſe nations was the ſame, it is very likely that one of them had it from the other. Cæſar thinks the Britons taught it the Gauls, becauſe they us'd to come hither for a thorough knowledge of all its myſteries; but this, perhaps, was only during their wars with the Romans. Bochartus believes it uncertain, which of them had their religion from the other. It is, however, very probable, that the Gauls, when they peopled Britain, planted their own religion there. But ſince the Britiſh and Gauliſh druids held the ſame notions, and we are very much in the dark about the firſt, the laſt muſt ſerve to give us ſome idea of their religion, which after all will be but very imperfect, becauſe the druids left nothing behind them in writing. According to a Burgundian writer theſe are ſome of the chief druidical maxims or rules. Golluſ. Mem. de la Franche Comte.

" None muſt be taught but in the ſacred " groves.

" Miſletoe muſt be gather'd, if poſſible, " in the ſixth moon, and with reverence; " it muſt be cut with a golden bill.

" All things derive their origin from hea- " ven.

" The arcana of the ſciences muſt be " committed to the memory only.

" Children are to be educated with great " care.

" The diſobedient are to be excluded " from the ſacrifices.

" Souls are immortal.

" The ſoul after death paſſeth into other " bodies.

" If the world is deſtroyed, it will be " either by fire or water.

" Upon extraordinary occaſions, a man " muſt be ſacrificed.

" As the body falls, or moves after it is " fallen; as the blood flows, or the wound " opens, future events are foretold.

" Priſoners of war muſt be ſlain upon the " altars, or burnt alive, incloſed in wicker, " in honour of the gods.

" All commerce with ſtrangers is to be " prohibited.

" He that comes laſt to the aſſembly of " the ſtates ought to be puniſhed with " death.

" Children are to be brought up apart " from their parents, till they be 14 years " of age.

" Money lent in this will be repaid in " the next world.

" There is another world, and they who " kill themſelves, to attend their friends thi- " ther, will live with them there.

" Letters given to dying perſons, or thrown " on their funeral piles, will carefully be " deliver'd in the next world.

" The moon is a ſovereign remedy for " all things, as its name in Celtic implies.

" All maſters of families are kings in " their own houſes, having a power of life " and death over their wives, children, and " ſlaves."

Hence we may form ſome notion of the religion of the druids, which for a long time prevail'd in Britain, as well as Gaul. It ſpread itſelf even into Italy, for Auguſtus prohibited the Romans from celebrating its myſteries. The druids were both male and female; it was a woman druid that, as Vopiſcus tells us, foretold to Dioclefian, then a private ſoldier in Gaul, that he would be emperor of Rome.

Govern-ment. The government of the Britons alſo muſt be learnt from the Gauls. From the founding of Rome, the Gauls were divided into ſeveral petty ſtates, with a head over each of them: out of theſe chiefs was choſen by common conſent one, who, for the time being, had the command of the armies in general, and the power of putting the laws in execution. Livy, after the manner of the Romans, calls this magiſtrate king; but a modern author*, thinking this title too great, ſtiles him only paramount or above all the reſt. However, as the land between the Tyne and the Britiſh channel was divided into no leſs than 17 petty kingdoms †, it is highly probable, the Britons had the ſame form of government. Caſſibelanus, prince of the Trinobantes, upon Cæſar's invaſion, and Caractacus, head of the Silures, in the time of Claudius, were choſen to be commanders in chief of the armies. Theſe ſeveral independent ſtates were, doubtleſs, at continual variance; but we know nothing of their affairs till the Romans invaded them. But, before I enter upon their hiſtory, it will be proper to give ſome account of the origin of the Picts and Scots, inhabitants of North-Britain.

Origin of the Scots. The Scots, reſolving to equal the Britons in antiquity, claim Gathelus, ſon to Cecrops king of Athens, for their founder; or, according to ſome, Argus the 4th king of the Argives, and Scota, daughter to Pharaoh king of Egypt.

Gathelus, being forced to leave Greece, came at length into Egypt, where he fought under Moſes, in Pharaoh's wars with the Ethiopians. He diſtinguiſh'd himſelf by ſo much bravery, that the king, upon Moſes's leaving Egypt, gave him the command of the army, with his daughter Scota in marriage. About 39 years after, terrified at the prediction of an oracle of the downfall of Egypt, accompany'd by many Greeks and Egyptians, he put to ſea. After ſeveral vain attempts to ſettle in Africa, he lands on the weſtern coaſt of Spain, naming the place Portus Gatheli, afterwards called Portugal. [Here the author forgets that Gathelus was Greek and not Latin.] This prince, planting a colony here, went farther north, and took poſſeſſion of a country which he ſtil'd Gathelicia or Gallicia. From hence, in proceſs of time, his ſon Hiberius, with ſome of his father's followers, ſailed to an iſland, which he named Hibernia, afterwards Ireland. The natives, being few, gave theſe foreigners a kind reception, and mixing with them ſoon became one nation, under the common name of Scots, from Scota Hiberius's mother.

This fabulous origin of the Scots Buchanan relates, to expoſe its abſurdity to his countrymen. The following is the moſt probable account.

Iren, called by the Engliſh and Scots Irenlandt or Ireland, had long been poſſeſs'd by the European Scyths or Scots, when a company of Spaniards (whom Buchanan ſuppoſes to be the deſcendants of the Celtiberian Gauls) landed there, about the time the Carthaginians became maſters of Spain. Their number being ſmall, the natives received them with open arms, which ſoon drew others thither; ſo that at length they became one nation, under the general name of Scyths or Scots, and were ſo very populous, that abundance of families were obliged to repair to the Ebudes or Hebrides, iſlands lying north of Ireland, which were ſoon alſo overſtock'd. The Scyths are ſaid to land in Ireland a little after the flood, and the Spaniards in the year of the world 3380.

Picts. The Hebrides being thus poſſeſs'd by the Scyths, the Picts, from that part of Germany now called Mecklenburgh and Pomerania, having embarqued, like other northern nations, to mend their quarters, offer'd to land in theſe iſlands; but hearing the ſoil was too barren to maintain any more inhabitants, and that a large neighbouring iſland, ſtiled Albion, would certainly anſwer their purpoſe, they directly ſailed thither, and ſettled in the north parts, that were but thinly inhabited, without any interruption.

The Scots ſoon followed them with the ſame view. The Picts were pleaſed to ſee them come over in ſuch numbers, as they not only wanted their aſſiſtance againſt the natives, but alſo a ſupply of women. Accordingly wives they had, on condition the heirs of the women ſhould have the preference before thoſe of the men, in the ſucceſſion to the kingdom they deſigned to eſtabliſh. This law was ſtill in force in Bede's time. The Scots and Picts, thus united, clear'd at length all the country, north of the Tyne, of its antient inhabitants. After this they parted by conſent, the Scots chooſing the weſtern parts, as neareſt to Ireland; and the Picts the eaſtern, as oppoſite to Germany. The Scots in Albion were ſoon after this called Albins, and thoſe in Ireland, Irens or Iriſh; whence the diſtinction of Great Scotland or Ireland, and little Scotland or North-Britain. The Albins, being continually ſupplied from their brethren the Iriſh, grew too powerful for the Picts, and at length quite rooted them out; but this was not done till many ages after their ſeparation. It is not eaſy for two bordering nations to be friends long; the Picts and Scots ſoon fell at variance. The Britons, for ſo I ſhall call the antient inhabitants for the future, tho' it is uncertain when they firſt received that name, did all they could under-hand to bring this quarrel to an open rupture, hoping by this means to rid themſelves of both parties. As they dreaded moſt the growing power of the Albins, they fell in with the Picts. The Albins, upon this, apply to Ferchard king of Ireland, who immediately ſent over his ſon Fergus to aſſiſt them. This prince, finding the Albins had hitherto lived in a ſort of anarchy, convinc'd them of the inconveniencies of ſuch a ſtate, and ſo got himſelf inveſted with the ſupreme authority. Fergus then, in ſtrictneſs of ſpeech, was the firſt king of Scotland; for Great-Scotland or Ireland had kings many ages before, and, if we will believe them, was the moſt antient monarchy in the world. Fergus, they ſay, arrived in Scotland in the year of the world 3627, about the time Alexander the great made his entrance into Babylon. But this pretenſion of theirs to ſo great antiquity admits of no ſmall diſpute.

Fergus was no ſooner ſeated on his throne, than he made great preparations for the war againſt the Picts, at the ſame time trying all poſſible means to bring matters to an accommodation. He repreſented to them, by his ambaſſadors, that the quarrel might eaſily be made up, would both ſides hearken to reaſon; and that the Britons, their common enemies, would take, the advantage of their diviſions to ruin them both. This prevail'd upon the Picts; and they immediately join'd the Scots againſt the Britons. Fergus, thus reinforced, gave the Britons battle, in which their king Coilus was ſlain, upon which they ſued for peace. Fergus, ſome time after, returning to Ireland, was ſhipwreck'd on that coaſt, in the very place where Carrick-Fergus now ſtands.

This is the account the Scotch hiſtorians give of the ſettlement of theſe two nations in North-Britain. From Fergus's arrival to the Roman invaſion, they ſay, the ſtate of things remained much the ſame. The land between the channel and the river Tyne was inhabited by Britons. From the Tyne to the fartheſt bounds of the north, the eaſtern part of the country was poſſeſs'd by the Picts, and the weſtern by the Scots, who reckon 15 kings from Fergus to Ederus, in whoſe reign Cæſar invaded Britain.

Diſpute about the antiquity of the Scots.

Tho' one would think the Scotch ſhould beſt know the origin of their own monarchy; yet this antiquity of theirs is greatly conteſted by ſeveral very famous Engliſh authors. As religion was concern'd in the diſpute, it was carried on with great warmth. The presbyterians alledge, that the church of Scotland was governed by presbyters only, called culdees, before ever there were any biſhops in it; whence they infer that epiſcopacy is not of divine inſtitution. The Engliſh biſhops deny the fact; aſſerting that the Scotch church was ſo far from being governed by presbyters, that it was not then in being, the Scots not coming to the iſland till the year of our Lord 503. At this rate, 800 years muſt be cut off from the Scotch account. And is it poſſible that the 40 kings they ſay reigned from Fergus I. to Coran, in the year of Chriſt 501, are all imaginary? On the contrary, it is not to be ſuppoſed, their learned adverſaries would charge them with ſo great an error, did they not believe they had good grounds for what they ſay. It is not to be expected I ſhould give a particular account of a diſpute which has filled ſo many volumes. I ſhall only briefly ſtate the queſtion.

Were the Scotch obliged to prove directly their ſettlement in North-Britain, ever ſince the time of Alexander the great, their arguments, perhaps, would not give entire ſatisfaction to unprejudic'd judges; but they had the art to put the diſpute on another footing. When a nation, ſay they, affirms any thing about its own hiſtory, it is to be admitted, without evident proofs to the contrary. Thus they oblige their adverſaries to prove a negative, which, all know, is a difficult task. However, they have undertaken it; and their chief argument is, that no writer ever mentions the Scots, as inhabitants of Britain, till the ſixth century.

They quote ſeveral paſſages from Latin authors, wherein there is not the leaſt notice taken of the Scots. To this the Scotch reply, that their nation not being conquer'd till the reign of Severus, and being but a ſhort time ſubject to the Romans, it is no wonder they gave ſuch an imperfect account of them. They add alſo, that tho' Tacitus and other hiſtorians mention the Deucaledonians, Meatæ, Attacotes, as inhabiting the north parts of Britain, it will not follow from thence, that they were not Picts or Scots, no more than that the Icenians, Trinobantes, Silures, were not Britons, becauſe they are diſtinguiſhed by theſe particular names. The chief againſt the Scots in this diſpute are Uſher Loyd, Stillingfleet, writers of great note. In their defence, the principal authors are Hector Boethius, Buchanan, Mackenzie, three very famous in Scotland.

The ſame Engliſh writers affirm, that the Picts are Britons, who to avoid the dominion of the Romans retir'd into the north; where continuing to paint their bodies, the Romans called them Picts, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe that upon their ſubmiſſion to them had diſus'd that cuſtom. But as the Romans did not ſubdue the 17 nations of the Britons all at once, why were not ſome of theſe, before their conqueſt, called Picts, as well as thoſe that fled beyond the Tyne? The Scotch urge, moreover, that this argument of the Engliſh has no other foundation than the conformity of the name Picts with the Latin word Picti; that tho' it is certain ſeveral Britons took refuge in the north, yet, to prove theſe to be the ſame with the Picts, it muſt be ſhewn how they became a diſtinct nation, ſo as to live apart by themſelves, as we know the Picts did for ſeveral ages, with laws and cuſtoms different from thoſe of the Britons and Scots. But as this cannot be made appear, it is more natural to think that theſe Britiſh refugees, retiring amongſt the Picts, were incorporated with them. This opinion, to which I own myſelf inclin'd, is farther confirm'd from the Scots, who had but little intercourſe with the Romans, calling their neighbours Pehiti. Now, if this name be the ſame with Picts, is it to be ſuppoſed that the Scots ſhould give their neighbours a Roman name? But if it is different, it follows that the Picts were not Britons, nor ſo named from painting their bodies. Buchanan, who believes the name Picts to be Roman, owns however, he is ignorant what name they gave themſelves; and affirms they deſcended from ſome Gauliſh colonies that ſettled in Thrace, who painted their bodies as well as the Britons. He adds, the Picts had the ſame language with the Britons and Scots, ſince it does not appear theſe three nations ever made uſe of interpreters. But it is very poſſible they might ſpeak different tongues, and yet hiſtorians take no notice of interpreters. Buchanan, however, concludes from hence, that they were of Celtic extraction. Verſtegan, an Engliſh hiſtorian, derives the name Picts from a word in their own language, ſignifying a warriour. But enough of a nation that has been entirely extinct for near 900 years.

BOOK I.

Julius Cæſar invades Britain twice. Obliges them to a yearly tribute. Remarks on Cæſar's account of his two expeditions. The ſtate of Britain in the reigns of Auguſtus, Tiberius, and Caligula. Claudius invades and conquers Britain. The wars between the Britons and Romans; and what happen'd before the arrival of the Saxons. Their original. The Angles, and Juttes. The ſtate of the Britiſh church to the coming of the Saxons.

THE Romans had conquer'd almoſt all Europe, Africa, and the chief kingdoms of Aſia, before they made any attempts upon Britain. They had as yet no leiſure for this undertaking, on account of their long wars with the Gauls; and Julius Cæſar was the firſt that engaged in it. Not ſatisfied with the conqueſt of the Gauls, being deſirous of ſtill greater glory, and of enlarging the bounds of the commonwealth, he reſolved to ſubdue the Britons. Some ſay, indeed *, his only view in this enterprize was his own private intereſt. The pretence, however, of both his invaſions was that the Britons had aſſiſted his enemies, the common excuſe of the Romans on ſuch occaſions; and, in his commentaries, he gives the following account of his expeditions hither.

Cæſar invades Britain, ante Chr. 54.

Cæſar, having ſpent the beſt part of the ſummer againſt the Germans, determin'd to employ the reſt in this deſign. And tho' he knew the ſeaſon was far advanced, he thought it would be worth his while, were it only to get ſome knowledge of the iſland, very little known to any but the merchants that traded thither; and who, themſelves, were unable to inform Cæſar of the extent or populouſneſs of Great-Britain, or whether the harbours were fit to receive ſhips of burthen. Upon this, he ſent Voluſenus to get better intelligence, whilſt the troops were marching to the place from whence they were to embark.

The Britons, being inform'd by the merchants of Cæſar's deſign, ſent ambaſſadors with offers of their ſubmiſſion, and the delivery of hoſtages for their ſecurity. He received them very civilly, and, having exhorted them to ſtedfaſtneſs in their reſolution, diſmiſs'd them with many fair promiſes, without acquainting them poſitively with his intentions. Comius, whom he had juſt before made king of the Atrebates †, he ſent with them, giving him inſtructions to excite the Britons to an alliance with the Romans, and inform them of his deſign of coming into Britain. This unexpected news was far from pleaſing them, and upon it they impriſon'd Comius, loading him with irons.

In the interim Voluſenus returned; and, all things being ready, Cæſar put two legions on board 80 ſhips, and his horſe were to follow in 18 more with all ſpeed. Coming upon the Coaſt of Britain, he found the hills and cliffs cover'd over with Britons, that with their darts might eaſily prevent his landing; which determin'd him to look out for a place where he might land with more ſafety. However, he lay by till four in the afternoon, waiting for ſome ſhips that were behind. The fleet being join'd, he ſet ſail and came to an anchor about two leagues farther. The Britons, perceiving this, ſent their chariots and horſemen before, which were followed by all the foot. The ſhips being too large to come near enough the ſhore, the Romans were under a neceſſity to leap into the ſea, armed as they were, to attack the enemy, who ſtood ready to receive them on dry land. Cæſar, obſerving the uſual ardour of his ſoldiers abate on this occaſion, order'd ſome gallies to advance as near the ſhoar as poſſible, to annoy the enemy in the flank, with ſtones and darts from their engines and ſlings, which put them into ſome diſorder. But the Romans durſt not ſtill venture to throw themſelves into the ſea, and, perhaps, would never have been brought to it, had not an enſign of the tenth legion leap'd in firſt with his colours in his hand, crying out aloud, "Follow me, fellow-ſoldiers, unleſs you would betray the Roman eagle into the enemy's hands: I, for my part, will diſcharge my duty to the commonwealth and my general." Fir'd at this, the ſoldiers, at once, leap'd into the ſea, and began the fight. But ſtill the Britons kept their ground; and the Romans were in danger of being repulſed, had not Cæſar with ſome arm'd ſloops obliged the enemy to give way a little. Upon this, the Romans advanced with the greateſt ſpeed; and, getting on dry ground, preſs'd the Britons ſo vigorouſly, that, at laſt, they put them to flight. They durſt not, however, purſue them, having no horſe, which, Cæſar tells us, prevented him from having a complete victory.

The Britons, terrify'd at the valour of the Romans, ſet Comius at liberty, and ſent him to Cæſar, charging his ill treatment upon the fury of the populace. Ambaſſadors were alſo diſpatched to ſue for peace, which Cæſar granted them, upon the delivery of ſome hoſtages, and the promiſe of more.

This being done four days after their landing, the Britiſh troops were diſmiſs'd, and ſome of their princes came and made their ſubmiſſion to Cæſar. In the mean time, the ſhips employed in tranſporting the Roman horſe, were drove back again by a ſtorm into the ports of Gaul. Some of the ſhips alſo that lay in the road were by the ſame ſtorm daſh'd in pieces, and others received great damage; and the tide of flood, the moon being at full, roſe ſo high, that the gallies they had drawn aſhore were fill'd with water. This put the Romans into a terrible conſternation, they not having brought with them materials to refit their veſſels, or any quantity of proviſions, Cæſar having determin'd to winter in Gaul.

The Britons that were with Cæſar eaſily perceived this; and alſo, by the ſmall compaſs of their camp, that the number of the Romans was inconſiderable. Having repreſented theſe things to their countrymen, upon their return, the Britons enter'd into a reſolution to cut the Romans off from all proviſions, and to amuſe them till winter. Cæſar, gueſſing at their deſign, took all poſſible care to lay in proviſions; and, having ſent to Gaul for neceſſaries to refit his ſhips, he made uſe of the timber and iron of the ſhatter'd ones to repair the reſt. The ſoldiers, knowing they wrought for their lives, ſoon put the fleet in a condition to ſail, there having been only 12 ſhips loſt.

In the mean time, the ſeventh legion being ſent out to forage, news was brought that a cloud of duſt was ſeen to riſe from that quarter. Cæſar directly marches away with the two companies that guarded the camp, ordering the reſt to follow with all expedition. As the harveſt was in every where elſe, the Britons knew the Romans would come to forage there, and ſo lay ready to fall upon them, as they ſhould be ſcatter'd in the field. Some they kill'd, and the reſt they ſurrounded with their chariots, when Cæſar came, in the critical moment, to ſave them from being all ſlain or taken. Having brought them off, he retir'd to the camp, not thinking it proper to come to a battle.

The Britons, upon this ſucceſs, augmented their horſe and foot, reſolving to attack the Romans in their camp; but Cæſar gave them ſo warm a reception, that they were ſoon put to flight, the Romans purſuing them as long as they were able. This defeat ſo diſpirited the Britons, that they ſent that very day ambaſſadors to treat of peace, which Cæſar agreed to, upon their ſending after him into Gaul double the number of hoſtages he demanded before. Tho' his paſſage thither was ſhort, yet the fear of expoſing his fleet to another ſtorm, it being ſo late in the year, made him hurry away; and, the Britons not being ſo good as their word, he reſolved to make them another more formidable viſit the following ſpring.

Cæſar's ſecond invaſion.

Cæſar, having left orders to repair the old and build ſome more new ſhips, went and ſpent part of the winter in Italy. At his return he found in the port of Iccius ſix-ſcore veſſels and 18 gallies, on board of which he put 5 legions and 2000 horſe, and landed at the place he had mark'd before, without any reſiſtance. The Britons, terrified by ſo vaſt a fleet, retir'd farther up in the country, behind ſome hills. Cæſar, having fortified the camp, ſet out in the night in queſt of the enemy; and, when he had marched about 12 miles, he ſaw them poſted on the other ſide of a river, to diſpute his paſſage. The Roman cavalry, in ſpite of their reſolution at firſt, obliged them to abandon their poſt; and they retir'd into a wood, the avenues whereof were block'd with large trees laid acroſs one another. The ſeventh legion attack'd them, notwithſtanding, and put them to flight; but, night approaching, Cæſar gave orders not to purſue them. The next day, as he was in purſuit of the Britons, he was inform'd that his fleet was almoſt entirely deſtroy'd by a ſtorm; upon which he returns to the camp, and found 40 of his ſhips ſhatter'd, and the reſt very much damag'd. He directly employs all the carpenters in his fleet and army, and ſent for others from Gaul; and, to prevent ſuch an accident hereafter, he made his ſoldiers, with infinite toil, draw up the ſhips within the camp. Having writ to Labienus, his lieutenant in Gaul, to build new ones, he proceeded in ſearch of the Britons, leaving a ſufficient guard for the camp.

Before he marched far, he found that the enemy's forces were greatly augmented under Caſſibelan king of the Trinobantes, whoſe kingdom lay beyond the Thames about 20 miles from the ſea. This prince had hitherto continual wars with his neighbours; but a peace was made with them all on this occaſion, and the command of the confederate army conferr'd upon him. The Romans were ſurpriz'd on their march by the Britiſh horſe and chariots; but they were repulſed with great loſs. In the mean time, ſome troops that lay in the woods furiouſly attack'd thoſe that guarded the camp, and put them in very great diſorder. Two companies that Cæſar ſent to their aſſiſtance, were, at the firſt onſet, put to the rout, and the tribune Quintus Laberius Durus was ſlain. Cæſar evidently perceived that the Romans, with their heavy armour, were unequal to an enemy that was nimble and light-armed, and always fought in ſmall parties, with a body of reſerve in their rear. The Roman horſe was no leſs embarraſs'd than the foot; for as the Britons often pretended to run away, the horſemen that purſued them were immediately cut off, ſo that it was as dangerous to purſue as to retreat. Cæſar's confus'd account of this action clearly ſhews the Romans were worſted. Beſides, if there be any weight in his reaſons for their ſucceeding no better in this encounter, why had he not the ſame difficulties in others, wherein he affirms the Britons were totally routed?

In Eſſex.

On the morrow, Cæſar having ſent out all the cavalry to forage, with three legions to guard them, the Britons fell upon them with great fury, who were defended by the legions, till Cæſar advanced with the reſt of the army; upon which, in a great battle, the Britons were entirely defeated.

After this, Cæſar marched towards the Thames, in order to enter the kingdom of Caſſibelan. Coming to the place where he was to ford, he ſaw the enemy on the other ſide drawn up in great numbers. However, tho' the bank and river were ſtuck full of ſharp ſtakes, he order'd the horſe to ride in, and the foot to follow, who waded up to their chins. Upon this reſolute attack, the Britons were obliged to retire. Caſſibelan, having disbanded his army, reſerved only 4000 men, who carried off all the corn and cattle in their way, to diſtreſs the Romans, who durſt not make any excurſions for proviſions, for fear of ſallies from the woods and by-places.

The Trinobantes, finding Cæſar on their borders, ſent deputies to treat of peace; intreating him alſo to protect Mandubratius their king, who had fled into Gaul, Caſſibelan having kill'd his father Imanuentius, and depriv'd him of his dominions. This Cæſar agreed to, provided they would victual his army, and deliver 40 hoſtages. Cæſar, at laſt, other ſtates following their example, was in a condition of attacking the capital city of Caſſibelan. A city, among the Britons, was no more than a wood fenc'd with a ditch. The Romans ſtorm'd this intrenchment, tho' very ſtrong, at two places at once, with ſo much briskneſs, that the enemy fled out at one of their avenues, having many ſlain and taken, and leaving abundance of cattle behind them.

In the mean time, four Kentiſh princes Cingetorix, Carnilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, at the inſtigation of Caſſibelan, attack'd the Roman camp that guarded their ſhips; but, after a long and reſolute fight, were repulſed, and Cingetorix taken priſoner.

Upon this, Caſſibelanus, by the mediation of Comius, treated with Cæſar, who conſented to a peace on the following conditions; that the Britons ſhould pay a yearly tribute to the Romans; and that Caſſibelan ſhould deliver a certain number of hoſtages, and leave Mandubratius in the quiet poſſeſſion of his dominions. Theſe things being ſettled, Cæſar embarqued his troops, and arrived ſafely in Gaul.

Remarks upon Cæſar's two expeditions.

Tho' in this account of his two expeditions into Britain, Cæſar does not commend himſelf in ſo many words; yet the very hiſtory of his actions gives him the moſt exalted praiſes. To make a deſcent with two legions only, in the view of a formidable army; nay, to ford the Thames at a place drove full of ſharp ſtakes, the oppoſite bank being defended by numerous troops, and the waters being ſo deep as to take the ſoldiers up to the neck, are actions that evidently ſpeak their own praiſe. Cæſar has been accus'd of turning every thing to his own advantage, in his commentaries; but, in the preſent caſe, it is plain there is ſomething paſs'd over in ſilence not at all to his honour. Not to inſiſt, that the part of the Thames, thought to be the place his men are ſaid to wade over, is ſix foot deep, what has been advanced will appear more evident, if we conſider Cæſar's deſign and ſucceſs in his attempt upon Britain. Dion Caſſius aſſures us, his intent was to reduce the whole iſland to a Roman province. He always gets the better of the Britons; he paſſes the Thames, in ſpite of all difficulties; Caſſibelan, at length, disbands his troops; Cæſar ſubdues his capital; and the Britons ſubmit. After all this, he only impoſes a light tribute on Caſſibelan; and neither fortifies any place, nor leaves any troops behind him, contented with reſtoring Mandubratius, as if that had been all he aim'd at in his undertaking. Is it not, then, very ſuſpicious that he was oblig'd to comply with theſe terms? Lucan, tho' no friend of his, would not, ſurely, without any grounds, ſo flatly accuſe him of turning his back to the Britons*. Dion declares, that in an action the Britons entirely routed the Roman foot, but were put in diſorder by the horſe. Horace and Tibullus† give ſeveral hints, that the Romans were not maſters of Britain in their time. From all which it is evident, that Cæſar's reputation, in this affair, is not ſo great as he repreſents in his own hiſtory. However, it is certain the commonwealth received very little advantage from theſe expeditions; for which reaſon, doubtleſs, Tacitus ſaid, "Cæſar had "rather ſhewn the Romans the way to Bri-"tain, than put them in poſſeſſion of it.

The ſtate of the Britons in the reign of Auguſtus.

After Cæſar's Death, the Britons did not pay their tribute, nor was it demanded for 20 years; but Auguſtus, after he was peaceably ſettled in the empire, was reſolv'd to force the Britons to a compliance. With this view, he went twice as far as Gaul‡, but was once prevented by a revolt in Pannonia; and the ſecond time the Britiſh ambaſſadors met him and ſued for peace. At laſt, the Britons not keeping their word, he determin'd to make a complete conqueſt of them; but the Britons found means to divert him from his deſign. Tenuantius, Caſſibelan's ſucceſſor, ſent him rich preſents, which were laid up in the Capitol. Cunobelin, who ſucceeded him, order'd money to be coin'd, ſome pieces of which may be ſeen in the cabinets of the curious, with the five firſt letters of his name. C.u.n.o.b. or C.a.m. the three firſt of Camelodunum, his capital city on one ſide; on the other, a man ſitting and coining money, with theſe letters T.A.S. c.i.o. from which antiquaries conclude that this money was intended for the payment of tribute.

Tiberius left the Britons to enjoy their liberty, being ſatisfied with their ſending back ſome ſoldiers of Germanicus, that were ſhipwreck'd on their coaſt.

Caligula.

Caligula pretended to invade Britain; but, hearing that the Britons ſtood ready to receive him, he deſiſted. However, he went on board a galley, and order'd them to row with all ſpeed towards the Britiſh coaſt. He ſuddenly came back as faſt as he went off. Being come on ſhore, he harangued his troops, as if going upon ſome great expedition. This done, a charge was ſounded as if the enemy were in view; upon which the whole army, by his orders, ſet about gathering cockle-ſhells in their helmets. He generouſly rewarded his ſoldiers for their alacrity, and ſent an account of his ſucceſs to Rome, expecting the ſenate would decree him a triumph; which they not doing, he reſolved to put them all to death; but this deſign was prevented by a conſpiracy againſt him, wherein he loſt his life.

The Britons enjoy'd their liberty for above 90 years after Julius Cæſar's ſecond invaſion, to the reign of Claudius.

The occaſion of Claudius's conquering Britain.

Cunobelin's two ſons, Togodumnus and Caractacus, both ſucceeded him; but whether they reign'd jointly, or ſeparately, is uncertain. In their reign, Bericus, for attempting to raiſe a ſedition, being obliged to leave the kingdom, went to the emperor's court at Rome, to whom he ſhewed how eaſy it was to conquer Britain. Claudius, upon this, ſent to the Romans, to demand the tribute due to the empire, which they flatly refus'd to pay; and, having a ſpecious pretence for the war, he ſent Plautius before him, who landed without any reſiſtance; for the Britons having heard of a mutiny in the Roman army, juſt as they were embarquing, and not thinking it could have been ſo ſoon over, they did not put themſelves in a condition to oppoſe him. Plautius was deſirous of giving them battle at once; but the Britons did all they could to avoid it, expecting he would, like Cæſar, winter in Gaul. However, at laſt, he found means to attack Togodumnus ſeparately; and, having entirely defeated him, went in ſearch of Caractacus, over whom alſo he obtain'd a ſignal victory. The Britons kept off, and encamped careleſly on the other ſide of a river, which they believed the Romans could not paſs without a bridge; and they were ſo ſurpriz'd at ſeeing ſome Germans, who were excellent ſwimmers, croſs over, that they decamp'd and retir'd at a greater diſtance. Upon this Plautius paſs'd over a conſiderable body of troops, commanded by Veſpaſian and Sabinus his brother, who gave the enemy battle and put them to flight. But rallying the next day, they attack'd ſo furiouſly a detatchment under the command of Sidius Geta, that they put them into ſome diſorder, and had like to have ſlain or taken Geta himſelf; but, happily eſcaping, he gave the Britons, almoſt ſure of victory, ſo briſk a charge that they quit the field. Upon this, the Britons retir'd towards the mouth of the Thames. Being acquainted with all the fords, they eaſily paſſed the river, whilſt the Romans fell among the moraſſes. At laſt, the Germans finding a ford, and the reſt of the army having paſs'd over a bridge a little higher up†*, the Britons were hemm'd in on all ſides, and great numbers of them ſlain.

†* It is improbable there ſhould be a ford ſo nigh the Thames' mouth, or a bridge a little higher up. Dion Caſſius ſeems to confound ſome river running into the Thames with the Thames itſelf.

Plautius

Claudius comes over into Britain.

Plautius now ſends to the emperor, to come and have the honour of putting an end to the war, who ſet out immediately. Claudius, as ſoon as he was arrived, commanded his army in perſon, and, forcing the Britons to a battle, entirely routed them. After this, he advanced towards Camelodunum*, meeting with little oppoſition; and, enlarging his conqueſts, ſubdued ſome neighbouring nations. Upon this occaſion, he was ſeveral times ſaluted imperator by the army, tho' the Romans never allow'd a general this honour more than once in the ſame war.

Finiſhes his conqueſts in 15 days.

If Claudius by this expedition, which was compleated in 15 days, acquir'd great glory, his clemency to the Britons, whom he left in poſſeſſion of their goods, was no leſs honourable and advantageous. Touch'd with his generoſity, they erected a temple to him, and paid him divine honours. He left Plautius governor of Britain, returning to Rome, after 6 months abſence, where the ſenate decreed him the honour of a triumph, and the ſirname of Britannicus. Tho' Suetonius affirms, that he ſubdued ſome part of Britain, without a ſtroke; yet Dion Caſſius's account is the moſt probable.

Plautius, ſeconded by Veſpaſian and Titus, purſued the conqueſts Claudius had begun. Veſpaſian beat the Britons in 30 conflicts; in one of which Titus his ſon, then but a tribune, ſav'd his father's life. He conquer'd two of the moſt powerful nations, and the iſle of Wight. But Plautius, commanding in chief, reap'd the glory of it; and, at laſt, being recall'd, the ſenate decreed him the honour of an inferior triumph.

Oſtorius ſucceeds him.

Oſtorius Scapula ſucceeds him, who, upon his arrival, found the Britons making continual inroads into the Roman conqueſts. Getting his army together, he marched ſo unexpectedly againſt them in the midſt of winter, that he defeated the firſt that oppos'd him and diſpers'd the reſt. However, to prevent future alarms, he propos'd to coop them up between the Avon and Severn, by building forts along between theſe rivers. Before he ſet about this work, he planted a Roman colony at Camelodunum. About this time alſo London became a colony; and the land between the Thames and the ſea was made a province, by the name of Britannia prima.

The Icenians†, tho' allies to the Romans, firſt oppos'd Oſtorius's deſign; and, others joining with them, encamped on very advantageous ground, but the Romans forced their intrenchments, and made great ſlaughter among them. After this Oſtorius went againſt the Cangians‡, who were ſoon diſpers'd. The Roman army was near the Iriſh ſea, when news was brought him that the Brigantes had revolted. Putting off, therefore, his firſt deſign, he immediately marches againſt them, and appeaſes this inſurrection by puniſhing the authors of it. But neither fair nor foul means could reduce the Silures*†, the braveſt and moſt powerful of all the Britons. Caractacus, their king, was eſteem'd the greateſt general Britain had ever produced; and all the nations in alliance with the Silures had conferr'd upon him the command of the confederate army. He retir'd among the Ordovices††, where he gather'd all his forces together, poſting himſelf advantageouſly on a ſteep hill, at the bottom of which was a ſmall river, and ſurrounding his camp with a rampart of flints and ſtones, in order to receive the enemy. Caractacus, to invigorate his ſoldiers, told them on the day of battle, that it would give them liberty or enſlave them for ever, reminding them of their anceſtors, who had glorioufly driven Cæſar out of Britain. The ſoldiers loudly proclaim'd, that they would defend their liberty, with the laſt drop of their blood. Such undaunted courage appear'd in their looks as, at firſt, ſtartled the Roman general; but, his army being extremely deſirous of engaging, he gave the ſignal of battle. The Romans eaſily paſs'd the river, but many of them were ſlain and wounded by the enemy's darts, before they came up to their camp. In ſpite of all reſiſtance, they approach'd the rampart, which, being but looſe ſtones, they ſoon tumbled down. The Britons were not able to withſtand the veteran troops, when they fought ſword in hand, but were ſpeedily put to flight. The wife, daughters, and brothers of Caractacus were taken priſoners; and he himſelf, a few days after, was deliver'd to Oſtorius by Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, to whom he fled for protection. He had commanded the confederate army 9 years; and all the world was ſurpriz'd at his reſiſting ſo long the Roman power. Claudius order'd the captives to be ſent to Rome; and on a certain day, before all the people, they were preſented to him, as he ſate on his throne. Firſt came Caractacus's vaſſals and retinue, then his wife, daughters, and brothers, and laſtly himſelf, walking with a compos'd countenance, not appearing too much dejected. Approaching the emperor, he made the following ſpeech, if Tacitus has not ſpoke for him. "If my moderation had

" ried in eternal oblivion. But now, if you
" preſerve my life, I ſhall be a laſting monu" ment of your clemency to ſucceeding ages."
The emperor, upon this moving diſcourſe, pardon'd them all. The ſenate, meeting on the occaſion of Oſtorius's victory over Caractacus, equall'd it to thoſe of Scipio over Syphax, and Paulus Emilius over Perſes, and they decreed him the ſame honours. In the mean time, the glory of Oſtorius began to loſe ground, whether he did not carry on the war with his former vigour, or that the Britons did their utmoſt to repair their diſgrace.

The Britons gain ſome advantages over the Romans.

They would have cut to pieces the troops left behind to build forts, had they not received timely aſſiſtance from the places adjacent. They kill'd the Roman commander, eight captains, and a great number of ſoldiers. At another time, they defeated a body of troops that went out to forage, and put the horſe that guarded them in diſorder; ſo that Oſtorius was obliged to come up with his legions, which forced the Britons to retreat, tho' with little loſs. There were, after this, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, the ſucceſs whereof was various.

The Silures are intractable.

The Silures were more obſtinate and intractable than all the other nations, reſenting Claudius's ſaying, Britain would not be quiet, till, like the Sicambri, they were tranſported into ſome foreign land. Two cohorts, which they had ſurpriz'd, that had advanced too near the enemy's quarters, they diſpers'd among the other nations, to ſpirit them to a revolt.

Oſtorius dies.

Oſtorius, quite ſpent with vexation, died about this time, at whoſe death the Britons rejoic'd the more, as they attributed it to his grief at not being able to interrupt the courſe of their victories.

Aulus Didius ſucceeds him.

Aulus Didius was immediately ſent over, who found the Roman affairs in a worſe condition than ever, a legion commanded by Manlius Valens having been defeated with great loſs. He ſoon put a ſtop to the Silures, who were making inroads into the frontiers of the Roman province.

The war breaks out a-freſh.

Venutius king of the Brigantes, who ſucceeded Caractacus, as commander of the army, was perſuaded by Cartiſmandua his queen, who betray'd Caractacus, to enter into an alliance with the Romans. But he and his queen quarrelling, and the Romans openly eſpouſing her cauſe, he was incenſed by their partiality to excite his countrymen to a revolt; upon which the war broke out with more fury than ever, which Didius, being very old, manag'd by his lieutenants.

Veranius ſucceeds Didius, and dies.

Verannius, his ſucceſſor in the reign of Nero, died before he had accompliſh'd any thing remarkable, tho' he boaſted in his will, that in two years, had he lived, he ſhould have ſubdued the whole iſland.

Suetonius Paulinus conquers the iſle of Mona.

Suetonius Paulinus ſucceeds him, from whom, being an experienced general, great matters were expected. He, firſt, undertook the conqueſt of Mona or Angleſey; to which end he paſs'd the foot over in flat-bottom'd boats, the horſe either fording or ſwimming. The iſlanders were drawn up on the other ſide, the women running about, dreſs'd like furies, their hair hanging looſe, fire-brands in their hands, and ſurrounded with druids, who with the greateſt ſolemnity, pour'd out dreadful curſes and imprecations. This frightful ſight ſo confounded the Romans, that they ſtood, without motion, expos'd to the enemy's darts. But, at laſt, ſhame and the exhortations of their general bringing them to their ſenſes, they attack'd the enemy ſword in hand, and conquer'd the iſland. Suetonius, in the firſt place, order'd all the conſecrated groves to be cut down, where they ſacrificed their captives, and conſulted their gods by inſpecting the entrails of men.

A general revolt.

However, Suetonius was obliged to leave Mona abruptly, to ſettle matters of greater importance. Praſutagus, king of the Icenians, to ſecure the protection of Nero to his family and kingdom, had made him and his daughters co-heirs to his vaſt treaſures; but no ſooner was he laid in his grave than the emperor's officers ſeiz'd on all his effects. Boadicea his widow, a woman of ſpirit, oppoſing theſe unjuſt proceedings, the officers caus'd her to be publickly whipp'd, and her daughters to be raviſh'd.

The cauſe of it.

This barbarity inſpir'd the whole iſland with the ſpirit of revolt. The Icenians were ſeconded by the Trinobantes, and Venutius join'd with them; nay, all the nations that had ſubmitted to the Romans, the city of London excepted. The Roman hiſtorians agree that the cauſe of this revolt was juſt. The Britons were deprived of their eſtates by the veterans, without any form of law. Catus Decianus, Nero's procurator, having no regard to their petitions, or the ordinance of Claudius, confiſcated their eſtates to the emperor's uſe. Thus, were the minds of the people, at once, inclin'd to ſhake off a foreign yoke. Venutius did all he could to foment this rebellion; and even his queen's adherents, dropping their domeſtick jars, renounced the friendſhip of the Romans.

A general maſſacre of the Romans.

Boadicea, full of reſentment, headed the revolters, in a lively manner exhorting them to take the advantage of Suetonius's being at a diſtance, to recover their liberty, by putting their oppreſſors to the ſword. The Britons, upon this, unawares and furiouſly, fell upon the Romans in their colonies, which they had rather embelliſh'd than fortified, and maſſacred all, without diſtinction. Unparallel'd cruelties were at this time acted; wives were hung up with their infants at their breaſts, to make them, in ſome ſort, ſuffer a double death; and virgins had their breaſts cut off and cramm'd in their mouths, that they might ſeem, in the agonies of death, to eat their own fleſh. The veterans at Camelodunum, tho' inclos'd in a temple as in an aſylum, were ſacreligiouſly burnt rather than ſtarv'd to death. In fine, not a Roman was ſuffer'd to live; and 80,000 * are ſaid to have periſh'd in this maſſacre.

* Tacitus ſays 70,000.

Let

The politicks of the Romans.

Let us here reflect upon the policy of the Romans, who, having conquer'd a country, directly ſent thither large colonies, that by degrees, mixing and intermarrying with the inhabitants, ſecur'd their conqueſts. Accordingly, above 80,000 Romans were now ſettled in Britain, tho' it had been ſubdued but 18 years before by Claudius, beſides the army of Suetonius and the garriſons that had eſcap'd the fury of the Britons.

Suetonius in great ſtraits.

Boadicea, from whoſe noble ſtature and courage, they had entertain'd great hopes, was now at the head of 100,000 Britons. As Suetonius had only 10,000 men, ſhe ardently deſir'd to come to a battle. The Roman general, the ninth legion under Petilius Cerealis being juſt then entirely routed, and Pœnius Poſthumius, who had a large detatchment of the ſecond, refuſing to join him, he was, in this extremity, obliged either to go and meet the enemy, or expect them in ſome town. He, firſt, reſolved to ſhut himſelf up in London; but foreſeeing that, in attempting to ſave that colony, he ſhould endanger the loſs of the whole province, he marched out, notwithſtanding the cries and intreaties of the inhabitants to the contrary. He ſaw evidently, at this juncture he muſt either conquer or die; and, therefore, he thought it beſt to go and attack them. Here he had need for all his experience and conduct, the number of the enemy being ſo great. He choſe a narrow ſpot of ground for the field of battle, with a foreſt behind him to ſecure him from ambuſcades in the rear, and a large plain before him where the Britons were encamp'd. The legions were cloſely drawn up in the center, the light-arm'd ſurrounded them, and the horſe made the two wings. The enemy ſwarm'd about the plain in batallions and ſquadrons, ſecure of victory, and had brought their wives and children to be witneſſes of their actions, and ſharers in the booty.

Boadicea's ſpeech to the army.

Boadicea, having her daughters by her ſide in the chariot, ſpoke to the ſeveral nations, as follows: "That the Britons had been formerly victorious under their queens; that "ſhe came not there, as one of royal deſcent, "to fight for empire or riches, but as one of "the common people, to revenge the loſs of "liberty, the wrongs done to her own perſon, and the violation of her daughters "chaſtity; that the Romans luſt was grown "to that pitch, that neither old nor young "eſcap'd its pollutions; but that the gods "had already began to puniſh them, for one "legion, that durſt hazard a battle, was cut "in pieces, and the reſt skulk'd in their "camp, or fled for their lives; ſo that the "very ſhouts of ſuch a great and victorious "army would put them to flight; that if the "Britons would only conſider the number of "their forces, and the motives of the war, "they would reſolve to vanquiſh or die; that "it was far better bravely to fall a ſacrifice "for their liberty, than endure again the out-"rages of the Romans. This was her reſo-"lution; but for the men, if they pleas'd, "they might live and be ſlaves."

Suetonius alſo, tho' he was aſſured of the valour of his troops, yet he exhorted them to deſpiſe the clamours of the barbarians. He told them that among the Britons, "There "were more women than ſoldiers, and that "moſt of them would make the beſt of their "way, as ſoon as they felt the force of their "victorious arms; that, in the greateſt armies, the deciſion of the battle depended "on a few, and their glory would riſe the "higher, as it was leſs divided; that they "ſhould only keep their ranks cloſe, and "fight, ſword in hand, after they had thrown "their darts; and, laſtly, that they ſhould "not loſe time about the ſpoil, which would "be the certain reward of victory." Upon this ſpeech, which was follow'd with loud acclamations, the courage of the ſoldiers appear'd ſo great, that the general, not fearing ſucceſs, gave the ſignal of battle. The Romans darted their javelins, without quitting their poſt; and, when the enemy's darts were ſpent, advanced ſword in hand, ſeconded by the auxiliary troops, who behav'd with equal bravery. Whilſt they fought at a diſtance with their darts, the Britons expected that the Romans would have fled before them; but, when they ſaw the legions advancing with ſhort and thick ſteps, in a reſolute manner, they fell into diſorder, which was ſo much the greater, as there were no leaders to checque it*. The Romans put the whole army in the utmoſt confuſion, who thought of nothing but ſaving themſelves by flight. At the ſame time, the Roman cavalry breaking through the Britiſh horſe, a terrible rout enſued. The Romans ſpar'd neither age nor ſex, but ſacrificed to their fury the women, children, and the very horſes. This victory equall'd their moſt famous ones, if, as Tacitus aſſures us, 80,000 Britons were ſlain, with the loſs only of 400 Romans, and as many wounded. Boadicea eſcap'd their hands, but was touch'd with ſuch a ſenſe of her ſhame and loſs, that ſhe poiſon'd herſelf. Pœnius Poſthumius, either to avoid the puniſhment due to his crime for refuſing to obey his general, or out of grief for loſing his ſhare of the glory of this victory, ſtabb'd himſelf.

The miſerable ſtate of the Britons.

The Britons, after this, in the utmoſt conſternation, fled, without the leaſt oppoſition, whoſe miſery was increas'd by famine, which themſelves had brought on, by neglecting to till the ground. They had hopes, indeed, from the ſmall number of the enemy, that they would keep together, and that ſo they ſhould have an opportunity of forming another army; but they were diſappointed, the Romans being furniſh'd with powerful ſupplies from Germany. Doubtleſs, Suetonius's army would have now made a complete conqueſt of Britain, had not the Romans fallen out among themſelves.

* Where was Venutius?

Suetonius recall'd.

Julius Classicianus, who succeeded Decianus, as procurator, thwarted Suetonius in all his designs; probably, because the general would not permit him to continue the oppressions that had caus'd the revolt. Such was Classicianus's prejudice against him, that he openly declar'd, and even writ to the emperor's ministers at Rome, that the war would never be ended, under the management of Suetonius. He never ceas'd till an order was sent him, to resign to Petronius Turpilianus, who did nothing worth notice, hiding his love of sloth under the specious name of the love of peace.

Resigns to Turpilianus.

Succeeded by Trebellius.

Trebellius Maximus succeeded him, as indolent as himself, famous for nothing but his quarrel with Cælius who commanded the 20th legion, which rose so high, that, a great part of the army deserting him, he fled to Vitellius general of the Roman army in Germany.

Nero dying, the Britons had some quiet in the short reigns of Galba and Otho, the army being commanded only by tribunes, among whom Cælius bore the chief sway. Vitellius, being emperor, sent Vectius Bolanus into Britain, who being ignorant of the art of war, nothing was done against the Britons. Vespasian, succeeding Vitellius, appointed Petilius Cerealis in his room. He defeated the Brigantes in several battles; and Julius Frontinus, who succeeded him, acquired no less glory in subduing the Silures.

Agricola.

Towards the end of Vespasian's reign, Julius Agricola was made governor of Britain, a particular account of whose wars is given us by his son-in-law Tacitus.

The Ordovices, before the arrival of Agricola, having cut in pieces a body of the Roman horse that was quarter'd in their frontiers, the first thing he did was to march directly against them; and, tho' they were retir'd among the mountains, he made them pay dear for their late success. He, then, turn'd his arms against Mona, which the Romans abandon'd, tho' he had no flat-bottom'd boats to carry over his men. Some of the horse, that swam over with their arms in their hands, so astonish'd the islanders, that they submitted without striking a blow.

First campaign of Agricola.

He gains the love of the Britons.

Agricola found that the Britons were never to be tam'd by arms alone, and that lenity was as necessary as force; and, therefore, during the winter, he attempted to reform several abuses, occasion'd by the avarice or carelessness of former governors. He stopp'd all manner of extortions, caus'd justice to be impartially administer'd, and the like; and so gain'd on their affections, as not to fear their revolting in his time. Vespasian dying, Titus his son, knowing the merit of Agricola, continued him in the government.

Second campaign.

In the spring he took the field again, marching towards the north, where he made some new conquests. He found the Romans had suffer'd, because they durst not take up their winter-quarters in the countries they had conquer'd; to prevent which, Agricola, who thoroughly understood the art of fortification, order'd forts to be built, that the Romans might safely winter there.

He spent the following winter in softening the rough manners of the Britons, and inspiring them with a desire of imitating the Roman customs. Soon after this, Britain was adorned with stately temples, noble portico's, and many curious buildings both publick and private. The British nobles spoke the Latin tongue, and wore the Roman habit; and, as Tacitus says, they look'd upon, as signs of politeness, what were so many badges of their slavery.

Third campaign.

Fourth campaign.

In his third campaign, Agricola proceeded in his conquests as far as the river Tweed. In the fourth, he subdued the nations between the Tweed and the two bays, call'd the fyrths of Edenborough and Dunbritton, into which the rivers of Glota and Bodotria discharge themselves. These two fyrths, one on the west, and the other on the east-side of Scotland, penetrate so far into the land, that the space between them is not above 30 or 35 miles. Here Agricola built castles and forts, by which the nations, yet unconquer'd, were pent up as in another island.

Fifth campaign.

In his fifth campaign, he vanquish'd some nations beyond the fyrths, and planted garrisons along the western coast opposite to Ireland, designing to invade it, being fully inform'd of its condition by a nobleman that was banish'd from that island.

Sixth campaign.

In his sixth campaign, Agricola pass'd the Bodotria, ordering his fleet, the first the Romans ever had on these seas*, to row along the coasts, and take a view of the ports in the northern parts. This terrified the enemy, but exceedingly animated the Romans, who, by this means, in those unknown countries, had always a communication with their fleet.

But Agricola, advancing farther north, found that the northern nations were marching towards him with a formidable army. To prevent being surrounded, he divided his troops, as the enemy had done theirs, into three bodies. The Britons, upon this, at once rejoin'd their forces, and furiously attack'd the ninth legion, encamp'd at some distance from the rest of the army, and were in a fair way of subduing the camp. Agricola march'd with all speed to their assistance, sending the light-horse before, to continue the fight, till the army should come up. At break of day, he was in view of the enemy; and the army, seeing the legion in extremity, rush'd upon them, and, at last, obliged them to give way; and, if the fens had not favour'd their retreat, this single battle would have compleated the war.

Seventh campaign.

In the spring, the Britons took the field again; and Agricola, having some trusty natives for his guides, marched in quest of them. Being near Grantzbain-hills, he saw above 30,000 of the enemy. Galgacus, the British general upon their approach, represented to his army, that, as they were at the extremity of the iſland, nothing but victory could preſerve them from perpetual bondage. On the contrary, Agricola exhorted his ſoldiers to their duty, ſhewing what a dreadful thing it would be, if, after a defeat, they ſhould fly to the Britons, who, for 50 years, had felt the force of their victorious arms. Then, drawing up his army in the beſt manner, to prevent the effuſion of Roman blood, he placed the auxiliary foot in the front, and the legions in the rear, whom he headed. Galgacus, to ſtrike the Romans with the greater terror, ranged his men on the ſide of a hill, that they might, at once, view his whole army; the horſe was drawn up on the plain at the bottom, and the chariots ran between the two armies. They fought, for ſome time, with darts, the Britons being unwilling to quit their poſt, their ſmall bucklers and great pointleſs ſwords being improper for cloſe fighting. However, Agricola forced them to it, by detatching four cohorts of Batavians and Thuringians, who attack'd them ſword in hand; by which means their ranks were ſoon broken, and the cohorts began to aſcend the hill. The others, following their example, gave the enemy no time to rally, but defeated all that oppoſed them. The Britiſh horſe began alſo to loſe ground; and the chariots drove up the hill, to aſſiſt the firſt ranks of the foot that were extremely diſorder'd. The chariots, at firſt, daunted the Romans; yet, through the unevenneſs of the ground, the charioteers could not command their horſes, and ſo they trampled upon friends as well as foes, as they came in their way. The infantry, poſted on the top of the hill, attempted to ſurround the Romans, as they purſued their victory. Agricola, upon this, order'd four ſquadrons to advance, who not only routed this body of foot, but, attacking the flank of the troops on the plain, made a great ſlaughter of them, which finiſh'd the victory. Galgacus, in this extremity, retreated, by night, with the remains of his army, in ſuch haſte, that it was in vain for the Romans to purſue them in the morning. The Britons loſt 10,000 men, and the Romans only 340. Agricola having diſpers'd the enemy, winter approaching, march'd back among the Horeſtians, who gave him hoſtages.

Domitian recalls Agricola.

Domitian, ſucceeding Titus his brother in the empire, ſeem'd pleas'd with the news of this victory, tho' he inwardly envy'd Agricola's glory; and on that account recall'd him, to make him governor of Syria; but, having got the ſenate to decree him a ſtatue crown'd with laurel, he caus'd him to be poiſon'd.

And poiſons him.

The Britons, all the country lying ſouth of the two fyrths having been reduced to a Roman province by Agricola, for the entire loſs of their liberty, receiv'd, however, great improvement in their cuſtoms and manners. Arts and ſciences flouriſh'd among them; and, from mere ſavages, they grew polite and civiliz'd, an advantage the northern parts could never attain. They, therefore, made but feint ſtruggles for the recovery of their freedom, the majority being ſatisfied with their ſlavery. But ſome of them, notwithſtanding, choſe to forfeit their eſtates, and retire among the Picts and Scots, rather than live in ſubjection to the Romans; who, joining with thoſe nations, waged continual wars againſt them, not ſparing even their own countrymen, whom they abhorr'd, for their tame and contented ſubmiſſion to the Romans.

The Britons, that had thus ſubmitted, underwent the uſual hardſhips of a conquer'd people. Exceſſive taxes were, on every occaſion, laid upon them, and their eſtates given to the veterans. The flower of their youth were ſent away as recruits into other provinces, a conſtant cuſtom among the Romans, to put it out of the power of a vanquiſh'd nation to revolt.

From this time to the reign of Adrian, we know little of the Britons; ſo that, probably, in this interval, they were quiet, and the inhabitants of the north enjoy'd their liberty. It is obſervable alſo, that the Romans permitted the Britons to have their kings, being proud in having ſuch for their ſubjects; Juvenal mentions Arviragus, as a Britiſh king, in the reign of Domitian.

Caledonians make irruptions into the Roman province.

In the firſt year of Adrian, the inhabitants of the north, conſiſting, as is believ'd, of Picts, Scots, and Britons, tho' the Roman writers ſtile them all by the common name of Caledonians, make irruptions into the Roman province. They, firſt, demoliſh ſome of Agricola's fortreſſes between the two fyrths; upon which, Julius Severus was ſent over, who was recall'd, before he could effect any thing, to be employ'd elſewhere. Adrian reſolv'd to go over, in perſon, to ſubdue theſe fierce and turbulent people, who ſtill continued their inroads; upon whoſe arrival, they retir'd towards the north. The emperor, however, went as far as York; but the account, ſome of Agricola's old ſoldiers gave him of the country, diverted him from his deſign. To make the Caledonians eaſy, he deliver'd up unto them all the lands between the two fyrths and the Tyne; and, to ſecure the Roman province, threw up a rampart of earth, from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway-fyrth, 80 miles long, and quite croſs the country from eaſt to weſt. He, after this, return'd to Rome, where he was honour'd with the title of reſtorer of Britain, as is evident from ſome medals.

Adrian comes into Britain, Ann. Dom. 124.

Raiſes a rampart quite croſs the country.

This rampart, however, did not prevent the irruptions of the Caledonians; for no ſooner were the Roman forces at a diſtance, than they began their inroads. In the reign of Antoninus, they broke down the rampart in ſeveral places. Lollius Urbicus, who was ſent to reſtrain them, having quell'd the Brigantes, rais'd another rampart between the two fyrths, which Agricola had formerly fortified; and, encamping ſome troops near at hand, pent up the Caledonians within their proper bounds.

Marcus

Marcus Aurelius, ſucceſſor to Antoninus, made Calphurnius Agricola governor of Britain, who repreſs'd the Caledonians, and more firmly eſtabliſh'd the Roman power over the diſcontented Britons. In this reign, Lucius a Britiſh king, embraced chriſtianity, which had long been planted in this iſland, tho' it made no great progreſs.

In the reign of Commodus, the Caledonians cut in pieces the Roman army, under the command of an unskilful general, and laid waſte the country in a moſt terrible manner. The whole province was in danger, had not the emperor ſpeedily ſent over Ulpius Marcellus, who ſoon compleated the war. He ſaw that theſe inroads of the Caledonians proceeded from the want of diſcipline in the Roman army, which he, therefore, endeavour'd to reſtore to its ancient ſtrictneſs. But, in ſpite of theſe, and all his other ſervices, the emperor depriv'd him of his government, and had like to have taken away his life.

The army mutinies.

Upon Marcellus's abſence, the army began to mutiny; and, therefore, Perennis, Commodus's favourite, broke or call'd home all the old officers, employing none but ſuch as were creatures of his own. The army, reſenting this, detach'd 1500 men, to accuſe him before the emperor of treaſonable practices. Commodus, having been jealous of him for ſome time, deliver'd him up to the ſoldiers, who diſpatch'd him on the ſpot.

Pertinax made governor.

Pertinax, afterwards emperor, was ſent over, to ſuppreſs the ſeditious temper of the army, who, acting according to the rigour of military diſcipline, in a mutiny of the ninth legion, was left for dead among the ſlain. However, at laſt, he brought the army to obedience; and, deſiring to be remov'd, was ſucceeded by Clodius Albinus, who, on ſome ſuſpicion, being recall'd, Junius Severus was ſent in his room.

Albinus.

In the reign of Pertinax, Albinus was again made governor, and continued in his poſt by Julian. Albinus's generoſity ſo charm'd the ſoldiers, that they proclaim'd him emperor, on the death of Julian. Septimius Severus in Pannonia, and Peſcennius Niger in Syria, at the ſame time, received the ſame honour from their armies. Severus, craftily offering to ſhare the empire between him and Albinus, which offer was accepted, he vanquiſh'd Peſcennius and ſlew him. Then, getting Albinus to be declar'd an enemy to the ſtate, he gave him battle in Gaul, near Lyons, whither he had brought his army from Britain, in which Albinus was defeated and ſlain. Severus, ſoon after, divided Britain into two governments, giving the ſouth to Heraclitus, and the north to Virius Lupus, whom the Caledonians ſo infeſted, that he was oblig'd to purchaſe a peace.

Britain divided into two governments by Severus An. 197.

Upon this, Britain was quiet till the 15th year of Severus, when the Caledonians, encourag'd by the entire neglect of diſcipline in the Roman army, made freſh inroads into the Roman province; inſomuch that the emperor, tho' ſixty years old, and afflicted with the gout, went over in perſon with a great army, to ſubdue the north, taking with him his two ſons Caracalla and Geta. The Caledonians, upon his arrival propos'd an honourable peace, which he rejected; and, leaving Geta at London, to take care of the ſouthern parts, he with Caracalla penetrated even to the extremities of the north. In this fatiguing expedition, he loſt 50,000 men, in cutting down woods, draining bogs or filling them with bavins, and by the ambuſcades of the enemy. Having, at laſt, vanquiſh'd thoſe nations, that had hitherto been unconquer'd, he found the country could not be kept in ſubjection, without a great army on the ſpot; and, therefore, did no more than divide the iſland into two parts, by building a wall in the place where Adrian had made a rampart, and not, as ſome fancy, between the two fyrths. Some remains of this wall, call'd by the ancient Britons Murſever or the wall of Severus, and by the Engliſh the Picts-wall, are to be ſeen to this day. The emperor, leaving the finiſhing of the wall and command of the army to Caracalla, went to York, and aſſum'd the title of Britannicus Maximus. Caracalla, in his father's abſence, indulged the ſoldiers in all ſorts of licentiouſneſs, ſo that the Caledonians unanimouſly revolted, who were but little accuſtom'd to the Roman yoke. Severus, not underſtanding the grounds of it, order'd all the rebels to be maſſacred; he died ſoon after at York, and his ſons, having made a peace with the Caledonians, return'd to Rome.

From the death of Severus to the reign of Diocleſian, we have a very imperfect account of the Britiſh affairs. The coins of Lollianus, Victorinus, Poſthumius, and others, commonly found in England, ſhew that ſome of the thirty tyrants were acknowledg'd, if not perſonally preſent, in Britain. Bonoſus, who attempted to uſurp the empire, in the reigns of Tacitus and Aurelian, was born in Britain. Probus was the firſt that permitted the Britons, Gauls, and Spaniards to plant vines. He ſent over alſo into Britain ſwarms of Vandals and Burgundians, who, it is general, thought, ſettled on Gogmagog-hills near Cambridge, where there is a fortification to this day, ſuppos'd to be their work, tho' it is far more probable it belong'd to the Danes, who were, for a long time, maſters of Cambridge.

Diocleſian.

In the firſt part of Diocleſian's reign, Carauſius was order'd to clear the ſeas of the Francs and Saxons that infeſted the Belgic, Armorican, and Britiſh coaſts. He enrich'd himſelf ſo prodigiouſly by unfair methods, that Maximilian, who reign'd then in the weſt, reſolv'd to have him aſſaſſinated. Carauſius, being inform'd of this, aſſum'd the title of emperor; and ſuch intereſt had he in the army in Britain, by his wealth, that his authority was own'd in that iſland. Maximilian march'd againſt him as far as Gaul; but judg'd it moſt proper, at length, to make him partner partner with him in the empire, leaving him the government of Britain for his ſhare. There are coins of theſe two emperors ſtill in England, having on the reverſe two hands join'd together with theſe words, Concordia Augg.

Maximilian, notwithſtanding this treaty, ſent Conſtantius, whom he had juſt then made Cæſar, with an army againſt his aſſociate. Whilſt Conſtantius was engag'd in the ſiege of Bulloign, taking it to be the door into Britain from Gaul, Carauſius was ſlain by Alectus, who aſſumed the title of emperor. Conſtantius directly paſs'd into Britain to expel this uſurper; but Alectus, ſoon after, was kill'd by Aſclepiodorus, who, uſurping the imperial dignity, was afterwards ſlain in a battle.

In the interim, Diocleſian and Maximilian, both on the ſame day, reſign'd the empire to Conſtantius and Galerius. Conſtantius had the weſtern provinces with Britain, who, upon ſome commotions, came over in perſon, and died at York, in an expedition againſt the northern people, then called Deucaledonians and Vecturions. Before his death, he had the pleaſure of ſeeing his ſon Conſtantine, whom he named for his ſucceſſor, and who is ſaid by ſome * to have been born in Britain of Helena daughter of Coel king of Colcheſter.

Conſtantius comes over, and dies at York.

Conſtantine.

The Britons liv'd quietly, during Conſtantine's reign, who was the firſt emperor that allow'd the chriſtians the free exerciſe of their religion throughout the Roman empire, and conſequently in Britain. He divided the whole empire into four præfectures, viz. Italy, Gaul, the Eaſt, and Illyria, which contained under them 14 large dioceſes or provinces. Britain, one of them, was ſubject to the præfect of Gaul, and govern'd by his lieutenant. Conſtantine divided it into three provinces, Britannia prima, the country ſouth of the Thames, the capital London; Britannia ſecunda or Wales, the capital Iſca or Caerleon; and Maxima Cæſarienſis, the capital York; which laſt was afterwards ſubdivided into two parts, the ſouthern which retain'd its old name, and the other more northward which was ſtil'd Flavia Cæſarienſis. There were 28 cities in theſe three provinces that became ſo many biſhops ſeats. The præfect of Gaul's lieutenant had under him four magiſtrates; two conſulars, and two called preſidents. Theſe officers, with ſeveral inferior ones, managed all civil and criminal affairs. As for the government of the army, there were in the empire two generaliſſimo's †, one for the eaſt, and another for the weſt. There were three general officers in Britain, viz. the count of Britain, who took care of the inland parts, and, probably, of the weſtern coaſts ‡; the duke of Britain, who defended the north from the inroads of the Picts and Scots ; and the count of the Saxon coaſts, who guarded the eaſtern and ſouthern coaſts from the Saxon piracies *†. There were ſeveral other officers for more private concerns; all which enriched themſelves, at the expence of the province.

Britain divided into provinces.

Conſtantine, having removed the imperial ſeat from Rome to Conſtantinople, often drain'd his weſtern provinces of their forces, and, among the reſt, Britain; on which account, the Britons were ſo much expos'd to the ravages of the Picts and Scots, that, at laſt, they were forced to invite a foreign nation to their aid, who ſubdued the iſland.

Upon Conſtantine's death, the empire was divided between his three ſons; but, in a little time, Conſtantius became ſole emperor. He ſent into Britain a notary, call'd Paulus, who was guilty of numberleſs extortions. As he had an independent commiſſion, Martinus, the governor, could not oppoſe him; yet he adviſ'd him to uſe his power with more diſcretion. Paulus inſolently told him, that they who cenſur'd his proceedings deſerv'd to be put in irons, as rebels to the emperor, which incenſed Martinus to draw his ſword and ſtrike at him; but miſſing his blow, he ran it into his own breaſt and kill'd himſelf, and Paulus, after this, protected by the emperor, condemn'd to death or impriſonment all that oppos'd him.

Conſtantius.

Paulus's extortions.

In Valentinian's reign, Britain was miſerably reduced by the joint attacks of the Picts, Scots, Attacots, Francs, and Saxons. Nectaridus, guardian of the coaſts, was defeated and ſlain, as was ſoon after duke Buchobaudes. Firſt Severus and then Jovinus, ſent over on this occaſion, had the ſame fate. At laſt, Theodoſius the elder, ſo called to diſtinguiſh him from his ſon, the firſt emperor of that name, being deputed, routed and drove theſe pillagers out of the Roman province, and, having recover'd all their plunder, reſtor'd it to the proprietors; he repair'd the ruin'd cities and caſtles, and, the enemy being retir'd beyond the two fyrths, he fortified the neck of land between the two ſeas, making a fifth province of the country they deſerted, ſtiling it Valentia, in honour of Valentinian. After this, Theodoſius return'd to Rome, leaving the iſland to the care of the governors of the five provinces.

Valentinian. An. 368.

In the reign of Valentinian II. and Gratian, Maximus was ſent into Britain, to appeaſe the Picts. Finding, on his arrival, that the union of the Scots and Picts was the only obſtacle to the entire conqueſt of the iſland, he propos'd to divide them; and, accordingly, prevail'd on the Picts to join the Romans, promiſing them all the lands that ſhould be taken from the Scots, who, ſoon after, being attack'd by theſe united powers, abandon'd their country, flying to Ireland and the adjacent iſles. Maximus was as good as his word to the Picts, tho' with an intent of ſubduing them alſo, on a proper occaſion.

In the mean time, Gratian, who reign'd jointly with his brother Valentinian, made Theodoſius the younger his partner. This choice, tho' applauded by all, was highly reſented by Maximus, who expected and imagin'd he beſt deſerv'd that honour himſelf; and, therefore, he reſolv'd to aſſume the imperial dignity. Inſtead of waging war againſt the Picts, he, now, endeavour'd to ſecure their friendſhip, to prevent any diſturbance in Britain, whilſt he ſhould be engag'd, elſewhere, againſt the three emperors; but the Scots, aided by ſome Iriſh troops, attempting to recover their country, for the preſent, interrupted his deſigns. He forced them, however, back into Ireland; and, pretending to follow them thither, ſo terrify'd the Iriſh, that they ſent to him to make his own terms, which were more favourable than they expected; and then, taking upon him the title of emperor, he went into Gaul againſt Gratian. According to the Roman hiſtorians, Maximus having got Gratian to be aſſaſſinated, as he was flying into Italy, and dethron'd Valentinian II. was, himſelf, conquer'd and beheaded by Theodoſius. Valentinian, being reſtor'd, was ſoon after murder'd by Arbogaſtus, who advanced Eugenius to the throne. Theodoſius fought the uſurper, treating him as he had done Maximus; and, thus, he became ſole emperor, and continued ſo to his death.

Honorius. He dying, the empire was divided between his two ſons, Arcadius having the eaſt, and Honorius the weſt. The latter being very young, the famous Stilico was regent, during his minority. His firſt care was to ſend Victorinus, a fierce and arrogant perſon, with a legion into Britain, to keep the Picts within bounds; but he treated them as ſubjects to the empire, forbidding them to chuſe a ſucceſſor to Hengiſt their king, lately deceaſed. The Picts, upon this, reſolved to recall the Scots; and, therefore, ſent an honourable ambaſſy to Fergus of the blood-royal of Scotland, then in Denmark, intreating him to return with his countrymen, and take poſſeſſion again of their country, promiſing him the command of their army in the war againſt the Romans, which ſeem'd to be unavoidable. Fergus, accepting this offer, ſent to the Scots to inform them, that he was ready to conduct them home; that they could never have a better opportunity, the empire being torn in pieces by inteſtine quarrels, and without powerfully attack'd by barbarous nations, that made horrible devaſtations on the frontiers; beſides, Stilico had recall'd Victorinus with his legion. At this juncture, the Scots reenter Britain, and unanimouſly choſe Fergus for their king*.

Gordon Scotorum. Chr. Buch. An. 403.

Fergus wages war with the Romans. Fergus immediately began to think of revenge on the Romans; and, having ſubdued the fortreſſes between the two fyrths, he proceeded as far as Severus's wall, where, without much difficulty, he enter'd into the Roman province, making great ravages.

The Britons, that is, the natives with a mixture of Romans and other foreigners, whoſe intereſt was now the ſame, being thus harraſs'd by their neighbours, and deſpairing of any aſſiſtance from Rome, elected Marcus, an officer of great eſteem among them, for their emperor; but, not pleaſing the people, he was ſlain or dethron'd, and Gratian choſen in his room, who, being of a cruel diſpoſition, was diſpatch'd four months after his election. One Conſtantine, a private centinel, purely on the account of his name, was next choſen, who, being a courageous man, drove back the Scots and Picts into their country; and, entering into a treaty with them, deſign'd to make himſelf maſter of the whole Roman empire. Accordingly, he paſs'd over into Gaul with the remainder of the Britiſh army; but, about four years after, he was vanquiſh'd by count Conſtantius, and beheaded by the order of Honorius the emperor.

The Britons, thus abandon'd, were reduc'd to great extremities by the Picts and Scots. The Romans could not aſſiſt them, being, themſelves, invaded by the Goths under Alaric, who, having ſack'd the city of Rome, had got poſſeſſion of Gaul; and the Suevi, Vandals, Catti, and Alans were become maſters of Spain. The emperor, however, to prevent the importunities of the Britons for aſſiſtance, publickly and freely acquitted them of the Roman juriſdiction. An. 410. An. 410.

Miſery of the Britons. This liberty enhanced their miſery. Ætius, in the reign of Valentinian III. having obtain'd ſignal victories over the Wiſigoths and Burgundians, in compaſſion to the Britons, ſent them a legion, under the command of Gallio of Ravenna, or, as others ſay, of Maximilian, who forced the Scots and Picts to retire into their own country; but the emperor recall'd this legion, juſt as the enemy was beginning their irruptions.

Ætius, before his departure, aſſur'd the Britons, that it would be in vain for them to expect any aſſiſtance hereafter from the emperor; he, therefore, adviſ'd them to inure themſelves to arms, exhorting them to repair Severus's wall, as a barrier againſt their enemies, and promiſing them the help of his ſoldiers and his own direction in the work. The Britons fell in with his advice; and, as ſoon as they had compleated the wall, the Romans took their laſt farewell of Britain, about the year 426 or 427†.

The Romans take their laſt leave of Britain.

The Picts and Scots began their hoſtilities, now, with greater confidence than ever; and, that they might make irruptions, at their pleaſure, they made large breaches in ſeveral parts of the wall, lately repair'd, which was weakly defended by the Britons. Some time after, Fergus died, on his way to Ireland, leaving his young ſon, Eugenius II. under the regency of Graham, his grandfather by the mother's ſide.

The Britons, in their deſperate condition, retir'd more ſouthward. The Picts and Scots, upon this, would have ſent for colonies from Ireland and the adjacent iſles, to inhabit the lands abandoned by the Britons, deſigning to drive them entirely out of the iſland, had not Graham prevented them by his authority, fearing the return of the Romans, with whoſe diſtreſſed ſtate, perhaps, he was not thoroughly acquainted; and, therefore, he preferr'd a ſolid peace before a dangerous war. This treaty oblig'd the Britons to pay a conſiderable ſum of money, and Severus's wall was to be the common boundary between both nations; this peace, however, was no way pleaſing to the Scots.

Eugenius breaks the peace.

Eugenius II. having the reins in his own hands, reſolved to break a treaty ſo diſagreeable to his ſubjects, and ſent ambaſſadors to demand all the lands the Scots were formerly poſſeſs'd of. The Britons, ſurpriz'd at this news, conveen'd a general aſſembly. The majority, believing that the Scots wanted only a pretence to begin the war, judg'd it beſt to reject their demands, which would only facilitate their deſign. Others, ſenſible of the extreme weakneſs of the nation, were for finding out ſome expedient to pleaſe the Scots, and avoid, if poſſible, a war, which muſt, of courſe, prove fatal to them; they farther told the aſſembly that Britain, drain'd by the Romans of all their ſoldiers, were forced to abandon the very lands now demanded, and their enjoying them was altogether owing to Graham's generoſity; that it was, therefore, more adviſeable for the Britons freely to reſign what they could not keep, than, on that ſcore, endanger the loſs of their all.

The Britons, declaring for war, are beaten; they obtain peace on hard terms.

Notwithſtanding the weight and ſolidity of theſe reaſons, the other party prevail'd; and the Scots ambaſſadors were diſmiſs'd with an inſulting anſwer. A deſtructive war enſuing, in which the Britons loſt 15,000 men, they were obliged humbly to ſue for that peace they had ſcornfully refus'd; but, to obtain it, they deliver'd up to the Picts and Scots all the country north of the Humber.

Cauſes of the weakneſs of the Britons.

Nennius, c. 23.

That the Britons were reduced to ſo low a ſtate may be accounted for, firſt, becauſe the Romans always employ'd foreign troops in their conqueſts, never permitting the natives to exerciſe their arms; for the levies rais'd in Britain were ſent into other provinces, from whence they never return'd. There were twelve large bodies of Britons, in the ſervice of the Romans, always recruited from Britain. Secondly, Maximus and Conſtantine almoſt drain'd the iſland of all that could bear arms; to which we may add their loſſes, after they were deſerted by the Romans.

Gildas.

From this time to the arrival of the Saxons, the Britiſh hiſtory is very confus'd, thro' the great difference among the writers of this age. We can learn nothing certain from them, but that the Britons had ſeveral kings, who were ſlain or dethron'd, according to the caprice or intereſts of the chiefs. It is alſo likely, that ſeveral princes reigning, at the ſame time, over different provinces weaken'd one another by their diviſions; and, to compleat their miſery, a dreadful famine rag'd among the Britons. Vaſt numbers, to ſave their lives, retir'd into Armorica, where a great part of the army, Maximus led into Gaul, was ſettled; and others, rather than periſh with hunger, ſubmitted to the mercy of the Picts and Scots, who, at this juncture, broke the peace, and, paſſing the Humber, made horrible devaſtations.

In this extremity, the Britons once more apply'd to the Romans, and writ a very moving letter to Ætius then in Gaul: "We "know not, ſay they, what courſe to ſteer. "The barbarians drive us to the ſea, and "the ſea drives us back to the barbarians. "Thus, of two kinds of death, always in our "view, one or other muſt be choſen, either "to be ſwallow'd up by the waves, or de-"ſtroy'd by the ſword." Ætius was making preparations againſt Attila, who had enter'd Gaul with 80,000 men; and, therefore, anſwered the Britons, that he could not comply with their petition. Upon this, they were thunder-ſtruck, and call'd together a general council, which agreed that the only means, to prevent their ruin, was to chooſe a monarch *, fancying that, being united under one head, their diviſions would ceaſe, and they ſhould be more enabled to reſiſt their enemies; but ſuch were the diſſenſions of their petty kings, that they endeavour'd to diſpatch the monarch elect, in order to ſucceed him. Theſe monarchs, therefore, could not ſubſiſt long; and the Britons, by this means, only plunged themſelves the deeper into anarchy and confuſion.

Vortigern choſen in 445.

The names of theſe monarchs are unknown till Vortigern king of the Dnumonii †, choſen in the year 445, who, being the moſt impatient of a ſuperior, had been always an avowed enemy to the preceding monarchs, and, as hiſtorians affirm, he even aſſaſſinated his predeceſſor. He was altogether unfit to reſtore the Britiſh affairs; and, being advanced by artifice and cabals, he was chiefly ſollicitous to ſecure his power. He was, alſo, of a cruel and covetous temper, addicted to many vices, and ſo lewd, that he debauched his own daughter, perſuading her ſhe ſhould be a queen. In the interim, the enemy muſt be repulſed; and Vortigern knew how unequal he was to that work, for which he was elected; and his continual apprehenſions of being dethron'd, moſt of all, perplexed him. Dreading, thus, his own ſubjects as well as the enemy, he thought he had form'd a project of freeing himſelf from the danger of both; but, not being able to execute his design, without the consent of the Britons, he conven'd a general assembly. Having pathetically represented the misery of the Britons, who must, as things stood, either be forced out of their country, or utterly destroyed by the enemy, assur'd them, there was only one way left for their safety, viz. to invite the warlike Saxons to assist them, who were at hand, and by whose means they might be in a capacity to repay the enemy in their own coin.

Proposes the calling in of the Saxons.

His proposal received.

Their fears and hopes, and, to be sure, the desire of revenge, induced them joyfully to receive Vortigern's proposal. The next thing to be consulted was, what conditions they should offer the Saxons. Vortigern propos'd the giving them some province, that their interest might prevail on them to fight with more vigour; but, as this would deprive some of the chiefs of part of their dominions, it was warmly debated. At last, it was agreed, they should have the isle of Thanet in Kent, being a proper place for landing their forces, and also for embarquing, when they should have a desire to return home. It was voted also, that the Saxon soldiers should be allowed pay, which should be settled by mutual agreement. Upon this, ambassadors were sent to negotiate this affair in Germany. Vortigern having gained his point, without being suspected of self-interest, fancied himself altogether out of danger. But alas, how blind is human wisdom! This very expedient, by the direction of divine providence, proved his own and the nations ruin.

Here it will be necessary to say somewhat of the Saxons, of whom the generality of the English historians give us but a slender account.

Origin of the Saxons.

About the time the Romans began their conquests in Germany, the inhabitants of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, now called Jutland, took possession of the northern parts of Germany, who divided themselves into the Suevi, Francs, and Saxons. Some affirm that the Francs were a branch of the Suevi; but, be that as it will, these three nations, continually advancing southward, at last, came upon the frontiers of the Roman empire, the Suevi towards Italy, the Francs to the south-west, towards the coast of Belgic Gaul, and the Saxons to the westward, towards the German ocean. The Suevi so terrify'd the ancient Germans, that they thought them to be a match for the immortal gods. The Francs over-run at length, the whole province of Gaul [founding the noble and antient kingdom of France.]

Cæs. com. l. 4.

The Saxons were possess'd of all the land between the Rhine and the Elbe, their territories being bounded on the west by the German ocean, and extending eastward to the borders of Thuringia, so that they were masters of Saxony, Westphalia, and all the Low-countries north of the Rhine. The people they subdued were also, at length, called Saxons; but, whether the Saxons proceeded more slowly in their conquests than the Suevi, or that they took a longer course, before they approach'd the Romans, they were not so soon known. Eutropius and Orosius, the first Roman historians, to whom we are obliged for our accounts of the northern nations, that take notice of them, at least, by the name of Saxons, tell us that Carausius, as above, was sent to clear the seas of the pyratical Francs and Saxons. From this time, they became formidable to the Romans; and, upon the decline of that empire, after Theodosius's death, the Saxons conquer'd all the country along the coasts of the German ocean, extending their conquests to the islands of Zealand; and, therefore, the Frisons, Batavians, and all their neighbours were scarce known by any other name but that of Saxons.

Tho' several have wrote on this subject, they leave us still in the dark, as to their original, nor do they distinguish the people that were stiled by the general name of Saxons; and, for this reason, the beginning of their history is confus'd, which is not to be wonder'd at, the authors, for the most part, having made no distinction of times and places. Sometimes, considering them, as they left their own country, they confound them with the Francs and Suevi, under the name of Cimbrians; at another time, they represent them as settled to the north of the Frisons, Batavians, and other neighbouring nations subject to the Romans. Some place them, at once, along the shore of the German ocean and banks of the Rhine, and even in the islands of Zealand, as if they had been from their original, inhabitants of these countries. Others, again, not observing that all their conquests were called Saxony, and finding some Saxons in the east of Westphalia, fancied them a distinct nation from those along the Rhine, as if I should make the Francs that vanquish'd Gaul a different people from those that settled in the Narbonnoise. However, it is certain, when the Britons called them in to their assistance, the Saxons were possess'd of Westphalia, Saxony, east and west Friezland, Holland, and Zealand.

Some carry their original as high as the tower of Babel; and, after several removes, from one country to another, at last, settle them in Saxony, so termed from them. Others think they descended from the Sacæ or Sassones of Asia *. Some derive them from the Persians, from the affinity between several Saxon and Persian words; but they, who have no mind to make an elaborate enquiry into this affair, begin the history of the Saxons from their leaving the Cimbrian Chersonesus.

The Saxons had, for some time, been possessed of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, when, The Angles.

being expell'd by the Goths, from whom that peninſula was ſtiled Gothland or Jutland, they came and ſettled in lower Saxony. Between theſe two places were a people, called Angles, inhabiting about Sleſwick in Holſtein; and, probably, the little country of Anglen, in thoſe parts, receiv'd its name from them, or they theirs from it. Theſe Angles, as well as a vaſt number of Juttes, call'd Wittes by Bede, joining the Saxons, with a view of having a ſhare in their conqueſts in Germany, became in a manner but one people; but, though they were generally all term'd Saxons, they were ſometimes called Anglo-Saxons. The good underſtanding between theſe three nations, their intereſt being always the ſame, and the government they eſtabliſh'd in Britain, evidently prove, that they were united before their coming here, and that they look'd upon themſelves as one nation.

Etymology of the word Saxon.

The genuine etymology of their name is as uncertain as their original. It is generally thought, that the word Saxon is deriv'd from Seax, in their language, a ſword. The Saxons wore a long ſword by their ſide, or at their back, and they uſed a ſhorter one for a bayonet or dagger; they were both ſhaped like a cutlace or faulchion.

Their manners.

In their manners, they much reſembled the antient Germans, being naturally fierce and warlike; but they were cruel to their enemies, eſpecially their priſoners of war, whom they ſacrificed to their gods.

Their government.

Their dominions were divided into twelve provinces, each of which had a chief accountable to the general aſſembly of the nation. In time of war, they choſe a general, who was inveſted with almoſt ſovereign power; but, the war being ended, his authority, like the Roman dictators, expir'd. Brunſwick was the center of their dominions.

Religion.

Their religion was the ſame with that of other northern nations and ſome part of Germany. The Britiſh Saxons became chriſtians about the end of the ſixth century; but thoſe in Germany were not converted till the ninth, by the care or rather violence of Charlemain. Their chief gods, before their converſion, were the Sun, Moon, Tuiſco, Woden, Thor, Friga or Fræa, and Seater, to whom they conſecrated the days of the week, as appears from the names the Germans, Dutch, and Engliſh give the days of the week to this day. Tuiſco is ſuppos'd to be Japhet's grandſon, and to have peopled the north of Europe; and the name of Teutch, the Germans give themſelves, is probably derived from Tuiſco. The god Thor, from whence the word thunder, was the ſame among the Saxons, as Jupiter among the Romans, i. e. the thunderer. Woden was the god of war, becauſe, under his conduct, the firſt Saxons left their country and made great conqueſts; and the principal families regarded him as their founder. In all probability, there were two of this name often confounded; one more antient, whom they ador'd as a god, and another who was the common father of the Saxon leaders. There are ſtill in England ſome footſteps of Woden, as Wanſdick, Wansborough, contractions of Woden's-dick and Woden's-borough. Friga, Woden's wife, was the Venus of the Saxons, who was worſhipp'd in the ſhape of an hermaphrodite, as being the goddeſs of both ſexes. They had another god, called Ermenſwol, the ſame as Mercury, and ſome others in common with all the northern nations. This is the moſt complete and clear account I can give of the Saxons, whom the Britons, by Vortigern's advice, invited to their aſſiſtance.

The ſtate of the Britiſh church, to the calling in of the SAXONS.

The ſtate of the Britiſh church.

THE Britons, like all other nations, except the Jews, before the birth of Chriſt, were groſs idolaters; and they had as many and extravagant deities, as the Egyptians themſelves. Andate, the goddeſs of victory, was one of the chief; and they had alſo gods to whom they aſcrib'd the ſame attributes, the Greeks and Romans did to Apollo and Diana.

Converſion of the Britons.

Tho' the preciſe time is uncertain; yet all agree the goſpel was preach'd very early in Britain. Thoſe, who ſuppoſe it to have been in Tiberius's reign, don't conſider that the firſt gentile Cornelius was not converted before the year of our Lord 40, three years after that emperor's death. Baronius, on the authority of Simeon Metaphraſtes, which he often rejects with reaſon, ſays St. Peter firſt preached to the Britons; but it is certain that this apoſtle perform'd his office chiefly in the eaſtern countries. Others tell us, that Simeon Zelotes converted the Britons. Nicephorus, Calliſtus Dorotheus, in his ſynopſis, and the Grecian kalendar affirm, that this apoſtle was crucified and buried in Britain; when, at the ſame time, the Roman martyrology and thoſe of Bede, Adon, and Uſuard declare that he ſuffer'd martyrdom in Perſia.

Whether Joſeph of Arimathea converted the Britons.

The moſt received opinion for ſome time, tho' as groundleſs as the former, was, that Joſeph of Arimathea was the apoſtle of the Britons. William of Malmsbury, to prove the the antiquity of the church of Glaſton or Glaſſenbury, affirms, after Freculphus, that, upon St. Stephen's martyrdom, the apoſtles being diſpers'd over the whole world, St. Philip, at his coming among the Francs, ſent Joſeph of Arimathea, with twelve of his diſciples, to plant the goſpel in Great-Britain, where they arrived in the year 61. After ſeveral interruptions, a Britiſh king gave them a ſmall ſpot of fenny ground, for a dwelling-place; and, ſoon after, two other neighbouring kings having allowed them twelve hydes of land, the angel Gabriel commanded them from God, to build a church in Glaſton, then called Inſwitrin *. This church, being finiſh'd in the year 63, was dedicated by our Saviour to the virgin Mary. To confirm this, a manuſcript chronicle in the abbey of Glaſſenbury is produced, to ſhew that Arviragus was the king who made the firſt preſent to Joſeph. Indeed, Juvenal mentions a Britiſh king of this name in the reign of Domitian; but it muſt be proved, that he lived in the time of Nero, ſince it is ſuppoſed the land, on which the church was built, was given to Joſeph in the year 61. In the next place, a charter of St. Patricius is alledged, which ſays, that Glaſton-church was founded by twelve diſciples of St. James and St. Philip; but, beſides ſeveral marks of forgery in this charter, it does not make the leaſt mention of Joſeph of Arimathea. Another charter is alſo produced from Ina king of the Weſt-Saxons, who lived in the 8th century, which declares that Glaſton is the moſt antient of all the Britiſh churches; but even in this charter, more ſuſpicious than the former, there is not a word of Joſeph. To the ſame purpoſe, a charter from Henry II. king of England, is alledged, wherein the king himſelf affirms, that, upon examination, he found it well atteſted, that the church of Glaſſenbury was built by the diſciples of the apoſtles, and dedicated to the virgin Mary by our Saviour himſelf. But this aſſertion, being founded upon the former proofs, is of no weight at all; and, beſides, the Francs were unknown at the time St. Philip is ſaid to come into their country. Euſebius, moreover, and ſeveral others tell us, that this apoſtle preached in Phrygia, and ſuffer'd martyrdom in Hierapolis; and, as for the hydes of land, the word hyde alone, being Saxon, ſufficiently confutes the ſtory; and it is notorious the Saxons came not to Britain till the year 449.

The Britons were converted ſoon after Chriſt's death.

It is highly probable the goſpel was preached in Britain ſoon after † Chriſt's death. Theodoret affirms, that the Britons were converted by the apoſtles. Euſebius, ſpeaking of the dangers the apoſtles met with, in preaching the goſpel in the moſt diſtant countries, mentions the Britiſh iſles. It is moſt likely the Britons were converted, between the time of Claudius's victory and Boadicea's defeat; for there were then in the iſland above 80,000 Romans, and, doubtleſs, ſome chriſtians, the goſpel having, at that time, prevail'd in many places, eſpecially at Rome; and I, therefore, ſee no inconvenience in aſſerting with ſeveral modern authors, that St. Paul firſt preached the goſpel in Britain. It is evident that, in the eight years between his firſt impriſonment at Rome and his return to Jeruſalem, he propagated chriſtianity in ſeveral places, particularly in the weſtern countries. He tells us of his deſign of going into Spain; and, probably, he might come over among the Britons, in order to convert them. Venutius Fortunatus, in his poem on the life of St. Martin, ſpeaking of the travels of St. Paul, favours this opinion; but, after all, it is mere conjecture, and proves no more than that the goſpel was very early planted in Britain.

Tho' this opinion could be ſupported beyond contradiction; yet it may be preſumed the chriſtian religion had no deep footing in the iſland, ſince, as ſeveral writers affirm, Lucius, a Britiſh king, ſent ambaſſadors to Eleutherus, the 12th biſhop of Rome, to intreat him to ſend over ſome miſſionaries, to inſtruct him in the chriſtian faith. Eleutherus joyfully embracing this opportunity of replanting the goſpel in Britain, where, in all probability, it had been rooted out by perſecutions, firſt of all, inſtructed Elwan and Medwin the two ambaſſadors; and, having baptized and conſecrated them biſhops, he ſent them home, by whoſe means chriſtianity flouriſh'd again in Britain, and had a vaſt ſpread. I omit the many things reported of Lucius, eſpecially the great number of churches he built in London, becauſe it is not to be ſuppoſed the Romans would ſuffer it. I paſs over alſo his travels, wherein he is ſaid to convert ſeveral nations, particularly the Griſons, in whoſe country he ſuffer'd martyrdom, as being entirely groundleſs; tho', poſſibly, ſome chriſtian, called Lucius, might preach the goſpel to the Griſons, and be martyr'd at Coire.

From this time to Diocleſian's perſecution, the hiſtory of the Britiſh church is altogether unknown. It is, however, likely that, during this interval of 80 years, chriſtianity made great progreſs in Britain, as is evident from Tertullian, Origen, Bede, and Gildas; but the vaſt number of Britiſh martyrs, that ſuffer'd in the dreadful perſecution under Diocleſian and Maximilian his collegue, puts this matter beyond all diſpute. St. Alban was the firſt martyr, who was converted at Verulam ‡ by a prieſt, whom he harbour'd in his houſe. How much ſoever Conſtantius Clorus was inclin'd to favour the chriſtians, when governour of Britain, yet he could not diſpenſe with the edicts of the emperors; but, on his coming to the empire, he put a ſtop to the perſecution.

ſecution. In the reign of Conſtantine his ſon, chriſtianity flouriſh'd in all his dominions, eſpecially in Great-Britain, where ſome ſay he was born.

Upon this happy revolution, Great-Britain abounded with churches; and, according to ſome, there were Britiſh biſhops at the council of Nice in 325. This is not at all improbable, ſeeing there were certainly three biſhops at the council of Arles, 22 years after; as there were ſome at the council of Ariminum in 359, but ſo poor, that they could not bear their own charges *. Their ſigning at this council the confeſſion of faith, wherein the term, conſubſtantial, was omitted, made ſome think that Arianiſm prevail'd in Britain; but a late author has proved, that the faith of the Britiſh church was the ſame, in this point, both before and after this council, which had not the effect the hereticks expected.

Pelagianiſm in Britain.

The Britiſh church was more juſtly charged with pelagianiſm. Several biſhops were ſeduced into this error, not by Pelagius himſelf, who, tho' a native of Britain, never returned thither, but by Agricola, one of his diſciples. This hereſy increaſing daily, the orthodox biſhops, ſent to the Gauliſh prelates, to deſire their aſſiſtance to confute it, who, being aſſembled in council, deputed Germanus biſhop of Auxerre, and Lapus biſhop of Troyes, to go over into Britain. At Verulam, in a conference with the pelagians, they brought over ſeveral from their errors. But, after their departure, the hereticks gaining ground again, Germanus, tho' advanced in years, made a ſecond voyage into Britain, accompanied by Severus biſhop of Troyes; and, deſpairing to convince them by arguments, he caus'd the edict of Valentinian III. that condemns all hereticks to baniſhment, to be put in execution againſt them. Before he left the iſland, he founded ſchools, which produced many biſhops famous for learning and piety.

Corruptions of the Britons the cauſe of their miſeries.

From this period to the arrival of the Saxons, we are much in the dark about the affairs of the Britiſh church. Doubtleſs, the wars with the Picts and Scots, by deſtroying their churches, and, what is worſe, by introducing a general corruption of manners, were very fatal to the chriſtians; tho' Gildas and Bede ſay, not ſo much the wars, as the ſudden and exceſſive plenty, juſt after the famine, corrupted the manners of the Britons. The clergy out-did even the laity in wickedneſs; and, gluttony, avarice, and luxury reigning among them, they took no care to preach to their flocks the precepts of chriſtianity, which they ſo little regarded themſelves. The dreadful calamities that befel the Britiſh nation, which are the ſubject of the next book, are imputed, by theſe two hiſtorians, to this general corruption.

* Du Pin affirms, the French and Britiſh biſhops choſe rather to bear their own charges, than to accept of the emperor's allowance.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK II.

The arrival of the Saxons. Vortigern makes Hengiſt, their general, king of Kent, and falls in love with his niece. Long and bloody wars between the Saxons and Britons under the conduct of Ambroſius firſt, and afterwards of the great king Arthur. The founding of the heptarchy of the Anglo-Saxons. The Britons are driven into Wales, where they remain, to this day, a diſtinct nation from the Engliſh. The extirpation of chriſtianity throughout their conqueſts by the Anglo-Saxons.

AS in a deſperate diſeaſe, we apply a deſperate remedy; ſo the Britons, in their extremity, tho' they often had ſmartly ſuffer'd by their irruptions, had recourſe to the Saxons. Were they at liberty to make a choice, they would, perhaps, have maturely conſider'd the diſadvantages as well as conveniencies of calling in this nation to their aſſiſtance; but, as they had no other remedy, they overlook'd ſuch objects as their fears might lay before them. Moreover, Vortigern, by ſoothing their hopes, prevented them from attentively weighing the conſequences of this proceeding; ſo that every one, being intent only to avoid the preſent dangers, ambaſſadors were immediately ſent away to negotiate this affair among the Saxons. Upon their arrival, Witigeſil, the Saxon general, having ſummon'd an aſſembly on this occaſion, the chief of the ambaſſy addreſs'd them, as follows:

Ambaſſadors ſent away with all haſte

Their ſpeech.

" Illuſtrious and generous Saxons, the Britons, oppreſs'd by the continual irruptions " of the Picts and Scots, ſend us to implore " your aſſiſtance. We have heard of your " renown, and we are ſenſible that your arms " are invincible; and, therefore, we are " come to intreat your protection. Britain, " for many years, was a conſiderable part of " of the Roman empire; but, being aban- " don'd by our maſters, we know no nation " better able than yourſelves to aſſiſt us. If " you grant our requeſt, we offer, in return, " all that our country, which is both rich and " fertile, can afford. We ſhall ſubmit to your " own terms, provided you enable us to " drive the enemy out of our country *." Witigiſil gave them this ſhort tho' pleaſing anſwer, " Be aſſured the Saxons will ſtand by " you in your extremity:" and, accordingly, 9000 men were granted them, on condition the Saxons ſhould be poſſeſſed of the iſle of Thanet, and their troops allow'd a certain pay.

Nennius. W. of Malmſ. Bede. l. 1.

The Saxons had ſome knowledge of Britain; and they had been dreaded, for a long time, by the inhabitants of the eaſtern coaſts. If they had not, as yet, attempted any conqueſts in the iſland, it was, becauſe they thought thoſe on the continent of greater importance; and, perhaps, they were ſtrangers to the great weakneſs of the Britons, before the diſcovery they now made themſelves. It is no wonder, therefore, they comply'd ſo readily with the Britons. Hengiſt and Horſa †, Witigiſil's ſons, were named to command the forces deſigned for Britain.

* Tho' Witichind, a Saxon author, puts theſe words in the mouth of the Britiſh ambaſſadors, it muſt be own'd they are very natural, conſidering the circumſtances of the Britons.

† Horſa ſignifies a horſe, and Hengiſt a ſtone-horſe. The Saxons uſually gave their children the names of animals.

Hengiſt

Hengiſt's character. Hengiſt was about thirty years of age; he firſt carried arms under his father, but, for his improvement in the art of war, he ſerved Verſtegan. alſo in the Roman armies, the emperors generally keeping ſome Saxon troops in pay. This young general had valour and experience, a ſound judgment, a becoming addreſs, with an engaging and affable behaviour, qualifications which warranted, in ſome meaſure, his ſucceſs. As for Horſa, nothing in particular is related concerning him.

The Saxons, having but an imperfect knowledge of Britain, did not, at once, ſend over the 9000 men they had promiſed; and, pretending the reſt were not in readineſs, on account of their great diſtance, they ſhipp'd off only a part of them, in three keyles or long boats, the nature of which veſſels * evidently ſhews that their number was ſmall. Hiſtorians have not diſtinctly mentioned the place from whence they embarqued; but, probably, it was from Zealand, then poſſeſs'd by the Saxons, which was moſt commodious as well as neareſt to the iſle of Thanet, where they landed.

449. The Saxons arrive in Britain. Hengiſt and Horſa arrived at Ebbesfleet in the iſle of Thanet, where Vortigern received them with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, and directly put them in poſſeſſion of the iſland, according to agreement. As ſoon as they had a little refreſhed themſelves, they were led againſt the Picts and Scots, who had advanced as far as Stamford in Lincolnſhire. G. Malmſ. In the firſt battle, the Saxons, whoſe very aſpects terrified the enemy, diſregarding their darts, came to a cloſe fight, and ſoon obliged them to give way; and, being diſpirited, by this and ſeveral other defeats, gradually retreated into their country, dreading nothing ſo much as an engagement with the Saxons.

Vortigern, tranſported at this ſucceſs, was now chiefly ſollicitous to attach the Saxons to his intereſt; and, with this view, he gave Nennius. Hengiſt and Horſa ſome lands in Lincolnſhire, where they firſt repulſed the enemy †. Hen- Langhorn, chron. reg. Angl. giſt, on the other hand, form'd hopes of procuring to himſelf a ſettlement in Britain; and the land, Vortigern beſtowed him, furniſhed him with a fair opportunity for promoting his deſign. He told the king, that, being at a great diſtance from the iſle of Thanet, to ſerve the Britons in the north, he wanted a place wherein he might ſecure his booty; and, therefore, he begg'd leave to build a ſmall fort on the lands he had given him, which requeſt Vortigern very readily granted. It is generally ſaid by hiſtorians, that he only ask'd leave to wall in as much ground, as he could ſurround with the hide of an ox; which he cut into ſmall thongs, incloſing with them a ſpace ſufficient for his purpoſe, where he built a fort, before the Britons could have time to interrupt his deſign. The name of the caſtle, Thong-Caſtor ‡, or the caſtle of thongs,  ſeems to confirm this account; and the name of the caſtle might give occaſion for applying to it Juſtin's ſtory of Dido, when ſhe was going to build Carthage; or Hengiſt might be informed of Dido's artifice, whilſt he ſerved in the Roman armies. Hengiſt builds Thong-Caſtor.

The Britons, ſeeing a caſtle in the very heart of their country, began to murmur againſt Vortigern. Hengiſt perceiving this, and having dived into the king's deſigns, repreſented to him, that his ſubjects, being delivered from their enemies, were grown inſolent, and only wanted an opportunity to dethrone him; he adviſed him, therefore, to divert the impending ſtorm, to ſend directly for the reſt of the Saxon troops. Vortigern, at once, fell in with this advice, and urged him to put it in execution immediately; and Hengiſt, accordingly, ſent to Witigiſil his father, who diſpatched away the troops in 16 large veſſels, ſending over with them Eſcus 450. and Rowena, the eldeſt ſon and niece of Hengiſt. More Saxons come into Britain.

Vortigern became now more abſolute than ever, which ſtrengthen'd the ſuſpicions the Britons had concerning him. Without conſulting his ſubjects, he allotted habitations for the Saxons; and he entered into a ſtrict friendſhip with Hengiſt. Vortigern grows abſolute.

Hengiſt, all the while, had his own ends in view; and, to bring them about, finding that love was Vortigern's darling paſſion, he takes the advantage of his weak ſide. He, one day, invites him to Thong-Caſtor, preparing for him a moſt ſplendid entertainment; but what pleas'd Vortigern, moſt of all, was the young Rowena, a lady of uncommon beauty. Hengiſt had given her inſtructions to ſtand directly in his view, that he might, during the repaſt, gratify his eyes with that amiable object. The plot ſucceeded; for the king gazed all the time upon Rowena, who convinced him by her looks, that ſhe was not inſenſible of the honour he did her. Hengiſt, reſolving to ſoothe his growing paſſion, made a ſign to his niece; upon which, ſhe fill'd a gold cup with wine, and, on her knees, preſented it to the king, ſaying, in Saxon, Liever kyning waſs heal, that is, dear king, your health. Vortigern, agreeably ſurpriz'd, ask'd his interpreter the meaning of her words, and how he muſt anſwer her in her own language; and, with an amorous glance, he ſaid, Drinck heal, that is, do you drink the health. Rowena, having juſt put the cup to her lips, preſented it to the king, who roſe up to ſalute her, which honour Rowena received with the moſt profound reverence; and, withdrawing, ſhe left Vortigern inflamed with love and deſire. This was a fatal moment to the Bri- Hengiſt plots againſt Vortigern.

He gives Kent to Hengiſt.

The king could think of nothing, now, but the enjoyment of Rowena; and, therefore, tho' he had a wife, demanded her in marriage. Hengiſt, to increaſe his eagerneſs, told him, he could not, contrary to the cuſtom of his nation, give his niece to a prince that was already married; that he was not abſolute maſter of Rowena; and, moreover, that the Saxon princes, eſpecially his father, perhaps, would never conſent ſhe ſhould marry a chriſtian. Vortigern, reſolving to ſurmount all difficulties, divorced his wife, by whom he had ſeveral children; then, he declared that Rowena ſhould have the free exerciſe of her religion; and, to ſatisfy the Saxon princes, he thought of an expedient, or, poſſibly, it was propos'd to him, by which he fancied he could reconcile his love with his politicks, viz. to inveſt Hengiſt and Horſa with the ſovereignty of Kent. The crafty Saxon having gain'd his point, all obſtacles vaniſh'd; and the amorous Vortigern was put in poſſeſſion of the charming Rowena. This was tranſacted ſo ſecretly, that Gorongus *, prince of Kent, was depoſed, before he ſo much as heard of it.

Hengiſt forms new deſigns.

Hengiſt, regardleſs of the murmurs of the Britons, forms deſigns of riſing ſtill higher; but, knowing that the Britons eſteem'd him, ever ſince his ſettlement in Britain, as an avowed enemy, he conceals his intentions, till he ſhould have a fairer opportunity of putting them in execution. To render Vortigern ſubſervient to his deſigns, he gave him repeated aſſurances, that he was entirely devoted to his ſervice; and, when he perceived he had thoroughly gained his confidence, he told him, that his ſubjects were plotting againſt him; and, that it was to be feared, whilſt the Saxon troops were engaged in the north, they would execute their intentions. He informed him alſo, that the Britons held a correſpondence with Ambroſius Aurelianus, then at the court of Aldroen king of Armorica, whom they intended to place on the throne; and there were ſome grounds for what he ſaid concerning Ambroſius.

Ambroſius, who he was. Stillingfleet orig.

This prince was ſprung from Roman anceſtors, and, according to the received opinion, ſon to one of the Britiſh monarchs, choſen after the departure of the Romans †. Being very young, when his father died, he was not ſuſpected by thoſe that ſucceeded to the crown; but, when Vortigern was elected, a powerful party declaring for Ambroſius, he tried all poſſible means to deſtroy him. Upon this, he retir'd to Aldroen his relation, waiting for a proper opportunity to head his party. What Hengiſt ſaid, therefore, could not but make a deep impreſſion on Vortigern's mind; who having entirely loſt the affections of his ſubjects, and looking upon Ambroſius as a dangerous rival, had nothing to depend on but the advice and aſſiſtance of this Saxon prince. Hengiſt, whoſe aim was to introduce more Saxons, that he might be a match for the Britons, and act without Vortigern, repreſented to him, that, as the Britons would certainly take advantage of the Saxons being in the north, his only way was, to ſend over for more Saxon troops to be commanded by truſty leaders, who would blindly obey his orders. Vortigern readily conſented to what was ſo agreeable to his own ſentiments. Hengiſt aſſur'd him, the new troops ſhould be ſent into the north againſt the Picts and Scots, whilſt he himſelf would ſtay in Kent to keep the male-contents in awe, who would, thus, be ſurrounded by the Saxon forces, and ſo kept from revolting.

Octa and Ebuſa ſettle in the north. 452.

Hengiſt ſent for a fleet of 40 ſhips, in which was embarqued a vaſt number of Saxon forces, commanded by Octa his brother, who brought his ſon Ebuſa along with him. They firſt plunder'd the Orcades; and then, attacking the Picts, forced them to retire northward, and firmly ſeated themſelves in their country. At firſt, they ſettled on the north ſide of the Tyne, eaſtward; but, afterwards, they advanced towards the ſouth, and drove the Britons beyond the Humber. Hengiſt, now, ſhew'd very little reſpect to Vortigern, ſending for recruits from Germany, without his leave; and, acting without diſguiſe, complained that the Saxon ſoldiers were not paid, according to agreement, and boldly demanded the arrears, threatening without ſpeedy payment to do himſelf juſtice. Gildas. Bede, l. 1. c. 15.

453. Vortimer animates the Britons to expel the Saxons.

The Britons, ſurpriz'd and exceedingly mortified to ſee Hengiſt in a condition to execute his menaces, began to think of ſome expedient to free themſelves from the Saxons. Vortimer, Vortigern's eldeſt ſon, had obſerved with regret, how the Saxons had ſtrengthen'd themſelves daily, by his father's indulgence; and he laid hold of this juncture, to acquaint the nobility, that it was high time to redreſs the evils that oppreſs'd them. He declar'd, that his father's cowardice, or treachery, had made the Saxons ſo powerful; that it was neceſſary, therefore, to reſtrain Vortigern from heaping any more favours on theſe ſtrangers, who would over-run the Britiſh nation, if ſteps were not taken to checque their growing power. The Britons awak'd, at laſt, out of their lethargy; and, by Vortimer's inſtigation, the moſt conſiderable of them, entering into a private confederacy, oblig'd Vortigern to make his ſon partner with him in the government, and reſign to him the adminiſtration of affairs. This was done ſo ſuddenly, that, not having time to call the Saxons to his aſſiſtance, he was compell'd to do as they would have him. Thus, Vor- 454.

The Britons resolve upon a war against the Saxons.

Vortimer easily perſuaded the Britons, that nothing but force would expel the Saxons, who, therefore, reſolved upon a war. Hengiſt, upon this, enter'd into a treaty with the Picts, by their means, with the Saxon troops ſettled in thoſe parts, to give the enemy a powerful diverſion in the north. As for Kent, Hengiſt thought himſelf ſtrong enough there to oppoſe Vortimer, who was preparing to attack him.

Before I enter upon the relation of a war, which ended with the conqueſt of Britain, it is proper to acquaint the reader, that he muſt not expect a complete and particular account. Hiſtorians content themſelves with the mention of certain facts, which preſerve the thread of the hiſtory, but ſcarce give us a general idea of that revolution, which introduced a new face of things over the whole iſland.

455. The battle of Egleſford.

The Britiſh and Saxon armies ſoon came to an engagement; they met at Eglesford † in Kent, where a bloody battle was fought, Horſa ‡ falling that day, as did Catigern , the youngeſt brother of Vortimer, by the hand of Hengiſt. The Britiſh hiſtorians ſay, Vortimer not only totally defeated the Saxons; but that, driving Hengiſt into the iſle of Thanet, he forced him to embarque for Germany. But what follows ſhews that, if the Saxons were not victorious, at leaſt, they were not conquer'd, ſince all their hiſtorians agree, that in this very year 455, immediately after the battle, Hengiſt aſſum'd the title of king of Kent, which, to be ſure, he would not have done, had he been vanquiſh'd and oblig'd to fly into Germany.

457. The battle of Crecanford.

Two years after, another battle was fought near Crecanford *† in Kent, wherein Vortimer was entirely defeated, with the loſs above of 4000 men and his beſt officers; and he was oblig'd to ſhut himſelf up in London, till he could raiſe another army. In the interim, Hengiſt made great devaſtations in the country, to ſtrike terror into the Britons; they, that lay moſt expos'd to the fury of the Saxons, fled to the woods for refuge, and ſome retir'd into Armorica, where they were kindly receiv'd by Aldroen. During theſe ravages, the very churches in the neighbourhood of the Saxons were reduced to aſhes; for theſe barbarians, joining to their natural fierceneſs a religious zeal, thought they honour'd their gods, by cruelty to the chriſtians, eſpecially the clergy.

The Britons apply to the king of Armorica for aſſiſtance.

The Britiſh chiefs aſſembled themſelves, at this juncture; and Guithelin, archbiſhop of London, and head of Ambroſius's party, adviſ'd them to apply to the king of Armorica, who had always ſhewn great kindneſs to the Britons, for aſſiſtance; and that he thought it neceſſary to invite over Ambroſius Aurelianus, who being deſcended from illuſtrious anceſtors, and having all the qualifications of a general, would, in all probability, deliver them from their preſent danger. As they had always hated Vortigern, and, ſince his laſt defeat, were diſpleas'd with Vortimer, the common, tho' unjuſt fate of generals in his caſe, they readily fell in with the archbiſhop's advice, deſiring himſelf to go and negotiate the affair. He ſet out directly for Armorica, and eaſily obtain'd the aid of 10,000 men, who all landed ſafely at Totneſs, under the command of Ambroſius. This general was receiv'd, as the only ſupport of the ſinking Britons; but Vortimer's party, ſtill conſiderable, regarded Ambroſius, as one that came to uſurp the crown, under a pretence of defending it. Vortimer himſelf threatened to puniſh ſeverely all that ſhould join him; ſo that the Britons, inſtead of uniting againſt the Saxons, by their inteſtine diviſions, deſtroy'd one another.

458. Ambroſius lands with 10,000 men.

Ambroſius and Guithelin contriv'd a plot, for the ruin of Vortigern and Vortimer; they repreſented to their party, that the ſon had neither courage nor conduct, and that the father was an enemy to the nation; and that, in vain, they attempted to drive out the Saxons, if they did not, firſt, deſtroy theſe two domeſtick enemies. Vortigern and Vortimer, on the contrary, told their abettors, that Ambroſius came with an intent to ſubdue them; that Guithelin, being ambitious, attempted to make Ambroſius a king, only to get the adminiſtration in his own hands, than which nothing ſhould be more dreaded by the Britons; that they muſt be wilfully blind not to ſee, that their deſign directly oppoſed the good of the kingdom; and that, inſtead of marching againſt the Saxons, they had only plotted how they might diſtreſs thoſe who were in arms for their country.

Civil wars among the Britons.

Theſe mutual animoſities ſoon came to blows; their firſt battle was near Catgwaloph in Carmarthenſhire. As it is not eaſy to know who got the victory in this and other engagements, I ſhall only obſerve, that the civil wars continued till the year 465, to the great prejudice of both parties, whilſt the Saxons daily grew more powerful both in Kent and beyond the Humber. So miſerable was the ſtate of the Britons, that numbers of them abandon'd their native country. A Dutch author ſays, that ſome of theſe unhappy wretches embarqued in a galley; and, rowing towards the mouth of the Rhine, landed at Catwick near Leyden, where they ſettled themſelves, by the ſea-ſide, in an old Roman camp, which they called Brittenburge.

466. The war againſt the Saxons breaks out again.

The Saxons, upon this, join'd their forces alſo; and, in the firſt battle, Hengiſt loſt Wipped, one of his chief officers, from whom the place, where they fought, was named Wipped's-Fleet †. The Saxon writers affirm, their countrymen obtained a ſignal victory; whereas the Britiſh authors tell us, that Vortimer entirely defeated the Saxons, forcing Hengiſt, a ſecond time, to fly into Germany. The ſequel, however, proves, that the Saxons had the advantage; nay, I will venture to aſſert, contrary to the opinion of ſome famous hiſtorians, that, in all probability, Hengiſt never returned to Germany, not ſo much as one author taking notice of the time or place of his ſecond landing.

Arthur firſt appears. Lang chr. reg. Angl.

In this war the renowned Arthur, at 14 years of age, firſt appeared in the Britiſh armies under Ambroſius, whoſe martial genius inclined him, ſo early, to take upon him the profeſſion of a ſoldier, which he followed to his death. He ſucceeded Gorlous his farther, as king of Danmonium ‡ in 467; and, ſoon after, was engaged in a war againſt Howel king of Areclute, on the borders of Scotland. This prince, envying Arthur's glory, became an ally with the Saxons in the north againſt him; but Arthur exceedingly increaſed his fame, by driving him to the iſle of Mona, where, in a battle, he ſlew him with his own hand. He was then about 18 years old; he afterwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf by actions more glorious, as well as more advantageous to his country.

473. The 4th battle between the Saxons and Britons. Flor Wigorn. Vortimer dies.

The war continuing between the Britons and Saxons, a battle the former loſt, in 473, put their affairs in the greateſt confuſion, and gave Hengiſt a fit occaſion for enlarging his power. At length, Vortimer died, in 475, poiſoned, as ſome affirm, by Rowena his mother-in-law, thro' the inſtigation of Hengiſt. The Britiſh hiſtorians, willing, at any rate, to make Vortimer a hero, tell us, he obtained many ſignal victories over the Saxons; but the power of the Saxons evidently ſhews, that Vortigern's advantages over them were neither great nor real. His death gave ſome quiet to the Britons, if a deceitful calm may be ſo call'd, which iſſued in their ruin.

A peace concluded on between the Saxons and Britons.

After a twenty years war, both parties ſeem'd deſirous of peace, which Vortimer had always ſtrenuouſly oppoſed; fearing, this war being over, he ſhould be forced to begin another with Ambroſius, who had gain'd the hearts of the people, and was uneaſy to ſee Vortigern and his ſon on the throne, tho' deprived of half their dominions. The peace was concluded, on condition each party ſhould keep their preſent poſſeſſions. This was mortifying to Hengiſt, who had formed hopes of ſubduing the whole iſland; he pleaſed himſelf, however, with the thoughts of effecting that by policy, which he could not do by force.

Remarks on the reſiſtance of the Britons.

That the Britons, who were ſo weak and diſpirited, before Hengiſt's arrival, ſhould ſo bravely reſiſt the Saxons in the firſt war, is very ſurprizing; that thoſe very Britons, who, when the Romans left them, durſt not face the Picts and Scots, ſhould, notwithſtanding, defend themſelves againſt both Saxons and Picts! But a long war teaches, by degrees, the moſt undiſciplin'd nation the uſe of arms, and often enables them to repair, in the end, what they loſt in the beginning. Had the Saxons invaded Britain, at firſt, with a great army, they, in all likelihood, would very ſpeedily have made an entire conqueſt of Britain; but, coming over in ſmall numbers, at different times, they protracted the war, and ſo taught the Britons an art, which the Romans were induſtrious in making them forget. It may be objected, perhaps, that, whilſt they defended themſelves in the ſouth, they loſt ground in the north. But the country beyond the Humber was taken from them, before Hengiſt's coming; and the Saxons took it from the Picts and Scots, and not from the Britons. What Octa and Ebuſa did, during this war, is unknown; probably, they aſſiſted Hengiſt, by giving the Britons frequent diverſions, and by ſending him ſupplies by ſea, which they could not do by land, the enemy's country lying in the way.

Hengiſt was extremely diſturbed to find himſelf reduced to the kingdom of Kent. He acquainted the Saxon princes in Germany, that, if they would ſend him ſupplies, he could eaſily procure for them a ſolid ſettlement in Britain; tho', after a long war, he had but a ſlender proſpect of his being able to perform his promiſe; and, beſides, the falling off of Vortigern, with the valour and conduct of Ambroſius, lay as inſuperable difficulties in his way. He was reſolved, however, to purſue his deſign, of being maſter of the iſland, by cunning; and, to this purpoſe, contriv'd a plot, which tarniſh'd the glory of all his former actions. He ſeem'd exceedingly pleaſed with the peace, to diſguiſe his baſe intentions; and the Britons, charm'd with his behaviour, which was, in outward appearance, moderate and friendly, they no longer repin'd for the loſs of Kent, thinking they knew the worſt, and, perhaps, hoping, one time or other, to recover it. In the interim, they lived amicably with Hengiſt; and their prejudices againſt the Saxons, at length, entirely vaniſh'd. Hengiſt, on the other hand, aſſur'd them it was his deſire, that both nations ſhould preſerve a good underſtanding with each other; and that he ſhould be glad, if it were promoted by mutual Vortigern, becauſe Hengiſt had occaſion for him, was only made priſoner, who, to no purpoſe, complained of his treachery; and he was not releaſed, without delivering up to the Saxons a great part of his dominions, on the borders of Kent, which they divided into three counties, calling them Suſſex, Eſſex, and Middleſex, which names they retain to this day. Hengiſt, after this, made horrible devaſtations in the neighbouring country, and got poſſeſſion of London, Lincoln, and Wincheſter.

So highly did the Britons reſent this inſtance of barbarity, that they could not view a Saxon, without horror; and, looking upon Vortigern, as an accomplice in the maſſacre, as he alone eſcaped, they all went over to Ambroſius ‡, except a few friends, who could do him but little ſervice in his ſinking condition.

Ambroſius takes upon him the title of emperor.

Ambroſius, being now ſole monarch of Britain, aſſumed the imperial purple, after the manner of the Roman emperors, creating, at the ſame time, prince Arthur a patrician . Could Britain have been preſerved, from becoming a prey to the Saxons, theſe two great princes, who had all the qualities of the moſt celebrated heroes, would, doubtleſs, have prevented it; but its fate was determined, and even they could only, for a while, defer its ruin.

Hengiſt ſends for more Saxons.

Hengiſt, however, with regret, ſaw his country quite diſpeopled; for the inhabitants, deteſting his treachery and cruelty, retired, in ſwarms, into the other provinces, ſo that there were not left hands enough to cultivate the ground. He ſent, therefore, for Ella, a Saxon general, from Germany, promiſing him part of the lands Vortigern had granted him. Ella, rejoycing at the news, ſoon arrived in Britain, with his ſons Baldulphus, Colgrin, and Ciſſa an infant, landing his troops at Whitering in Suſſex, but not without reſiſtance. He did not become maſter of the ſhore, without a long battle; but, at laſt, he drove the Britons as far as the foreſt of Andred's-wall ††, then 65 miles long and 30 broad. This retreat gave the Saxons an opportunity of ſettling themſelves, by degrees, along the coaſt, and towards the Thames. During the nine years they were employed in thoſe parts, they had continual wars with the Britons, the particulars of which are unknown. ſeveral others, who ſuppoſe that he went back into Germany.

The Britons, harraſs'd by almoſt continual wars for 60 years together, were not in a condition to think of recovering the provinces uſurped by the Saxons; tho' they were not a little concerned to ſee the Saxons ſo firmly ſettled in their country, and that they could, when they pleaſed, have freſh ſupplies from Germany. Without any previous truce or treaty of peace, both parties lay quiet for nine years, for Hengiſt, himſelf, as well as the Britons, wanted a ceſſation of arms, to regulate the affairs of his kingdom. In this interval, Ella gain'd ground, the Britons not daring to reſiſt him, leſt they ſhould give Hengiſt a handle to renew the war, which they were reſolved to avoid. Nine years ceſſation of arms.

The Britons, having had time to recruit themſelves, ſollicit Ambroſius to take up arms; they aſſured him, that the longer the Saxons were ſuffered to reſt, they grew the ſtronger; that Britain, now, abounded with young ſoldiers, fit to ſerve their country; and that, perhaps, they ſhould never have a better opportunity. Ambroſius repreſented to them, that their reaſons were very convincing; but, that there was no proſpect of ſucceeding in their attempts to expel the Saxons, whilſt Vortigern was alive; that, tho' he was advanced in years, he had an able party, that would certainly raiſe new animoſities, as ſoon as the war ſhould break out; that they knew, ever ſince the arrival of the Saxons, he had always been their friend; that all their loſſes were occaſioned by their inteſtine diviſions; and, whilſt they continued, it was in vain to expect any better ſucceſs; and he concluded with telling them, they muſt either let the Saxons remain undiſturbed, till Vortigern's death, or diſpatch that domeſtick enemy, that they might unite their forces againſt the foreigners. Vortigern was ſo much hated by moſt of the Britons, that they inſtantly reſolved upon the latter; and they unanimouſly The Britons ſollicit Ambroſius to take up arms.

prepared to execute their deſign, with all imaginable ſecrecy and expedition. Vortigern was in danger of falling into the hands of Ambroſius, and had but juſt time to get into a caſtle in Wales, where he was not very ſafe. Ambroſius went and beſieged him, being intent upon his deſign; but, during the ſiege, the caſtle, either by accident or the engines of the beſiegers, taking fire, was conſumed to aſhes; and the unhappy Vortigern periſh'd in the flames. Thus, died that prince, very old, after a troubleſome reign of forty years. He had three ſons, by his firſt wife, Vortimer, Catigern, and Paſcentius, of whom I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. By his daughter, whom he debauched, he had a ſon, called Fauſtus, who ſpent his life in a monaſtery, where he was diſtinguiſh'd for his piety.

Ambroſius renews the war, and beats Ella in 487.

Ambroſius, upon this, renews the war againſt the Saxons, of which we have not a particular account. The moſt remarkable event was Ambroſius's victory over Ella and his two eldeſt ſons; which was the firſt the Britons could truly boaſt of, tho' all their hiſtorians affirm the contrary. The Saxon general was obliged to ſhut himſelf up in his ſtrong holds, till he received new ſupplies from Germany.

Hengiſt died, before the end of this war, in 488, aged about 69, of which he ſpent 39 in Britain, and 33 on the throne of Kent *. He was certainly the moſt valiant and prudent general of his time; and it could be wiſh'd for the honour of the Engliſh, that the founder of their monarchy had not, as I may ſay, cemented his throne with the blood of ſo many Britiſh lords, whom he, baſely and treacherouſly, murder'd; an action that leaves an indelible ſtain on his memory. Were it not for this, his glory would have been ſingular, as, by his conduct and bravery, he ſucceſsfully accompliſh'd a deſign extremely difficult in the execution. Beſides Kent, Eſſex, and Middleſex, he was poſſeſſed of ſome lands in Lincolnſhire, where he built Thong-Caſtor; and the Saxons beyond the Humber owned him for their ſovereign. He left two ſons, Eſcus who ſucceeded him, and Audoacer who remained in Germany.

Eſcus king of Kent

After Ella's defeat, about a year before Hengiſt's death, Eſcus was ſent into the north, to aſſiſt Octa and Ebuſa againſt the Britons; but, as ſoon as he heard of his father's death, he returned to Kent, to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom. In the mean while, Ambroſius, purſuing his victory, recovered London, Wincheſter, and Lincoln. Eſcus, wanting his father's qualities, never attempted to retake theſe three places, preferring his eaſe before the fatigues of war. In all likelihood, he obtained a truce, ſince, in the three ſucceeding years, there is no mention of hoſtilities on either ſide.

In this interval, Arthur having no employment at home, made a voyage to Jeruſalem; whilſt Ambroſius, by the aſſiſtance of Samſon, whom he had invited from Armorica, and made archbiſhop of York, regulated the affairs of the church, which, by the wars, was extremely diſordered.

490. Arthur goes to Jeruſalem. Nennius, H. Hunting. l. 2.

The Northumberland Saxons beginning to riſe in 491, Arthur being returned from his voyage, attacked and defeated them. Ella likewiſe, having received powerful ſupplies from Germany, beſieged Andred-Ceſter †, ſituated in the foreſt of Andred's-Wald. The reſiſtance of the beſieged, and an army of the enemy advantageouſly poſted, made him loſe much time; but, at laſt, he took the town by ſtorm, and reduced it to aſhes. Upon this, he aſſumed the title of king of Suſſex or of the South-Saxons, which he durſt not do, whilſt Hengiſt was alive. This ſecond Saxon kingdom contained the counties of Suſſex and Surrey; he was alſo choſen monarch or general of the Saxons, in Hengiſt's room; for altho' Hengiſt was only king of Kent, yet he was regarded as chief of all the Saxons, according to the cuſtom of that nation in Germany, who, in time of war, had always a captain-general, accountable only to the convention of the ſtates, which cuſtom the Saxons continued in Britain. Hengiſt's ſon did not think himſelf ſufficient for this office, ſince he ſuffered Ella to be inveſted with it.

The year 495 was very remarkable, for the arrival of Cerdick, a Saxon general, not only for his conqueſts, but chiefly, becauſe from him were deſcended the kings of England, in the male line, down to Edward the confeſſor, and, in the female, to the glorious prince who now ſits on the throne. In tracing him back, the Saxon annals ſhew us, that he ſprung from Woden, the original of all the principal Saxon families. He was famous alſo, for founding a kingdom, to which all the reſt, at laſt, were ſubject; and, therefore, he is to be eſteemed, if not the firſt, at leaſt, one of the chief founders of the Engliſh monarchy. This valiant prince, having acquired great glory in Germany, and having no farther employment there, determined to try his fortune in Britain, where many of his countrymen were already ſettled; and, with this view, he fitted out five veſſels; and, accompanied by his ſon Kenrick, now adult, he embarqued for Britain.

call'd Bernicia, to himſelf, to defend it againſt the continual attacks of the northern nations. Congrin, after the defeat of the Northumbrians by Arthur, had ſhut himſelf up in York, where Arthur immediately went and beſieged him. Baldulphus, however, was gone into Norfolk, to aſſiſt Cerdick at his landing; but, his coming being delay'd, he marched back towards York, in order to relieve it. Cador, Arthur's nephew, meeting him on the way, ſo defeated him, that he was oblig'd to diſguiſe himſelf in a peaſant's habit, to ſave his life; by which means he came ſafely under the walls of York, where, diſcovering himſelf, he was drawn up with a rope. The news he brought of Cerdick's coming with powerful ſupplies, from Germany, animated the beſieged, tho' Arthur briskly carried on the ſiege, hoping to take the town, before his arrival. In the mean time, Cador waited in Norfolk, to oppoſe the landing of the Saxons; but Arthur, being inform'd that Cerdick was landed at Yarmouth, and had defeated Cador, he raiſes the ſiege, retiring into a place of ſecurity, till he could learn exactly the number of the Saxons, which fame had magnified. Baldulph and Colgrin, coming out of York, made great devaſtations in Lancaſhire, whilſt the Britons were ſo terrified at Cerdick's arrival, that Arthur, for the preſent, thought fit to keep off from theſe formidable enemies.

Cerdick arrives, and defeats Cador.

426. Paſcentius revolts;

Paſcentius, ſon to Vortigern, having long concealed his ſecret diſguſt, for being deprived of all his father's dominions, made an attempt, at this juncture, to obtain what he took to be his right. Aſſiſted by his party, he got ſome forces together; and, joining Baldulph and Colgrin, he was reinforced by great numbers of his friends in Wales. Ambroſius being very ſickly, and of an advanced age, Arthur march'd againſt this rebel, and entirely routed him, near the little river Douglas.

But is defeated by Arthur.

497. He is defeated again, and pardon'd. Nennius.

The enſuing year, Arthur defeated him again in the ſame place, and ſo warmly purſued his victory, that he forced him to yield and ſue for pardon. Paſcentius's ſubmiſſion proved more advantageous to him than his arms; for he was not only pardon'd, but put in poſſeſſion of Brecknock and Radnor * in Wales, which being made a kingdom, his poſterity enjoy'd it for many years. I ſuppoſe theſe lands to be no more than Vortigern's private eſtate in thoſe parts, before he was king; and that, if Ambroſius inveſted Paſcentius with ſovereignty, it was only to give him ſome ſatisfaction about his pretenſions to the crown of Britain.

Galway ſubdued by the Saxons.

About this time, the Saxons in the north ſubdued the little kingdom of Galway † from Galvan, Arthur's nephew; which, tho' now part of Scotland, had been poſſeſs'd by the Britons, and withſtood the continual attacks of the Saxons as well as Picts. Galvan retir'd to his uncle Arthur, whom he aſſiſted very much in his wars.

Soon after this, Porta landed at Portland ‡, ſo called after him, with a new ſupply of Saxons from Germany; which obliged Arthur to repair to London. Tho' this prince had generally the advantage over the Saxons, in all their engagements; yet his forces were exceedingly diminiſh'd, whilſt the enemy's troops were continually reinforced, entire bodies of Saxons, under the command of famous generals, coming over to Britain, either with the view of a ſettlement, or for plunder only. Arthur, on this account, would have been reduced to extremity, were it not for the aſſiſtance of Hoel king of Armorica, his nephew, who being deſirous of glory, rejoiced at an opportunity of ſignalizing himſelf in the ſervice of his uncle, and, at the head of 15,000 men, landed at Southampton. Arthur, upon this, attack'd the Northumbrians, grown formidable by the valour of Baldulph and Colgrin, and completely defeated them. The two Saxon brothers, not being able to ſtand before him, after this victory, with the remains of their army join'd Cerdick, then laying ſiege to Lincoln; but Arthur, purſuing them with all ſpeed, ſo ſuddenly ſurprized Cerdick, that he was forced to hazard a battle, which proved fatal to the Saxons. Cerdon betook himſelf to the foreſt of Celidon; where, having ſuffer'd great hardſhips, he, at laſt, tho' with great difficulty, retir'd towards the weſtern coaſts. Some hiſtorians affirm, that, in this extremity, having no proviſions, nor the hope of any aſſiſtance, he obliged himſelf, by a treaty with Arthur, to return into Germany, with the remainder of his troops; and alſo, that being embarqued, contrary to his promiſe, he return'd and landed at Toſton in the weſt. However, it is certain Cerdick continued in Britain, and lay quiet for ſome time, having loſt in the battle above 6000 men.

Upon this defeat, the Saxons dreading Arthur, who knew how to improve his victories, reſolved to unite all their forces, the more effectually to ſtop the progreſs of his arms. Accordingly, Eſcus king of Kent, Ella king of Suſſex, Cerdick, Porta, the northern Saxons, joining all their forces, Cerdick was made general of the whole army. Ella, who had been monarch ever ſince 492, would, doubtleſs, have had the command, were it not for his infirmities and advanced age. Cerdick, dividing his troops into two bodies, placed the ſmalleſt under Baldulph and Colgrin, and commanded the other himſelf, with his ſon Kenrick. In the mean time, the Britons made great preparations, as they knew they had occaſion for all their forces againſt ſo powerful an enemy; all that could carry arms came in ſwarms, to liſt under their generals; and it was thought, on both ſides, they ſhould ſoon come to a battle, that would decide the fate of both nations. Ambroſius himſelf, whom the hiſtorians have called Nazaleod, appear'd at the head of his army; and, having detatch'd Arthur to follow Baldulph and Colgrin, who were marching weſtward, determin'd to go in queſt of Cerdick. Arthur, every where triumphant, engaging with the Saxon brothers in Cornwal, obtain'd a ſignal victory.

508. The Britons are defeated.

In the interim, Ambroſius advanced towards Cerdick, who ſtood his ground; and, coming to an engagement, he broke the right wing of the Saxons and routed them. But, whilſt he eagerly purſued them, who made but little reſiſtance, Kenrick, having had the ſame advantage over the right wing of the Britons, inſtead of purſuing them, attack'd Ambroſius in the flank, and ſo gave Cerdick time to rally his troops, and finiſh the victory, by an entire defeat of the Britons.

Ambroſius ſlain.

Ambroſius, mortified at this diſappointment, in ſpite of his age and infirmities, threw himſelf among the enemy, to animate his troops to renew the fight; but all his efforts ſerved only to crown his glorious life with an honourable death. The ſucceſs of this battle was, by the publick acknowledgment of his father, attributed to Kenrick; it was fought in 508, near a place, call'd by the Saxons Cerdick's-Ford *.

Nazaleod and Ambroſius the ſame. Cambden. H. Hunt.

The name of Nazaleod, given to the Britiſh monarch ſlain in this battle, has led ſome to think it was not Ambroſius; but the opinion of Cambden and other good authors is, doubtleſs, the moſt probable. All hiſtorians agree, that Ambroſius fell in battle; now, after the beginning of this prince's reign, there was no other, in which a Britiſh monarch was ſlain; beſides, hiſtorians would have mention'd the time of the death of ſo great a prince, had it happen'd in any other action.

Arthur elected monarch. Uther de Prim. G. Mon.

Arthur ſucceeds Ambroſius, as monarch, who was certainly beſt qualify'd to command the army, his very name being a terror to the Saxons. Between Ambroſius and Arthur, ſome authors place Uther Pendragon, who, they ſay, was Arthur's eldeſt brother, and both of them ſons to Ambroſius. Others affirm, that Arthur was Uther's ſon and ſucceſſor; but the beſt Engliſh hiſtorians aſſert, that Uther was only a ſirname given to Arthur, on the account of his victories, the word bearing that ſenſe in the old Britiſh language; and that he was named Pendragon, from his wearing a dragon for his creſt.

Uther Stillingfleet. Langhorn.

Arthur, after his coronation at Caerleon, defeated the Northumbrian Saxons, on the banks of the little river Ribroyt that runs thro' Lancaſhire; this is reckon'd his tenth victory over the Saxons. In the interim, Baldulph and Colgrin made ſuch ravages in the weſtern parts, that he was obliged to leave Northumberland, to go and reſtrain them, leaving Hoel in Bernicia, to watch the motions of the Saxons there, who, tho' often conquer'd, were ſtill formidable. Arthur, forcing the Saxon brothers to come to an engagement, routed them near Cadbury † in Cornwall. Cambden.

The battle of Badon-hill.

In the mean time, Cerdick being reinforced by the Saxon princes in Britain, as well as from Germany, laid ſiege to Bath. Baldulph and Colgrin joining him alſo, with what troops they could muſter together, he wiſh'd the Britons would raiſe the ſiege; and he ſoon obtain'd his deſire; for Arthur, reſolving to hazard all, to ſecure that place, came and gave him battle, which prov'd the moſt bloody that had ever been fought between the two nations. It continu'd from noon till night, without any apparent advantage on either ſide. Both armies kept the field, waiting for the day to renew the fight. The Saxons, in the night, poſted themſelves on a little hill, call'd Banneſdown, which neither party had done the day before, tho' of ſuch importance to them. No ſooner was it light, than Arthur, obſerving their advantageous poſt, was reſolv'd to diſlodge them, which he effected, after a long and obſtinate fight. The Britons, animated by the preſence and valour of their king, and finding that the Saxons, in retreating down the Hill, were put into diſorder, ſo vigorouſly preſs'd upon them, that they routed them entirely. Baldulph and Colgrin were both ſlain; and Cerdick, with the remains of his army, retreated to a place of ſecurity. Bede. Langhorn.

The Picts beſiege Areclute. G. Mon. l. 7. H. Hunt. l. 2.

An unexpected accident prevented Arthur from purſuing his victory. The Picts, in alliance with the Saxons, Arthur being at a great diſtance, and Hoel lying ſick at Areclute, reſolved to beſiege that town; but Arthur, flying to the aſſiſtance of his nephew, obliged them to raiſe the ſiege. This prince enrag'd at the Picts, who, by this diverſion, had done ſervice to the Saxons, rifled their country from one end to the other, and, were it not for the interceſſion of the biſhops, would have entirely deſtroy'd it.

Arthur's wife dies. G. Malmſ. l. 1. Fl. Vigorn.

About this time, died Gueniver, Arthur's wife, who was buried in the county of Angus †; and, as ſhe died without iſſue, the women of the country fancied all that walk'd over her grave would, like her, be barren, and all poſſible care was, therefore, taken to prevent young damſels from approaching it. Hoel, upon this, return'd to Armorica, the victory of Badon having ſecur'd Arthur, for ſome time, from any attempts of the Saxons. Cerdick

Cerdick lay quiet ever ſince his defeat, expecting new ſupplies from Germany, which arrived in 514, under Stuff and Withgar his nephews. Upon this, he took the field again, and committed great ravages in the country of the Britons; but Arthur, tho' weaken'd by his own victories, not being reinforced like the Saxons, made vigorous attempts to oppoſe the progreſs of the enemy. The many and bloody battles between the two nations did not decide the quarrel, becauſe in ſome of them the Saxons, and in others the Britons were victorious; but in 519 Cerdick ſo defeated the Britons, that they deſpair'd of ever expelling the Saxons. Arthur, at this juncture, enter'd into a treaty with Cerdick, by granting him a part, rather than endanger the loſs of all his dominions. He, therefore, ſurrender'd to him Hampſhire and Somerſetſhire, with which Cerdick was contented, deſiring, after ſo long a war, to enjoy ſome repoſe in his declining age. Upon this, he founded the kingdom of Weſſex, or of the Weſt-Saxons, ſo called, becauſe it lay weſt of Kent and Suſſex; and he was crown'd at Wincheſter, 23 years after his arrival in Britain *. Thus, by his valour and conduct, Cerdick, as well as Hengiſt and Ella, obtain'd a ſettlement in Britain.

The Saxons and Juttes, whom Hengiſt had planted in Eſſex and Middleſex, had hitherto been governed by a deputy, under the king of Kent; but in 527 Erchenwin, ſprung from Woden, aſſumed the title of king of Eſſex, or of the Eaſt-Saxons. We are at a loſs to know who he was, how long he had been in Britain, and what right he had to this new kingdom. I conjecture he was governor under Octa king of Kent; and, taking the advantage of his weakneſs, got the people to acknowledge him for their king.

The arrival of the Angles. Bede. G. Malm. M. Weſt.

About this time, a great number of Angles, under twelve chiefs, whoſe names, except that of Uffa, are unknown, landed ſomewhere on the eaſtern coaſt of Britain; where continually gaining ground towards the weſt, they forced the Britons, at laſt, to deſert the country along the eaſtern ſhore. The Angles, thus ſituated, had an opportunity of ſending for new colonies, as they wanted them, from Germany, by whoſe aſſiſtance they founded the kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles; but, as their firſt chiefs did not aſſume the title of kings, the beginning of this kingdom is generally brought down to 571.

The battle of Cherdſley.

In Arthur's abſence, the Angles arrived in Britain; and Cerdick alſo took this opportunity to break the peace, and by the means of his ſon Kenrick, who always accompanied him, obtain'd a ſignal victory in Buckinghamſhire at Cerdick's Lega, now Cherdſley †.

Arthur, upon his return, renew'd the treaty with Cerdick; upon which, he aſſum'd the title of emperor, as ſome undertake to prove by his ſeal, found at Weſtminſter. Leland declares, he ſaw the impreſſion of it on red wax, with theſe words on it: Patr. Arthurius. Britann. Gall. Germ. Dac. Imper. Theſe lofty titles, perhaps, gave the occaſion of attributing to him ſo many victories in foreign countries, and of ſtiling him conqueror of the Gauls, Germans, and Dacians; but whether this ſeal be genuine or not, there are ſufficient grounds for theſe titles, from what I have already ſaid concerning this prince. He might be called Britannicus, as he was monarch of the Britons; Gallicus, from his expedition againſt the Gauls that I juſt now mention'd; Germanicus, as he ſo often defeated the Saxons, who came from Germany; and Dacicus, on account of his victories over the Juttes, who were mix'd with the Saxons, and whom ſome have confounded with the Danes and Dacians. However, if he aſſum'd the title of emperor, as, in all likelihood he did, after the example of Ambroſius, it will be neceſſary, to avoid the confuſion, with regard to chronology, in the hiſtory of this prince, carefully to diſtinguiſh the ſeveral epocha's or times of his entering upon his four dignities. 1. He was crown'd king of Dammonium in 467, at the age of fifteen. 2. In 476, he was created patrician by Ambroſius. 3. In 508, he was choſen monarch of Britain. 4. In 508, he aſſum'd the imperial purple.

528. Arthur renews the treaty with Cerdick. Leland.

4 Epocha's in Arthur's reign.

The king of Armorica, being told that the Wiſigoths, who then poſſeſs'd part of Gaul, reſolv'd to invade his dominions, intreated Arthur to come over, once more, to his aſſiſtance, who readily complied with his requeſt; and, as he foreſaw he ſhould be abſent, for ſome time, he left Modred his nephew, whom he deſign'd for his ſucceſſor, regent, entruſting him alſo with the care of his queen.

Upon Arthur's departure, Modred ſubdued the iſle of Wight, barbarouſly deſtroying moſt of the inhabitants; but this was nothing to Arthur, in compariſon of Modred's treachery, who, having his wife and kingdom in his power, fell paſſionately in love with both. Not ſatisfy'd with debauching the queen in private, he publickly married her; and, to ſcreen himſelf from Arthur's reſentment, reſolved to ſeize upon the crown of his uncle, king, and benefactor. With this view, he enter'd into an alliance with Cerdick, who made him pay dear for his protection, obliging him to deliver up to him Berkſhire, Wiltſhire, Devonſhire, and Dorſetſhire. By this means Cerdick's kingdom became vaſtly ſuperior, in extent and dignity, to all the Saxon kingdoms already eſta-bliſh'd. Modred, having thus made a league offenſive and defenſive, he was crown'd at London, thoſe, who deteſted his treachery, not daring to reſiſt him, before Arthur's return.

Cerdick invites over more Saxons. G. Malm. Antiq. Gl.

In the interim, Cerdick, the moſt of his ſubjects being Britons, thought it neceſſary, to ſecure his new dominions, to people them with Saxon colonies; and, therefore, he gave great encouragement to all that were inclin'd to leave Germany, and ſettle in his kingdom. Upon this invitation, above 800 veſſels arrived in his ports, in which were vaſt numbers of Saxons and Juttes. Cerdick, having alloted them habitations, expell'd ſuch Britons as he moſt ſuſpected, eſpecially from the frontiers; and the Britons, at length, loſt the ſuperiority in number they had over the Saxons.

Cerdick, having ſo many new ſubjects, repeated the ceremony of his coronation at Wincheſter, his capital city, as king of the Weſt-Saxons. This kingdom was very advantageouſly ſituated, being bounded on the north by the Thames, on the weſt by the Severn, on the ſouth by the ſea, and on the eaſt by the kingdom of the South-Saxons; and Cerdick was pretty ſecure from the Britons who were ſtill poſſeſs'd of the greateſt part of Dammonium, as they were divided from the reſt of the nation by this new kingdom and the Severn.

Cerdick crown'd again.

Cerdick, being thoroughly acquainted with Arthur's valour and activity, did all that was poſſible, to put himſelf in a poſture of defence; and he rewarded his nephews, Stuff and Withgar, for their faithful ſervices, with the iſle of Wight. As, in all probability, they were Juttes, Cerdick, in the diſtribution of his new colonies, had peopled that little iſland with their own countrymen *.

534. Cerdick's death G. Malm. l. 1.

Cerdick, thus prepar'd againſt Arthur's attacks, departed this life in the year 534, 16 years after his firſt coronation, and 39 after his arrival in Britain. He muſt have been very old, when he died, ſeeing, 39 years before, his ſon Kenrick was able to aſſiſt him in his wars. As the time he ſpent in Britain was a continued ſcene of good and bad ſucceſs, he had always an opportunity of diſcovering his great abilities, either in improving his victories, or in extricating himſelf out of thoſe difficulties into which he was plunged by the fortune of war. Kenrick, the truſty companion of all his labours, ſucceeded him, as king of Weſſex, and alſo as monarch of the Saxons and Angles. Cerdick's ſucceſſors had the ſirname of Gewiſhians, from Gewiſh one of their anceſtors, famous in his generation.

Polychr. l. 5. c. 4.

The ſame year died Octa king of Kent, after a reign of 22 years, remarkable for nothing but the diſmembering the kingdom of Eſſex, which, for what reaſon is unknown, he did not oppoſe; Hermenrick his ſon ſucceeded him.

535. Arthur returns.

Arthur, at length, returns, after a four years abſence. We are ignorant of the cauſe of his long ſtay in Armorica, ſo extremely prejudicial to his own affairs. Modred was poſſeſs'd of his throne, and in ſtrict alliance with the Saxons; but Arthur, tho' waſted with age, and almoſt deſtitute of friends, was reſolved to make an attempt to regain his kingdom, and to revenge himſelf on Modred. This reſolution animated thoſe that, durſt not, at firſt, declare for him; many, both officers and ſoldiers, who could not think of drawing their ſwords againſt him that taught them how to conquer, abandon'd the uſurper, and liſted themſelves in the ſervice of their lawful ſovereign. With this ſmall army, whoſe defect in number was amply ſupply'd by their courage, and the conduct as well as valour of the general, Arthur met Modred, reinforced with Saxons and Picts, who were incenſed againſt Arthur, on the account of the devaſtations he made in their country, and, engaging him at a great diſadvantage, ſignally defeated him. In the battle he loſt Galvan and Anguſel, two princes of his blood, who had ſteadily adhered to him.

And defeats Modred, 537.

Modred, by the aid of the Saxons and Picts, was ſoon in a condition to engage his uncle again; but he had no better ſucceſs than before. Arthur, tho' always victorious, could not deſtroy the uſurper, much leſs recover what had been ſurrender'd to the Saxons. Whilſt this war continued, there were two eclipſes of the ſun, which ſome fanciful hiſtorians have thought to be preſages of the entire ruin of the Britons, which followed ſoon after.

Mordred is again defeated.

542. The laſt battle, wherein Arthur and Modred were both ſlain. Gal. Mon. H. Hunt.

The war had now laſted ſeven years, when the fatal blow was given in 542, by the river Camb-alon *, near Camelford in Cornwall; for the Britons, having loſt their beſt troops, were never after able to withſtand the Saxons. The uncle and nephew, in this bloody battle, ruſh'd upon one another, with ſuch fury, that Modred was ſlain upon the ſpot; and Arthur, being mortally wounded, was carried to Glaſſenbury, where he died, aged 90 years, 76 of which he had continually ſpent in the exerciſe of arms. Tho' he reign'd but 34 years; yet, before he aſcended the throne, he had long commanded the Britiſh armies under Ambroſius. It is a pity the actions of ſo valiant a general ſhould have given riſe to ſuch a vaſt number of fables; whereas his life was a ſubject that deſerved the graveſt and moſt skilful pen. He is reported to have inſtituted the order of the knights of the round table, ſo famous in romances; and this is not at all improbable, ſince we are aſſur'd, from the letters of Caſſiodorus, that Theodorick, king of the Oſtrogoths, inſtituted one in Italy in the ſame century.

So great an affection and eſteem had the Britons for this hero, that many of them would not believe that he was dead; nay, ſeveral ages after, ſome imagined that he was only on his travels in foreign countries, vainly expecting his return *. This might ſeem incredible, were it not for a late inſtance of the like folly, with reſpect to Don Sebaſtian king of Portugal. Some writer, perhaps, to ingratiate himſelf with the Britons, might, from hence, take occaſion to invent all thoſe pretended voyages and victories; which have been an inexhauſtible fund for abſurd fictions to romantick authors, who have ſo confounded his hiſtory, that ſeveral have queſtioned whether there was, in reality, ſuch a man in the world. But if we diſtinguiſh truth from falſhood, by having recourſe to the epocha's I have, above, laid down, we ſhall find nothing in his character unworthy of a great and glorious prince. He was born at Tindagol in Cornwall in 452 or 453, and died in 542; and was buried in the monaſtery of Glaſſenbury, by the ſide of Gueniver his ſecond wife. He had two others of the ſame name, one of which died in the country of the Picts, and the third proved falſe to him. By the laſt he had a ſon called Noem, who died a child. Arthur, juſt before he expired, ſent his crown to Conſtantine his couſin, the ſon of Cador and grandſon of Ambroſius, declaring him, by that, his ſucceſſor, that is, as king of Dammonium, for the Britiſh monarchy was extinct by his death. It is ſaid that his body was found entire in Glaſſenbury monaſtery, in the reign of Henry II. whereon might be plainly diſtinguiſh'd ten wounds, one of which only ſeemed mortal. But the report of his ſtature, viz. that the diſtance between his eye-brows was a ſpan, and that other parts of his body were in proportion, is altogether fictitious. Ancient romances tell us, that his ſhield was named Pridwen, his lance Ron, and his ſword Caliburn; which laſt was preſented, in 1091, to Tancred king of Sicily by Richard I.

547. Ida's arrival. Gal. Mon. An. Sax. Flor. Wigor. H. Hunt. M. Weſt.

No ſooner did the news of Arthur's death and the preſent diſtreſs of the Britons reach Germany, than great multitudes reſolved to come over and ſettle in Britain. Ida, an Angle and ſprung from Woden, with many families of his own countrymen, having embarqued in 40 veſſels, landed at Flamborough in Yorkſhire, then poſſeſſed by the Northumberland Saxons, who received them as friends. The Northumbrians, ſo ſtiled from the north of Humber which they inhabited, had been there, ever ſince the time of Hengiſt, and had all along been ſome way dependent on the kingdom of Kent, tho' we are ignorant how they were govern'd, from the death of Octa and Ebuſa to the year 547. Ida got himſelf acknowledged, both by them and the Angles he brought with him, king of Northumberland. As the Saxons ſo readily mixed with the Angles, and obeyed a king of that nation, it is highly probable, as I have already obſerved, that they were both originally the ſame people. This was the fifth kingdom founded by the Anglo-Saxons. Ida was a very famous prince; but, however, we have nothing recorded concerning him, except his building the city of Bebbanburgh, ſo named after Bebba his queen. This city was after many years deſtroyed, tho' the caſtle of Bamborough remains to this day.

In the year 552, the Britons, attempting to recover part of their lands from Kenrick king of the Weſt-Saxons, were repulſed near Salisbury. 552. H. Hunt.

The Saxon annals tell us, that, three years after, two ſons of Modred, aided by the Saxons, made an effort to dethrone Conſtantine, who ſucceeded Arthur, as king of Dammonium; but, Conſtantine routed them, purſuing them to Glaſſenbury, and ſlew them even in the abbot's arms. 555. Gal. Mon. l. 8.

Ida king of Northumberland died in 559, after he had reigned peaceably twelve years, whom all the hiſtorians acknowledge to have been a prince of great accompliſhments. After his death, Northumberland, tho' the occaſion of it is not known, was divided into two kingdoms. Adda, Ida's ſon, was king of Bernicia, and Alla, of the race of Woden, had Deira. Ida left behind him twelve ſons, ſix by wives, and the reſt by concubines. 559. Ida dies.

The enſuing year, Kenrick, king of Weſſex and monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, died after a reign of 26 years, during which he never was in arms but once, to repel the Britons who attack'd him, employing himſelf wholly in promoting peace and tranquillity in his dominions. Keaulin, the eldeſt of the four ſons that ſurvived him, ſucceeded to his kingdom and the Saxon monarchy. 560. Kenrick's death. Keaulin ſucceeds him.

Keaulin, being an ambitious prince, regarded the other Saxon kings, as his vaſſals and dependents; and, finding they would not eaſily be brought to ſubmit to him in this manner, he made vaſt preparations, which alarm'd both the Saxon and Britiſh princes, eſpecially the laſt, who, ſince Arthur's death, had liv'd in a ſort of anarchy; what remain'd of their country being canton'd out into little independent ſtates, which weaken'd one another by the diſunion of their princes. The Britiſh hiſtorians give us a melancholy account of theſe petty ſovereigns. Conſtantine, king of Cornwall, was a cruel tyrant, polluted alſo with abominable luſts. Aurelius Conanus, whoſe kingdom lay to the eaſt of the Severn, was guilty of parricide, and his reign, to the laſt degree, tyrannical. Vortipor, king of Demetia or South-Wales was bloated with pride, and glorying that he had no religion, perſecuted the clergy. Cuneglas, whoſe dominions were north of Cambria or Wales, grew old in vice, and was notorious for wickedneſs. Maglocune or Malgon †, king of Mona or Angleſey, did nothing elſe but pillage his neighbours and ſubjects, enriching himſelf by rapine and violence. Theſe tyrants, not daring to confide in one another, never met together to conſult about their common ſafety; Gildas.

but,

but, each purſuing his private intereſt, they left Britain in a deplorable ſtate of confuſion, and gave the Saxons an opportunity to eſtabliſh themſelves on its ruin.

However, for their defence againſt Keaulin's preparations, they elected Malgon general, merely on account of his gigantick ſtature; who, being one of no experience, could have done them little ſervice, had the Saxons united their forces againſt him; but, fortunately for him and the Britons, Keaulin turned thoſe arms againſt his countrymen, which ſhould have been employ'd againſt the common enemy. As none of the Saxon princes were in a capacity of engaging againſt him ſingly, they were, by degrees, obliged to yield to Keaulin greater ſubmiſſion, than their laws and cuſtoms demanded from them to their monarch, dreading at the ſame time that he would make ſtill farther incroachments on their liberties.

564. Ethelbert is made King of Kent. G. Malmſ. l. 1.

At laſt, Hermenrick king of Kent dying in 564, Ethelbert, his ſon and ſucceſſor, could not bear the haughty proceedings of the Weſt-Saxons, and the more, becauſe, being of Hengiſt's family, he thought he had the beſt claim to the dignity of monarch. He, therefore, declares war againſt Keaulin, not conſidering the diſproportion between their forces. Keaulin, deſpiſing him, as a young prince of no reputation, gave him battle at Wibbandune or Wimbleton in Surrey, and entirely routed him; and, upon his being defeated a ſecond time, he ſued for peace. Ethelbert's concern for this diſappointment was enhanced by the jeſts of the other princes, who derided his preſumption. He learnt, however, that courage, without prudence and force, is inſufficient for a war; and, by making a proper uſe of this leſſon, he became one of the wiſeſt and moſt illuſtrious princes of his nation. This was the firſt civil war among the Saxons, which was follow'd by many others, occaſioned by the ambition of their princes; ſo that, if another Arthur had appear'd, the Britons might have recovered all their loſſes. But divine providence had otherwiſe determined.

571. Uffa firſt king of East-Angles.

Uffa, the laſt of the 12 chiefs of the Angles before mentioned, aſſumed in 571 the title of king of the Eaſt-Angles, forty years after his arrival in Britain. This was the ſixth kingdom of the Anglo-Saxons*.

Keaulin's ambition.

Keaulin, upon his ſucceſs againſt Ethelbert, treated the neighbouring Saxon princes, as his vaſſals; but the kings of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, being ſeparated from him by a large tract of ground poſſeſs'd by the Britons, were pretty ſecure from the effects of his ambition. The kings of Kent, Eſſex, and Suſſex, having ſubmitted to him, as he was ſuperior to each of them in the extent of his dominions, he attacks the Britons, with a view of making new conqueſts. This war, which continued ſeven years, extremely weakened the Britons. Hiſtorians, who give but a very imperfect account of it, tell us, that Cutha, Keaulin's brother, often defeated the Britons, and would, in all likelihood, have exceedingly enlarged his brother's territories, had he not been ſnatch'd away by death, in the midſt of his victories.

He attacks the Britons. F. Wigorn. H. Hunt. l. 2.

Before the end of this war, Uffa died in 578, leaving the kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles, which he founded, to Titil his ſon. 578. Titil. F. Wigorn.

The Britons, being ſurrounded on all hands by their enemies, in this their laſt extremity, apply'd to the Scots, ſending ambaſſadors to Aidan king of Scotland, to implore his aſſiſtance, who aſſur'd him, "That his ruin was "inſeparable from theirs; that the Saxons "deſign'd to ſubdue the whole iſland, a great "part of it being already in their poſſeſſion; "that, if they ſhould conquer what was re-"maining in the hands of the Britons, they "would give the Scots no better quarter "than the Picts; they added, that Keaulin "was an enterprizing and ambitious prince, "capable of forming projects of dangerous "conſequence to all, unleſs a ſpeedy ſtop "were put to his proceedings." Aidan, prevail'd on by theſe arguments, at the head of a powerful army, join'd the Britons againſt the common enemy. Keaulin march'd againſt him with the greateſt expedition; but, the other princes not over-haſtily ſending in their troops, his forces were not equal to thoſe of the Britons and Scots. He engaged them, notwithſtanding, with undaunted reſolution; but his army was cut in pieces, his ſon Cuthwin ſlain, and he himſelf had a very narrow eſcape. The Britons, elated with this ſucceſs, began to contrive ſchemes for expelling the Saxons; but they were far from being in a condition to put them in execution. The Saxon princes, not diſpleaſed to find Keaulin's ambition mortified, yet, for their own intereſt, ſoon put their monarch at the head of an army much greater than the former; and, upon this, deſirous of revenge, he ſpeedily engaged the Britons, and by a glorious victory repaired his diſgrace. Aidan retreated into Scotland †, and the Britons, finding all their meaſures diſconcerted, were forced to ſit down contented with what was left them. But the juſtice of God, which had long purſued them, was not yet ſatisfied; they muſt be reduced to ſtill greater extremities, and be diveſted of their beſt and richeſt countries by a nation, whom the Almighty had choſen to be the inſtrument of his vengeance.

Aidan aſſiſts them and defeats Keaulin. H. Hunt. l. 2.

Aidan is defeated, and retreats into Scotland.

The Britons were but juſt recovered from their conſternation, when a vaſt fleet, ſeen on their coaſts, entirely diſpirited them, as it was the greateſt that ever came from Germany, and brought over ſwarms of Angles, under Crida who was deſcended from Woden. I cannot learn where they landed, but probably in Eaſt-Anglia; and, having marched thro' that kingdom, they advanced towards the middle of the iſland, without oppoſition. Crida every where terrified the Britons by his preſence; and, in vain, did they fly for ſhelter to their fortified towns, the want of proviſions for ſo great a number ſoon obliging them to ſurrender.

The Britons retreat into Wales.

The Britons, at length, as their laſt and only refuge, retreated into Cambria, on the other ſide the Severn; by whoſe flight, Crida got poſſeſſion of all the land lying between the Humber, the Severn, and the Thames, by which he was bounded on the north, weſt, and ſouth, and eaſt of him lay the kingdoms of Eſſex and Eaſt-Anglia.

Crida founds the kingdom of Mercia.

Crida, upon this, founded the kingdom of the Middle-Angles or Mercians, the largeſt and moſt conſiderable of all the Saxon kingdoms, being crown'd firſt king thereof in 584.

The ſtate of the Britons.

Cambria being too ſmall for ſo many families, great numbers of the Britons went over into Armorica, where many of their countrymen were already ſettled*. Others ſubmitted to the Saxons, content to be made hewers of wood and drawers of water, for a ſorry ſubſiſtence. Thoſe that continued in Cambria, for a long time, defended themſelves againſt the conquerors, who did not, for a great while, extend their conqueſts beyond the mountains. This little corner of the iſland, to which the Britons were confined, was afterwards divided into ſeveral petty kingdoms, which had different fates, according to the ambition or power of their kings. The Britons, from this time, having no relation to the hiſtory of England, I ſhall, for the future, conſider them only as a neighbouring nation. It is certain, they made ſeveral efforts to recover their loſſes, but to as little purpoſe as were the attempts of the Anglo-Saxons to force them from their retreat.

The Saxons give to Cambria the name of Wales.

The Saxons named the Britons Gwalliſh or Walliſh, that is, Gauls, taking them to be, as probably they were, of Gauliſh extraction. For the ſame reaſon, they call'd Cambria Walliſh-land; whence the Engliſh term it Wales to this day, which name the French have changed into Galles, as being derived from the Gauls. The Walloons and Wallachians ſtill retain theſe names; and, in ſome parts of Germany, the Italian tongue is ſtiled Welch, on the account of Gallia Ciſalpina inhabited by the Gauls. As for Cambria, it is my opinion, that, before the arrival of the Saxons, the Britons, who term'd themſelves Cumri or Cumbri, call'd their country Cambria; and that, after their retreat, the name, that before was common to the whole, became peculiar to that part of the iſland.

The Saxons call Britain England. Jo. Saliſb. in Polychr. l. 5.

About the ſame time, the Anglo-Saxons, with one conſent, gave to the ſeven kingdoms the general name of England, that is, the country of the Angles. Whether this was done, becauſe the Angles were more numerous than the Saxons or Juttes, and their kingdom the moſt conſiderable, or on ſome other account, is uncertain. Perhaps, Engle-land is a contraction of Engle-Saxe-land, a name derived from the two chief nations that ſettled in Great-Britain; but the Picts, Scots, and Iriſh, retaining the old names, continu'd to call them Saxenag and their country Saxeneage. As the Saxons were firſt known in Britain, the neighbouring nations, accuſtomed to that name, would not make uſe of a new one introduced by the conquerors.

It is the moſt received opinion, indeed, that Ecbert king of the Weſt-Saxons, 250 years after the time I have mention'd, firſt called Britain by the name of England; but the truth of it depends on the authority of an hiſtorian, that is far from being infallible. Others aſſure us, and with greater probability, that this change of names was brought in by the Saxons, ſoon after their arrival in Britain; that is, as may reaſonably be conjectured, about the time of Crida's ſettlement in the iſland; but how can this account agree with the reign of Ecbert, which did not commence till the year 800?

Kings of Bernicia. G. Malm.

After Ida's death and the diviſion of Northumberland, Adda, Ida's eldeſt ſon, king of Bernicia, dying, in 563, four kings, all ſons or brothers to Ida, reigned ſucceſſively to 586, when Athelric, Ida's youngeſt brother, aſcended the throne.

Sledda king of Eſſex.

In the year 587, Erchenwin, king of Eſſex, died, after a reign of 60 years, and was ſucceeded by Sledda his ſon.

Thus, have I related the moſt material events that happen'd in Great-Britain, from the arrival of the Saxons to their eſtabliſhment, after a war of 130 years. We have ſeen how the Britons, notwithſtanding their reſolute ſtruggles for liberty, were obliged, at laſt, to ſurrender the whole iſland to the very nation they call'd in to their aſſiſtance. The following book will ſhew us, what was tranſacted, during the heptarchy. The Saxons, Juttes, and Angles, who ſubdued Britain, as they eſteemed themſelves to be all of the ſame nation, as they had done in Germany, eſtabliſh'd a form of government, very nearly reſembling that they liv'd under in their own country. They had their Witten-a-Gemot or aſſembly of wiſe-men, for managing the affairs relating to the ſeven kingdoms; and they choſe one out of the ſeven kings to have the command of their armies, who, tho' he was ſtil'd monarch, ſeems to me to have been ſomewhat like to a ſtadtholder in Holland. There was, however, ſome difference between the Saxon government in Britain and that in Germany; for, in the latter place, the general aſſembly was inveſted with the ſupreme power, whereas in Britain each king was ſovereign in his own dominions. In a word, this form of government reſembled that of the united provinces, each of which, conſider'd abſtractly, is ſovereign and independent, tho' all of them, as a body, are ſubject to the decrees of the general aſſembly of the ſtates, to which they give their conſent by their deputies.

The cauſe of the Britons ſubjection.

If we enquire into the cauſes of this grand revolution, the entire ſubjection of the Britons

* Armorica, i. e. maritime, on account of its ſituation, is ſaid to have been called Bretagne from theſe Britons.

to the Saxons, we muſt, in the firſt place, aſcribe it to the juſt judgment of God, who puniſh'd them for their enormous crimes, from which neither the people, kings, nor clergy were free, as their own hiſtorians acknowledge. But if we look after ſecond cauſes, as the Divine Being generally employs natural means in the execution of his deſigns, we ſhall find their own diviſions, their want of courage, occaſion'd by their long ſubjection to the Romans, and their being without a general that was able to conduct them and revive their drooping ſpirits, concurr'd in introducing this fatal calamity. How bravely did the Britons behave under Ambroſius and the great Arthur; and yet what a poor defence did they make againſt the Picts and Scots? The hiſtories of all nations demonſtrate the influence the good or bad qualities of princes have over their ſubjects; and we ſhall learn, from the ſequel, that civil wars were as pernicious to the Anglo-Saxons as to the Britons.

The ſtate of the church, from the arrival of the Saxons, to the retreat of the Britons into Wales.

The eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of the Britiſh church very little known.

AN accurate account of the eccleſiaſtical affairs of Britain, during a war which continued 130 years, is not to be expected. The clergy, the only writers in thoſe days, were too much engaged in other buſineſs, to have leiſure for penning hiſtories; and, had they an opportunity for it, their writings could not eaſily, as things ſtood, have been tranſmitted to poſterity. We muſt, then, be contented with the relation of a few traditionary events, without any order or connexion.

Several ſchools erected.

Before the arrival of the Saxons, Germanus biſhop of Auxerre, coming twice into Britain, on account of the pelagian hereſy, as hath been mention'd, found that the ignorance of the clergy was, in a great meaſure, the cauſe of their corruption; and he, therefore, founded publick ſchools, for the education of the Britiſh youth, eſpecially ſuch as were deſign'd for holy orders. Dubricius and Iltut taught the moſt famous of theſe ſchools. Dubricius, biſhop of Landaff, afterwards archbiſhop of Caerleon and metropolitan of all Cambria, had two ſchools, one at Henſland, which he taught himſelf, and another at Mockroſt; and Iltut kept his at Llan-tayl, that is, the church of Iltut. There was alſo at Bangor in Wales a noted monaſtery, where youth were inſtructed. Some are of opinion alſo, that Germanus introduced the Gauliſh rites and ceremonies into the publick ſervice of the Britiſh church. This is the ſubſtance of what can be related concerning the Britiſh church, whilſt the Saxons were employ'd in their conqueſts; I can only add a few particulars concerning ſome eccleſiaſticks, celebrated for their piety, who, at that time, flouriſh'd in the iſland, ſo concluding my account of the church of Britain, till, by the converſion of the Saxons, I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of the church of England.

Schools of Dubricius and Iltut.

St. Patrick.

Patrick was one of the moſt famous, for converting the Iriſh, which is generally attributed to him, tho' Anatolius and Palladius preach'd in Ireland before him. In all likelihood, he made the greateſt progreſs; and, therefore, the Iriſh have always had the profoundeſt veneration for him, and do ſtill reverence him, as their apoſtle and protector. There were three ſo called; Patrick the elder, who died in 449, and is taken notice of in the chronicle of Glaſſenbury monaſtery; Patrick the great, who converted the Iriſh, and died in 493, after he had govern'd the church of Ireland 60 years; Patrick the younger, his nephew, who ſurvived him ſome years.

Dubricius.

Dubricius, archbiſhop of Caerleon, was remarkable for his piety, learning, the ſchools he erected, and alſo for the ſynod he held, at Breva in Cardiganſhire, againſt the pelagians.

St. David.

David, ſon to a Britiſh prince and ſucceſſor to Dubricius, transferr'd the archiepiſcopal ſeat from Caerleon to Menevia, after him called St. David's. He was illuſtrious for his auſtere life, and his ſynod at Vittoria, which ratify'd the canons of Breva. It is ſaid that he wrought many miracles, and particularly, that he gave the virtues to the Bath-waters they retain to this day. He is reported to have lived 146 years.

Samſon elder and younger.

Samſon the elder was invited over from Armorica, and made archbiſhop of York by Ambroſius. Samſon the younger, of royal blood, was an archbiſhop, that had a power to perform this office wherever he came, without a particular ſee; and, the Saxon wars forcing him to return home, he was made archbiſhop of Dol. It is ſaid, that he carried away with him ſeveral memoirs, that would have given great light to the eccleſiaſtical affairs of Britain, had they been carefully preſerved.

Cadoc.

Cadoc, abbot of Landcaervern, ſpent a very conſiderable income, in maintaining 300 prieſts; and he lived to the year 570.

Patern.

Patern, of a noble family in Armorica, having ſtudied 20 years in Ireland, ſettled in Cambria, where he was altogether employ'd in promoting peace among the ſeveral princes. He, for the moſt part, reſided at Cardigan, where may ſtill be ſeen Llan-Badarnvawr, that is, the church of great St. Patern, which was, for ſome time, a biſhop's ſeat; he died in Armorica, where he was ſo diſtinguiſhed for his piety, that no leſs than three feſtival-days were conſecrated to his memory.

Petrock,

Petrock. Petrock, born in Cornwall, was eminent for his holy life, and after him Petrock-ſtow or Padſtow, in the ſame county, was ſo named.

Kentigern. Kentigern, ſon to a princeſs of the Picts, was abbot of Glaſcow, from whence he went into Wales; and, founding a monaſtery there, he returned home. He is much celebrated for his auſterities, particularly his rigid abſtinence from fleſh.

Aſaph. Aſaph, Kentigern's diſciple, wrote the life of his maſter, who made him abbot of the monaſtery he erected in Wales; he died in 590, and from him the city of St. Aſaph received its name.

Columba. Columba, of a noble Iriſh family, founded a monaſtery in Ireland, called Dearmach, or the field of oaks, becauſe ſituated in a foreſt. Some time after, he came into Britain, to preach among the Highland-Picts, whom he converted to chriſtianity, with their king Brydius, who gave him the little iſland of Jona or Hy, ſince named Colchil, where he founded a very famous monaſtery. The Scotch churches, both in Ireland and Great-Britain, were, for many years, ſupplied, by theſe two monaſteries, with biſhops and prieſts. It is remarkable, that, purſuant to Columba's inſtitution, the abbot of Jona retained a juriſdiction, not only over the ſeveral monaſteries which ſprung from that, but alſo over the monks that went off to be prieſts or biſhops. Bede gives this reaſon for it, that Columba the founder was no more than a prieſt; but it might be added, that the monks, who had vowed obedience to the abbot of Jona, tho' advanced to the epiſcopal dignity, believed their former vow to be indiſpenſably obliging. The defenders of the eccleſiaſtical hierarchy are ſomewhat perplexed by this inſtance; yet they endeavour to evade it, by alledging that it was an ill cuſtom that prevailed in that country, contrary to the general practice of the church in all other places.

Gildas. Gildas of Badon or Bath was Iltut's ſcholar, and a monk of Bangor monaſtery. He was born in the year of the battle of Badon, according to Uſher in 520; but, in my opinion, founded upon reaſons too tedious to be inſerted here, in 511. Gildas wrote a treatiſe de excidio Britanniæ, or concerning the deſtruction of Britain, wherein he freely cenſures the Britiſh princes in his time, i. e. thoſe who, upon Arthur's death, divided the country into ſeveral petty ſtates; and we are indebted to him for the knowledge of what was tranſacted among the Britons, about the time he wrote, in 564. There is another hiſtory, or rather romance, under Gildas's name, who is by ſome called Albanian and ſuppoſed to be a different perſon; but Stillingfleet affirms, both theſe works were penn'd by the ſame author, and that there was no other Gildas but he of Badon. Orig. Brit.

Columbanus. Columbanus an Iriſhman, diſciple to Congal, abbot of Bangor in Ireland, ſpent a conſiderable part of his life in Britain; and, from thence paſſing into Burgundy, he founded the abby of Luxeul, of which he was the firſt abbot. Twenty years after, Thierri king of Auſtraſia and likewiſe of Burgundy, baniſh'd him, for too boldly cenſuring his conduct, and forced him to take ſanctuary in the court of Agilulph king of the Lombards. At length, he founded the monaſtery of Bobio near Naples, where he died. Fauchet Antiq. Gaul.

Theſe were the moſt famous eccleſiaſticks in the Britiſh church, from the coming of the Saxons to the retreat of the Britons into Wales. It is obvious, we have an account only of thoſe that flouriſhed in Ireland, Scotland, and Wales; for, as for the other parts of Britain, we have not ſo much as the names of the biſhops, except Theon and Thadiock, archbiſhops of London and York, who were obliged alſo, at laſt, to fly into Wales. It is extremely probable, that all the monuments of the Britiſh church were deſtroyed by the Saxons, wherever they became maſters, that is, in all places except Wales. Theſe cruel idolaters, as well out of duty as wantonneſs, trampled upon every thing relating to chriſtianity, and treated even the chriſtians themſelves with the utmoſt barbarity. "From the eaſt to the weſt, ſays Gildas, "das, nothing was to be ſeen but churches "burnt and deſtroyed to their very founda- "tions. The inhabitants were cut off by the "ſword, and buried under the ruins of their "own houſes; and the altars were daily pro- "faned by the blood of the Britons ſlain "thereon." Bede, who was himſelf a Saxon, tells us, that "By the Saxons a fire was "lighted up, which executed the juſt ven- "geance of God againſt the wicked Britons, "as he had formerly burnt Jeruſalem by the "Chaldeans. Britain was ſo ravaged by the "conquerors, or rather by the hand of the "Almighty, that there ſeemed to be a con- "tinued flame from ſea to ſea, which con- "ſumed the cities, and covered the ſurface "of the whole iſland. Publick and private "buildings fell in one common ruin; the "prieſts were murdered on the very altars; "and the biſhop and his flock periſh'd, with- "out any diſtinction, no one daring to give "their ſcatter'd corpſe an honourable bu- "rial." Gildas. Bede.

The Britons, who eſcaped the fury of their enemies, for want of proviſions in the woods and mountains to which they retreated, were forced, at laſt, to ſubmit to the Saxons, being glad to purchaſe their lives with the loſs of their liberty. Some retired into foreign parts; and they, who out of love to their native country, remained in the iſland, and, dreading ſlavery, could not think of ſurrendering themſelves up to the Saxons, dragged on a miſerable life, expoſed unto inexpreſſible wants, and perplex'd with continual fears.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK III.

The ſtate of Great-Britain, after the conqueſt of the Saxons. Of the heptarchy in general. The hiſtory of each of the ſeven kingdoms in particular; with a full account how chriſtianity was eſtabliſhed at ſeveral times, in each of thoſe kingdoms, and other remarkable affairs relating to the riſing church.

THE revolution, made by the Anglo-Saxons, introduced a new face of things in Great-Britain; they changed the very names of the towns and provinces, and divided the country in a new manner. It will be convenient, then, before we proceed, to take a ſhort view of the ſtate of the whole iſland.

The ſtate of Great-Britain.

Great-Britain, canton'd out into ſeveral kingdoms, was in the poſſeſſion of four different nations, viz. the Britons or Welch, the Scots, the Picts, and the Anglo-Saxons. Under the Britons were included all thoſe foreigners, whether Romans or others, ſettled in the iſland, ever ſince the reign of Claudius. As Britain was ſubject to the Romans 400 years, the poſterity of theſe foreigners was, doubtleſs, very numerous, as the Romans ſent vaſt numbers, either of veterans or people from their other conqueſts, to inhabit Britain. Theſe colonies were diſtinguiſh'd from the natives, before the Romans abandon'd the iſland; but, when they join'd the Britons againſt the Scots and Picts, and afterwards againſt the Saxons, they were incorporated with them, and became one people, being never, after that time, diſtinguiſhed by hiſtorians. The Vandals, ſettled about Cambridge, were alſo eſteemed as Britons, and involved in the ſame common ruin. After the eſtabliſhment of the heptarchy, the Britons had only Cambria and the weſtern parts of Danmonium. The firſt of theſe, the antient name of all Britain, was changed by the Saxons into Wales. As for Danmonium, it was, in all likelihood, ſo named by the Romans, the Britains calling it Kernaw from Kern or horns, on account of the many promontories that ſhoot out into the ſea like horns. The Saxons ſtiled it Cornwall, i. e. the country of Kernaw, inhabited by Gauls or Britons, affecting to eraſe all footſteps of the Romans, ſince they even called a people Gauls, whom the Romans had named Britons, for 400 years together. The natives kept their ground in that corner of the iſland, as well as in Wales, for a long time, till, at laſt, they were entirely ſubdued, as the ſequel will inform us.

The northern parts of Great-Britain were poſſeſſed by the Picts and Scots, being ſeparated from the Engliſh by the rivers Esk and Tweed and the mountains between them. The Picts were on the eaſt ſide, and the Scots on the weſt, the mountain of Grantzbaine being their common boundary, from the mouth of the Nid to the lake of Lomond. Aberneth, in the county of Strathern, was the capital of the Picts, from whence the biſhop's ſeat was removed to St. Andrews. Edinburgh belonged alſo to the Picts; and what the Saxons poſſeſs'd, beyond Severus's wall, was taken from them. The territories of the Scots lay towards the north and weſt, as far as the ſea that bounds Britain on theſe two ſides.

The Saxons, Angles, and Juttes, all three compriſed under the name of Engliſh, had ſubdued all the ſouthern parts of Britain, from the channel to Severus's wall, and ſomewhat farther, towards the eaſt. This was divided into ſeven kingdoms, of which the Saxons and Juttes had four, viz. Kent, Eſſex, Suſſex, and Weſſex; the Angles alone had two,

Mercia

Mercia and East-Anglia; but in Northumberland they were mix'd with the descendents of the Saxons, that first took possession of the country beyond the Humber, under Octa and Ebusa.

In relating the history of these seven kingdoms, I shall, first, give some account of the heptarchy in general; secondly, I shall particularly describe the state of each of these seven kingdoms; and, lastly, I shall exhibit, in synchronical tables, the most remarkable events that happen'd in each of them, that I may present to the reader, in one view, the history of all the seven kingdoms.

Of the heptarchy in general.

By the heptarchy is meant the government of the seven kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, as united into one body or state. The bond of this union was their captain-general, or, if you please, their monarch, who was elected by the joint consent of the seven kingdoms, and invested with certain prerogatives, the nature or number of which are not thoroughly known.

Besides a monarch, as the center of the heptarchy, they had also an assembly-general, composed of the principal members of the seven kingdoms or their deputies, which they called the Wittenagemot. Each kingdom had likewise its convention or parliament, as the several states have in the united provinces of the Low-Countries; and, altho' each of them was sovereign and independent, yet were they all subject to the determinations of the assembly-general.

But, as times and circumstances often occasion alterations in the best constitutions, the ambition or restlesness of their kings soon dissolv'd that union the very form of their government supposed. The most powerful very often took the advantage of the weakness of the others, to aggrandize themselves; whence proceeded the wars among them, which ended in the subversion of the heptarchy.

Another cause of their wars was the ambition of their monarchs, who, not satisfied with the privileges of that dignity, were desirous of enlarging them. Had we an exact account of the prerogatives of the monarch, transmitted to us by the historians, we might have been able to form some judgment on this head; but as they have given us a bare relation of facts, only marking the time and success of those wars, without informing us about the reasons and motives of them, the history is render'd imperfect, and incapable of being carried on so regularly, as one could have wish'd. All that we can gather from the annals is, that the Anglo-Saxon kings were naturally very restless and troublesome; but this character is not peculiar to them, since, in succeeding ages, there has been no greater union among the princes of Europe.

Besides these wars, to which the annalists have chiefly confin'd themselves, there were, doubtless, many other events, that would have given life and spirit to their histories; but, as they were all monks, they regarded nothing but the foundations of monasteries, and the privileges granted to the clergy. In doing this, they were naturally led to give some account of the heptarchy, in order to make out their rights; but, as this was their only view, they have taken notice of little else besides the succession of the kings in their respective kingdoms, with some of their principal actions. However, as this is properly all the assistance we have towards an history of the heptarchy, which chiefly relates to religious affairs, it will be requisite to say somewhat concerning it.

When the Saxons arrived in England, they were all pagans; and their conversion began in 597, with the kingdom of Kent, by Austin a benedictin monk, and ended in 653, with the kingdom of Mercia, by the preaching of certain missionaries from Northumberland. During these 56 years employ'd in propagating christianity, it fell out that, in the kingdoms of Essex, Northumberland, and East-Anglia, it was entirely extirpated, after its first establishment; so that some of the kingdoms remained in paganism, whilst others embraced the christian faith, neither were all of the same kingdom converted at once.

Austin preached to the Saxons in Kent, Mellitus to the East-Saxons, Paulinus to the Northumbrians, Birinus to the West-Saxons, Wilfrid to the South-Saxons, Felix to the East-Angles, and the northern Monks to the Mercians. These had not all the same success in their ministry; yet, in about 60 years after Austin's arrival, all England was converted. But of this I shall have occasion to say more hereafter.

One remark, however, I shall make, viz. that the monks, in converting the Anglo-Saxons, took special care to inspire them with a veneration for monasteries and a monastick life. Such an influence had they over the princes and grandees, in this particular, that the number of monasteries, that were founded in England, from the conversion of the English to the dissolution of the heptarchy, i. e. in 200 years, and the immense riches the monks acquired in that time, are matter of astonishment. Religion seem'd entirely to consist in enriching the monks, and absolute perfection in embracing a monastick life. Even kings and queens renounced their worldly grandeur, to pass their days in a monastery, either to expiate their enormous crimes, or from a belief that it was the nearest way to salvation. The monks took all imaginable pains to keep alive the fervour of this sort of devotion, loading with panegyricks all that were so piously dispos'd, and sainting them, when they died. Hence it is, that we have so many male and female saints in the ecclesiastical history of England, and, among the rest, several kings, who of all others, were best able to purchase a saintship this way.

I now proceed to give a particular account of each of the seven kingdoms, wherein I shall endeavour, as much as possible, to avoid the dryness usually attending the bare relation of facts.

The Hiſtory of NORTHUMBERLAND.

Bounds of Northumberland.

THE kingdom of Northumberland, as its name imports, lay on the north of the Humber, being bounded to the ſouth by that river, to the weſt by the Iriſh ſea, to the north by the country of the Picts and Scots, and to the eaſt by the German ocean; it contained Lancaſhire, Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, Northumberland, York, and Durham. The chief cities were York, Dunelm, now Durham, Carliſle called by the Romans Luguballia, Hexham or Hagulſtadt, and Lancaſter. The greateſt length of this kingdom was 160 miles, and its greateſt breadth 60.

IDA. 547.

Ida, the firſt king, began his reign in 547, and died in 559. After his death, Northumberland was divided into two kingdoms. Adda, Ida's ſon, was king of Bernicia or the northern part, reaching from Severus's wall to the mouth of the Tweed; and Alla was king of Deira or the ſouthern part. Glappa ſucceeded Adda in 566, Fridulph him in 572, Theodorick him in 579, and Athelrick him in 586.

ADDA of Bernicia. ALLA of Deira.

We know nothing of thoſe kings, but the time of their death. Athelrick being ſuperannuated, when he came to the crown, Adelfrid his ſon governed the kingdom in his name, tho' without the title of king; and, having eſpouſed Acca, daughter to Alla king of Deira, who died in 588, he got poſſeſſion of that kingdom, tho' Alla left behind him a ſon about three years old, called Edwin.

ADELFRID 590. 613. Bede, l. 2. c. 2.

Adelfrid *, ſucceeding his father in 590, became very formidable to his neighbours, eſpecially to the Welch, as well as to the Scots and Picts; but of theſe wars we have only the following remarkable particular. Adelfrid preparing to beſiege Cheſter, then poſſeſſed by the Welch, they were reſolved to give him battle; and, to procure the divine bleſſing on their arms, 1250 monks, from Bangor monaſtery, were ordered to pray near the field of battle; during the whole time of the engagement. Adelfrid meeting thoſe monks, who made too much haſte to the place appointed, put them all to the ſword; and this maſſacre was followed with a ſignal victory over the Welch. Upon this, Adelfrid paſſing into Wales, entirely demoliſhed the monaſtery of Bangor, which ſtill contained above 1000 monks; for Bede aſſures us, they were divided into ſeven claſſes, each of which conſiſted of above 300. Two of the gates of this immenſe ſtructure were more than a mile diſtant; and as this monaſtery was very antient and famous, in all likelihood, the monks, forced out of Britain by the Saxons, had taken ſanctuary there.

Whilſt Adelfrid was purſuing his conqueſts, Edwin, ſon to Alla king of Deira, wandered up and down without any fixed place of reſidence, no one daring to eſpouſe his cauſe, for fear of Adelfrid. At length, Redowald, king of the Eaſt-Angles, taking pity on this diſtreſſed orphan, allowed him a retreat at his court. Edwin was then about 30 years of age, handſome and well-made, and maſter of ſuch agreeable qualities as ſoon attracted the love and eſteem both of Redowald and his queen. Scarce had he taſted the ſweets of this retreat, when Adelfrid ſent ambaſſadors to Redowald, to deſire him either to deliver up Edwin or take away his life, and, on his refuſal, to declare war againſt him. Redowald, being thus ſurprized, could not immediately reſolve how to act. As his forces were inferior to Adelfrid's, he dreaded a war. On the contrary, honour, honeſty, the laws of hoſpitality, and Edwin's innocence, all concurred to plead againſt his giving him up, as a ſacrifice, to an implacable enemy; beſides, he thought it mean and ignoble to ſubmit to the orders of one that had no right to command him. Thoſe different conſiderations, for a long time, kept him in ſuſpence, whether he ſhould act the generous part, or purſue his own intereſt. Bede, l. 2. c. 12.

In the mean time, Edwin, being inform'd of this by the queen, was in great perplexity of mind. For 27 years, he had been a wanderer, without any fixed abode but what the king of Eaſt-Anglia had generouſly granted him, which now was likely to prove fatal to him. If Redowald ſurrendered him, he foreſaw that his ruin was unavoidable; but his irreſolution, on the other hand, led him to hope for ſome lucky turn in his favour. He conſidered that, if Redowald ſhould determine to protect him, the war, that would certainly follow, might give him an opportunity of recovering his father's dominions; beſides, he was not ſure of avoiding by flight the danger that threaten'd him. He was reſolved, therefore, to depend upon Redowald's honour, who was naturally of a generous diſpoſition; but this prince, at length, to prevent a deſtructive war, came to a reſolution to ſacrifice Edwin, for the benefit of the publick. Edwin, being informed of Redowald's deſign by the queen, thought himſelf now in a deſperate condition, knowing that the king had put it out of his power to ſave himſelf by flight.

Nothing has been, hitherto, ſaid of Edwin but what is natural; but Bede, in whoſe days miracles were ſo much in vogue, that every remarkable occurrence was attended with ſome prodigy or apparition, in his large account of this prince's adventures, was willing to grace his eccleſiaſtical hiſtory with a miraculous event, which, as he tells us, he received from ſome old men in his time. Moreover, as this author was himſelf a Saxon, and born in Northumberland, a miracle, wrought in favour of the firſt chriſtian king of that kingdom, muſt, of courſe, redound to the honour of his country. If the hiſtorians had not copied it from him, I ſhould have taken no more notice of it, than of ſeveral others in his works, that are no better atteſted; leaving it, therefore, to the reader to believe as he pleaſes, I ſhall preſent him with the hiſtory of Edwin, as related by Bede.

Edwin, having been inform'd by the queen of the king's final reſolution, walk'd about the palace-garden in the night-time, to conſider of his affairs. Being in a penſive mood, and even buried in thought, he ſaw a man in an extraordinary garb, approaching towards him, who asked, what was the occaſion of his being ſo diſturbed, when all the world was aſleep? The prince told him, he was amazed to find an entire ſtranger to him ſo inquiſitive about his affairs. The ſtranger made him the following anſwer: "Think "not that I am unacquainted with the cauſe "of your diſquiet; I am privy to all that "has befel you to this very hour, and now "come to give you comfort under your mis-"fortunes. What return will you make to "him that ſhall aſſure you of your becoming "the moſt powerful and glorious king, that "ever ſway'd a ſceptre in England? When "this happens, reply'd Edwin, I will gene-"rouſly reward all that ſhall have done me "any ſervice, as well as the perſon who pre-"dicts my good fortune. The ſtranger an-"ſwered, He that is able and willing to ad-"vance you to the throne, requires nothing "from you, but the belief of his doctrine "and obedience to his precepts. Edwin re-"ply'd, I ſhould be a wretch, with a witneſs, "to refuſe ſubmiſſion to ſuch a ſincere friend." The ſtranger, then, laying his hand on the prince's head, ſaid; "Reflect attentively on "what I am now doing; and, when the like "ſhall happen to you, remember to perform "your promiſe immediately." Upon this, the ſtranger diſappear'd in an extraordinary manner, to convince Edwin, that there was ſomething ſupernatural in the adventure *.

Edwin's ſurprize was increaſed by a meſſage from the queen, giving him to underſtand, that Redowald had alter'd his purpoſe; for ſhe had ſo pathetically repreſented to him the horror of the action he had reſolved to commit, that he choſe to run all riſques, rather than act ſo diſhonourable a part. The king, accordingly, told the ambaſſadors, that he would not deliver up Edwin, much leſs take away the life of an innocent prince, that had retreated to his palace for protection. As he expected that a bloody war would enſue this anſwer, he determin'd to begin firſt, by attacking Adelfrid in Northumberland, before he could muſter his forces together. Redowald levied an army with all expedition, and divided it into three bodies, that were to march at ſome diſtance from each other. Reyner, his eldeſt ſon, commanded the firſt, who had orders to go before, to ſecure a certain paſs; whilſt he follow'd himſelf, at the head of the ſecond, leaving Edwin to bring up the rear. Reyner, being deſirous of glory, by ſpeedy marches, contrary to his orders, hoped to ſurpriſe Adelfrid, before he was prepared to receive him. Adelfrid, indeed, had not aſſembled all his forces; but, finding that Reyner was too far advanced, he fell upon him, before it was in the power of Redowald to join him. As Reyner's raſhneſs entirely proceeded from his exceſs of courage, he defended himſelf with great reſolution and bravery; but, being too ventureſome, was ſlain, and his army routed.

Redowald, enraged at this, joining Edwin, march'd, with all ſpeed, to attack the enemy, who had not time to retreat; but, adelfrid, who would have been glad of ſuch an opportunity, inſtead of retiring, fiercely advanced towards the Eaſt-Angles, and both armies ſoon came to an engagement. Adelfrid performed wonders, to ſecure his reputation; and, finding he was over-power'd by numbers, choſe rather to die, than ſurvive the diſgrace of a defeat. With this view, he threw himſelf among the thickeſt of his enemies, and, being cover'd over with wounds, bravely fell a ſacrifice; the Northumbrians, upon this, laid down their arms, and betook themſelves to flight.

After this ſignal victory, to which Edwin had not a little contributed, Redowald enter'd into Northumberland, without any reſiſtance. Anfrid, Oſwald, and Oſwy, Adelfrid's three ſons, fled into Scotland; and the Northumbrians, thus abandon'd, ſubmitted to Redowald. This generous prince did neither puniſh them for the inſolence of their king, nor ſeize on their kingdom; but, from a peculiar greatneſs of ſoul, he not only gave to Edwin the kingdom of Deira, to which he had ſome pretenſions, but alſo that of Bernicia, contenting himſelf with the glory of ſo generous an action; and, for this, and on the account of his late victory, he was elected monarch, that dignity being then vacant.

Edwin † by a ſurprizing and unexpected turn of affairs, wherein the hand of heaven appear'd, now found himſelf at the head of a powerful kingdom, God, as the ſequel ſhews, raiſing him up, to propagate chriſtianity in Northumberland, as Ethelbert had already done in Kent.

Redowald dying in 624, Edwin put up for the monarchy; and, indeed, none of the princes were in a condition to diſpute this point with him, except Cinigiſil and Quicelm, joint-kings of the Weſt-Saxons. Quicelm, eſpecially, oppoſed him with all his might; and he thereby drew upon himſelf a war, which endangered the loſs of his dominions, being obliged humbly to ſue for peace. Upon this, Edwin was choſen monarch; and the very Welch, leſt Edwin ſhould invade them, as he had threaten'd, conſented to pay him tribute.

674. Edwin enlarged the prerogatives of the monarchy, more than any of his predeceſſors, aſſerting an abſolute power over the other kings. Ebald, king of Kent, was his chief favourite, [illegible]ſe ſiſter Ethelburga, a princeſs of great merit, he deſigned to eſpouſe. As he was monarch, he imagined that his propoſal would be joyfully received; but Ethelburga, being a zealous chriſtian, abhorred the thoughts of marrying an idolatrous prince, tho' never ſo much to her advantage. Her brother too refuſed to conſent to the match, unleſs ſhe had free liberty publickly to profeſs her religion. The deſire of poſſeſſing ſo accompliſh'd a perſon prevailed on the monarch to comply with all their demands; and Ethelburga conſented, as ſhe was led to hope ſhe ſhould have it in her power to convert her ſpouſe and his ſubjects, as Bertha her mother had done before her in Kent. This affair being ſettled, Ethelburga ſet out for Northumberland, accompanied with ſome eccleſiaſticks, particularly Paulinus, conſecrated a biſhop by Juſtus archbiſhop of York, who brought over Edwin and the Northumbrians to the chriſtian religion, as will be particularly ſhewn in the ſtate of the church.

Edwin, for many years, enjoyed a profound tranquillity, being both feared and eſteemed by all the other kings; and, in thoſe peaceable times, he not only maintained his ſovereignty over the other princes, but enacted wholeſome laws, which he cauſed to be ſtrictly obeyed. Hiſtorians obſerve, that he adminiſter'd juſtice with ſuch impartiality and rigour, that, in his reign, a child might have travelled over the whole kingdom with a purſe of gold in his hand, without the leaſt danger of robbing; but his chief care was, after his converſion, to propagate chriſtianity, in places where it was not known, and to replant it, where it had been aboliſhed. At his inſtigation, if not by his abſolute order, Erpwald, king of the Eaſt-Angles, permitted that the goſpel ſhould be preached a-new in his dominions; and, at length, he became a chriſtian himſelf. Edwin, who could not bear the leaſt reſiſtance to his will, aſſumed an authority over the other kings, of which he was very jealous; for, by an enſign carried before him, in the form of a globe *, as a ſymbol of the the union of the heptarchy in his own perſon, he convinced them, that he would be regarded not only as their head, but as their maſter.

633. Bede, l. 2. c. 2. Penda, king of Mercia, was the moſt impatient under this yoke; and, not daring to attempt it alone, long'd for a favourable opportunity to ſhake it off. At laſt, finding that Cadwallo, king of Wales, could not think of paying tribute to a foreign prince, he entered into a confederacy with him againſt the king of Northumberland. As their preparations were publick, Edwin, reſolving to ſurpriſe them, advanced as far as Heathfield, where they came to an engagement. The battle, on both ſides, was fought with deſperate fury, the Mercians and Welch confiding in their numbers, and the Northumbrians in the courage and conduct of their king. Edwin, notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of the enemy's forces, kept the fight in an equal balance, till an unhappy accident took from him his uſual preſence of mind, tho' at this juncture, more than ever neceſſary. Offrid, his eldeſt ſon, who bravely aſſiſted him, being ſlain at his feet, ſo highly enraged him, that he flew among the thickeſt of his enemies, not regarding whether he was followed by his ſoldiers; he was immediately ſtabb'd in many parts of his body, and with his life loſt the victory.

Thus fell Edwin, in the 48th year of his age, the 16th of his reign, and the 9th of his monarchy. By his firſt wife, daughter to Cearlus king of Mercia, he had two ſons Offrid and Effrid; and by his ſecond, Ethelburga of Kent, he had two ſons and two daughters, who all died in their infancy, except Anfleda, wife to Oſwy king of Northumberland. Edwin reſided at Derventø, now Auldby in Yorkſhire.

Interregnum. Bede, l. 2. c. 20. The two kings, after their victory, enter'd into Northumberland, making horrible devaſtations, and treating the inhabitants with the utmoſt inhumanity. The Welch too, tho' they were chriſtians, carried their barbarity to ſuch a height, that Effrid, Edwin's ſon, ſurrender'd himſelf to Penda, who treated him, at firſt, with civility, but afterwards ordered him to be ſlain in his preſence. Ethelburga and Paulinus fled to the king of Kent, who beſtowed his ſiſter ſome lands for a monaſtery, in which ſhe continued to her death; and Paulinus was made biſhop of Rocheſter. Thorn. Hiſt. Abb. Canterb. Cam. in Kent.

The Northumbrians, on account of their defeat and the fury of the two kings, could not, for a long time, recover themſelves; and, at laſt, they eſteemed it more glorious to die bravely, with their ſwords in their hands, than periſh by the cruelty of theſe tyrants. But, when they came to elect a king, the Bernicians and Deirans could not agree in their choice, thoſe of Deira chooſing Oſrick, a relation of Edwin's, and the Bernicians, Anfrid. This laſt, upon the death of Adelfrid his father, retir'd into Scotland with Oſwald and Oſwy his brothers, where they were all three baptized into the chriſtian faith.

633. Oſrick in Deira. Anfrid in Bernicia. These two kings were no ſooner on the throne, than they turn'd apoſtates to chriſtianity; but their puniſhment from God was as ſudden as their revolt from him, being both ſlain in the firſt year of their reigns. Oſrick raſhly beſieging Cadwallo in York, with an army of undiſciplin'd troops, the

Welch king ſallied out and attack'd him ſo briſkly, that he routed his army, and left him dead on the ſpot. After this, Cadwallo march'd againſt the king of Bernicia, who was at the head of 12,000 men; and amuſing him with overtures of peace, till he had got him
634. in his reach, ſuddenly fell upon him, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of the Northumbrians, Anfrid himſelf being kill'd in the battle.

Interregnum. So many ſucceſſive loſſes were fatal to the Northumbrians; and the Welch king, being exaſperated by their late ſtruggles, deſign'd nothing leſs than the entire ruin of this miſerable nation. His cruel outrages, at laſt, alarm'd Oſwald, Anfrid's brother, who determin'd, at all hazards, to relieve the Northumbrians; and, raiſing a ſmall number of forces, he boldly oppoſed the uſurper. Tho' the king of Mercia had return'd to his own kingdom, Cadwallo, not doubting of ſucceſs, march'd againſt Oſwald, who intrenched himſelf in an advantageous place, expecting his coming; but, relying more on the divine aſſiſtance, than on his own ſtrength, he erected a croſs before the camp, and, on his knees, with his whole army, humbly implored a bleſſing on his arms. In the interim, Cadwallo advanced, full of confidence that his numbers would gain him the victory. Pleas'd with the thoughts of ſatisfying his revenge, to encourage his men, he attempted in perſon, to force their intrenchments; but, before he could accompliſh his deſign, he was ſhot thro' the body with an arrow, which put an end to his life. Upon this, his troops began to retreat, being exceedingly diſorder'd; and, the Northumbrians, ſallying out from their retrenchments, attack'd them ſo vigorouſly, that they were entirely routed. The providence of God ſo viſibly interpos'd, in favour of the Engliſh, that the field of battle was named Heaſen-field, now Haledon.

634. OSWALD. F. Wig. M. Weſt. Oſwald, upon this victory, became poſſeſſed of both the kingdoms of Northumberland; he was heir to Bernicia by Adelfrid his father, and to Deira by Acca his mother, ſiſter to Edwin. He was the moſt knowing as well as moſt religious prince of his age, having been inſtructed in the chriſtian faith, whilſt in Scotland. Such was his virtue, humility, and zeal for chriſtianity, that his ſubjects, who highly loved and eſteemed him whilſt alive, reverenced him as a ſaint, after his deceaſe. Oſwald deliver'd his country from Cadwallo's tyranny, re-united the two kingdoms of Northumberland, and was alſo monarch of the Anglo-Saxons; he was particularly induſtrious in replanting the goſpel in his dominions, from whence the late troubles had entirely baniſh'd it.

Penda, king of Mercia, who could not bear to ſee Oſwald his ſuperior, as monarch, took up arms, without declaring war, in order to ſurpriſe him. Oſwald, on the other hand, endeavour'd, with all expedition, to come upon him, before he had muſter'd his forces together. Penda took the advantage of his haſte; for, his army being the moſt numerous, he gave him battle, and obtain'd a victory, which would have been glorious, had he not ſullied it by his cruelties. The body of Oſwald, who was ſlain in the fight, being found among the dead, he barbarouſly cut in ſeveral pieces, and, fixing them on ſtakes, erected them in the field of battle, like ſo many trophies. This battle was fought at Oſweſtree *. Oſwald left a ſon behind him, called Adelwalt, afterwards king of Deira.

Penda, who acted with his uſual inhumanity, having ravaged Northumberland, beſieged Bamborough, a fortified town built by Ida; where meeting with greater oppoſition than he expected, he determin'd to reduce it to aſhes. With this view, he laid a prodigious quantity of wood under the walls, ſetting it on fire, as ſoon as the wind was favourable to his deſign; but no ſooner was the fire lighted, than the wind tack'd about, blowing the flame directly into his camp, to the great prejudice of the beſiegers. Upon this, he rais'd the ſiege, and, leaving Northumberland, carried the war into Eaſt-Anglia. Penda having thus retreated, Oſwy, Oſwald's brother, was crowned king of Bernicia; and, the ſucceeding year, Oſwin, the ſon of Oſrick ſlain by Cadwallo, was placed on the throne of Deira. Bede, l. 3. c. 16.

643. OSWY in Bernicia. Oſwy thought he was very unjuſtly deprived of part of his brother's dominions; but dreading another invaſion from Penda, he wanted an opportunity to recover his right; but, at length, finding the king of Mercia otherwiſe engaged, he aſſerted his claim to the kingdom of Deira; which obliged Oſwin to 644. take up arms, in his own defence, having OSWIN in Deira. made uſe of ſeveral means to prevent it. He was of a mild and peaceable temper, more devout than brave; and tho' he was drawn into the war, merely by neceſſity, yet he could not overcome the ſcruples it raiſed in his conſcience. He verily believed, that the ſhedding of his ſubjects blood, in his quarrel, was the greateſt of crimes; and, for this reaſon, he retir'd from his army to a certain count's houſe, whom he eſteem'd to be his beſt friend, deſigning to betake himſelf into a monaſtery; but his friend treacherouſly diſcover'd him to Oſwy, who order'd him to be cruelly murder'd, expecting to come at his kingdom with the greater facility. The people of Deira exaſperated againſt him, on the account of this inhuman action, and dreading to fall under the dominion of ſuch a tyrant, placed Adelwalt, ſon to Oſwald his brother, on the throne, who was a prince of greater valour than Oſwin his predeceſſor. In proceſs of time, Oſwy, touch'd with remorſe, built a monaſtery in the very place where Oſwin was murder'd, thinking that ſlight penance would atone for his crime.

Oſwy ſtill kept up his pretenſions to the crown of Deira; and Adelwalt, to put himſelf out of all danger from his uncle, enter'd Oſwy ſtill in Bernicia. 552.

into an alliance with the kings of Mercia and East-Anglia, Penda, tho' 70 years of age, being the author of this league. Oſwy did all he could to divert the impending ſtorm, and would even have brib'd Penda with a ſum of money, to deſiſt from his deſign; but Penda, who was an irreconcilable enemy to the Northumbrians, would not comply, having now an opportunity of gratifying his paſſion. Oſwy, in this extremity, being obliged to ſtand alone againſt this triple alliance, made a vow to found a dozen monaſteries, and devote one of his daughters to be a nun, if God would grant him the victo-
655. ry. To this vow hiſtorians attribute the ſucceſs, the Divine Being was pleaſed to vouchſafe him in this war.

Whilſt the two armies were on their march, in order to engage, Adelwalt, conſidering that he had the ſame reaſon to fear his being dethron'd by Penda as by Oſwy, was reſolv'd to ſtand neuter, during the engagement, that he might defend himſelf againſt the conqueror. Penda, being ignorant of Adelwalt's reſolution, vigorouſly attack'd the king of Bernicia, not doubting that he ſhould be ſeconded by the Deirians and East-Anglians; but, when the Mercians found that Adelwalt drew off his troops, their courage abated, and, thinking they were betray'd, began to give way. The kings of Mercia and East-Anglia try'd all poſſible means to revive the ardour of the ſoldiers; but, being both ſlain, their army was routed. This battle was fought in Yorkſhire, on the banks of the Are, and the place was afterwards named Winwidfield *.

After this victory, Oſwy marched into Mercia, and ſubdued that kingdom, tho' he enjoy'd it but three years; during which time, the monarchy, vacant ever ſince the death of his brother Oſwald, was conferr'd upon him. Penda, indeed, had the beſt pretenſions to it; but he was alſo the moſt dangerous perſon to be entruſted with it. Oſwy poſſeſs'd Mercia, by right of conqueſt, whilſt Penda's ſons were obliged to ſeek for refuge among their friends. The Mercians, however, at length, not being able to bear the proceedings of Oſwy's officers, took up arms; and, they concerted their meaſures ſo wiſely, that, whilſt Oſwy had not the leaſt apprehenſions of it, they ſuddenly forced the Northumbrians out of WULFER. Mercia, and placed Wulfer, the ſon of Penda, on the throne.

A few years after, Adelwalt dying, without iſſue, Oſwy was crowned king of Deira; and Northumberland was, once more, united into one kingdom.

OSWY king of Bernicia only.

However, this union was not of a long continuance; for ſo great was Oſwald's affection for Alfred his natural ſon, that he made him king of Deira, againſt the liking of his ſubjects.

ALFRED king of Deira.

Oſwy, after a reign of 28 years, died in 670. In the beginning of it, he was embroil'd in wars; but, at length, he enjoy'd ſome quiet. Bede, for reaſons I ſhall take notice of in the hiſtory of the church, looks upon him to have been one of the moſt illuſtrious kings of the heptarchy, tho' the murder of Oſwin had exceedingly tarniſh'd the glory of his other actions. He had two ſons and three daughters, by Anfleda daughter to Edwin. Egfrid his ſon ſucceeded him, as king of Bernicia, and likewiſe in the monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons; and the Deirians, upon Oſwy's deceaſe, revolting againſt Alfred, and ſubmitting to Egfrid, he became king of all Northumberland. Alfred retir'd into Ireland, where he purſued his ſtudies, waiting for a proper opportunity to recover his dominions.

In the year 684, he made a deſcent upon 684.
Ireland, under the conduct of Bertfrid, whoſe Bede, l. 4.
barbarity to the Iriſh, eſpecially his not ſparing their very churches and monaſteries, render'd this expedition abortive; for the Iriſh, who were terrify'd at firſt, afterwards defended themſelves with ſo much courage and bravery, that they forced Bertfrid to return home with the remains of his army.

Egfrid, upon this diſappointment, reſolving to enlarge his bounds towards the north, invaded the Picts, who, being unexpectedly ſurprized, had recourſe to their bogs and fens, to avoid the firſt attacks of their enemies. Egfrid raſhly purſued them, and led his men into ſuch dangerous places, that they could not retreat. The Picts, who were thoroughly acquainted with the country, ſo diſtreſſed his troops, that he loſt above half his army; and, being, after all, under a neceſſity of engaging the enemy, on very unequal terms, he loſt his life, in the 40th year of his age and 14th of his reign.

Egfrid was twice married; but Adelfrida, his firſt wife, daughter to Annas king of the East-Angles, and widow to an Engliſh lord, called Thombert, is reported to have continued a virgin, though ſhe had two husbands, and, at laſt, to be ſeparated from Egfrid entirely; ſhe founded a monaſtery at Ely, and was the firſt abbeſs herſelf, being reverenc'd in England by the name of St. Auldry.

The kingdom of Northumberland was never ſo conſiderable, after Egfrid's death, as before. The Picts ſubdued part of Bernicia, which lay advantageouſly for them; and the Welch ſeized on the two provinces, that did formerly conſtitute the kingdom of Areclute, and out of them erected the kingdoms of Lennox and Cumberland, the firſt of which was recover'd from them, ſome years after.

* Now Leeds.

Egfrid

Egfrid dying without iſſue, the Northumbrians invited Alfred from Ireland, to make him king of both their kingdoms, which from that time were always united.

685. ALFRED. Bede, l. 4. The Picts and Welch having had leiſure to ſecure their conqueſts, before Alfred was ſettled on the throne, he could do no more, nor even that without difficulty, than defend the reſt of his dominions. The monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons paſſed over to the kings of Weſſex.

705. An. Sax. F. Wigor. Alfred died in 705, after a reign of 20 years, leaving Oſred his ſon to ſucceed him, at eight years of age, under the tuition of a lord, named Brithrick.

OSRED. G. Malm. l. 3. de Pont. The beginning of his reign, as it often happens to princes, in the caſe of minority, was attended with troubles; for Edulph, a lord of the country, taking the advantage of Oſred's youth, made an attempt upon the crown. As a powerful party had declared for him, Oſred and his guardian were forced to take ſanctuary in Bamborough-caſtle, where Edulph immediately beſieged them. The length of the ſiege having given Brithrick an opportunity to look about him, and his friends a fit occaſion for riſing, in the behalf of their lawful ſovereign, Edulph was obliged to raiſe the ſiege in a hurry; and Brithrick ſallying out in purſuit of the uſurper, took him priſoner, ordering him to be beheaded, about two months after his revolt.

Bede l. 5. F. Wigor.

Oſred was no ſooner his own maſter, than he fell into a wicked and lewd courſe of life; and, particularly, he had very little veneration for the monks, which, in thoſe days, was accounted the height of impiety. It is ſaid, that he debauched the nuns, without ſcruple, and even committed rapes upon them, when he could not prevail by other means. Tho' the truth of this accuſation is uncertain, yet it proved of very dangerous conſequence; for ever ſince Alfred, Oſwy's natural ſon, came to the crown, all the baſtards of the kings, or their deſcendents, fancied they had the ſame pretenſions, which was the cauſe of many troubles in the kingdom. Kenred and Oſrick, the poſterity of Ogga natural ſon to Ida, formed a party againſt Oſrick, which was very warmly abetted by the regular and ſecular clergy; it became, at laſt, ſo powerful, as to be in a condition to give Oſred battle, wherein he was ſlain, in the 19th year of his age and 11th of his reign.

716. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3.

716. KENRED. Kenred, the chief author of the revolt, ſucceeded him, and died in the ſecond year of his reign.

OSRICK. Oſrick was his ſucceſſor, who reigned 11 years, without doing any thing remarkable.

CEOLWULF. 730. Ceolwulf, his relation, to whom Oſrick left the crown, turn'd monk in the 7th or 8th year of his reign, paſſing the remainder of his days in the monaſtery of Lindisfarne.

750. EDBERT. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3. Edbert, his ſucceſſor, was invaded by the Picts, immediately after his coronation. As this obliged him to march his army towards the north, the king of Mercia, in the mean time, fell upon the ſouthern parts of Northumberland, and carried off great booty.

Edbert, towards the concluſion of his reign, having enter'd into an alliance with Oenguſſa king of the Picts, recover'd Areclute, the capital of the kingdom of Lennox, taken by the Welch in the time of Alfred. Deovama, general or prince of the Welch, attempting to raiſe the ſiege, was defeated; and Edbert, ſoon after, retir'd into a monaſtery. 756.

OSULF. Oſulf, to whom he left his crown, was aſſaſſinated, in the firſt year of his reign. 758.

MOLLON ADELWALD. 760. Mollon-Adelwald, tho' not of the blood-royal, was choſen to be his ſucceſſor; which election ended, at length, in the entire ruin of the kingdom. Upon this, all the grandees thought they had a right to the crown, as well as the princes of the blood; and ſome of them, finding that Mollon was advanced to the throne by a powerful party, they imagined they might make uſe of the ſame means to raiſe themſelves. Oſwy was one of the principal; but, he dying, Alcred, ſprung from Ida by Alarick, one of his natural ſons, treading in his ſteps, enter'd into a ſecret conſpiracy againſt the king, and, having taken away his life, was crown'd in his ſtead.

ALCRED. 765. Mollon's faction, that were exceedingly mortify'd by his death, in proceſs of time, recovering their ſtrength, Alfred was obliged to fly for refuge to the Picts; and, upon his departure, Ethelred, Mollon's ſon, was plac'd on the throne.

ETHELRED. 774. Ethelred, being thus advanced, thought the death or baniſhment of the oppoſite party the beſt way to ſecure his crown; and, accordingly, he took away the lives of three lords, for forged or ſlight offences, becauſe they had been moſt active in oppoſing his election. However, this method ſerved only to furniſh his enemies with a ſpecious pretence for making an inſurrection. The king, ſending the beſt of his troops, under a general entirely devoted to his intereſt, expected he ſhould have ſpeedily reduced them to obedience; but his army was twice defeated by the rebels, who forced him to repair for ſecurity to ſome of the neighbouring kingdoms. Upon this, Alfwald, the ſon of Oſulf and grandſon to Edbert, was placed on the throne.

ALFWALD. 770. H. Hunt. l. 4. Alfwald I. reigned eleven years with great juſtice and moderation; but he was, however, aſſaſſinated by one of the other party, tho' reverenced by his followers as a ſaint, after his deceaſe.

OSRED II. 789. Oſred II. Alcred's ſon, was elected in his ſtead, who became ſo contemptible, that he was confin'd in a monaſtery, in the firſt year of his reign. Ethelred's faction were much concerned in depoſing Oſred, and had intereſt enough to have him recalled, after an exile of 12 yers.

Ethelred restored to the crown. 794. Ethelred began his new reign with two cruel actions, which very much incenſed his enemies againſt him, as he put Oſred his predeceſſor, tho' a monk, to death, and diſpatched Alphus and Alphwin, ſons of the good king Alfwald.

795. In this reign, the Danes invaded Northumberland, and deſtroy'd by fire Lindisfarne monaſtery; monaſtery; and, the year following, they ravaged Tinmouth monaſtery, founded by king Egfrid. Ethelred, aſſiſted by Offa king of Mercia, his father-in-law, putting a ſtop to their proceedings, drove them to their ſhips, where the greateſt part of them periſhed by a tempeſt on the Engliſh coaſt.

Tho' Ethelred's inhumanity had mightily inflamed the reſentment of the oppoſite party, he ſtill indulged his revengeful temper, fixing himſelf on his throne, by the death or baniſhment of thoſe whom he ſuſpected; and, at length, endeavouring to baniſh Ardulph, one of the principal lords, he introduced a civil war. When it had continued two years, the malecontents, reſolving, at all hazards, to get rid of Ethelred, had him aſſaſſinated. His party, however, placed Osbald, one of their own faction, on the throne.

Sim. Dunelm. Rog. Hov.

Charlemain, a friend to Ethelred, ſo reſented this proceeding, that he was upon the point of declaring war againſt the Northumbrians, as we learn from Alcuin's letter to Offa king of Mercia.

Alcuin Ep. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3.

OSBALD. 796.

During the publick rejoicings at Osbald's election, the oppoſite faction had the management to dethrone him, 27 days after he was advanced to the throne, and choſe Ardulph in his room.

ARDULPH. 800.

Tho' Ardulph's party were, at preſent, the ſtrongeſt, yet the other made frequent attempts to get the aſcendant, Alcred having left a ſon behind him, called Alcmund, that commanded it; and, as this prince grew formidable, Ardulph eſteemed it abſolutely neceſſary to ſacrifice him, for his own ſecurity. As Alcmund's death was conſider'd by his friends, as a martyrdom, they ſainted him, and took up arms to revenge it; but Aldred, their general, being ſlain, they remain'd quiet for a while, waiting for a more favourable opportunity, which fell out ſoon after. This party, at length, became ſo powerful, that Ardulph fled for protection to the court of Charlemain, where the Engliſh were always kindly received.

ALSWALD. 808.

Alfwald II. who had expelled Ardulph, ſucceeded him, and dying, after a reign of two years, left the crown to Andred.

ANDRED.

In Andred's reign, Northumberland became ſubject to Ecbert king of the Weſt-Saxons, who put an end to the heptarchy.

The hiſtory of the kingdom of MERCIA.

Kingdom of Mercia.

THE kingdom of Mercia, the moſt conſiderable of the heptarchy, was bounded on the north by the Humber, which parted it from Northumberland; on the weſt by the Severn, beyond which were the Britiſh or Welch; on the ſouth by the Thames, which ſeparated it from the kingdoms of Kent, Suſſex and Weſſex; and on the eaſt, by the kingdoms of Eſſex and Eaſt-Anglia. Thus Mercia was defended, on three ſides, by three large rivers, and was as a boundary to all the other kingdoms, the name Mercia being derived from the Saxon word, Merk, which ſignifies a bound, and not, as ſome have fancied, from an imaginary river called Mercia. The inhabitants of this kingdom are ſometimes ſtiled by hiſtorians Mediterranei Angli or the mid-land Engliſh, and ſometimes South-Humbrians, as being ſouth of the Humber, but moſt generally Mercians. The chief cities of Mercia * were Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwick, Leiceſter, Coventry, Litchfield, Northampton, Worceſter, Glouceſter, Darby, Cheſter, Shrewsbury, Stafford, Oxford, and Briſtol. Its greateſt length was 160 miles, and its greateſt breadth about 100.

CRIDA. H. Hunt. F. Wig.

Crida, the firſt king of Mercia, came to England in 584, and, being crown'd the ſame or following year, died in 494.

Interregnum.

Upon Crida's death, Ethelbert, king of Kent, took poſſeſſion of Mercia; but he, at length, reſtored it to Wibba, Crida's ſon, reſerving, however, ſome right of ſovereignty, the nature of which has not been related by the hiſtorians.

WIBBA. 597.

Wibba, after a reign of 19 years, died in 615, leaving a ſon behind him, named Penda; but Ethelbert, dreading his turbulent ſpirit, when Mercia had been a year without a king, conferred the crown on Cearlus, Webba's couſin-german.

CEARLUS 616.

Cearlus, upon Ethelbert's death, delivered Mercia from the dominion of the kings of Kent; and, having reigned nine years, died in 624.

PENDA. 625.

As Cearlus had no iſſue, Penda, Wibba's ſon, ſucceeded him in the 50th year of his age, who was the moſt reſtleſs and active prince that ever reigned in England. I have already given ſome account of his wars with Edwin, Oſwald, and Oſwy, kings of Northumberland; and thoſe he had with the kings of Weſſex and Eaſt-Anglia, I ſhall ſpeak of in the hiſtory of theſe two kingdoms.

In 653, Penda, having made his eldeſt ſon king of Leiceſter, ſent him into Northumberland, to eſpouſe the daughter of Oſwy, where he embraced the chriſtian faith. He brought back with him ſome miſſionaries, who preached the goſpel in Mercia with good ſucceſs; but Penda continued a pagan to his death.

At laſt, he was ſlain in battle, in the 80th year of his age, as hath been mentioned, leaving behind him five ſons, Peda, Wulfer, Ethelred, Merowald, and Mercelm, and two daughters Ciniburga and Ciniſwintha.

Interregnum. 657.

After Penda's death, Oſwy became maſter of Mercia, keeping it three years. He left Peda, his ſon-in-law, the little kingdom of Leiceſter; but being poiſoned ſoon after by his wife, Oſwy ſeized on that too, holding it, with the reſt of Mercia, till he was expelled by Wulfer.

* It contained 16 counties.

WULFER. 659. Wulfer's reign was as full of commotions as that of his father Penda; but as his wars were of no moment, and are very imperfectly related by hiſtorians, I ſhall only obſerve, that he took Adelwalch, king of Suſſex, priſoner, and brought him to Mercia, after he had ſubdued his kingdom. In proceſs of time, Adelwalch embracing chriſtianity, during his im-
663. priſonment, Wulfer gave him the iſle of Wight, which he had alſo conquered. It is
665. probable, that Wulfer likewiſe made a conqueſt of the kingdom of Eſſex, ſince it is notorious, that Ina was promoted by him to the biſhoprick of London.

Wulfer was a pagan, when he came to the throne, but he was converted ſoon after, and had all his children educated in the chriſtian faith. Vereburga, one o his daughters, was honoured as a ſaint. He died in 675, deſigning to leave his crown to his ſon Cenred; but Ethelred his brother, by ſupplanting his nephew, obtained the kingdom.

ETHELRED. 675. Ethelred, being ſeated on the throne, erected Herefordſhire into a kingdom, giving it to Merowald his brother, who, dying without iſſue, left it to his younger brother Marcelm; he dying alſo without an heir, it was again united to Mercia.

679. In 679, Ethelred invaded Kent, making great devaſtations. After this, he turned his arms againſt Northumberland, and forced Egfrid to reſtore ſome Mercian towns he had taken, during Wulfer's reign. Theodore, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was very active in making up the peace between the two kings.

In 697, Oſtrith, Ethelred's wife, was aſſaſſinated; and, as the king took no pains to diſcover the murderers, it was ſuſpected that the king himſelf had ſome concern in the mat-
704. ter. However, Ethelred reſigned his crown to Cenred his nephew, Wulfer's ſon, and retired from the world into Bardney monaſtery *, being, ſoon after, made the abbot of it.

CENRED. 704. Cenred did nothing remarkable, during a reign of four years, except his taking up the monkiſh habit, after the example of Offa king of Eſſex, who came to his court, to demand Ciniſwintha his aunt, Penda's daughter, in marriage. This princeſs managed both the kings with ſo much dexterity, that ſhe perſuaded them to turn monks, and to wait upon the pope at Rome, to receive the tonſure from his hands. Ceolred, Ethelred's ſon, ſucceeded Cenred.

CEOLRED 709. Ceolred was engaged in a terrible war with Ina king of the Weſt-Saxons; but we are told no more concerning it, by the hiſtorians, but that both theſe kings fought a bloody battle, at Wodenburgh in Wiltſhire, with equal ſucceſs.

Coelred was ſo far from preferring the monkiſh habit to a crown, that he entirely diſregarded the monks and the other clergy, invading their privileges, without the leaſt remorſe; and, by this practice, ſo contrary to that of all the other Engliſh princes, he made the monks his inveterate enemies. They not only painted him in the blackeſt colours, whilſt alive, but, after his death, which happen'd in 716, they gave out, that, with his lateſt breath, he blaſphemed and talked with the devil. Such reports, as theſe, the monks induſtriouſly raiſed and ſpread abroad, againſt thoſe that were not devoted to their intereſt; and the hiſtories of theſe times abound with ſuch inſtances. Ethelbald, the grandſon of Eoppa, Penda's brother, ſucceeded Ceolred.

This king, one of the moſt illuſtrious that had, hitherto, reigned in Mercia, was alſo choſen monarch, in the room of Ina king of Weſſex, who had embraced the monaſtick life. Tho' this dignity originally conſiſted only in preſiding at the general aſſemblies, in commanding the armies of the heptarchy, and in ſome other prerogatives, which conferred no right of ſovereignty over the other kings; yet the monarchs generally made it their principal care to graſp at an unlimited power. Ethelbald carried the prerogatives of the monarchy to the utmoſt height, taking the advantage of a favourable opportunity, and became very formidable to the other princes. On this account, the kings of Weſſex and Northumberland agreed to attack him, at once, from two different quarters. Mercia being ſituated between thoſe kingdoms, Ethelbald was forced to ſend half his army towards the north, whilſt he, with the reſt, marched againſt the Weſt-Saxons under the command of Ethelum. We know nothing of this war, but that Ethelbald was vanquiſh'd and his army routed.

ETHELBALD. 716. 752.

Four years after, he was ſlain in a mutiny, raiſed by Beornred, a lord, who was proclaimed king by the ſoldiers.

757. BEORNRED.

This election very much diſpleaſed the Mercian lords, eſpecially as he did not belong to the royal family; and, before he could ſettle himſelf on the throne, they choſe Offa, nephew to Ethelbald, who gave the uſurper battle, and entirely defeated him. Some tell us, Beornred was ſlain; and others, that he defended himſelf, for ſome time, in a part of Mercia.

OFFA. 757. Offa was one of the moſt glorious kings that reign'd in England, during the heptarchy, on ſeveral accounts, which I ſhall briefly mention. One of his moſt remarkable victories was that over Aldrick, king of Kent, in 774.

Offa, treading in the ſteps of his predeceſſors, who aſſerted a ſovereign authority over the other kings, had continual wars with the princes that diſputed his pretenſions; but the account, hiſtorians give us of them, is very lame and defective. We muſt, then, reſt ſatisfied with what is ſaid of him, in general, which may ſerve to let us into ſome knowledge of his character.

Whilſt Offa was employ'd in ſubduing the Saxon kings, the Welch, who catch'd at every advantage the frequent diſſentions of the Engliſh put in their way, reſolved to attack him. In this war, the Welch were, at firſt, ſucceſsful; but, Offa having ſtruck up a peace with the Engliſh, that he might turn his arms againſt the Welch, ſoon obliged them, not only to abandon their conqueſts in Mercia, but alſo part of their own country beyond the Severn, which Offa peopled with Engliſh colonies. To prevent its being ever retaken by the Welch, he threw up a rampart defended by a large ditch, as a boundary between Mercia and Wales. This rampart 24 miles long, from the mouth of the Dee to the place where the Wye runs into the Severn, was called Clawdh-Offa or Offa's-dike.

In 786, Offa made his ſon Egfrid partner with him in the government, and gave his daughter Edburg in marriage to Brithrick king of Weſſex.

The greateſt blemiſh on Offa's reputation, was his treachery to Ethelbert king of the Eaſt-Angles, who came to his court, to demand his daughter Adelfrida in marriage. This young prince was treated, at firſt, with great marks of affection and eſteem; but, by the preſſing and repeated inſtigations of Quendrida his queen, who repreſented to him, that he ought not to loſe ſo fair an opportunity of becoming maſter of Eaſt-Anglia, Offa was prevailed upon to violate the moſt ſacred laws of honour and hoſpitality, by the murder of Ethelbert. Upon this, he marched into Eaſt-Anglia with a great army, and, meeting with no reſiſtance, he ſeized on the kingdom, uniting it to Mercia.

He had no ſooner committed this horrid fact, than he was ſeverely tortur'd by the laſhes of his own conſcience, which, continually preſenting his crime to his view, did not allow him a moment's eaſe. To appeaſe its fury, he went to Rome, in 794, to obtain a pardon from the pope*, who granted his requeſt, on condition that he would be liberal to the churches and monaſteries, the way to atone for ſins in thoſe days; it could have been wiſhed, that reſtitution alſo had been made a neceſſary and previous article.

794. * Adrian.

Among Offa's liberalities to the churches of Rome, there was one, which proved very prejudicial to England, that we ſhall particularly mention. Ina, king of the Weſt-Saxons, had founded a college at Rome, for the education of Engliſh youth; to the ſupport of which, he had order'd a penny to be collected yearly, from every family in his dominions. This charity was termed Romeſcot, that is, tribute of Rome, or ſent to Rome. Offa extended this tax throughout Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia, the lands of the monaſtery of St. Albans only excepted; and becauſe this money was paid at Rome on a holy-day called St. Peter's ad vincula*, this tax was called Peter's-pence, inſtead of Romeſcot. The directors of the college were, by this means, amply ſupplied with money to defray the expences they were at, from the great concourſe of the Engliſh that came to ſtudy at Rome. In proceſs of time, the popes, pretending it was a tribute the Engliſh paid to St. Peter and his ſucceſſors, converted it to their own uſe, till it was entirely aboliſhed by Henry VIII.†

* 1ſt of Auguſt.

Before Offa left Rome, he obtained of the pope the canonization of St. Alban, whoſe relicks were ſuppos'd to be found at Verulam. At his return, he built there a fine church and a ſtately monaſtery; from this time, Verulam was named St. Alban's. Offa, likewiſe, was very liberal to the church of Hereford, where the body of Ethelbert lay interr'd, that they might pray to God continually, both for him and the king whom he murdered. 793

William of Malmsbury expreſſes himſelf to be at a loſs, whether he ſhould place Offa among the good or bad princes, putting the canonization of St. Alban, the firſt Britiſh martyr, and the founding a noble monaſtery to his honour, in the balance with the murder of the king of Eaſt-Anglia.

Offa's reign was remarkable on ſeveral accounts: for the erecting of Litchfield into an archbiſhoprick, of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter; for Peter-pence; and for publiſhing a body of laws, entitled Mercens Leaga, i.e. laws of the Mercians, which was a pattern to his ſucceſſors, the greateſt part of them being inſerted in king Alfred's laws, publiſh'd about the end of the enſuing century.

Offa had contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Charles the great. We have ſome of the letters they wrote to each other, in the life of Offa, at the end of Matthew Paris's hiſtory; a life that contains in it almoſt as many fables as truths.

Offa died in 796, after a reign of 39 years. Egfrid, who had been already crown'd, as his partner, ſucceeded him, as king of Mercia, and in the dignity of monarch.

Egfrid, who ſurvived his father but four or five months, employ'd that time in enriching the monks, eſpecially thoſe of St. Alban's. Cenulph, ſprung from Wibba by another branch, was his ſucceſſor in both of his dignities. EGFRID, 796.

Cenulph immediately declared war againſt Edbert-Pren, king of Kent, tho' the cauſe of it is unknown. We are only told, that it was fatal to the king of Kent, who, being taken priſoner, was carried to Mercia, where Cenulph order'd his eyes to be put out, after he had placed another on his throne. CENULPH, 796.

Cenulph died in 819, after a glorious reign of 24 years, leaving a ſon, named Cenelm, very young, and two daughters, Quendrida and Burganilda.

Quendrida, Cenelm's eldeſt ſiſter, hoping to obtain the crown, if her brother was diſpatch'd, had him aſſaſſinated by one Aſcobert, who threw his body into a well, where it was found, as is reported, by a miracle, Quendrida did not ſucceed in her deſign, the Mercians electing Cleolulph, the uncle of the laſt king. CENELM, 819.

† Nat. Bacon, ch. xi. proves it was far from being a tribute.

Cleoluph,

CLEOLULPH. 819. Cleolulph, after a year's reign, was depos'd by Bernulph, one of the principal lords. Bernulph, 821. Ludican, 823. Witglaph, 825. I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of theſe three kings of Mercia, in the hiſtory of the kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons.

The hiſtory of EAST-ANGLIA.

East-Angles. THE kingdom of Eaſt-Anglia was bounded, on the north, by the Humber and the German ocean; on the eaſt, by the ſame ocean, which almoſt ſurrounded it on two ſides; on the ſouth, by the kingdom of Eſſex; and on the weſt, by Mercia. Its greateſt length was 80 miles, and its greateſt breadth 55. It contained the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and part of Cambridgeſhire; and its chief towns were Norwich, Thetford, Ely, and Cambridge. I have already related, how this kingdom was founded by the Angles, and that Uffa was the firſt who aſſumed the title of king of Eaſt-Anglia.

UFFA. 571. We have nothing remarkable recorded concerning him; he died in 578, and was ſucceeded by

TITIL. 578. Titil his ſon, who died in 599, had for his ſucceſſor

REDOWALD. 599. Redowald his ſon, the moſt illuſtrious of all the kings of Eaſt-Anglia, if not of the whole heptarchy. As I have given a large account of him, in the hiſtory of Northumberland, I ſhall only obſerve here, that he died in 624, leaving his crown to ERPWALD 624. Erpwald his ſon, who made no figure, being, during his whole reign, in ſubjection to Edwin king of Northumberland, who might have deprived him of his kingdom, with the conſent of the Eaſt-Angles, if his obligations to Redowald his father would have permitted him to be guilty of ſuch an ungrateful action. But, though he left Erpwald the title of king, Edwin himſelf was, in reality, the ſovereign of Eaſt-Anglia; Erpwald was aſſaſſinated in 633, after a reign of 9 years.

Interregnum. After his death, there was an interregnum for three years, though the occaſion of it is unknown. In 636, the Eaſt-Angles placed on the throne.

SIGEBERT. 633. Sigebert, who having been baniſhed by Erpwald, on ſuſpicion of aſpiring to the crown, had retired into France, where he embraced the chriſtian faith. As ſoon as he was on the throne, he made it his principal ſtudy to propagate the knowledge of the true God among his ſubjects; for tho' the goſpel was planted in Eaſt-Anglia, in the reign of Redowald, it was now almoſt extinguiſhed, having never taken deep root. Having accompliſhed this deſign, by the aſſiſtance of Felix a Burgundian prieſt, he retired into a monaſtery, reſigning his crown to Egrick his relation, who being attacked, ſoon after he came to the crown, by Penda king of Mercia, the Eaſt-Angles petition Sigebert to quit his monaſtery and be their commander. He reſiſted, for ſome time, all their intreaties; but as they were perſuaded, that heaven could not refuſe the victory to ſuch a religious prince, they preſſed him with ſo much importunity, that, at laſt, he complied with their requeſt, and headed the army with Egrick, having no arms but a ſwitch. God, who is not directed by our notions, gave the victory to the Mercians, both the Eaſt-Anglian kings being ſlain on the ſpot. They were ſucceeded by EGRICK. 644.

Annas the ſon of Ennius, nephew to Redowald, one of the moſt illuſtrious kings of Eaſt-Anglia. By his aſſiſtance, Cenowalch king of Weſſex, who fled to him for protection, recovered his dominions from Penda, who had taken them from him, in 645. ANNAS. 644.

Penda, being incenſed againſt Annas, on that account, was reſolved to carry fire and ſword into Eaſt-Anglia. Annas dying, whilſt he was making preparations to defend himſelf, left the management of this dangerous war to 654.

Ethelrick his brother and ſucceſſor, who, dreading Penda, purchaſed a peace with a ſum of money; and, to engage him in a war with Northumberland, he offered to join him with all his forces. I have already related, how they were both ſlain in an engagement with Oſwy. He was ſucceeded by ETHELRICK. 654.

Adelwalt his brother, who died in 664, leaving his crown to ADELWALT. 655.

Aldulph his nephew, the ſon of Ethelrick, of whom we only know, that he was alive in 680, and aſſiſted at the council of Hatfield. His ſucceſſor was ALDULPH 664.

Alfwald, who died in 749, and was ſucceeded by ALFWALD.

Beorna and Ethelbert, who divided the kingdom *. Ethelbert dying before the year 758, Beorna reigned alone; but we know nothing more of him, but that he was ſucceeded by BEORNA and ETHELBERT.

Ethelred, who died about the year 790, leaving the crown to 749. ETHELRED.

Ethelbert, whom Offa, king of Mercia, put to death, in order to ſeize his kingdom; and, from this time, Eaſt-Anglia and Mercia were united into one kingdom. ETHELBERT.

* Tyrrel declares, he ſaw, in a chronicle of Mailroſs, a king, called Switheard, who reigned in 749. He might have ſucceeded Alfwald.

The hiſtory of the kingdom of ESSEX.

Kingdom of Eſſex.

THE kingdom of the Eaſt-Saxons was bounded, on the north, by Eaſt-Anglia; on the eaſt, by the German ocean; on the ſouth, by the Thames; and, on the weſt, by Mercia. Its greateſt length was 65 miles, and its greateſt breadth 38. It contained the counties of Eſſex and Middleſex, and part of Hertfordſhire. The chief cities were London and Colcheſter; the firſt of which became, at length, the metropolis of all England. It had been very conſiderable, on account of its ſituation in the time of the Romans; but, in all likelihood, it was reduced very low, after the arrival of the Saxons.

Hengiſt having extorted this country from Vortigern, after the maſſacre of the Britiſh lords, Erchenwin erected it into a kingdom. The hiſtorians have not given us an account of the founding of this kingdom, by the loſs of which Hengiſt's ſucceſſors were deprived of ſo large a tract of land as the kingdom of Kent. Had there been a monaſtery in the caſe, we ſhould have had all the particulars.

ERCHENWIN. 527. Erchenwin came to the crown in 527, and died in 587, after a reign of 60 years. He was ſucceeded by

SLEDDA. 587. Sledda his ſon. The year of his death is not known, but SABERT. Sabert or Saba his ſon reigned in 599. He was the firſt chriſtian king of Eſſex, being converted by the miniſtry of Mellitus and the ſollicitation of Ethelbert king of Kent, his uncle by the mother's ſide*. He was remarkable for his piety and zeal for chriſtianity. He died in 616, and was ſucceeded by

SAXRED, &c. 616. Saxred, Seward, and Sigebert his ſons, who, reigning jointly, unanimouſly turned apoſtates to the chriſtian religion, which they had profeſſed, during the life of their father. After a reign of ſeven years, raſhly engaging, on very unequal terms, with Cinigiſil and Quicelm kings of Weſſex, they were, all three, cut off, with their whole army. They had for their ſucceſſor

SIGEBERT the little. 623. Sigebert the little, the ſon of Seward, the very time of whoſe death his unknown; but he was ſucceeded by Sigebert the good, grandſon to a brother of pious king Sabert, who was on the throne in 653. He re-eſtabliſh'd chriſtianity in his dominions, from whence it had been expelled, ever ſince the death of Sabert, he was aſſiſted in this work by Cedd, a Northumberland prieſt, who was conſecrated biſhop of the Eaſt-Saxons. He was aſſaſſinated, in 655, by two counts his relations, who, having been excommunicated by Cedd, complain'd that the king, inſtead of avenging their quarrel, threw himſelf at the biſhop's feet, begging pardon for his having convers'd with them, ſince their excommunication. His ſucceſſor was SIGEBERT the good. 653.

SWITHELM. Swithelm his brother, who was ſucceeded by

SEBBA and SIGER. Sebba and Siger; the firſt was the ſon of Seward, and the other of Sigebert the little. Siger return'd to paganiſm; but Sebba ſtedfaſtly adhered to the chriſtian faith. They were both vaſſals to the king of Mercia, as has been related in the reign of Wulfer. Siger died in 683, and Sebba alone. 683. Sebba having reigned alone, about 11 years turned monk in 694, leaving the crown to

SIGHARD and SENOFRID. 694. Sighard and Senofrid his ſons, who, reigning together, in all probability, died much about the ſame time, towards the year 705. To them ſucceeded

OFFA. 705. Offa the ſon of Siger, who, with Cenred king of Mercia, was perſuaded, by Ciniſwintha, to embrace the monaſtick life, as has been already obſerved. Some ſay, Offa was ſucceeded by SEOLRED. 709. Seolred or Selred the ſon of Sigebert the good, who was ſlain, after a reign of 39 years, but by whom, or how, is not known. His ſucceſſor was SWITHRED. 749. Swithred his ſon, as ſome tell us. This is the laſt king, whoſe name is mention'd in the Saxon annals. He began his reign in 746; and, if he was alive, at the time of the diſſolution of the heptarchy, he muſt have reigned 78 years. Of all the ſeven kingdoms, the hiſtory of the kingdom of Eſſex is the moſt imperfect.

The hiſtory of the kingdom of KENT.

The kingdom of Kent.

THE kingdom of Kent, the firſt that was founded by the Saxons being neither large nor very conſiderable, made no figure in the heptarchy, after the reigns of Hengiſt and Ethelbert. It was very advantageouſly ſituated, having the ſea to the ſouth and eaſt, the Thames to the north, and the little kingdom of Suſſex to the weſt. Whilſt that continued, it ſerved, as a rampart, againſt the ambition of the kings of Weſſex; but, when it was ſubdued by the Weſt-Saxons, the kingdom of Kent lay dangerouſly

* Ricula, Ethelbert's ſiſter, was Sabert's mother.

expos'd to its powerful neighbours. The truth is, the awe the kings of Weſſex and Mercia ſtood in of each other, becauſe of the equality of their forces, prevented, for a long time, the little kingdom of Suſſex from becoming a prey to either of them. It was not above 60 miles in length and 30 in breadth. The principal towns were Dorobern or Canterbury the capital, Dover, Rocheſter, and ſome others not ſo large, but noted for their ſituation and harbours, as Sandwich, Deal, Folk-ſtone, Reculver, &c.

HENGIST 455. Hengiſt came into Great-Britain in 449, aſſumed the title of king in 455, and died in 488. He was ſucceeded by ESCUS. 488. Eſcus his ſon. As the Saxons, after Hengiſt's death, made Ella king of Suſſex their monarch, it is very probable, that Eſcus was not in ſo great eſteem as his father. We know nothing remarkable of his reign, tho' it laſted to the year 512. His ſucceſſor was

OCTA. 512. Octa his ſon, who ſuffer'd, or, at leaſt, could not prevent, the erecting of the counties of Eſſex and Middleſex, taken from him, into the kingdom of the Eaſt-Saxons. We meet with nothing elſe remarkable, during a reign of 22 years. To him ſucceeded

HERMENRICK. 534. Hermenrick, who reigned 30 years. Before his death, he made partner with him, in the government, his ſon and ſucceſſor

ETHELBERT. 568. Ethelbert, one of the moſt illuſtrious kings of the whole heptarchy; he was, particularly, famous for being the firſt chriſtian king of the kingdom of Kent.

This prince, being of an aſpiring genius, was extremely concern'd to find, that his predeceſſors had loſt the dignity of monarch, and the authority Hengiſt had over all the Saxons ſettled, in his time, in Great-Britain. Keaulin king of Weſſex, being now in poſſeſſion of the monarchy, he diſputed it with him, and 568. was twice defeated. Upon this, he lay quiet till the year 593, when he was join'd by all the other kings, who were diſpleas'd at Keaulin's becoming maſter of the kingdom of Suſſex; and Ethelbert, being appointed general, vanquiſh'd the king of Weſſex, who died ſoon after.

Ethelbert being elected monarch, not conſidering Keaulin's fall, occaſion'd by himſelf, exerciſed an abſolute power over all the kingdoms lying ſouth of the Humber, the Northumbrians alone being able to preſerve their liberty.

He was not only dreaded, on account of his uncommon accompliſhments; but alſo, as he was in alliance with France, by marrying Bertha, daughter to Cherebert king of Paris; and tho' the contempt with which Ethelbert treated the neighbouring princes, whom he had often defeated, render'd him formidable, yet had they ſtill a much greater reaſon to be alarm'd.

594. Upon the death of Crida king of Mercia, Ethelbert ſeized his kingdom, tho' he had left a ſon to ſucceed him; in this, treading exactly in the ſteps of Keaulin, tho' he himſelf had ſtirred up the other kings againſt that monarch, becauſe of his ambition. Thus, men, generally, condemn in others what they approve in themſelves. Ethelbert thought he had a right as monarch, or as a deſcendent from Hengiſt, to ſucceed all the thrones vacant in the heptarchy; for, when fortune ſmiles, it is eaſy for a man to find plauſible reaſons, to ſupport the moſt exorbitant pretenſions. However, the Saxon princes, alarmed at this open uſurpation, began to think of meaſures to reſtrain his power within due bounds. Ethelbert, apprehenſive that they would all enter into a confederacy againſt him, and treat him as they had done Keaulin, judg'd it neceſſary for him to prevent ſo great a danger. Accordingly, to make them eaſy, he reſtor'd the kingdom of Mercia to Wibba the ſon of Crida, reſerving, at the ſame time, ſuch an authority over him, as that he ſhould not undertake any thing, without his order or conſent. Pleas'd with this, they laid aſide all thoughts of a war, to which they were driven by mere neceſſity.

Nothing very material fell out in the remainder of Ethelbert's reign, except what related to religion, of which I ſhall ſpeak in the hiſtory of the church. He had two wives; Bertha of France his firſt, by whom he had Edbald who ſucceeded him, and Ethelburga who was married to Edwin king of Northumberland; but the name of his ſecond wife is unknown. He died in 616, after a reign of 52 years.

EDBALD. 616. Edbald, who was very unlike his father, as ſoon as he became his own maſter, turn'd heathen; and he is ſaid to have married the queen his mother-in-law. As his vices render'd him ſlothful and unactive, the other kings ſhook off the yoke they had ſubmitted to, during Ethelbert's life. The king of Mercia, in particular, having aſſerted his liberty, Edbald had neither the power nor reſolution to ſecure what the king, his father, imagin'd he had ſo firmly eſtabliſh'd. Perhaps, the hiſtorians are agreed to give this prince a very infamous character, to repreſent his converſion in a ſtronger light; but, however, they tell us, that, by the miniſtry of Laurentius, archbiſhop of Canterbury, he return'd to the profeſſion of chriſtianity, and ſpent the remainder of his life in conformity to the precepts of the goſpel. He left behind him two ſons, Ermenfred and Ercombert, the laſt of which ſucceeded him, and a daughter named Enſwith, who founded the abbey of Folk-ſtone.

ERCOMBERT. 640. Ercombert, tho' the youngeſt of Edbald's ſons, mounted the throne, to the prejudice of his elder brother; he order'd the pagan temples to be levell'd to the ground, and the idols to be broken in pieces, leſt they ſhould enſnare the people. Ermenfred being ſeized with a mortal diſtemper, Edbald promis'd him, that he would leave the crown, which properly was his right, to his children; but he was not punctual in the performance, and, perhaps, he had not time to perform it, as he died in the year 644. He left behind him two ſons, Egbert and Lothair, and two daughters; Ermenilda, the eldeſt, was married to Wulfer king of Mercia, and the other was a nun.

EGBERT. 664. Egbert, immediately after he came to the crown, took away the lives of Ercombert's two ſons, leſt they ſhould interrupt him in the poſſeſſion of the regal dignity. He preſented their ſiſter Domnena, with ſome lands in the iſle of Thanet, where ſhe founded a monaſtery; and he died in 673, leaving two ſons, Edrick and Widred, who did not directly ſucceed him, the crown being ſeized by LOTHAIR 673. Lothair their Uncle, who, to ſecure the ſucceſſion in his family, made his ſon Richard partner with him in the government, after a reign of 10 years, without interruption. This proceeding obliged Edrick to retire from court, and apply to Adelwalch, king of Suſſex, for aſſiſtance, who ſupplied him with an army; and, by this aid, entering Kent, he de-

685. feated Lothair, who died of the wounds he received in battle. Upon this, Edrick was crowned, without reſiſtance; and Richard fled into Germany, where Boniface, archbiſhop of Mentz, his countryman, gave him his ſiſter in marriage, getting him to be elected king of Swabia, as ſome writers inform us. I cannot account for his dying in Tuſcany, where his tomb is ſtill to be ſeen; and they call him king of England, whereas, at moſt, he was no more than king of Kent.

EDRICK. 685. Edrick reigned but two years; and, dying without iſſue, he left the crown to WIDRED, and SWABERT. 686. Widred his brother, who was obliged to make Swabert his partner. Upon Edrick's death, commotions aroſe, occaſion'd by the ambition of ſome of the grandees, who refuſed to acknowledge Widred for their king. In all likelihood, Swabert was one of the chief of the rebels, ſince he was admitted a partner in the government; and it is unknown, whether he belonged to the royal family.

687. In the reign of thoſe kings, Cedwalla king of the Weſt-Saxons, fancying that the inteſtine jars in Kent would render that kingdom an eaſy conqueſt, ſent an army thither, under Mollon his brother, who over-ran a great part of the country; but the two kings, at length, joining their forces, defeated him. Mollon, finding that he was cloſely purſued, took ſanctuary, with 12 others, in a houſe which they bravely defended; but, the Kentiſh ſoldiers ſetting it on fire, they all miſerably periſhed in the flames. Cedwalla ſpeedily revenged his brother's death, as he moſt tenderly loved him; for he enter'd Kent with a formidable army, and deſtroyed the whole country with fire and ſword. This invaſion reduced Kent ſo low, that it never, after this, made any figure in the heptarchy.

The two kings did not enjoy any quiet, till the year 691; which, perhaps, was the occaſion, that Bede placed the beginning of Widred's reign in this year, tho' he received the crown five years before. Swabert died in 695, and WIDRED alone. 695. Widred, remaining ſole king of Kent, reigned 12 years longer, and died in 725, leaving behind him three ſons, Ethelbert, Edbert, and Aldrick. He was ſucceeded by the two eldeſt, ETHELBERT. 748. Ethelbert and Edbert, who reigned jointly to the year 748, and then, Edbert dying, Ethelbert alone reigned 10 or 12 years, leaving his crown, after he had reigned, in all, 36 years, to ALDRICK 760. Aldrick his brother; he made his ſon Aldulph partner, who died before him. The neighbouring princes, ſeeing the weak condition of Kent, often attacked Aldrick; eſpecially, Offa king of Mercia, who, by a victory over him, brought him to the very brink of ruin. However, the other kings would not ſuffer Offa to be maſter of the kingdom; and he was, moreover, diverted from this war by the Welch, who invaded Mercia, as I have, above, related. Were it not for this, in all probability, he would have united Kent to Mercia.

Aldrick dying without iſſue, the race of Hengiſt became extinct. He was ſucceeded by EDBERT PREN. 794. Edbert, ſirnamed Pren. Cenulph, king of Mercia, taking advantage of his weakneſs, made devaſtations in every part of Kent; and, at length, having taken him priſoner, carried him into Mercia, where he order'd his eyes to be put out. After this, he gave the crown to 798.

CUDRED. 798. Cudred, who reigned 8 years, as his tributary and vaſſal. Upon his deceaſe, Cenulph permitted

BALRED. Baldred his ſon to ſucceed him, in whoſe reign the heptarchy was diſſolved, which began with the conqueſt of Kent by Egbert king of the Weſt-Saxons, as we ſhall learn hereafter.

The hiſtory of the kingdom of SUSSEX.

The kingdom of Suſſex.

THE kingdom of Suſſex was one of the moſt inconſiderable of the heptarchy; it contained only the two counties of Suſſex and Surrey, the moſt part of which conſiſted of the large foreſt of Andreds-wald, ſo term'd by the Saxons, from its Roman name, Anderida. As this foreſt was untouch'd, when Ella ſubdued Suſſex, we may ſuppoſe that it was ſtubb'd up by degrees. This kingdom was not above 50 miles long and 40 broad; it was bounded, on the north, by the Thames; on the ſouth, by the ſea; on the eaſt, by the kingdom of Kent; and, on the weſt, by Weſſex. Chicheſter was the capital city, built by by Ciſſa the ſecond king of Suſſex; he built alſo Ciſsbury, the ruins of which are ſtill to be ſeen.

Ella. 491. Ella came into Britain in 476, and was crown'd king of Suſſex in 491. Such was his reputation among the Saxons, that they elected him to ſucceed Hengiſt, as their monarch. He met with ſome difficulties, from the oppoſition of Arthur, who was a general of great valour and conduct; but, however, he ſettled, at length, in that part of the iſland where he firſt landed, and founded there the kingdom of Suſſex or of the South-Saxons. I have already given a large account of Baldulph and Golgrin his ſon, who were ſlain at the battle of Badon. Ella, dying in 514, left the crown to his only ſurviving ſon, Ciſſa. 514. Ciſſa, who was remarkable for nothing, except his great age and a long reign of 76 years. If we ſuppoſe him but a year or two old, when his father brought him over in 476, he muſt have been 115 or 116 years of age, when he died in 590; but it is very improbable, that Ella ſhould bring over with him a child ſo young.

590. Ciſſa dying without an heir, Keaulin, king of Weſſex and monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, took poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Suſſex, which occaſioned the league the other princes enter'd into againſt him; but, tho' Keaulin was defeated, Ceolrick, his nephew, and ſucceſſor, remained maſter of Suſſex.

From this time, the South-Saxons made ſeveral attempts to ſhake off the yoke of the kings of Weſſex. In 607, they revolted againſt Cleolulph, but were reduced to obedience; and, in 648, in another ſtruggle, they had the ſame ill ſucceſs. Cenowalch, king of Weſſex, continuing in Eaſt-Anglia, and Penda, king of Mercia, being maſter of Weſſex, the South-Saxons plac'd on the throne

Adelwalch. 684. Adelwalch, whom Cenowalch was not in a condition to dethrone, on the account of Penda's invaſion, who had ſeized on his kingdom, and kept poſſeſſion of it for three years.

685. However, Wulfer king of Mercia, having attack'd Cenowalch and vanquiſh'd him in ſeveral encounters, penetrated as far as Suſſex; where, having defeated Adelwalch, he took him priſoner, and ſubdued his kingdom, with the iſle of Wight. Adelwalch having embraced chriſtianity, during his impriſonment, Wulfer enlarged him, making him a preſent of the iſle of Wight.

It is highly probable, that Adelwalch, after Wulfer's death, recover'd the kingdom of Suſſex, ſince the Saxon annals aſſure us, that he was on the throne in 686.

The ſame year, Cedwalla, a Weſt-Saxon prince, being forced from his own country, enter'd Suſſex with an army; and Adelwalch, attempting to expel him, was ſlain in battle. 686.

Upon this, Cedwalla reſolved to make himſelf maſter of Suſſex; but he was oppoſed by Authun and Berthun, who were return'd with an army from an expedition againſt Kent. At the ſame time, Cedwalla, hearing of the death of the king of Weſſex, who had obliged him to quit his dominions, return'd home, and was made king of the Weſt-Saxons. In the interim, Authun and Berthun were crowned kings of Suſſex. Some authors ſay, that they were Adelwalch's ſons; and others tell us, they were only his generals. Cedwalla, making war againſt them, they were defeated; and Berthun was ſlain in battle. Authun and Berthun. 688.

In all likelihood, Authun, ſtill enjoying the crown, was a vaſſal to the king of Weſſex, who, upon Authun's death, would not permit the vacant throne to be filled. Authun alone.

The South-Saxons made ſeveral efforts to recover their liberty, and they took up arms in the year 722; but, failing in their meaſures, Ina, king of Weſſex, reduced them to obedience. 722.

Three years after, taking the advantage of ſome troubles in Weſſex, they placed Albert on the throne; but Ina, having vanquiſh'd and ſlain this new king, united their kingdom to his own. 725.

However, in 754, Sigebert being then king of Weſſex, who was afterwards depos'd, they revolted again, chuſing Oſmond for their king; but, in all probability, Cenulph, Sibert's ſucceſſor, brought them back to their former ſubjection. After this, it does not appear that they made any attempts to recover their liberty, their country being, from this time, always conſider'd as a province of Weſſex. 754.

The hiſtory of the kingdom of WESSEX.

The kingdom of Weſſex.

THere were in the heptarchy three kingdoms, two of Angles, viz. Northumberland and Mercia, and one of the Saxons and Juttes, namely, Weſſex, which were vaſtly ſuperior to the others, in grandeur and power. Weſſex lay ſouth of the Thames, being about 70 miles broad, from the Thames to the Britiſh channel, and 150 long, from the frontiers of Suſſex to the river Tamer, which parted it from Cornwall. The chief cities were Winchester the capital, Southampton, Portſmouth, Salisbury, Dorcheſter, Sherborne, and Exeter, where a great number of Britons were intermix'd with the Saxons; the iſle of Wight alſo, inhabited by Juttes, was ſubject to the king of Weſſex.

The kingdom of Weſſex or of the Weſt-Saxons was ſo named, becauſe it lay weſt of Suſſex, Kent, and Eſſex. This kingdom was very conſiderable, not only for its extent, but its its ſituation alſo, being ſecured, on the north, by the Thames, and, on the ſouth, by the ſea; on the eaſt, it was bounded by the little kingdom of Suſſex, and, on the weſt, by the Britons of Cornwall, who were ſo divided from their countrymen the Welch, by the mouth of the Severn, that it was ſcarce poſſible for them to give each other any aſſiſtance.

CRIDA. 519. Crida arrived in Britain in 495. He was, firſt, crowned king of the Weſt-Saxons in 519, upon Arthur's ſurrender of the two counties of Hampſhire and Somerſetſhire, the whole then of his kingdom. He was crowned, a ſecond time, at Wincheſter in 532 or 533, upon the delivery of Berkſhire, Wiltſhire, Devonſhire, and Dorſetſhire by Modred. He, dying in 534, left the crown to KENRICK 534. Kenrick his ſon, who, whilſt his father lived, was famous for his valour and conduct; but, being on the throne, he preferred a peaceable and quiet life to the noiſe and hurry of arms. He did nothing remarkable, during his reign, except his defeating the Britons, who attacked him in 552. He died in 560, and was ſucceeded by KEAULIN 560. Keaulin his eldeſt ſon, who being choſen monarch alſo, upon his father's deceaſe, exceedingly enlarged the prerogatives of that dignity. Having obliged the neighbouring princes to ſubmit to his authority, by his ſeizing on the kingdom of Suſſex, after Ciſſa's death, he gave them occaſion to fear, that he deſigned to reduce all England into one kingdom. To ſecure Suſſex, he kept his court at Chicheſter, leaving the government of Weſſex to Ceolrick his nephew, whom he 592. deſigned for his ſucceſſor. All the other kings, and even Ceolrick himſelf, entered into a league againſt him, on the account of his ambition; and, being vanquiſhed by the king of Kent, who commanded the confederate army, Keaulin was forced to retire into ſome unknown corner, where he died ſoon after. His wars with the Britons and Aidan king of Scotland I have already related.

CEOLRICK. 594. Ceolrick, who ſucceeded his uncle, did nothing remarkable. He died in 598, and had for his ſucceſſor

CLEOLWULPH. 598. Cleolwulph his brother, who, in 607, reduced to their allegiance the South-Saxons, who had revolted. He died in 611, being ſucceeded by

CINIGISIL. 611. Cinigiſil his nephew, the ſon of Ceolrick, who, a year after he was crowned, made

QUICELM 612. Quicelm his brother his partner in the government, or rather divided the kingdom between them. The two brothers obtained, in

614. 614, a ſignal victory over the Britons. I have, above, given an account of Quicelm's wars with Edwin king of Northumberland; and I ſhall have occaſion to take farther notice of him, in the hiſtory of the church. He em-

635. braced the chriſtian faith, a little before his death, which happened in 636.

Cinigiſil alone. 636. Cinigiſil, who was converted to chriſtianity, before his brother, in 635, reigned alone till his death. He left the crown to CENOWALCH. Cenowalch his ſon, whoſe reign was exceedingly perplexed with war by the kings of 643. Mercia. Penda, whoſe ſiſter he had married and divorced, ſuddenly attacking him, forced 645. him to abandon his kingdom, and fly for protection to Annas king of the Eaſt-Angles, 646. where he continued, the three years that Penda was poſſeſſed of Weſſex. Cenowalch turned chriſtian in Eaſt-Anglia, and, at laſt, 648. was, by the aſſiſtance of Annas, reſtored to his kingdom.

In 652, he ſignally defeated the Welch; 652. he obtained another victory over them in 658.

Some years after, he was engaged in a war 661. with Wulfer, Penda's ſucceſſor; but we know neither the occaſion nor the ſucceſs of it. Some ſay, Wulfer was vanquiſhed and taken priſoner; whilſt others tell us, he was victorious, which I take to be the moſt probable opinion. It is evident, that Wulfer ſubdued Suſſex and the iſle of Wight, which he could not have effected, if Cenowalch had been able to oppoſe him. However, Cenowalch, dying in 662, left his crown to SEXBURGE. 627. Sexburge his wife, a princeſs of great valour, of an exalted and extenſive genius, having all the qualifications neceſſary for a queen. She reigned but one year, and then died, according to ſome; but others ſay, ſhe was depoſed by the Weſt-Saxons, who thought it a diſhonour to be governed by a woman.

After her death or expulſion, the kingdom was divided among ſeveral of the grandees, of whom Cenfus, a prince of the blood-royal, and ſprung from Cerdick, was the chief. We are at a loſs about the particulars, relating to the cantoning out the kingdom; which, however, was united again into one body, after theſe petty tyrants were either dead or expelled.

CENFUS. 674. Cenfus, in 674, made his ſon Eſcwin partner with him, and, in all likelihood, was obliged to let Centwin, brother to the late king Cenowalch, reign alſo in ſome part of the kingdom.

The year enſuing, Wulfer attack'd the kings of Weſſex, whoſe army was under the command of Eſcwin; and a bloody battle was fought, in which Wulfer had the advantage, tho' the loſs, on both ſides, was very conſiderable.

Cenfus died two years after, and Eſcwin his ſon did not long ſurvive him; ſo that Centwin became ſole king of Weſſex.

CENTWIN alone. 676. Centwin, in 628, gaining a ſignal victory over the Welch, Cadwalladar, their king, was forced to apply to the king of Armorica for aſſiſtance. Cadwalladar afterwards took a journey to Rome, where he died.

Towards the end of this reign, Cedwalla, a prince of the royal family of Weſſex, became ſo popular, that Centwin, being jealous of him, order'd him to depart the kingdom. Cedwalla retir'd into Suſſex; and, as he was well beloved, a great number of young perſons attended him, reſolved to follow his fortunes. Adelwalch, then king of Suſſex, incenſed at Cedwalla's entering his kingdom, with a ſort of an army, without his leave, leave, would have forced him thence, but was ſlain in the attempt. Upon this, Cedwalla would have ſeized the kingdom; but Authun and Berthun prevented him, as I have, above, related. In the mean time, Centwin dying, Cedwalla, returning to Weſſex, received the crown.

CEDWALLA. 685. Cedwalla was alſo monarch of the Anglo-Saxons; and his firſt war was againſt Authun and Berthun.

He turned his arms, next, againſt Kent, carrying off a conſiderable booty. Then he attacked the iſle of Wight, which, from the time of Wulfer's giving it to Adelwalch, had belonged to the king of Suſſex. Arwald Authun's brother, being governor of the iſle, undertook to defend it; but, Cedwalla's forces being vaſtly ſuperior to his, in number, he was obliged, at laſt, to abandon the iſle to the mercy of the conqueror. As the inhabitants were all idolaters, Cedwalla, from a falſe zeal for religion, reſolved to extirpate them, and people the place with chriſtians; and he would have executed his cruel deſign, had not Wilfrid, formerly biſhop of York, and then biſhop of Selſey in Suſſex, repreſented to him, that it would be much better for him to attempt their converſion. Cedwalla, upon this, was diverted from his inhuman purpoſe, but on condition that they would all immediately receive baptiſm. The miſerable inhabitants, who had no leiſure for deliberation, embraced chriſtianity, at the firſt preaching of Birwin a prieſt, Wilfrid's nephew, who was employed to convert them, if the bare declaration of people, extorted by the fear of death, may be called by that name.

687. Some time after, Cedwalla ſent his brother Mollon, with an army, into Kent, an account of which I have already given, in the hiſtory of that kingdom.

In 688, Cedwalla went to Rome, to be baptized by the pope; for, tho' he was a great zealot for the chriſtian faith, he had not, hitherto, received baptiſm. As he paſs'd thro' France and Lombardy, he was in all places treated with honour and reſpect; and Cunibert, king of the Lombards, in particular, entertained him in a noble and grand manner. When he came to Rome, he was baptized by
688. pope Sergius II. by the name of Peter. He had, all along, wiſhed to die ſoon after his baptiſm; and, accordingly, he died a few weeks after it at Rome. He was buried in St. Peter's church, where a magnificent tomb was erected to his memory, with an epitaph ſhewing his name, quality, age, and the time of his death *. He left behind him two ſons, which he had by Cendrith his queen; but, on the account of their minority, they did not ſucceed him. Ina his relation received the crown.

INA. 888. Ina was one of the moſt renowned and illuſtrious kings, that reigned in England, during the heptarchy; and, the very firſt year of his reign, he was declared monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, in a general aſſembly, wherein Sebba, king of Eſſex, ſerved him effectually.

Ina's wars with the Britons in Cornwall, the kings of Kent, the South-Saxons, and the king of Mercia rendered him ſtill more famous; but, as the hiſtorians have only told us the ſucceſs, with out letting us into the motives of theſe wars, we cannot be very particular, in our account of them. They inform us, that in Kent they were forced to purchaſe 694.
a peace with a ſum of money; that, in 710, he ſubdued part of Cornwall; that, in 715, Ina and Ceolred fought a bloody battle at Wodensburg in Wiltſhire, where the loſs was equal on both ſides; and, that, laſtly, he reduced the South-Saxons to their allegiance, 722.
and placed one Albert on the throne.

Theſe exploits procured Ina a great reputation for war; but the panegyricks, beſtowed on him by the hiſtorians, were chiefly owing to the four following particulars. (1.) He rebuilt Glaſſenbury monaſtery, vaſtly augmenting its privileges and revenues. (2.) He publiſhed a body of laws, entitled Weſt-Saxon Leaga, i. e. laws of the Weſt-Saxons, which ſerved for a pattern to Alfred the great, his ſucceſſor. (3.) He quitted his crown and embraced the monaſtick life, which was, in thoſe days, taken to be an undoubted mark of religion. This he did, by the perſuaſion of Ethelburga his queen, who often repreſented to him the examples of the kings his predeceſſors, who had turned monks, and, on that account, were honoured as ſaints. (4.) Which moſt of all redounded to his fame: When at Rome, after he had conferred with pope Gregory II. about it, he built a large college, 727. for the education of the Engliſh eccleſiaſticks that ſhould come to ſtudy at Rome, and for the reception and entertainment of ſuch Engliſh kings and princes, as ſhould, hereafter, make a viſit to the tombs of the apoſtles. Cloſe to the college, he built alſo a ſtately church, appointing a certain number of prieſts to officiate in it. Beſides the charge of thoſe ſtructures, the ornaments of the church, and the neceſſaries of the college, there was an abſolute occaſion for a ſtanding fund for their ſupport, according to the intent of the founder. With this view, Ina laid the tax of a penny, called Romeſcot, on every family in the kingdoms of Weſſex and Suſſex; and, ſome time after, Offa, king of Mercia, laid the ſame tax on the kingdoms of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia, terming it Peter-pence. Some ſay, Ina returned to England, to have this tax ſettled by the general aſſembly or parliament of Weſſex, and to get the charter ſigned by all the nobility of the kingdom; and that, having done this, he went back again to Rome, where he took up the monkiſh habit. Ethelburga, who adviſed him to it, became a nun herſelf, putting on the veil in the monaſtery of Barking.

* Hic depoſitus Cedwalla, qui & Petrus, rex Saxonum. Sub xii. cal. Maij indictione ſecunda qui vixit annos plus minus triginta, imperante domino Juſtiniano piiſſimo Auguſto, anno ejus conſulatus quarto, pontificante apoſtolico viro Sergio papa ſecundo.

Malmsbury is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Ina was 62 years on the throne of Weſſex, ſince it is evident he reigned but 37, or, at moſt, but 39 years, when he reſigned his crown to Adelard his couſin.

ADELARD 717. Tho' Adelard was placed on the throne, with the conſent of the aſſembly-general, Oſmond, one of the royal family, diſputed his right. Their quarrel was decided by a battle, wherein the king defeated his rival, whoſe death, which happened ſoon after, reſtored peace and tranquillity to the kingdom. Adelard died in 740, and had for his ſucceſſor CUDRED. 740. Cudred his brother or couſin, of whom we have the following account.

743. In 743, he obtained a remarkable victory over the Corniſhmen. Two years after, Ethelun, a Weſt-Saxon lord, fomented a ſedition among the ſoldiers, in which Kenrick, the ſon of Cudred, was ſlain. This was followed by a civil war, which laſted for ſome time.

750. Ethelun, heading the rebels, ventured to give his ſovereign battle, wherein the king, tho' with great difficulty, was victorious. During the engagement, Ethelun gave ſuch convincing proofs of his courage and conduct, that the king was pleaſed to receive him into favour.

752. It was the ſame Ethelun, that, in 752, vanquiſhed Ethelbald king of Mercia, in a battle taken notice of in the hiſtory of that kingdom.

753. Cudred, turning his troops againſt the Britons of Cornwall, ſubdued part of their country, which he united to Weſſex. He, dying a little after, left his crown to SIGEBERT. 754. Sigebert his nephew, who, by his vices and cruelties, occaſioned the hatred and contempt of his ſubjects. A certain count, having expoſtulated with him about his conduct, was put to death in his preſence. Upon this, the Weſt-Saxons, loſing all patience, publickly depoſed him, and placed Cenulph, the ſon of Adelard, on the throne. Sigebert was forced to acquieſce in the ſentence of the ſtates, retiring to a foreſt, where he was killed by a ſwineherd.

CENULPH 754. Cenulph was very famous, for his many victories over the Britons.

After a reign of 30 years, he was jealous of Cunehard, Sigebert's brother, and, perhaps, not without reaſon. Cunehard, finding that the king was reſolved to diſpatch him, determined to prevent his deſign. Viewing, him, therefore, one day, as he went alone to viſit a certain lady his ſpecial favourite, he purſued him, with ſome of his friends, into the houſe and attacked him. Cenulph defended himſelf bravely, and even wounded his enemy; but, at laſt, being overpowered with numbers, died of his wounds. The king's officers and domeſticks ruſhing in at the noiſe, and finding him dead, ſlew Cunehard, deſpiſing the vaſt offers he made them, if they would ſpare his life and place him on the throne. Brithrick, Cenulph's ſon, ſucceeded his father.

BRITHRICK. Brithrick, three years after he received the crown, married Edburga, the daughter of Offa king of Mercia, and, about the ſame time, baniſhed Egbert. Egbert, who was a prince of the blood-royal, by his noble qualities, had ſo captivated the affections of the Weſt-Saxons, that the king, for his own quiet, ſent him out of the way. Egbert repaired, at firſt, to the court of Offa king of Mercia; but Offa was unwilling to affront Brithrick, his ſon-in-law, by harbouring a prince whom he deteſted. Upon this, Egbert went to France, where he was very honourably received by Charles the great. During his reſidence at this court, for 12 years, he made great improvement in his natural abilities, being rendered capable of carrying on his grand deſign of uniting the ſeven kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons into one monarchy, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. 784. 787.

During Brithrick's reign, the Danes, firſt, invaded the kingdom of Weſſex, being, at this time, dreaded not only at ſea, but on the coaſts of ſeveral European kingdoms. As the Engliſh ſuſtained incredible damage by them, it is no wonder, that the hiſtorians have exactly noted the time of their firſt deſcent upon England.

Brithrick, in 799, being poiſon'd by Edburga his wife, the Weſt-Saxons ſo reſented this action, that, before they choſe a new king, they made a law, prohibiting the wives of their future kings from aſſuming the title of queens, or ſitting on the throne with their husbands; and, leſt the complaiſance of the kings to their wives ſhould occaſion the violation of this law, it was farther enacted, that, if any king, hereafter, ſhould diſpenſe with the obſervance of it, he ſhould be, ipſo facto, deprived of his regal dignity, and his ſubjects be abſolved from their oaths of allegiance. 799. or, 800.

Upon this, ambaſſadors were ſent by the Weſt-Saxons to Egbert, to offer him the crown. Egbert was then at Rome with Charles the great, who was inveſted there, ſoon after, with the imperial crown. Here he took his leave of that great prince, who had been a father to him, and, at his departure, gave him freſh proofs of his affection.

Queen Edburga fled alſo, for protection, to Charles the great, who, becauſe of the friendſhip between him and her father Offa, gave her a rich abbey, where ſhe might have quietly ſpent the remainder of her days; but, that way of life not agreeing with her conſtitution, being detected of an amour with a young Engliſh gentleman, the emperor was obliged to diſcard her. After ſhe had wander'd about, for ſome time, ſhe, at laſt, died at Pavia in great want and miſery.

EGBERT. 800. Egbert, beſides the valour which was natural to all the Saxon princes, excelled all the other kings, his cotemporaries, in his vaſt knowledge in politicks, acquir'd during his reſidence at the court of Charles the great. He no ſooner received the crown of Weſſex, than he was reſolved to make the beſt uſe of this advantage; but, like a skilful politician, the more effectually to accompliſh his deſigns, he judged it neceſſary to proceed leiſurely and with with deliberation, He, therefore, employ'd the firſt ſeven years of his reign, in gaining the affection and eſteem of his own ſubjects, in which he was as ſucceſsful as he could have wiſh'd.

The kingdom of Weſſex being bounded, on the ſouth, by the ſea, and, on the north by the Thames, it was very natural for Egbert to enlarge his bounds, either eaſtward or weſtward. To the eaſt, lay the kingdom of Kent, which would have been very convenient for him, were it not, at that time, ſubject to Cenulph king of Mercia, a prince of uncommon worth and monarch of the Anglo-Saxons. Waiting, therefore, for a more favourable juncture, Egbert turn'd his arms, firſt, weſtward, againſt the Britons of Cornwall; and with ſuch ſucceſs, that, in a war commenced in 809, in a ſingle campaign, he 809. reduced all Cornwall to obedience.
810. The Welch having deſigned to aſſiſt their countrymen in Cornwall, Egbert made this a handle to attack them the following year. He frequently defeated them, and, at laſt, ſubdued the kingdom of Venedotia *, one of
* In Britiſh Gwenydh. the three into which Wales was then divided; and, the more the Welch attempted to 811. ſhake off their yoke, it became ſo much the
812. heavier; for Egbert, returning again, deſtroy-
813. ed all before him with fire and ſword, which made them cautious, how they provok'd him to come, a third time, among them.

819. At length, Cenulph's death gave Egbert occaſion to think of putting his deſigns in execution. He was immediately elected monarch, to which dignity he had the faireſt pretenſions; his kingdom was in a flouriſhing ſtate, whilſt the others were weaken'd by inteſtine diviſions; and the heptarchy was reduced to five kingdoms, of which his was the chief. In the reſt, the race of their antient kings being extinct, there were perpetual jars and animoſities among the grandees, who all imagined they had a right to aſpire to the crown; and, therefore, they regarded nothing but their own private intereſts, as they were always forming parties and cabals to promote them. On the other hand, the kingdom of Weſſex daily increas'd in power, by the wiſe adminiſtration of the king, whoſe valour was equal to his judgment and ſagacity in the moſt refined politicks. Moſt of the preceding monarchs, as well as Egbert, had projected the reduction of the heptarchy into one kingdom, and their deſign proved abortive, merely, becauſe it was not well-tim'd; but every circumſtance was favourable to the king of Weſſex. Northumberland had, long ago, been torn in pieces by two factions, who, not minding what was tranſacted abroad, were attentive only, how they might ſupplant each other. Mercia was in the ſame condition. Bernulph, who had depos'd Ceolwulph, reigned only by the ſupport of a powerful party, who had placed him on the throne, but could ſcarce ſecure it to him, ſo great was the diſcontent and envy of the nobility; and, on this account, tho' that kingdom was enlarg'd by the acquiſition of Eaſt-Anglia, and Kent was dependent on it, yet it was vaſtly inferior, in power, to that of Weſſex. The Eaſt-Angles, not being thoroughly inur'd to the Mercian yoke, wanted only a proper opportunity to throw it off; and the wars, the kings of Kent were engaged in againſt the Weſt-Saxons and Mercians, had reduced them ſo low, that they became tributary to the Mercians, and were, therefore, unable to ſtand againſt Egbert. As for Eſſex, there is reaſon to preſume, that it was ſubject to Mercia, and it had been, for many years, very inconſiderable; beſides, if Smithred was ſtill on the throne of Eſſex, which is uncertain, he muſt have been of an extreme old age.

Theſe conſiderations inflamed Egbert's ambition, who began his preparations; and the king of Mercia, jealous of him, determin'd immediately to provide for his own ſecurity. Tho' he did not apprehend that Egbert had the conqueſt of all England in his view; yet he was perſuaded, that he deſigned to enlarge his dominions, at the expence of his neighbours; and, dreading the impending ſtorm, he judg'd it adviſable to attack Egbert, before he was in readineſs, expecting that, by this means, he ſhould diſconcert his meaſures. To this end, he marched his army as far as Ellandunum or Wilton near Salisbury, where he met the enemy, whom he thought to have ſurprized. The two armies coming to an engagement, the Mercians were entirely routed, with ſo great loſs, that Bernulph could never afterwards retrieve it.

This victory was of vaſt conſequence to Egbert; firſt, as it exceedingly weaken'd the king of Mercia, who alone was able to oppoſe him; and, ſecondly, as it pav'd the way for the conqueſt of Kent, to which Bernulph, by attacking him firſt, had given a handle. This conqueſt was abſolutely neceſſary, in order to his becoming maſter of all the country between the Thames and the ſea; and, beſides, by beginning with Kent, he was in no danger of alarming the Northumbrians, who were too far diſtant to be much concerned about what was tranſacted, ſouth of the Thames.

Egbert, therefore, ſent Ethelwolph his ſon with a powerful army into Kent. Baldred, not prepared againſt an invaſion, to no purpoſe, intreated the king of Mercia to aſſiſt him. Bernulph's late defeat render'd him incapable of bringing an army, ſo ſoon after it into the field. Beſides, Egbert was ſo advantageouſly poſted, that he could not ſend any ſuccours into Kent, without marching them through the very heart of his army; which he not being in a condition to attempt, Baldred was forced to bear the burthen of the war alone. However, he hazarded a battle; but, being defeated, he retir'd into Mercia, abandoning his kingdom to Ethelwolph, who ſoon ſubdued it. Thus, the kingdom of Kent was united to thoſe of Weſſex and Suſſex, and Egbert got poſſeſſion of the whole country lying ſouth of the Thames.

• After this, he made a conqueſt of Eſſex; but the hiſtorians have not given us one particular concerning it, ſo defective is the hiſtory ſtory of that kingdom. Tho' the ſubduing theſe two kingdoms was a great ſtep towards the conqueſt of the reſt; yet he found the conqueſt of Northumberland, Mercia, and Eaſt-Anglia to be the moſt difficult task. Had theſe three kingdoms been in their former ſplendor, each of them, ſingly, would have been a match for Egbert; or, had they enter'd into a ſtrict alliance, for their common defence, they might, perhaps, have made him deſpair of ſubduing them; but their inteſtine diſcords prevented ſuch a neceſſary union. The Eaſt-Angles only waited for an opportunity to revolt againſt the king of Mercia. The Northumbrians had, for ſome time, lived in a ſort of anarchy, ſo that they were intent upon nothing elſe but the ruin of one another, in which they had only too much ſucceſs. Mercia, indeed, ſeem'd ſtill to have ſufficient power; but they were divided among themſelves, as well as the Northumbrians, and the battle of Ellandunum had conſiderably weaken'd them; whereas the ſtrength of Weſſex was increaſed, by the conqueſt of two kingdoms.

Egbert, pleas'd to find all things conſpire, in favour of his deſigns, firſt, invaded Mercia, evidently foreſeeing, that the conqueſt of the others would naturally follow the ſubduing that kingdom. Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia made but one body, ever ſince Offa had united them; but, as this union was not cemented by the mutual affection of both nations, it was rather deſtructive than advantageous to the ſtate. The Eaſt-Anglians conſider'd the Mercians, as their deteſtable maſters; whilſt they, on the contrary, treated the Eaſt-Angles, as their ſlaves and vaſſals. This being the caſe, it was much eaſier for Egbert to foment their inteſtine animoſities, than for them to reap the benefit of their union. Egbert, therefore, exerted all his art and skill to widen their diviſions, being confident, that, could he once bring them to an open rupture, they would render themſelves incapable of reſiſting him, for the future. It is very ſurprizing, ſince this maxim, We muſt divide thoſe whom we would deſtroy, is ſo very notorious, that the truth of it ſhould be ſo little conſider'd by thoſe, againſt whom it is put in practice. The Eaſt-Angles, extremely deſirous of ſhaking off the Mercian yoke, blindly fell in with the advice Egbert ſecretly gave them, viz. to take up arms, for the recovery of their freedom. As they conſulted only their intereſt, for the preſent, they did not reflect, that, when they had ſerved Egbert's turn, they would be leſs able to defend themſelves againſt him, than againſt the Mercians. Egbert, indeed, pretended that he had nothing but their intereſt in view; and he laid before them the moſt plauſible motives, to excite them to a revolt. He repreſented to them, by his emiſſaries, that they could never have a fairer opportunity for regaining their liberty; that the Mercians were ſo weaken'd, by their defeat at Ellandunum, that they were in no condition to tyrannize any longer over the Eaſt-Angles; that he himſelf was ſo incenſed againſt Bernulph, that he would not fail to aſſiſt them, having made publick declarations to this purpoſe. This was ſufficient to work upon the Eaſt-Angles; for the pleaſing proſpect, of being freed from the Mercians, baniſh'd from their thoughts the fear of becoming ſubject to the Weſt-Saxons. Thus reſolved, they took up arms; but Bernulph, alarmed at their proceedings, attempted, with all expedition, to checque an evil he apprehended to be of dangerous conſequence. With the very firſt troops he could muſter together, he marched againſt them; but, inſtead of chaſtiſing them, he was defeated and ſlain.

The Eaſt-Angles were exceedingly animated by this auſpicious beginning. However, the Mercians, not at all diſcouraged, immediately elected a king, named Ludican, who was intent upon carrying on the war; whilſt the Eaſt-Angles were making preparations to receive him, expecting that the king of Weſſex would aſſiſt them, as occaſion offered, according to his promiſe. Ludican actually entered Eaſt-Anglia, with a powerful army; but death prevented him from making any progreſs. Some affirm, he was ſlain in battle; and others ſay, that the Eaſt-Angles, dreading him, found the means to have him aſſaſſinated.

Whether the Mercians diſcovered, that Egbert privately aſſiſted the Eaſt-Angles, or whether that prince's conqueſts had opened their eyes, they became ſenſible, at length, that the maintaining their authority over Eaſt-Anglia was not ſo much the buſineſs of the preſent war, as the preſervation of their liberties. Reſolving, therefore, to exert their utmoſt, they choſe for their king Witglaph, a lord of ſingular merit, whoſe ſon had married a daughter of king Cenulph. If this prince had been engaged with the Eaſt-Anglians only, in all probability, he would have ſpeedily put an end to the war; but, as things ſtood, he was ſo far from being able to reduce Eaſt-Anglia, that the defence of his own dominions ſufficiently employed him. Egbert, fearing the election of a king, of known valour, would give a new turn to affairs, openly declared for the Eaſt-Anglians. He had hitherto aſſiſted them only underhand, at leaſt, he had not made himſelf a party in the war; but, now, he publickly declared war againſt the Mercians. Witglaph did all that was poſſible to withſtand the united forces of the Eaſt-Angles and Weſt-Saxons, frequently trying his fortune in little skirmiſhes and encounters, but always with ill ſucceſs. At laſt, being defeated in a great battle, and finding his condition deſperate, he fled to the abbey of Croyland, where he lay concealed three months. Egbert, purſuing his victory, ſubdued Mercia, without any farther reſiſtance. He deſigned to have united it to his other dominions; but, by the mediation of Siward abbot of Croyland, Witglaph was reſtored to his kingdom, upon his paying homage and becoming tributary to the conqueror.

The Eaſt-Angles alſo, tho' they had been ſo ſubſervient to Egbert's deſigns, were glad to be received into his protection, on almoſt the ſame terms with the Mercians, gaining no more by this war, than the change of one maſter for another.

Northumberland alone remained unconquered; but that kingdom was not in a condition to hold out long againſt the king of Weſſex. Andred, who was then on the throne, was no more than a titular king, his faction having raiſed him, not that he, but that they, through him, might reign. Beſides, Northumberland was continually diſtracted by parties; and the Scots, who often invaded it, had over-run a great part of the kingdom. Accordingly, no ſooner did Egbert approach with an army, that had already ſubdued four kingdoms, than Andred and the Northumbrians, in a great conſternation, ſubmitted themſelves, on the terms granted to the Mercians and the Eaſt-Anglians.

Thus, ended the heptarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, all the ſeven kingdoms being reduced under the dominion of the king of Weſſex. Indeed, Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland preſerved ſtill the ſhadow of liberty; but it is highly probable, that Egbert would not have ſuffer'd other kings to be choſen, after the death of thoſe then reigning, if the Danes, who ſoon after began their invaſions, would have allowed him leiſure to take other meaſures.

The heptarchy, from the founding of Mercia, the laſt of the ſeven kingdoms, continued 243 years; but, if we date it from Hengiſt's arrival, it laſted 378.

The cauſes of its diſſolution are very obvious. One of the principal reaſons was, the vaſt inequality among the ſeven kingdoms, three of which exceedingly ſurpaſs'd the others, in extent and power. Scarce was the heptarchy founded, before the kings of Weſſex look'd upon Suſſex and Kent as extremely convenient for them; and the kings of Mercia were continually intent upon the kingdom of Eſſex. Nay, it appears the Mercians were maſters of it for ſome time; and, in all probability, it was entirely free, when Egbert, ſubdued, and united it to his other dominions. Eaſt-Anglia was, all along, coveted by the Mercians and Northumbrians, and the former, at length, made a conqueſt of it. Another reaſon of the diſſolution of the heptarchy was, the default of male-heirs in the royal-families of all the kingdoms, Weſſex excepted; for, from this cauſe, proceeded thoſe frequent diſſentions among the grandees, which very much weakened their reſpective ſtates. To this may be added, as another reaſon, the concurrence of ſo many various circumſtances, which never happen'd, but in the reign of Egbert; but we muſt chiefly aſcribe this great revolution to the providence of God, who was pleas'd to raiſe England by degrees, and, after ſeveral changes, to that height of grandeur and power it is at preſent poſſeſs'd of.

I come, now, to treat of the converſion of the Anglo-Saxons to the chriſtian faith, and give an account of the church of England, in her primitive ſtate, the principal part of the Engliſh hiſtory, during the heptarchy.

The ſtate of the church of England, from the converſion of the Engliſh, to the diſſolution of the heptarchy.

IN order to have a clear knowledge of the converſion of the Anglo-Saxons, England muſt be conſider'd, as divided into ſeven diſtinct kingdoms; and, as they did not all of them receive the chriſtian faith at one time, it will be neceſſary to treat concerning each of them ſeparately. I ſhall, accordingly, proceed to relate what remarkable events, as to religion, happened in each kingdom, from the founding of their churches, to the diſſolution of the heptarchy, in the reign of Egbert the firſt ſole monarch of England.

The ſtate of the CHURCH of KENT.

The ſtate of the church of Kent.

I ſhall begin with the kingdom of Kent, as it was the firſt that embraced chriſtianity; but, ſeveral circumſtances concurring to produce this event, I ſhall mention them all in this place.

I have already taken notice of Ethelbert's power over the other kings of the heptarchy; and that his alliance with France did not a little contribute towards it. It was with this view, that he demanded in marriage the daughter of Cherebert king of Paris, tho' this affair, at firſt, met with ſome difficulties. Chilperic, who, ſince his brother Cherebert's death, had been as a father to this princeſs, by reaſon of Ethelbert's being an idolater, could not be prevailed upon, for ſome time, to conſent to this match; but, Ethelbert having promis'd to let Bertha have the free exerciſe of her religion, and granted her the liberty to bring over with her a certain number of eccleſiaſticks, he, at length, received her in marriage. Chilperic formed hopes, that, as ſhe was thoroughly grounded in her religion, ſhe would not only adhere to it herſelf, but would be a means of converting the Engliſh monarch; and, in this, his expectation was fully anſwered. As ſoon as they came together, ſhe did all that was poſſible, by her affability and condeſcention, to gain the affection of her husband; and Ethelbert, charmed with the agreeable qualities of his ſpouſe, had all the eſteem and love for her ſhe could have wiſh'd. Bertha, upon this, hoping, in time, to make him a convert, took all opportunities of repreſenting to him the truths of the goſpel in the ſtrongeſt light; and Luidhard biſhop of Soiſſons, who came over with the queen, by his occaſional interviews with Ethelbert, very much promoted her deſign. The king, in a ſhort time, was ſo far wrought upon, that if he did not, as yet, embrace chriſtianity, he entertain'd a favourable opinion both of it and its profeſſors.

526. At this juncture, pope Gregory I. ſent miſſionaries into England, to inſtruct the Engliſh in the knowledge of the goſpel. Gildas and Bede ſharply inveigh againſt the Britons, for permitting their neighbours to live ſo long in paganiſm; but theſe invectives are groundleſs. It is obvious, that, whilſt the Saxons treated the natives with all imaginable cruelties, they were very unfit inſtruments to convert their oppreſſors. Beſides, their continual wars gave the Saxons no leiſure to apply their thoughts to religious affairs; but, as ſoon as they were ſettled, aſſiſtance was not wanting; and though it came from abroad, it was as effectual as if it had been given by their neighbours. This being a very remarkable epocha in the Engliſh hiſtory, I ſhall ſhew the methods of divine providence, in bringing about its deſigns, in favour of this nation; and, to this purpoſe, it will be neceſſary to take a view of what happened a little before.

About 18 or 20 years before the arrival of the miſſionaries from Rome, in the reign of Alla king of Deira, ſome young children were ſent from England to Rome, in order to be ſold; for the Engliſh made no ſcruple of ſelling their children, when they were overſtock'd, this being then a common practice among them. Theſe young children, being expos'd in the publick market, attracted the eyes of vaſt numbers of ſpectators, who could not ſufficiently admire them. Among the reſt, Gregory, archdeacon of Rome, very attentively beheld them, who enquir'd particularly after the place of their nativity, and the religion there profeſſed; and finding they were Engliſh, and born of idolatrous parents, he determin'd upon going, in perſon, to preach the goſpel to that nation; and, having obtain'd the pope's licence, he made preparations for his journey. However, the Romans petitioning the pope not to deprive them of ſo neceſſary a paſtor, for whom they had a profound veneration, and, the pope complying with their requeſt, Gregory could not put his deſign in execution; and, in all likelihood, Gregory's undertaking would have, at that time, met with great difficulties. All England was embroiled with wars and commotions; Ethelbert was not, as yet, married to Bertha; his mind was unprepared for the reception of the goſpel, and, being a vaſſal to Keaulin, he was in no condition to encourage Gregory's deſign; but, in proceſs of time, every thing concurred to bring it about. Gregory, now biſhop of Rome, revived his former deſign of converting the Engliſh; and tho', on account of his dignity, he was obliged to reſide at Rome, and could not go himſelf, he ſent thoſe whom he thought qualified to inſpire them with a regard for the goſpel. He appointed, for this miſſion, 40 benedictin monks, with Auſtin at their head, in the quality of abbot *. It is highly probable, that Bertha had informed the pope, how well affected her husband was, with reſpect to religion, ſince they had orders to land in Kent. Auſtin and his companions, being, in their paſſage thro' France, ſupplied with interpreters, arrived at the iſle of Thanet in 597. As ſoon as they were landed, Auſtin acquainted the king, that he was come into his dominions, accompanied by ſome very honeſt men, with a meſſage of the laſt importance, to ſhew him the way to everlaſting happineſs. Upon this, Ethelbert order'd them to remain where they were, deſigning to come himſelf, to hear, from their own mouths, the occaſion of their journey. A few days after, he went in company with the queen; and being apprehenſive, as Bede tells us, of charms or ſpells, he ſeated himſelf in the open air, believing that, in ſuch a ſituation, they could have no power over him. Having given orders for the ſtrangers to be called before him, he enquir'd into their propoſals. Auſtin, as the repreſentative of the reſt, made a long harangue, preaching the goſpel in a moving and zealous manner, ſays the ſame hiſtorian, tho' he does not give us a word of his ſermon. Ethelbert, learning from the interpreters what Auſtin ſaid, made him the following reply: "Your "propoſals are noble, and your promiſes in- "viting; but I cannot think of quitting the "religion of my anceſtors, for one that ſeems "to be ſupported by the teſtimony of per- "ſons that are entire ſtrangers to me. How- "ever, ſince you have undertaken ſo long a "journey, on purpoſe to impart what you "apprehend to be of the greateſt importance, "you ſhall not be ſent away, without ſome "ſatisfaction. You ſhall be treated with ci- "vility in my dominions, and ſupplied with "all things neceſſary and convenient; and if "any of my ſubjects, convinced by your "doctrine, ſhall embrace your religion, I "ſhall not oppoſe it."

Canter-

Canterbury, the capital of Kent, where ſhe provided them with lodgings, and procured them the liberty to preach to as many as had the curioſity to hear them; and they made ſuch an uſe of this opportunity, that, in a ſhort time, ſeveral of the principal Saxons embraced the chriſtian faith. The ſwift progreſs of the goſpel, at Canterbury, excited in the king an inclination to be more particularly inſtructed, in the nature of the religion thoſe ſtrangers preached; and, at length, by
598. the queen's perſuaſions and his frequent conferences with Auſtin, he received baptiſm, about a year after the arrival of the miſſionaries. The converſion of the king being followed by that of great numbers of his ſubjects, the queen's chapel, which was without the city *, ſoon became too little to contain them; and, therefore, they turned one of the heathen temples into a church, which was dedicated to St. Pancrace. Soon after, ſeveral other temples, by Ethelbert's order, were uſed in the ſame manner; and the foundations of Canterbury cathedral were laid, which was dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, tho' afterwards it had the name of St. Thomas. Auſtin alſo founded a monaſtery, which he had not the ſatisfaction to finiſh. Peter, one of his companions, was the firſt abbot; and it was named from St. Auguſtin its founder. Ethelbert, at length, leaving Canterbury to the Italian monks, kept his court at Reculver.

Thus, began the converſion of the Saxons in England. Auſtin and his companions were inſtruments, made uſe of by divine providence, to turn them from their pagan ſuperſtitions to the light of the goſpel; a bleſſing their brethren in Germany did not enjoy, for 200 years after, till the reign of Charles the great. Ethelbert was very active in promoting the converſion of his ſubjects, but by no violent or compulſive methods, having been taught by his inſtructors, as Bede expreſsly obſerves, that God requires none to be his ſervants, but thoſe who ſerve him with a willing mind. It would be well, if all chriſtian princes were of the ſame opinion! The Saxons were ſo deſirous of embracing chriſtianity, that the hiſtorians tell us, Auſtin, in one day, baptized 10,000 in the river Swale, which runs into the Thames.

Auſtin's ſucceſs in Kent, leading him to expect the ſame every where, he look'd upon all England, as already converted. Full of this notion, he haſten'd to Arles, to be conſecrated archbiſhop of the Saxons by Etherius, or Vigilius, then archbiſhop of that place. One would not have wonder'd at it, had he been ſatisfied with the bare title of biſhop; but it is, indeed, ſurprizing, that he ſhould aſpire to the archiepiſcopal dignity, when he had not a biſhop under his juriſdiction. It is certain, the pope promis'd to make him an archbiſhop, provided his miſſion was ſucceſsful; but, in all likelihood, by theſe words, Gregory meant the converſion of the Engliſh nation in general, and not of a part only of one of the leaſt kingdoms of the heptarchy. How great ſoever Auſtin's progreſs was, for the time he had been in England, it was nothing, in compariſon of what remained to be done. His eagerneſs, therefore, to be made archbiſhop and primate of England, when there was but a ſingle church in it, does not redound much to his reputation. All that can be advanced in his favour is, that the progreſs of the goſpel, at Canterbury, led him to imagine, that the converſion of all England was at hand; and, indeed, ſoon after his return from Arles, he erected an epiſcopal ſee at Rocheſter, of which Juſtus, one of his fellow-labourers, was the firſt biſhop. 603.
Hence it is evident, the goſpel had been alſo preached in that city, and with ſome ſucceſs.

It is plain, that Auſtin entertained great hopes of his miſſion, ſince, fearing he ſhould ſtand in need of more labourers in the harveſt, he ſent Peter and Laurence, with two others of his companions, to acquaint the pope with his wants. He made uſe of this opportunity alſo to deſire the pope's reſolution of certain queſtions, which he apprehended to be difficult, and which, he foreſaw, might perplex him, in the government of the new church.

Auſtin's letters, and the accounts he ſent him of his progreſs, inſpired him with ſuch a high conceit of his miſſion, that, regarding the converſion of the Engliſh, as a thing already done, though it was but juſt begun, he ſent the pall † to Auſtin, as a mark of diſtinction to this new apoſtle. He ordered him alſo to erect biſhops ſees in ſeveral places, particularly at York, where was to be placed a metropolitan with 12 ſuffragans; and, upon the death of one of the two archbiſhops, the ſurvivor was to conſecrate another in his room, and have the precedence of him. The reaſon of this preference, with reſpect to York, was, becauſe it had formerly, under the Romans, been an archbiſhoprick as well as London and Caerleon. As for the laſt, as it was poſſeſſed by the Britons, and already an archbiſhop's ſee, tho' not under the juriſdiction of the pope, there was no occaſion to mention it. Gregory's deſign, therefore, in making London an archbiſhoprick, was to reſtore things to their primitive ſtate; tho' he afterwards altered his meaſures, at the inſtance of Auſtin, who was deſirous of obtaining that honour for Canterbury, the metropolis of Kent, where he firſt exerciſed his miniſterial functions. The pope's intent, then, was only to put things on their antient footing, when, in his anſwer to Auſtin, he told him it was his meaning, that the archbiſhops of London and York ſhould be independent of each other, tho' he granted to Auſtin, during his life, a juriſdiction, as well over them as all the other biſhops of Great-Britain.

But Gregory's pains were, for the preſent, needleſs, ſince chriſtianity was, as yet, far enough from extending to Northumberland. However, the rais'd hopes the pope had conceived, from Auſtin's letters and meſſages, led him to give directions about the Engliſh churches, as if they had been really founded. Beſides theſe general orders, he exhorted Auſtin not to be elated at his having received the gift of miracles; from whence it appears, he had been informed, that ſeveral miraculous works had been performed by him. He charged him alſo, not to pull down ſuch idolatrous temples as were fit to be made churches, but to conſecrate them, by ſprinkling holy-water and placing reliques under the altars; and, as the Saxons had been accuſtomed to offer ſacrifices to their gods, on their feſtival-days, he directed, that, upon the anniverſaries of the ſaints, whoſe reliques were preſerved there, or on the day of the church's conſecration, they ſhould kill ſome cattle and provide an entertainment, to which the poor were to be invited. At the ſame time, he wrote to Ethelbert and Bertha, exhorting them to perſeverance in the true religion, and to zeal and diligence in promoting the great work Auſtin had undertaken. Peter and Laurence, with Mellitus, Paulinus, Ruffinianus, and ſome other new miſſionaries, brought theſe letters, together with ſacred veſſels, ornaments for the altars, veſtments for the prieſts, reliques, books, and other neceſſaries for the celebration of divine ſervice. Auſtin received alſo the reſolution of the queſtions he had ſent to the pope; which, with their anſwers, I ſhall briefly relate.

I. Queſtion. How biſhops ought to behave towards their clergy? Into how many portions ſhould the offerings at the altar be divided? And how are biſhops to act in the church?

As to the firſt point, the pope refers him to St. Paul's epiſtles to Timothy. To the ſecond, he replies, that it was the cuſtom of the church to divide the offerings into four parts; one for the biſhop, another for the clergy, a third for the poor, and the fourth for the repairs of the churches. As to the laſt article, which was very obſcure, before the pope cleared it up, in his anſwer, he replies, that Auſtin, being a monk, ought not to live apart from the reſt of the clergy, but, according to the practice of the primitive chriſtians, ſhould have all things in common *. He adds, that ſuch clerks, as could not live continently, ſhould marry, and receive their ſtipends at their own houſes, in conformity to thoſe words of ſcripture, Diſtribution was made to each of them according to their wants. As for other chriſtians, he judged it unneceſſary to preſcribe any rules, in reference to their alms-giving, ſince our Saviour himſelf had ſaid, Give alms of ſuch things as you have, and behold all things are clean unto you.

* Acts iv. 32.

II. Queſt. Since the cuſtoms of the Gallican and Roman churches differ, how ought he to manage?

The pope adviſes him to ſelect, from each church, what he thought moſt convenient for the church of England.

III. Queſt. What puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on him that is guilty of ſacrilege?

Gregory anſwers, It muſt be conſidered, whether the theft was done out of neceſſity or covetouſneſs; and the puniſhment muſt be proportioned accordingly, with charity and moderation. As for reſtitution, God forbid, the church ſhould inſiſt on more than ſhe loſt.

IV. Queſt. Whether two brothers may marry two ſiſters, that are no way related to them?

The pope anſwers, They may very lawfully.

V. Queſt. To what degree of conſanguinity are marriages prohibited?

Gregory replies, To the ſecond degree incluſively, and no farther. He would not, however, have thoſe divorced, who had married within the prohibited degrees, before their converſion, becauſe they did it ignorantly; but he would have all the new converts ſtrictly charged not to do ſo, and, on their preſuming to do it, to be debarred the communion.

VI. Queſt. Whether a ſingle biſhop may ordain another, when the length of the journey renders it inconvenient for other biſhops to come to his aſſiſtance?

The pope anſwers, that as Auſtin was now the only biſhop in England, he might, alone, conſecrate others; but, to prevent this inconvenience hereafter, he adviſed him to place biſhops in ſuch a ſituation, that they might not be at too great a diſtance from one another.

VII. Queſt. How ought I to behave towards the biſhops of Gaul?

Gregory replies, that he does not allow him any juriſdiction over them, being unwilling to deprive the archbiſhop of Arles of his authority.

VIII. Queſt. Whether a woman with child ought to be baptized?

The pope tells him, He thought it very convenient.

IX. Queſt. How long after her lying-in, ought a woman to come into the church?

Anſw. If ſhe does ſo, the minute after her delivery, ſhe ſins not.

X. Queſt. How long after the birth, ſhould the baptiſm of an infant be deferred?

Anſw. A child may be baptized, as ſoon as he is born.

XI. Queſt. How long, after a lying-in, muſt it be, before a man and his wife may come together again?

Gregory, in his anſwer which is very large, blames mothers for not ſuckling their own children, children, aſcribing the riſe of this ill cuſtom to their incontinency; and, therefore, he decides, that the husband ought not to have carnal copulation with his wife, till the child is weaned *.

XII. Queſt. May a woman, during ſome certain times, come into the church?

The pope enlarges on this head, and, at length, concludes, that womens infirmities ought not to hinder their coming to church.

XIII. Queſt. May a man, that has lain with his wife, come into the church, or receive the ſacrament, before he has waſh'd himſelf?

Gregory having, as uſual, made uſe of a great number of diſtinctions, concludes, that it is better for ſuch a man to abſtain from both, for ſome time.

XIV. May a man, after an impure dream, receive the communion, or, if a prieſt, adminiſter it?

The pope, at laſt, concludes, a man, in the caſe mention'd, ought not to communicate; but he allows a prieſt, in the ſame caſe, to adminiſter the ſacrament, if there is no other in the way to officiate for him.

Theſe difficulties, propos'd by Auſtin, do not convey to us any great idea of his parts and abilities; however, Gregory reſolved them fully and diſtinctly, as if they had been of the laſt importance. So deeply was he concerned for the converſion of the Engliſh, that, inſtead of giving Auſtin the leaſt diſcouragement, he highly extolled him.

Auſtin's zeal was not confined to the converſion of the Saxons; for he undertook alſo to bring the Welch and Britiſh biſhops to acknowledge the pope's juriſdiction, which was not an eaſy task. The Britons thought it their duty to adhere to the rites and cuſtoms they had practis'd, ever ſince the goſpel was planted among them; neither could they conceive any reaſons for their conformity to the church of Rome, at ſo great a diſtance from them; nor could they ſee, that their owning the pope's authority would tend to their advantage. Auſtin, however, purſued his deſign; for, beſides his attachment to the ſee of Rome, he had a claim to the primacy of all Britain, by virtue of the pope's grant, to excite him to this undertaking. On this account, he exerted himſelf to accompliſh this enterprize, which coſt him more labour and trouble, than the converſion of the Saxons, tho' he was, after all, diſappointed.

The goſpel, as I above obſerved, was firſt preached in Britain, either by the apoſtles themſelves, or by ſome of their diſciples. From that time, the Britons had conſtantly adhered to the cuſtoms and rules preſcribed to them by their firſt inſtructors; but the church of Rome had made ſeveral innovations, in the celebration of divine ſervice, to which they would have obliged all churches to conform. Tho' the biſhops of Rome, every where, met with oppoſition, they would not quit their pretenſions. This difference, indeed, was of no great importance; yet, towards the end of the ſecond century, it caus'd a moſt ſcandalous quarrel between pope Victor I. and the churches of Aſia; which roſe to ſuch an height, that the pope, on that very account, excommunicated them all. Tho' this affair had never been legally determin'd, the biſhops of Rome, inſiſting on their claims, did their utmoſt to bring about their deſigns. The weſtern churches, being neareſt to Rome, ſoon fell in with them, almoſt all, except the churches of Gaul and Milan, conforming, at length, to the Roman ritual; but Britain, which was, as it were out of the world, ſince the ambaſſy of Lucius to pope Eleutherius, held very little correſpondence with the biſhops of Rome. The Britons regarded them only, as biſhops of a particular dioceſe, or, at moſt, but as patriarchs, on whom their churches had not the leaſt dependence; and ſo far were they from acknowledging the pope's authority, that they were even ſtrangers to his pretenſions to any over them. Auſtin, however, undertook to bring them to own the pope, as head of the church in general. It is no eaſy matter to know the extent of Auſtin's deſigns, ſince it does not appear, that he had any inſtructions from Gregory I. who did not aſpire after ſuch an exorbitant power, as was attributed to his ſucceſſors. It muſt, however, be granted, that Gregory claimed a ſuperiority over the Britiſh churches, ſince, in his letter to Auſtin, he put the whole iſland under his juriſdiction; and, indeed, it is not to be imagined Auſtin would have purſued this point ſo far, had he not been aſſured of being ſupported in it; but, be this as it will, he left no means unattempted to accompliſh his deſign.

With this view, he prevailed on the Britiſh biſhops to meet him in a ſynod, to debate upon his propoſals; but neither promiſes nor threatenings could work upon them, to admit of the leaſt alteration in their antient cuſtoms. Bede affirms, that Auſtin, finding his arguments ineffectual, cauſed a blind man to be brought into the aſſembly; and, when the Britons had tried, in vain, to cure him, he reſtored him to his ſight, by his prayers. But, whether the miracle might not be called in queſtion, becauſe the blind man was a Saxon, or, whether Bede, who lived not till long after, might be impos'd upon in his information, the Britons were not convinced by this evidence. Auſtin could obtain no farther ſatisfaction from them, but that they would meet again, to determine the affair in a more numerous ſynod †. Seven Britiſh biſhops were preſent at this ſecond council, accompanied by Dinoth, abbot of Bangor, who brought ſeveral of his monks along with him. Before they came to the ſynod, they advis'd with a hermit of great repute among them, how they ſhould behave on this occaſion. The good old man told them, he ſaw no reaſon they had to admit of any change in their divine ſervice, on the bare requeſt of a man that was an entire ſtranger to them; but, as the eſſence of religion conſiſted in union and charity, it would not be amiſs to comply in ſome meaſure with Auſtin, provided he was a holy man, and one ſent from God. They farther enquir'd, how they ſhould know, whether he was ſuch a perſon or not? He anſwered, they might know it by his humility, the moſt unerring mark of a true chriſtian; and they would ſee, whether he was adorn'd with this virtue, by his riſing up to ſalute them, at their coming into the council-room; for, if he fail'd in that inſtance of reſpect, it would be an undoubted token of his pride. Accordingly, they, on purpoſe, came laſt into the place; and, Auſtin not riſing to ſalute them, they entertain'd an invincible prejudice againſt him. Thus, for a failure in good manners, Auſtin's ſcheme, which coſt him ſo much pains and trouble, proved abortive.

As Auſtin, in the ſynod, was very actively engaged, in urging the Britons to ſubmit to the pope's authority, Dinoth, abbot of Bangor, made him the following anſwer: "You "propoſe to us obedience to the church of "Rome; are you not ſenſible, that we al- "ready owe a deference of love and charity "to the church of God, the biſhop of Rome, "and to all chriſtians; which obliges us, by "all poſſible means, to do them all the good "we can? Other obedience, than this, to "him whom you call pope, we are ignorant "of; and this we are always ready to pay. "But, for a ſuperior, we have no occaſion "to go ſo far as Rome, when we are go- "verned, under God, by the biſhop of Caer- "leon, who hath authority to take care of "our churches and ſpiritual affairs?" It is ſaid, that Auſtin, after a long diſpute, deſpairing to convince them, cried out, full of indignation, "Since you reject peace from "your brethren, you ſhall have war from "your enemies; and, ſeeing you will not aſ- "ſiſt us, in preaching the word of eternal "life to your neighbours, you ſhall receive "death at their hands." From this it appears, that Auſtin reproached the Britons, for their negligence and want of zeal, in not promoting the converſion of the Saxons; and, perhaps, he deſigned to intimate to them, that their not complying with his propoſals was the only bar to the converſion of all England. However, Auſtin's words were look'd upon, as a prediction of the dreadful maſſacre of the monks of Bangor, mentioned in the hiſtory of Northumberland; but I ſubmit it to the reader's judgment, whether the abbot of Bangor's refuſal of Auſtin's propoſals was a crime, that deſerved ſo ſevere a puniſhment.

Auſtin, not meeting with the ſucceſs he expected, in this undertaking, confin'd himſelf within the bounds of his miſſion, appointing Mellitus, one of the miſſionaries ſent him by the pope, to preach the goſpel to the Eaſt-Saxons; but I ſhall ſpeak, more particularly, concerning him, in my account of the converſion of that nation. 604.

Theſe are the tranſactions of Auſtin, commonly ſtiled the apoſtle of the Engliſh, during the eight years he reſided in England. He arrived in 597, and died in 605, according to the received opinion. Some ſay, he died ſooner; and others, tho' without grounds, bring his death down to 613. He was buried at Canterbury, near the cathedral, which was not then finiſhed, with this inſcription on his tomb:

"Here lies Auguſtin, the firſt archbiſhop "of Dorobern, who, being ſent hither "by Gregory, pontiff of Rome, and ſup- "ported by the co-operation of God "with miracles, converted king Ethel- "bert and his nation to the faith; and, "having accompliſhed the days of his "miniſtry, departed this life the 7th "of the calends of June, in the reign "of the ſaid king."

Auſtin had Laurentius for his ſucceſſor, who was equally ſollicitous to reduce the Britons to the obedience of the pope, and a conformity to the church of Rome, in the celebration of eaſter. In his letters, he upbraided them, for their obſtinacy, ſharply inveighing againſt Dagham, a Scotch biſhop, who, paſſing thro' Canterbury, had refuſed to eat with him, on account of their difference in opinion; but his letters were ineffectual.

Gregory I. did not pretend to a juriſdiction over the Britiſh churches, as univerſal biſhop; a title which he declaim'd againſt, with great diſlike. However, in all likelihood, he thought he might, as patriarch of the weſt, claim the homage of the Britiſh, as well as Engliſh biſhops, to his ſpiritual jurisdiction; but Boniface IV. who was, ſoon after, pope, being ſupported by the emperor Phocas, aſſum'd the title of univerſal biſhop. This induced the miſſionaries in England to renew their attempts, to bring the Britons to own his authority, tho' all to no purpoſe; and, for this reaſon, Mellitus was ſent to Rome, to receive inſtructions from the pope, about this affair. But Ethelbert's death * put a ſtop to it, and reduced the chriſtians to a deplorable condition; for Ebald, his ſon and ſucceſſor, revolting to paganiſm, the miſſionaries were deprived of the protection they had, hitherto, enjoyed. To compleat their miſery, Sabert king of Eſſex, converted by Mellitus, dying ſoon after, his three ſons, who jointly ſucceeded him, turning idolaters again, would not ſuffer Mellitus, on his return from Rome, to remain in their dominions. He fled to Laurentius, archbiſhop of Canterbury, as did alſo Juſtus biſhop of Rocheſter, the inhabitants of that place having, in all probability, renounced the faith. Theſe three prelates reſolved to go to France, and abandon the renegado renegado Saxons; from whence it appears, either that the inhabitants of Kent and Eſſex became apoſtates from chriſtianity, or that there were not ſo many converts, as Gregory imagined. Mellitus and Juſtus departed, purſuant to their reſolution; but Laurence continued in England, tho' with a deſign of following them in a ſhort time. It is ſaid, that, being ready to depart, as he lay one night in his church, St. Peter appeared to him and ſeverely ſcourged him, for propoſing to abandon his miſſion. The day after, ſhewing Ebald the marks of the ſcourge, he converted him, perſuading him alſo to diſengage from his unlawful marriage, being eſpouſed to his father's widow. As to Ebald's converſion, it is aſſerted by all the hiſtorians; but I cannot warrant the truth of St. Peter's apparition. Ebald, upon this, recalled Juſtus and Mellitus, reſtoring them to their reſpective ſees of Rocheſter and London; but the Eaſt-Saxons, at London, rejecting Mellitus, he returned to Kent, and, ſoon after, ſucceeded Laurentius, in the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury. It is 619. reported, that, by his prayers, he put a ſtop to a great fire, which, in all likelihood, would have reduced the city to aſhes, and that he wrought ſeveral other miracles.

Mellitus was ſucceeded by Juſtus biſhop of 624. Rocheſter, to whom the pope ſent the pall. After him came Honorius, whoſe ſucceſſor was Deuſdedit, upon whoſe death, there was a vacancy, for four years. Egbert and Oſwy, kings of Kent and Northumberland, having held a conference, about the affairs of the church, reſolved to ſend Wighard, a Kentiſh prieſt, to be conſecrated archbiſhop of Canterbury at Rome. Wighard dying there, Vitalian the pope offered it to Adrian and Andrew, two monks, who refuſed the archbiſhoprick, thinking it too great a burthen for them; but Theodorus a Greek monk, a 668. native of Tarſus in Cilicia, being not ſo ſcrupulous, was conſecrated at Rome, and ſet out for England. The pope ordered Adrian to go with him, leſt Theodorus, who was a Greek, ſhould introduce cuſtoms in Britain contrary to thoſe of the church of Rome. As Theodorus was the moſt famous prelate, that, in thoſe times, poſſeſſed the ſee of Canterbury, I ſhall be more particular, in my account concerning him.

Theodorus was diſtinguiſhed, not only for his learning, but for the greatneſs of his mind and the ſolidity of his judgment; tho' he was of a warm and imperious temper, fond of power, and could not bear any oppoſition to his will. Whilſt he was archbiſhop of Canterbury, he laid hold on every opportunity of extending his juriſdiction over all England, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. I ſhall only obſerve in this place, that, during his life, he alone exerciſed the archiepiſcopal functions, making incroachments on the rights of the ſee of York; tho' Gregory I. had ordered, that, after Auſtin's death, the two archbiſhopricks ſhould be independent of each other. As ſoon as he 669. came into England, he made a viſitation of all the churches in his juriſdiction, and brought them to an entire conformity to the uſages of the church of Rome.

The Engliſh being ſtill very ignorant, Theodorus erected a ſchool or ſeminary at Crecklade *, where he and Adrian, beſides divinity, taught arithmetick, muſick, aſtronomy, Greek and Latin. Bede affirms, that he knew ſeveral of their ſcholars, that could expreſs themſelves as readily in Greek and Latin, as in their own language. Theodorus did not only excite in the Engliſh a love of learning, by exhortations and inſtructions, but alſo by the books he put into their hands; ſome of theſe are ſtill extant in manuſcript, as David's pſalms, St. Chryſoſtom's homilies, and Homer, all beautifully written. He compoſed a large work himſelf, entitled pœnitentiale, which, not long ſince, remained entire at Cambridge †, but is not to be found there now. In 1677, extracts of it, with ſome other Journ. des Scav. of his treatiſes, were publiſhed at Paris, with 1678. notes by Jacobus Petitus.

Theodorus died in 690; but the vacancy 692. was not filled, till two years after, by Berthwald abbot of Reculver, who, having been archbiſhop 38 years, was, upon his death, ſucceeded by Tatwine, a perſon eminent for 731. learning and probity. He performed the archiepiſcopal functions, near two years, before he received the pall; which evidently ſhews, he did not believe it to be abſolutely neceſſary to qualify him to act, as an archbiſhop. Tatwine, dying in 735, had No- 735. thelm, a prieſt of the dioceſe of London, for his ſucceſſor, who went to receive the pall at Rome, where he was conſecrated by Gregory III. He died in 741, and, the year en- 742. ſuing, Cuthbert, biſhop of Hereford, was elected in his room. To him ſucceeded Bregwin, of a noble family in Germany. This 759. prelate was remarkable, for a religious and exemplary life, during the two years he held the ſee. Jambert or Lambert, abbot of St. Auſtin's, was his ſucceſſor. In his time, 761. the churches of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia were wreſted from his juriſdiction, Litchfield being erected into an archbiſhoprick, in the reign 765. of Offa; and, tho' he made uſe of his utmoſt endeavours, he could neither prevent it, nor recover his rights. Athelard, who ſucceeded him, was more fortunate; for he obtained, that the churches of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia ſhould be, as formerly, ſubject to the ſee of Canterbury. Wulfrid, his ſucceſſor in 804, was alive, when the heptarchy was reduced to a monarchy.

Before I proceed to the church of Northumberland, I ſhall enquire into the reaſons, why Gregory's order, that the archbiſhopricks of Canterbury and York ſhould be independent of each other, was not put in execution. Firſt, the Northumbrians were not converted, ſo ſoon as that pope expected; ſecondly, they all apoſtatized from the faith, upon the retreat of Paulinus, who received the pall; and, laſtly, the continual troubles in Northumberland hinder'd the firſt biſhops of York, from taking the advantage of Gregory's regulation, which was not much regarded. This gave occaſion to Theodorus, to ſeize on all the juriſdiction, as well over the northern as ſouthern churches; and his ſucceſſors, treading in his ſteps, claimed the primacy of all England, excluſive of the archbiſhops of York; which afterwards cauſed great diſputes.

The CHURCH of NORTHUMBERLAND.

HAving already related Edwin's marriage with Ethelburga of Kent, I ſhall only add, that Paulinus, who came with her into Northumberland, in the quality of biſhop of the Northumbrians, ſpent a whole year at Edwin's court, to very little purpoſe; but, at length, ſeveral circumſtances concurred to favour his deſign, of which I ſhall give a particular account.

Quicelm, king of Weſſex, being vaſtly impatient under Edwin's yoke, reſolved to ſhake it off, by the means of an aſſaſin, whom he ſent to him, on ſome pretence, privately armed with a dagger. The ruffian, being introduced into the king's preſence, made ſuch a furious paſs at him, that he was wounded thro' the body of Lilla, his favourite, who had interpoſed and received the blow. Paulinus, hearing of this accident, haſtily ran into the room, and obſerving the king to be highly enraged againſt the king of Weſſex, told him, God, who deteſted ſuch wretches, would certainly puniſh ſo horrid a villany. It is reported, that Edwin promiſed, at the ſame time, to renounce paganiſm, if the God of the chriſtians would revenge him on his enemy. At this very inſtant, he received the news, that the queen, after a hard labour, was delivered of a princeſs, for which he returned thanks to his gods. Paulinus, for his part, having been in great perplexity about the queen, on his knees, thanked God for her deliverance. The biſhop's zeal immediately begat in the king ſo favourable an opinion of the chriſtian religion, that he gave his conſent, that Paulinus ſhould baptize the new-born infant, being the firſt that was baptized in Northumberland. Edwin, in the interim, marched with an army into the dominions of the king of Weſſex; and, after ſeveral defeats, obliged him to ſue for peace, and give him ample ſatisfaction for his late perfidiouſneſs; but, tho' he returned home victorious, he did not embrace chriſtianity, according to his promiſe. When the queen and Paulinus preſs'd him concerning it, he told them, that the quitting his religion appeared to him to be a thing of ſuch conſequence, that he could not reſolve upon it, without a thorough examination of matters; and, indeed, he ſet about it, in good earneſt, frequently conferring with Coifi the pagan high-prieſt, on Paulinus's arguments for chriſtianity. Coifi, finding that the king was almoſt a chriſtian, determined to make his court to him betimes, by conforming to his will. It would not, perhaps, be impoſſible, in the like caſe, to diſcover ſome of this ſtamp among the chriſtian clergy.

In the mean time, the queen and Paulinus continued their ſollicitations, and, to enforce them, prevailed on the pope to write a letter to Edwin; but he ſtill demurred. At laſt, the circumſtances of the viſion, he had formerly ſeen in Redowald's garden, being, as is ſaid, revealed to Paulinus, his converſion was accompliſhed in an extraordinary way. Bede tells us, that, the king being, one day, ſurrounded with a crowd of courtiers, Paulinus came in abruptly; and, laying his hand on his head, asked him, whether he apprehended the meaning of that token? Edwin, at theſe words, recollecting what had paſſed between him and the ſtranger in Redowald's garden, threw himſelf at Paulinus's feet, who, with an air of authority, ſpoke to him as follows: "My lord, you have been delivered from "your enemies, and are become a great king. "Every thing, that was predicted concern-"ing you, is compleated; and, therefore, you "ſhould perform your promiſe." Upon this, we are told, that Edwin, being entirely ſatisfied, embraced the chriſtian faith. From this time, he not only endeavoured after a more perfect knowledge of the goſpel himſelf, but was active in bringing over his ſubjects to the profeſſion of it; but, before he declared himſelf, he prevailed on ſome of his chief courtiers, whoſe examples, he did not queſtion, would have a mighty influence on the people. 626.

He expected the greateſt oppoſition from Coifi, whoſe intereſt it was that the people ſhould continue idolaters; but he was agreeably ſurprized to find, that he was diſpos'd to comply with his deſire. As he was diſcourſing with him, one day, on this ſubject, the high-prieſt, like a true courtier, told him: "I have, for a long time, ſeriouſly employ'd "my thoughts on our religion, and on the "nature of our gods; and I muſt own, I can-"not forbear calling in queſtion their good-"neſs, juſtice, and power. Never, perhaps, "did any perſon ſerve them with greater "zeal, devotion, and aſſiduity than myſelf. "You, ſir, have been a witneſs, how punctual "I have been in the diſcharge of my office; "and yet I never reaped any advantage by "it, nor is there a man in your court, that "has not been better rewarded than I. Now, "is it not a plain caſe, that, ſince our gods "take ſo little notice of their moſt ſincere "and devout ſervants, they muſt be either "unjuſt, or weak, or rather no gods at all."

Edwin, pleas'd with this anſwer, had the curioſity to ſound the ſentiments of another prieſt, next in dignity to Coifi; who, encouraged by the high-prieſt's example, told the king: "Sir, the more we enquire into "the

" the nature of the ſoul, the more we are in " the dark about it. It is with our ſoul, as " with the little bird that came in, the other " day, at one of the windows of the room, " where you ſat at dinner, and flew out im- " mediately at the other; whilſt it was in the " room, we knew ſomething of it; but, as " ſoon as it was gone, we could not tell, " whence it came, or whither it was flown. " Thus, whilſt the ſoul animates the body, " we may come to the knowledge of ſome of " its properties; but, in a ſeparate ſtate, we " are ignorant, whither it goes, or whence " it came. Since, then, Paulinus propoſes to " give us clearer notions in theſe points, it is " my opinion, that we ſhould hearken to his " propoſals; and, laying aſide all paſſion and " prejudice, we ſhould embrace that which is " moſt agreeable to the dictates of right " reaſon."

Upon this, the king reſolved, that Paulinus ſhould explain himſelf on the ſubject of religion, in the preſence of the pontiff and other prieſts. Paulinus had no ſooner ended his diſcourſe, than Coifi loudly declared, that he could ſee no reaſon to doubt of the truth of the chriſtian religion. Edwin, having thus brought over the high-prieſt and ſome of his principal courtiers, he called a Wittenagemot or parliament, to debate, whether chriſtianity ſhould be received or not; but it paſs'd in the affirmative, without any oppoſition. Coifi was the moſt forward of any to attack the idol-worſhip; and, to demonſtrate the ſincerity of his converſion, marching, at the head of the other prieſts, towards the pagan temple,
627. he darted his javelin againſt the idol; which was broken in pieces, by the king's order, and the temple conſumed to aſhes *. The ſame day, Edwin was baptized, with his niece Hilda †, afterwards abbeſs of Whitby.

The Northumbrians copying after the example of their king, Paulinus, on a ſudden, was fully employed, by the vaſt crouds of people, that daily came to be taught and baptized; but if, as ſome affirm, he baptized in one day 10,000, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that he could be very particular in his inſtructions ‡. A church of wood was run up in all haſte, for the new converts; and, ſoon after, Edwin laid the foundation of another of free-ſtone
628. round the former, which ſtood, till the latter was built. He did not live to finiſh this church, which was effected by Oſwald his ſucceſſor. It is ſaid, that Paulinus preached alſo at Lincoln, and converted there Blecca the Saxon governor.

633. In proceſs of time, Edwin being ſlain in battle, ſuch a deſolation followed, that Paulinus was forced to leave the kingdom, and the Northumbrians relapſed to idolatry. Anfred and Oſrick, kings of Deira and Bernicia, became apoſtates from chriſtianity, as well as their ſubjects, tho' they were both converted in Scotland, where they had lived in exile. The revolt of theſe princes and Cadwallo's barbarity, after their death, almoſt quite extirpated chriſtianity in Northumberland. In theſe calamitous times, neither prieſt nor monk had the courage to attempt the recovery of the Northumbrians to the chriſtian faith; and James the deacon, whom Paulinus left at York, was unable, without aſſiſtance, to put a ſtop to this general apoſtacy. Things 634.
continued in this condition, till Oſwald aſcended the throne, who no ſooner had reſtored peace and tranquillity, than he exerted all his power to revive religion. With this view, he deſired the king of Scotland to ſend him ſome perſons of learning to inſtruct his ſubjects. Accordingly, Corman, a monk of Jona, was diſpatched into England; but, being diſliked by the Engliſh, on account of his imperious temper, he returned to his monaſtery. Corman making a report of his miſſion in a full chapter, Aidan, one of the brotherhood, found, from his own words, that he had not treated the Engliſh with that condeſcenſion their circumſtances required, and, therefore, told him: " In my opinion, brother, you have been " ſomewhat too rough and ſevere in your car- " riage to thoſe, whom you deſigned to con- " vert; not conſidering, that the chriſtian re- " ligion is to be propagated by mild and " gentle, not by compulſive methods." Upon this, the monks unanimouſly declared, that Aidan was the fitteſt perſon to undertake the converſion of the Northumbrians; and, being, firſt, conſecrated a biſhop, he began his journey. Bede tells us, that he was a pious and 635.
religious man; but that his zeal was without knowledge, becauſe he did not obſerve the cuſtom of the church of Rome, in the celebration of eaſter, keeping it after the manner of the eaſtern chriſtians. However, as much a ſchiſmatick as he was, nothing can be added to the character given him by Bede. He ſays, that Aidan not only inſtructed chriſtians in their duty, but alſo, by his piety and fervent charity, charmed the very pagans, converting them to the chriſtian faith. Such was his ſucceſs among the Northumbrians, that they returned, in ſwarms, to the profeſſion of chriſtianity. Oſwald was ſo zealous in this work, that he vouchſafed to be Aidan's interpreter, to explain his diſcourſe to the people. It may, perhaps, ſeem ſtrange, that Oſwald did not recall Paulinus, who was then biſhop of Rocheſter, or employ James, who was ſtill in Northumberland. But Oſwald, being inſtructed in the chriſtian religion in Scotland, had an averſion to the Roman miſſionaries, by reaſon of the difference between the Romaniſts and Scots, about eaſter and the eccleſiaſtical tonſure. Aidan dying, after he had 652.
governed the church of Northumberland 17 years, Finan, another monk of Jona, was ſent to ſucceed him. He fixed the epiſcopal ſee, Finan and the Scotch eccleſiaſticks, in other inſtances, declared their independence on the church of Rome. Their obſtinate refuſal, to comply with the Roman cuſtom of keeping eaſter, was an article of much greater importance; at leaſt, it appear'd to be ſo to the Italian prieſts. England was, at this time, divided into two ſects or parties, who tenaciouſly adhered to their reſpective opinions. The Scotch prieſts and monks followed the eaſtern churches; but the French and Italian eccleſiaſticks, in this and all other points, conformed to the church of Rome, treating as ſchiſmaticks thoſe who were of different ſentiments. They, accordingly, exerted themſelves to bring the Engliſh churches to a conformity with them; and they imagin'd, it might eaſily be accompliſh'd, if they could once gain Finan over to their party. With this view, they ſent a Scotch prieſt to him, who had his education in France, to repreſent to him the reaſons alledged by the church of Rome, on this article; but he was ſo far from being able to convince him, that Finan became a more open and avowed oppoſer of the Roman cuſtoms.

This diſpute was carried on with great warmth, not only among the clergy, but the moſt ignorant of the laity too, as it commonly happens in religious differences. Whilſt Aidan and Finan lived, the Romaniſts, who had a veneration for theſe holy biſhops, bore, with ſome patience, this diverſity of opinions; but when Colman, another Scotch
661. monk, ſucceeded Finan, in the reign of Oſwy, the diſpute was renew'd with greater vehemence than ever. The Romaniſts, at length, prevailed on Oſwy to call a ſynod, in the nunnery of Hilda, at Streanes-halh or Whit-
664. by, to decide this affair. In this ſynod, each party procured as many voices as they could; but, hiſtorians tell us, the Romaniſts exceeded the others in zeal and activity. At the head of the Scotch party, were king Oſwy, Colman biſhop of the Northumbrians, and the other Scotch prieſts and monks, with all that had received their ordination from them. On the contrary ſide, appeared Anfleda Oſwy's queen, Alfred king of Deira, Oſwy's natural ſon, Wilfrid a prieſt, his preceptor, who had ſtudied at Rome, Agilbert biſhop of Paris, who had been biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, Agathon a prieſt of the ſame church, Ronan a Scotch prieſt, James the deacon, and all who had been diſciples of the Italian prieſts and monks.

The zeal and warmth, with which this diſpute was managed, would lead one to think, that the very eſſence of religion was concern'd in it; and, indeed, that the Romaniſts were of this opinion, appears from what Bede ſays, on this occaſion: "It was not without rea-
" ſon, that this queſtion diſturbed the minds
" of many chriſtians, who were apprehenſive,
" leſt, after they had begun the race of ſal-
" vation, they ſhould be found to have run
" in vain." However, tho' Bede was of opinion, that all they, who did not conform to the church of Rome, run in vain; yet he gives Aidan and Finan the higheſt encomiums, for the ſanctity of their lives. He tells us, they had the gift of miracles, which evidently proves, that he regarded them as ſaints, tho' they were, according to his notion, actually ſchiſmaticks. Baronius alſo, when he ſpeaks of the Scots and Britons of thoſe times, repreſents them as guilty of ſchiſm, for refuſing obedience to the pope; but yet he makes no ſcruple of ſainting Aidan and Finan, who ſtrongly aſſerted the independency of their churches. Hence it follows, that either theſe biſhops were not, in reality, ſchiſmaticks, or that their ſchiſm did not prevent their being eminent ſaints, their having the aſſiſtance of God in working miracles and converting nations. But to return the ſynod of Whitby; and, as the diſpute about eaſter was the occaſion of it, and the cauſe of great commotions in England, I ſhall give a brief account of its firſt riſe and original.

Towards the end of the ſecond century, a controverſy aroſe in the church, about the day on which the feſtival of eaſter ſhould be obſerved. The churches of Aſia kept it on the 14th day of the moon, on whatſoever day of the week it happened, according to the cuſtom of the Jews; but the weſtern churches put it off, till the Sunday after the 14th day, becauſe that was the day of our Saviour's reſurrection. Several councils were called, in the eaſt as well as weſt, to determine this affair; but both parties ſtifly adhered to their opinions, each of them pretending to apoſtolical tradition, the eaſtern biſhops from St. John, and the weſtern from St. Peter and St. Paul. If we admit both theſe traditions to be true, it evidently follows, that it is not very material, which of them be obſerved, ſince the apoſtles had not ſettled this point among themſelves; and, indeed, notwithſtanding this diverſity of cuſtom, both parties held communion with one another, till the time of pope Victor I. who excommunicated the quartodecimans, or thoſe that kept eaſter on the 14th day of the moon. Irenæus, biſhop of Lyons, tho' of the ſame opinion with Victor, ſeverely reprimanded him, for uncharitably making a rupture, on the account of a thing ſo trivial. He reminds him of Anicetus, Pius, Hyginus, Teleſphorus, and Xiſtus, his predeceſſors, who held communion with the churches of Aſia; and he farther tells him, that it would have been more to his credit, if he had copied after the example of Anicetus, who gave the euchariſt with his own hand to Polycarp biſhop of Smyrna, tho' of different ſentiments from him, in this very matter.

Victor's imperious treatment of the churches of Aſia only made them more tenaciouſly adhere to their opinion; and they believed they were the leſs obliged to conform to the practice practice of the church of Rome, as the pope, in the main, could not produce any authentick proofs of their tradition from St. Peter and St. Paul, tho' the Aſiaticks would have been equally perplex'd to make out theirs from St. John. Socrates the hiſtorian has a remarkable paſſage to this purpoſe: "Neither Chriſt nor his apoſtles, ſays he, have "given any orders concerning the paſchal "feaſt, as Moſes did to the Jews, it not being their deſign to determine circumſtances "about holy-days, but to inſtruct chriſtians "in the precepts of piety and a holy life. It "is my opinion, therefore, that, as certain "cuſtoms have been introduced in each country, this of the paſchal ſolemnity was one a-"mong the reſt, and not built upon the au-"thority of the apoſtles. The quartodeci-"mans affirm, that the 14th day was inſti-"tuted by St. John. The Romaniſts tell us, "they had their practice from St. Peter and "St. Paul. But, as neither of them have "proved their aſſertion, by any authentick "record, it is evident, the feſtival of eaſter "may be kept in every place, according to "the cuſtom firſt introduced there."

Hence it appears, that they, who were not fond of wrangling, did not apprehend this controverſy to be of any importance to religion. However, for the ſake of uniformity, even in the ſmalleſt matters, the council of Arles, in 314, determin'd, that eaſter ſhould, in all places, be celebrated on the Sunday after the 14th day of the moon, which happen'd next after the vernal equinox or 21ſt of March. This canon was ratify'd by the council of Nice, in 325; and the emperor iſſued orders throughout the whole Roman empire, to have it put in execution. His letter to the governors and other magiſtrates declared, that the council came to this reſolution, becauſe the quartodecimans were feweſt in number, and too nearly followed the cuſtom of the Jews. For theſe reaſons it was, that the council order'd, that eaſter ſhould be kept on the Sunday after the full moon in March; but it is uncertain, whether it was meant, that the people ſhould reckon from the beginning of the 14th of the moon, or from the evening and beginning of the 15th*. Purſuant to this decree, all the churches obſerved eaſter-day on a Sunday. One circumſtance, however, viz. what was to be done, when the full moon fell out on a Sunday, not being thoroughly ſettled, was the occaſion of a diverſity; for ſome churches, the Scotch in particular, began their eaſter on that very day, and, conſequently, at the ſame time with the Jews, tho' the church of Rome put it off to the Sunday following. Since that time, ſome alterations have been made, which introduced different cuſtoms. Whereas, for a long time, a cycle of 84 years was every where made uſe of, to diſcover the preciſe time of eaſter, the church of Rome invented, for that purpoſe, a vaſtly more convenient cycle of 19 years, obliging all the churches, under her juriſdiction, to a conformity to it. Tho', doubtleſs, this cycle was calculated neareſt the truth; yet as it was unknown to the Britons and Scots, who had held but little correſpondence with Rome, they adhered to their old method.

Eaſter being, thus, celebrated at different times, it ſometimes happen'd in Oſwy's court, that, whilſt the king kept the paſchal-feaſt, the queen, who obſerved the cuſtom of the Romaniſts, was advanced no farther in lent than Palm-Sunday. Oſwy was, therefore, deſirous of fixing eaſter-day, that all might keep it, at the ſame time. Having made a ſhort ſpeech, to open the council, he ordered Colman to produce his arguments, in vindication of the cuſtom of the church of Scotland. Colman alledged, that it had been the conſtant practice of his predeceſſors, and of thoſe from whom he received his conſecration; that Columba, Aidan, and Finan had always obſerved it; and that, farther to confirm this point, he could advance the authority of St. John the beloved apoſtle. Having, at large, inſiſted on this argument, Agilbert, biſhop of Paris, was deſired to make a reply to what Colman had aſſerted; but he, having excuſed himſelf, becauſe of his want of skill in the Engliſh language, requeſted, that Wilfrid might have leave to ſpeak the ſenſe of the Romaniſts. Wilfrid, obtaining the king's permiſſion, anſwered Colman very warmly. He explained the method of fixing Eaſter made uſe of by the church of Rome, and aſſerted, that all the churches in the world conformed to it, except the Scots, Picts, and Britons, who perſiſted in their fooliſh obſtinacy. Colman replied, that Wilfrid's manner of ſpeaking highly reflected on St. John's memory, who never would have eſtabliſhed a fooliſh cuſtom. Wilfrid, conſcious that he had expreſſed himſelf ſomewhat too freely, to juſtify St. John, ſaid, that he could not, at once, throw off all the Jewiſh ceremonies, leſt he ſhould offend the Aſiatick Jews, as St. Paul, for the ſame reaſon, had circumciſed Timothy; and, in the laſt place, he alledged, that the Romaniſts exactly followed, in this particular, what was preſcribed by St. Peter and St. Paul.

The paſſage I cited from Socrates ſhews, that it was as difficult to prove, that the cuſtom of the Romiſh church had its riſe from St. Peter, as that the practice of the Scotch church was derived from St. John. Beſides, the cycle of 19 years, then, uſed by the Romaniſts, was, doubtleſs, invented, after the time of St. Peter; but, as Colman and his party were but little acquainted with what was tranſacted abroad, and did not ſo much propoſe to prevail on the Romans to obſerve their cuſtoms, as to perſuade them to let them continue their own ancient practice, without interruption, they ſtill appealed to the authority of St. John and Columba. Wilfrid, however, demanded of Colman, with an air of triumph, whether he pretended to put Columba in the balance againſt St. Peter the prince of the apoſtles, to whom our Saviour ſaid, " Thou art Peter, and upon this " rock will I build my church." We are not told, what anſwer Colman returned; for it muſt be remarked, that all the account, we have of this council, is given us by the partiſans of Rome. However, it appears, Oſwy was convinced, that St. Peter had a prerogative above the other apoſtles, ſince he declared, at laſt, for the cuſtom he had eſtabliſh'd at Rome, in preference to that of St. John. Bede tells us, the king was brought to this conviction, by being told, that, as St. Peter had the keys of heaven, he would deny him entrance, if he obſtinately oppoſed his own inſtitution; and Oſwy's declaration, inſtantly, drew over a majority of votes for the Romaniſts.

In this ſynod, the controverſy, about the eccleſiaſtical tonſure, was alſo debated. The Romaniſts aſſerted, that the head ought to be ſhaved round, exactly in the place where our Saviour wore the crown of thorns, of which it was an emblem; but the Scotch prieſts ſhaved the fore-part of the head, from ear to ear. Bede does not relate the iſſue of this debate; but, in all likelihood, it was determined, in favour of the Romaniſts.

The affair of eaſter being decided againſt the Scots, Colman and his party retired into Scotland, as they could not think of ſubmitting to a deciſion, that ſeemed to them ſo unreaſonable. Thus, it is in matters of religion, things, at firſt, altogether indifferent become, at laſt, of the greateſt importance, by the pride and uncharitableneſs of the clergy. Cedd biſhop of the Eaſt-Angles, who had been interpreter to both parties in the ſynod, was the only one of Colman's adherents, that thought it his duty not to forſake his flock, for a thing ſo trifling, tho' he was of a different opinion from the Romaniſts. Tuda was Colman's ſucceſſor; and Eatta was made abbot of Lindisfarn, in the room of him that went off with Colman.

Thus, the ſtorm, this diſpute had raiſed, was allayed, to the great ſatisfaction of the Romaniſts, who foreſaw, that their ſucceſs, in this affair, would very much contribute to the eſtabliſhment of the pope's authority over the northern churches, as, in fact, it did. The church of Northumberland had been governed, for 30 years, by Aidan, Finan, and Colman, whom their adverſaries could charge with nothing, but their ſteddy adherence to the cuſtoms of their anceſtors, in the affair of eaſter. Upon Colman's retiring into Scotland, the government of the church of Northumberland was always committed either to Saxons, or foreigners trained up in the principles of the church of Rome, the Scotch being entirely excluded.

Tuda dying ſoon after, Alfred king of Deira, deſirous that Wilfrid, his preceptor, ſhould be made biſhop of York, the ſee whereof was then at Lindisfarn, ſent him into France, to be conſecrated by Agilbert biſhop of Paris; but, Wilfrid continuing a long time in France, Chad, then abbot of Leſtingham, was made biſhop of the Northumbrians. Chad went to Kent, to be conſecrated by Deuſdedit archbiſhop of Canterbury; but, finding he was lately deceaſed, he applied for conſecration to Wine biſhop of Wincheſter, and then returned into Northumberland. Bede ſays, he was a very holy man, free from pride or ambition, and that he accepted of his epiſcopal dignity, merely in obedience to the king's authority.

In the mean time, Wilfrid, returning into England, reſided a few months at Canterbury, to take care of that dioceſe, till Theodorus's arrival, and then proceeded to Northumberland. Finding that Chad was biſhop of Lindisfarn, and not daring to complain of Alfred's inconſtancy, he retired to his monaſtery at Rippon. In proceſs of time, Theodorus, in his viſitation of all the churches in England, coming to York, ſharply rebuked Chad, for his receiving conſecration from the biſhop of Wincheſter. Chad ſubmitted to his cenſure; and, without offering any thing in his own vindication, humbly complied with all his demands. The archbiſhop, charmed with his modeſt carriage, conſecrated him a-new; but he commanded him to return to his monaſtery, to make way for Wilfrid, whom the two kings of Northumberland had deſigned for the biſhoprick of York or Lindisfarn. Tho' Bede does not tell us, why Chad was ſent back to his monaſtery, after his ſecond conſecration; it is evident, Theodorus was gained over by the two kings, who were in Wilfrid's intereſt; and indeed, there does not appear to be any reaſon for depoſing Chad, ſince all defects, if there had been any, were taken off, by his conſecrating him again.

Wilfrid was very proud and imperious, one of theſe that are for lording it, wherever they come, tho' they expect condeſcenſion from all the world. His pride was, for ſome time, ſupported by the two kings of Northumberland; but, at length, Oſwy being dead, Alfred depoſed, and Egfrid on the throne, who had no regard for this prelate, Wilfrid did not meet with the reſpect, that was ſhewn him, in the reign of Oſwy. He was ſo mortified, on this account, that he could not ſmother his uneaſineſs; and, perhaps, he expreſſed it in ſuch an inſolent manner, that he incurred the king's diſpleaſure. Some time after, Theodorus coming again into Northumberland, Egfrid gave him to underſtand, that Wilfrid neglecting the duties of his function, by his arrogance, brought a great ſcandal on religion. The king's complaint was not groundleſs; for all hiſtorians are agreed, that he was extremely proud; that he affected to live in a royal manner; that he never appeared abroad without a pompous retinue; and that he was ſerved in gold. Theodorus, finding this a fair opportunity for enlarging the rights of his ſee, and leſſening thoſe of York, which had been an archbiſhoprick, in the time of Paulinus, was reſolved to embrace it; and, therefore, without hearing what

Wilfrid

Wilfrid had to ſay, in his own defence, depos'd him, obtaining the king's leave to divide Northumberland into two dioceſes. Boſa, who lived at York, was biſhop of the firſt, which contained the churches of Deira. Eatta was placed over the other ſee, which was ſtill fixed at Lindisfarn, conſiſting of the churches of Bernicia. Egfrid alſo made Lincolnſhire, which he had taken from the king of Mercia, a third biſhoprick, of which Ethedus was the firſt biſhop.

Wilfrid, incenſed at this diſgrace, directly ſet out for Rome, to lay his caſe before the pope; but Theodorus diſpatched a monk to inform the pope of the reaſons, why he degraded him. However, fearing Wilfrid might bring the pope over to his intereſt, becauſe of the ſervice he did the church of Rome, at the council of Whitby, he wrote to Ebroine, mayor of the palace to the king of France, to ſtop him on his journey. Wilfrid, being inform'd of this, determin'd to go, by the way of Frieſland *, where Adalgiſus the king hoſpitably received him, acquainting him, how Ebroine had requeſted him to detain or murder him. During his ſtay in Frieſland, we are told, he converted a great number to chriſtianity; and, at length, he departed to Strasbourg, from whence he was conducted in ſafety to Rome by the king of Auſtraſia.

Agatho, who was then pope, having heard Wilfrid's complaints, held a ſynod about them, who unanimouſly declared, that Wilfrid ſhould be reſtored to his biſhoprick. Wilfrid, upon this, returned home, and preſented to the king the ſentence of the ſynod at Rome, with a letter from the pope; but Egfrid had ſo little reſpect for either of them, that, after he had upbraided the biſhop, for obtaining them by bribery, he put him in priſon, where he kept him a whole year, and would not, then, have enlarged him, were it not for the importunate interceſſion of his aunt Æbba, and on condition that he would never, for the future, come into Northumberland.

Wilfrid, under all theſe diſcouragements, retir'd to the monaſtery of Glaſſenbury, where Bertwald, the abbot, allowed him a ſafe retreat; but Ethelred, king of Mercia and uncle to Bertwald, ſoon deſir'd him to diſmiſs him, on the account of Egfrid. In this extremity, Wilfrid fled for ſanctuary to Adelwalch king of Suſſex, who was converted, during his impriſonment in Mercia, tho' his ſubjects were ſtill idolaters. This prince, who protected him, requeſted him to attempt their converſion; and, in a ſhort time, by Wilfrid's miniſtry, the South-Saxons, as well as the inhabitants of the iſle of Wight, embraced the chriſtian faith. At leaſt, this is related by Eddius. the writer of his life, though, to ſpeak the truth, it is ſcarce poſſible to clear up the chronology of theſe facts. Wilfrid continued ſome years in Suſſex, where he was made biſhop of Selſey, as the ſequel will inform us.

In the mean time, Theodorus, having come, a third time, into Northumberland, erected a new biſhoprick at Hagulſtad or Hexham, of which Thumbert was the firſt biſhop, to make amends for Lincoln, now poſſeſs'd by the Mercians. Some time after, Theodorus coming thither, a fourth time, he called a council, in which Thumbert was depos'd, for preſuming to take it ill, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould exerciſe his juriſdiction over the northern churches. It was, indeed, contrary to the regulation of Gregory I. and the pall, ſent to Paulinus the firſt biſhop of the Northumbrians, evidently proves it was not the deſign of the court of Rome, that the churches of the north ſhould have any dependence on Canterbury; but Aidan, Finan, and Colman not having demanded the pall from the pope, York or Lindisfarn had only the bare title of a biſhoprick, which did not give theſe Scotch prelates the leaſt diſturbance, domineering over the church being a thing that was fartheſt from their thoughts. Theodorus, however, being the ſole archbiſhop in England, took hold of this opportunity to extend his juriſdiction over the north. With this view, in all probability, he degraded Wilfrid, divided York into three biſhopricks, and, laſtly, depoſed Thumbert, who had openly cenſured his uſurpations.

The council, that depoſed Thumbert, choſe Cuthbert, a monk of Lindisfarn, to ſucceed 685. him, who was the only one, that oppos'd his own election, thro' an exceſs of modeſty. The biſhops, who all thought him worthy of the epiſcopal dignity, with difficulty, brought him to a compliance, being, at laſt, obliged to conſent, that he ſhould continue at Lindisfarn, where he had long reſided, and, on this account, Eatta was tranſlated to Hagulſtad.

Some time after, Theodorus, being of a very advanced age, was touch'd with remorſe, for what he had done againſt Wilfrid; and, deſirous of a reconciliation, he ſo preſſingly interceded for him with Alfred, Egfrid's ſucceſſor, that he was recalled. The biſhoprick of Lindisfarn being then vacant, by the voluntary reſignation of Cuthbert, 686. Boſa was tranſlated thither, and Wilfrid reſtor'd to York.

Cuthbert return'd to his monaſtery at Lin- 687. disfarn, and died ſoon after. In proceſs of time, his body being removed to Durham, he became ſo famous for miracles, that, of all the Engliſh ſaints, he had the greateſt veneration paid to his memory.

Wilfrid was no ſooner fixed in his ſee, than he diſannull'd all that had been acted, during his diſgrace. He endeavour'd to re-unite York and Hagulſtad, claiming the revenues, that were appropriated to that biſhoprick. In a word, he made null and void all the regulations of Theodorus, and, perhaps, with reaſon; but, becauſe of his imperious conduct, he met with oppoſition from all quarters; and Alfred himſelf, his pupil and ſovereign, unable to bear any longer his inſolent

* Eddius ſays, he went firſt into France, where he was way-laid, and had his retinue and equipage plunder'd.

703. carriage, forced him once more from his church. This reſtleſs prelate was obliged to fly for ſhelter to Ethelred king of Mercia, formerly his enemy, but now his friend. Leiceſter, one of the four biſhopricks of Mercia, being vacant, Ethelred placed Wilfrid in that ſee, which, however, he did not long enjoy; for his haughty temper ſo diſpleaſed the king of Mercia, that he deprived him of it, in a few months. He took occaſion alſo to fall out with Berthwald archbiſhop of Canterbury, and forfeited his protection, which he ſo much wanted. Alfred and Ethelred, both now his enemies, having ſo good an opportunity to mortify his pride, deſired Berthwald to call a council, to enquire into Wilfrid's life and actions. The archbiſhop readily complying with their requeſt, a council was held at Oneſtresfield in Northumberland; and Wilfrid, being obliged to appear, was charged with crimes, for which he deſerved to be degraded. However, the biſhops rather choſe, by intreaties and threatenings, to bring him, if poſſible, to a voluntary reſignation of his biſhoprick, but to no purpoſe; for he told them, that their uſage of him was highly ungrateful, after all the ſervices he had done the Engliſh church. He boaſted, that he had contributed moſt of any to the fixing eaſter-day, according to the cuſtom of Rome, that he introduced the Roman ritual into the churches of the north, and that he prevailed on the Scots to conform to the rules of the order of St. Benedict. "For "theſe reaſons, ſaid he, ye ought rather to "reward me, than threaten to depoſe me "for imaginary crimes; but, if you will dare "to proceed, I will appeal to the pope. No "other has power to condemn me, and him "alone I acknowledge to be my judge." The council, however, unanimouſly depos'd him; but Wilfrid, tho' 70 years of age, reſolv'd upon a journey to Rome, for redreſs. The pope, always favourable to thoſe that appealed to him, call'd a ſynod of the neighbouring biſhops, wherein Wilfrid, upon his ſingle repreſentation of the caſe, was fully acquitted. After this, the pope gave him letters to Berthwald and the kings of Mercia and Northumberland, requiring them to reſtore Wilfrid, purſuant to the decree of the ſynod.

No ſooner was Wilfrid returned, than he went to the archbiſhop, who, finding he came with the pope's recommendation, promis'd him his friendſhip. Ethelred alſo, who had taken up the monkiſh habit, made interceſſion for him; but Alfred, at firſt, ſeem'd inflexible. He ſaid, he could ſee no reaſon, upon the pope's letter, and the ſentence of a foreign council that knew little of the affair, to reſtore a man that, having been baniſh'd ſeveral times, was, at length, lawfully depos'd by a ſynod; but he ſoon alter'd his mind. Eddius affirms, that, falling ſick, it was told him, that his diſtemper was a puniſhment ſent from God, for his diſobedience to the pope's orders; and that he, thereupon, made a vow to reſtore Wilfrid, provided he recover'd. Tho' death prevented him from performing his vow, he gave orders to Brithrick, whom he left guardian to his ſon Oſred, to put it in execution immediately.

The civil war raiſed by Edulph, who had uſurped the crown, for the preſent, prevented the reſtoration of Wilfrid, whoſe behaviour, at this juncture, ſeem'd to deprive him of all hopes of being ever reſtored. As he did not queſtion but Edulph, who was then beſieging the king and Brithrick in Bamborough-caſtle, would get the better, he made his court to him betimes, to ſecure his friendſhip, which had like to have proved his ruin; for Edulph, to gratify the Northumbrians, who, he was ſenſible, abhorred Wilfrid, forbade him his preſence. On the other hand, Brithrick, on the account of his conduct, no longer had any kindneſs for him; tho' upon the uſurper's death, not without ſome difficulty, he conſented, that Wilfrid ſhould be reſtor'd. To this purpoſe, a council was held near the river Nydd, which determined, that Wilfrid ſhould be biſhop of Hagulſtad, with which he was obliged to take up; and John, then 708.
biſhop of Hagulſtad, was tranſlated to York, vacant by the death of Boſa.

John, in 721, reſign'd his biſhoprick, retiring to the monaſtery of Beverly, of which he was abbot. He was canonized, after his death, and became very famous, by the name of St. John of Beverly. Wilfrid the younger, his chaplain, ſucceeded him, in the ſee of York; and to Wilfrid the elder ſucceeded Acca, one of the prieſts that attended him in his journey to Rome, where he made great proficiency in church-muſick, which, Bede tells us, it was impracticable for him to attain in his own country. Wilfrid the younger had for his ſucceſſor in the ſee of York Egbert, brother to Edbert king of Northumberland.

It was neceſſary to give a particular account of the northern biſhopricks, the ſucceſſions of the firſt biſhops, and the alterations occaſioned by Wilfrid, that we might be able to form a diſtinct notion of the churches of Northumberland. From this, we may alſo learn, how the archbiſhop of Canterbury had an opportunity of exerciſing his juriſdiction over all England, contrary to the regulation of Gregory I. to which Theodorus's enterprizing genius and the depoſing of Wilfrid did not a little contribute; for, if Wilfrid had continued in the ſee of York, he would certainly have obtain'd the pall, and thereby diſconcerted all Theodorus's meaſures.

The dignity of archbiſhop of York and metropolitan of the north vaniſhed with Paulinus. Upon that prelate's departure, the Northumbrians revolted from the faith; and the monks, Oſwald ſent for from Scotland, to recover them to chriſtianity, were ſatisfied with the bare title of biſhop, never applying to the pope for the pall, whoſe authority they did not acknowledge. Wilfrid, Colman's ſucceſſor, being degraded, the biſhoprick of the Northumbrians was divided into four, viz. York,

York, Whithern, Lindisfarn, and Hagulſtad, which was an obſtacle to the biſhop of York's requeſting the pall; beſides, Boſa, John, and Wilfrid the younger, who were ſucceſſively biſhops of that ſee, were men of religion and integrity, who did not, in the leaſt, aſpire after more honourable titles. But Egbert, being biſhop of York, and his brother on the throne of Northumberland, took the advan-
744. tage of the reſpect they had for him at Rome, on account of his birth, and procured the pall with the archiepiſcopal dignity; and, thus, he obtained a juriſdiction over the three other northern biſhops, who became his ſuffragans. From this time, the archbiſhops of York inſiſted on Gregory's regulation, who gave orders, that the two archbiſhopricks ſhould be upon a level and entirely independent. On the contrary, the archbiſhops of Canterbury pleaded the juriſdiction Theodorus exerciſed over all England, which occaſioned a conteſt between the two metropolitans, that was not decided, for many ages after. Alcuinus repreſents Egbert, whom he ſtiles his maſter, as an able and learned prelate, and ſays, that he built a library at York, furniſhing it with an excellent collection of books. Eanbald, his ſucceſſor, lived to the time of the diſſolution of the heptarchy.

The CHURCH of WESSEX.

WE do not find, that Auſtin ſent any of his companions to preach to the kingdom of Weſſex; for they were not converted, till 40 years after his arrival in Britain, by the
634. miniſtry of Birinus. This prieſt, being zealous for the advancement of chriſtianity, deſired pope Honorius, that he would ſend him into England. Being conſecrated a biſhop, he ſet out on his journey, and accidentally ar-
635. rived in the kingdom of Weſſex. As the inhabitants were idolaters, he determined to
636. continue among them, to attempt their converſion; and, in proceſs of time, he had the ſatisfaction to baptize Cinigiſil king of Weſſex and Quicelm his brother. Soon after, Birinus found, that his audience increaſed, multitudes following the examples of their kings. He remained, for 14 years, to edify his new converts, by his life and doctrine; and, having made a conſiderable progreſs, he died at Dorcheſter, where he had built a church and fixed his epiſcopal ſee.

Upon Birinus's death, Cenowalch, ſucceſſor to Cinigiſil his father, being ſtill a pagan, was no friend to the chriſtians; and, what was worſe, Penda, an idolater alſo, obliged Adelwalch to fly for refuge into Eaſt-Anglia, and kept Weſſex in his poſſeſſion, for three years; ſo that it is not to be ſuppoſed, that the goſpel could make any great progreſs, during
646. this interval, in the midſt of wars and commotions. Cenowalch, however, being converted in Eaſt-Anglia, and afterwards reſtored to his dominions, was the means of reviving religion in his kingdom, where, ſince Birinus's deceaſe, none had been very active in 650. eſtabliſhing the new converts. In the mean time, Agilbert, a Frenchman, juſt arrived from his ſtudies in Ireland, paſſing thro' Wincheſter, in his way to France, Cenowalch invited him to ſtay with him, to inſtruct his ſubjects. Agilbert complying being conſecrated a biſhop, went and reſided at Dorcheſter; but, not having the gift of languages, he made but ſmall proficiency. Cenowalch, finding that he could not learn Engliſh, and that it was to no purpoſe to preach to his people, in a foreign language, grew weary of Agilbert. At length, he divided his kingdom into two dioceſes; and, leaving Agilbert 660.
at Dorcheſter, he made Wina a Saxon, who had been trained up and conſecrated in France, biſhop of Wincheſter. Agilbert, extremely uneaſy that the king ſhould make this diviſion, without conſulting him, and, eſpecially, that the new biſhop ſhould be placed in the capital, having obſerved, that no notice was taken of his complaints, retired into France, where he was made biſhop of Paris. He returned into England, to aſſiſt at the ſynod of Whitby; and, in the interim, Cenowalch, falling 666.
out with Wina, forced him away alſo.

Weſſex being now without a biſhop, and eccleſiaſticks qualified for ſuch an office not very common in England, Cenowalch thought fit to recall Agilbert, who would not quit Paris for Wincheſter. However, he recommended to the king his nephew Eleutherius, a prieſt; who, being accepted of and conſe-
670. crated by Theodorus, became ſole biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons.

Cenowalch dying, Weſſex was infeſted with civil wars, for 10 years. Eleutherius, in the mean time, died, and had Heda for his ſucceſſor. After Heda's death, the number of chriſtians being vaſtly increaſed, Weſſex was again divided into two dioceſes, the ſees whereof were fixed at Wincheſter and Sherborn. Daniel was placed in the former; and Aldhelm, nephew to king Ina, the firſt Engliſhman that wrote in Latin, underſtanding it better than any of his countrymen before him, was made biſhop of the latter. When he was, thus, promoted, he was abbot of Malmsbury monaſtery, ſo called from Maidulph a Scotchman, the firſt abbot, and Aldhelm his ſucceſſor *. Forthere, according to Bede, well verſed in the ſcriptures, was biſhop of Sherborn after Aldhelm; and Almund was Daniel's ſucceſſor, in the ſee of Wincheſter. From this time, to the diſſolution of the heptarchy, I meet with nothing remarkable, in the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of Weſſex.

The

The CHURCH of MERCIA.

THE Mercians did not embrace chriſtianity, till 50 years after the converſion of Kent. Penda, who reigned above 30 years, was of too proud and turbulent ſpirit to fall in with a religion ſo contrary to his temper; yet providence ſo ordered affairs, that, tho' he did not profeſs, he at, leaſt, tolerated the chriſtian religion in his dominions. Peda his eldeſt ſon, whom he had made king of Leiceſter, who went into Northumberland, to demand Anfleda, king Oſwy's daughter, in marriage, could obtain her on no other terms, but his becoming a chriſtian. Whether Peda apprehended, that, in the like caſe, he ſhould meet with the ſame obſtruction, in all the other kingdoms, already converted, or, whether he had a favourable opinion of chriſtianity, he received baptiſm, before he left Northumber-
643. land. At his return, he brought with him four prieſts, Cedda, Adda, Beti, and Diuma, to inſtruct the Mercians in the chriſtian faith; which, whether it was out of complaiſance to his ſon, or becauſe all religions were indifferent to him, the king his father did not oppoſe. Diuma a Scotchman, who was the only biſhop of the four, governed the church of Mercia proſperouſly, for ſome years, he and his fellow-labourers having met with a plentiful harveſt in this kingdom, the largeſt of the ſeven, and the laſt that was converted. Cellach ſucceeded Diuma.

Upon Penda's death, Mercia was, three years, ſubject to Oſwy king of Northumber-
659. land; but, he being a chriſtian, religion received no damage from this revolution. However, Wulfer, who was ſtill a pagan, aſcending the throne, thro' a blind zeal, perſecuted his chriſtian ſubjects, and even put to death two of his own ſons, who refuſed to renounce their faith, if we can believe thoſe who relate this fact, which ſeems to have no foundation. Happily for the chriſtians, this ſtorm was of
Rob. de Swapham. a ſhort continuance, Wulfer being converted ſoon after.

During this perſecution, Cellach retreated into Scotland; ſo that, when Wulfer embraced chriſtianity, he ſent for Trumhere, an Engliſh prieſt, educated in Scotland, and had him conſecrated biſhop of Mercia. To him ſucceeded Jaruman, who replanted the chri-
664. ſtian religion in Eſſex, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Upon Jaruman's death, Wulfer requeſted Theodorus to ſend him a biſhop, who re-
* Or Ceada. joiced at this opportunity of promoting Chad*, whom he deprived of the ſee of York, as was, above, related, in the hiſtory of Northumberland. Chad, coming to Mercia, fixed his ſee at Litchfield, where he died, after he
669. had governed the church, with prudence and ſucceſs, for many years. I am perſuaded, it will not give offence, that I refer thoſe to Bede's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, who have the curioſity to ſee a liſt of Chad's miracles, and the hymns the angels ſang in the air, over his houſe, when he lay on his death-bed.

Upon this Theodorus, advanced Winfrid, a prieſt, to the biſhoprick of Litchfield, whom 675.
he degraded ſoon after, for daring to expoſtulate with him, on the account of the authority he aſſumed over the other biſhops; * Now Peterborow.
and Saxulph, abbot of Medes-hamſted *, ſucceeded Winfrid. The number of chriſtians in Mercia being daily increaſed, Ethelred, Wulfer's ſucceſſor, divided his kingdom into four dioceſes, Litchfield, Worceſter, Hereford, and Leiceſter. Saxulph remained at Litchfield. Faddrick was ſent to Worceſter; 680.
but dying, before his conſecration, Boſelus was placed in his room. Cuthwin had the ſee of Leiceſter, and Putta was biſhop of Hereford. Upon Cuthwin's death, Leiceſter was united to Litchfield; but they were, in proceſs of time, ſeparated again, on Wilfrid's account, who was depoſed from York, and did not hold this ſee long †. Heda was ſucceſſor † Vid. church of Northum.
to Saxulph, in the biſhoprick of Litchfield.

I ſhall overlook the particulars relating to the Mercian churches, that are of no conſequence, with the ſucceſſion of their biſhops, to come at the revolution that fell out in the reign of Offa, by the erecting of Litchfield into an archbiſhoprick. Offa, jealous of the archbiſhop of Canterbury's juriſdiction over the churches of Mercia, and eſpecially having had a quarrel with Lambert, who then filled the archiepiſcopal ſee, reſolved to withdraw the churches of Mercia from their ſubjection to his authority. With this view, he ſecretly ſollicited pope Adrian I. to make the biſhop of Litchfield an archbiſhop, and the biſhops of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia his ſuffragans. The pope willingly gave his conſent, hoping, by obliging this prince, to have an opportunity of extending his juriſdiction over the church of England, which was not, hitherto, ſo thoroughly ſubmitted to, at leaſt, not ſo much as he could have wiſh'd. To this end, he ſent Gregory biſhop of Oſtia, 784.
and Theophylact biſhop of Todi, as his legates, to negotiate this affair. To amuſe Lambert, they came under the pretence of calling ſynods in England, for the confirmation of the churches in the chriſtian faith, Upon their arrival, Theophylact continued, ſome time, with Offa, to concert meaſures to bring about their deſign; whilſt Gregory proceeded to Northumberland, where he held a ſynod, of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Up- 785.
on his return to Mercia, the two legates convened a national council of the ſeven kingdoms at Calcuith, where king Offa was preſent. Having ratified the canons of the Northumberland-ſynod, the erecting of Litchfield into an archbiſhoprick was propoſed. Lambert oppoſed it, to the utmoſt of his power, tho' to no purpoſe; for, this affair having been previouſly ſettled, the authority of Offa and the legates bore down all oppoſition. Higbert, then biſhop of Litchfield, was declared an archbiſhop; and the biſhops of Mercia and East-Anglia were made his ſuffragans. He died, before he received the pall; but Adulph, who ſucceeded him, had that honour from the pope, who ratify'd what the council had determin'd. Some think, Offa purchas'd this favour with the tax of Peter-pence levied on Mercia and East-Anglia; but this is downright conjecture. Litchfield did not enjoy the title of an archbiſhoprick, above 14 years. Offa and Egfrid his ſon being deceaſed, Cenulph was ſo far prevailed on by the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, who repreſented to him the regulation of Gregory I. according to which there ought to be no more than two archbiſhops in England, that he himſelf wrote to the pope, to deſire him to reſtore things to their primitive ſtate. Adelard, archbiſhop of Canterbury, tranſacted this affair at Rome; and, at length, after a nine years ſollicitation, he obtain'd an order from pope Leo III. that Mercia and East-Anglia ſhould again be under the juriſdiction of the ſee of Canterbury. From this time to the reign of Egbert, nothing remarkable occur'd in the church of Mercia, except the councils, which I ſhall take notice of in another place. 800.

The Church of ESSEX.

604. THE goſpel was, firſt, preached to the East-Saxons by Mellitus, one of the miſſionaries ſent over to Auſtin; but all the ſucceſs he met with was, in all probability, 614. owing to the authority of Sabert king of Eſſex and Ethelbert king of Kent, ſince, upon their deaths, all the East-Saxon converts revolted to paganiſm, and expell'd Mellitus, never admitting him to return. The converſion of the East-Saxons, then, is not to be dated from this time, but rather from the reign of Sigebert the good. This prince preſerving an uninterrupted friendſhip with Oſwy king of Northumberland, and making him frequent viſits, was inſtructed in the chriſtian religion at his court, and received baptiſm there. Returning, he brought with him Cedd a Northumbrian prieſt, who, being alſo a biſhop, attempted the converſion of the East-Saxons, and with remarkable ſucceſs. He was the only Scotchman, that, after the ſynod of Whitby, remained with his flock, tho' the controverſy, about eaſter, was decided, contrary to his opinion; and he even cenſur'd Colman and his adherents, for leaving their flocks, on the account of a thing of ſo little importance. His ſtrict regard to eccleſiaſtical diſcipline occaſion'd Sigebert's death, or, at leaſt, it was ſo repreſented, as we have obſerved, in the hiſtory of Northumberland. As Cedd often viſited Northumberland, where he had ſpent a conſiderable part of his life, Adelwalt, king of Deira, gave him certain lands near Leſtingham, where he founded a monaſtery. Thither he uſually retir'd to practiſe the greateſt auſterities; and there alſo he died of the plague, after he had governed the church of Eſſex ſeveral years. Bede, who gives him great encomiums, mentioning his auſtere way of living, takes occaſion to tell us, that faſting was religiouſly put in practice by all who pretended to a regular life, and that ſome faſted every Wedneſday and Friday, till 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The Saxon homilies alſo are very particular on this article, tho' they rationally caution againſt exceſſive faſtings.

Upon the deaths of Sigebert the good and Swithelm his brother, in the reign of Sebba and Siger, the plague raged terribly in Eſſex, eſpecially, at London. Siger, believing that it was ſent among the East-Saxons, as a puniſhment from the gods, for deſerting the religion of their anceſtors, revolted to paganiſm, and his ſubjects, who were not, hitherto, thoroughly converted, followed his example; but Sebba continued ſtedfaſt in the profeſſion of chriſtianity. Wulfer, king of Mercia, to whom theſe princes were, at that time, ſubject, on this occaſion, ſent Jaruman his biſhop, to attempt the recovery of the East-Anglians to the chriſtian faith; and his labours were crown'd with abundant ſucceſs. Soon after, Wulfer, who was abſolute in the kingdom of Eſſex, exhibited the firſt inſtance of ſimony in England, by ſelling the biſhoprick of London to Wina, who had been expelled from Wincheſter; and he governed the church of Eſſex, till his death, in 675. Erkenwald ſucceeded him, famous for his ſingular affection to the city of London, as well as for the ſanctity of his life, on account of which he was enrolled in the catalogue of the ſaints. Erkenwald dying, a warm conteſt aroſe, between the canons of St. Paul's at London and the monks of Bangor, who ſhould bury him; but the former, carrying their point, interr'd him in their cathedral. I ſhall proceed no farther, in the ſucceſſion of the biſhops of London, as nothing remarkable happened, from this time, to the diſſolution of the heptarchy. 664. 666.

The Church of EAST-ANGLIA.

THE firſt converſion of the East-Angles is dated from the reign of Redowald; but it is not known, by whom they were converted. It is probable, that, whilſt this prince lived, chriſtianity made no great progreſs in East-Anglia. The moſt plauſible conjecture is, that Redowald having a reſpect for Ethelbert king of Kent, at whoſe court, ſome affirm, he was baptized, permitted ſome of Auſtin's companions to preach in his dominions, and did not perſecute thoſe who were inclin'd to embrace the goſpel. What is related, concerning his ſuffering the true God and the pagan idols to be worſhipp'd in the ſame temple, ſeems to prove, that he was not himſelf a chriſtian, and that the number of converts in Eaſt-Anglia was very inconſiderable. However, it is certain, that chriſtianity did not flouriſh in this kingdom, either in his or his ſon Erpwald's reign; and, therefore, it cannot be a great miſtake, if we place the converſion of the Eaſt-Angles, in the reign of Sigebert, Erpwald's ſucceſſor.

This prince, who had been long in France, where he received baptiſm, was thoroughly inſtructed in the chriſtian religion. Returning home, to take poſſeſſion of the crown, he brought with him Felix, a Burgundian prieſt, and had him conſecrated a biſhop at Canterbury. Felix, upon his arrival in Eaſt-Anglia, was very induſtrious, in reclaiming thoſe who had renounced the faith, and in converting thoſe who never had embraced chriſtianity; and ſuch was his ſucceſs, that the Eaſt-Angles came, in ſwarms, to be baptized. In the interim, that they might have continual inſtructions, to confirm them in the belief of chriſtianity, Sigebert erected ſchools, like thoſe he had ſeen in France. Some aſſert, * that the univerſity of Cambridge owes its original to theſe ſchools; but this opinion ſeems to be groundleſs.

In the mean time, Sigebert received farther aſſiſtance from Furſeus an Iriſh monk, whoſe labours, among the Eaſt-Angles, were very ſucceſsful. Bede gives him an extraordinary character, attributing to him ſeveral miracles; nay, he aſſures us, that, like St. Paul, he was rapt up into heaven. Furſeus built a monaſtery at Cnobersburgh †, which was largely endowed, at ſeveral times, by the kings of Eaſt-Anglia. The commotions that aroſe, upon Sigebert's reſigning the crown, obliged Furſeus to retire into France, where he founded the monaſtery of Lagny, in the juriſdiction of Meaux.

Felix was biſhop of the Eaſt-Angles 17 years, his ſee being fixed at Dummoc, now Dunwich *, a little town by the ſea-ſide. Here it was, that he converted and baptized Cenowalch king of Weſſex, who had retreated into Eaſt-Anglia. Felix had, for his ſucceſſor, Thomas, a deacon of that church. To him ſucceeded Berchtgiſlus, ſirnamed Boniface; and, after him, came Biſus. Biſus being ſuperannuated, Becca and Badwin were made his aſſiſtants, and Eaſt-Anglia was divided into two dioceſes. Becca reſided at Dummoc, and Badwin at Elmham, now a poor village in Norfolk. Both theſe biſhopricks were in being, till, the Danes becoming maſters of Eaſt-Anglia, they lay vacant, for above 100 years; and, after this, the dioceſe of Dummoc was re-united to Elmham. From hence, the epiſcopal ſee was removed to Thetford ‡, and afterwards to Norwich , where it continues to this day.

* In Suffolk. It is reported to have had 50 churches.

The CHURCH of SUSSEX.

IT is no wonder, the kingdom of Suſſex continued pagan, ſo long after the reſt, as it was ſubject to Weſſex, where the goſpel was not preached, till 40 years after Auſtin's arrival. If we may give credit to Eddius, who wrote the life of Wilfrid biſhop of York, this prelate converted the South-Saxons, having, upon his diſgrace, fled for refuge into Suſſex. King Adelwalch, who protected him, had already attempted the converſion of his ſubjects, by founding a monaſtery in his kingdom ††, but to very little purpoſe; and, perhaps, Wilfrid would have met with no better ſucceſs, were it not for a favourable juncture, that unexpectedly happen'd. Soon after his arrival, their country being miſerably diſtreſs'd, for want of proviſions, he taught the South-Saxons the art of fiſhing in the ſea, their skill before reaching no farther than the catching of eels. This improvement, as it greatly relieved them, made ſo deep an impreſſion on their minds, that they liſten'd with the ſame attention to his inſtructions about their ſpiritual, as they had before to thoſe about their bodily wants; and, beſides, ſeaſonable ſhowers, after a three years drought, reſtoring the earth to its former fruitfulneſs, they were fully convinced, according to Eddius, that Wilfrid was an extraordinary perſon, ſignally favour'd by heaven. Wilfrid, finding that the chriſtians became daily more numerous, fixed his epiſcopal ſee at *† Selſey, a ſmall peninſula given him by Adelwalch. Here alſo he founded a monaſtery, which he furniſh'd with the monks he brought with him from Northumberland; and in this place he uſually reſided, during the time of his exile. Wilfrid being, at length, recalled, Selſey was, a long while, without a biſhop, the South-Saxons, after their ſubjection to the kings of Weſſex, being placed under the juriſdiction of the biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons. In proceſs of time, Weſſex being divided into two dioceſes, Suſſex was annexed to the ſee of Wincheſter; till a ſynod held in Weſſex, in the time of Daniel, decreed, that Suſſex ſhould be a diſtinct dioceſe, and the ſee fixed at Selſey, as formerly. Edbert was the firſt biſhop; and his ſucceſſors reſided at the ſame place, to the year 1070, when the

Having given an account of the principal particulars, relating to the converſion of the ſeven kingdoms, it will be requiſite to take a general view of the councils held in England, during thoſe early times of the church.

The COUNCILS, during the HEPTARCHY.

I Have already mentioned the two ſynods convened, at the requeſt of Auſtin, to bring over the Britons to ſubmit to the pope's authority; and, tho' theſe were rather Britiſh than Engliſh councils, I cannot paſs them over, without the following remark. Bede affirms, that Auſtin demanded of the Britons, that they would celebrate Eaſter the ſame day with the Romaniſts; that they would conform to the ceremonies uſed by the church of Rome, in the adminiſtration of baptiſm; that they would aſſiſt the Roman miſſionaries, in converting the Saxons; and that they would ſubmit to the papal authority. Had Auſtin laid the ſame ſtreſs on each of theſe four articles, Bede would, doubtleſs, have given us the ſentiments of the Britiſh biſhops, about the three firſt, tho' he ſpeaks only of the laſt; from whence it appears, that it was the point Auſtin chiefly inſiſted on, and, accordingly, the abbot of Bangor, in his anſwer, takes no notice of any of the other articles.

I have, above, ſaid what is ſufficient, concerning the council of Whitby and the other ſynods, called on the account of Wilfrid.

The council of Hertford. 673.

In 673, Theodorus, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſummoned a national ſynod at Hertford, at which were preſent all the Engliſh biſhops, with a vaſt number of other eccleſiaſticks. The archbiſhop, being preſident, put the queſtion to the biſhops, Whether they were willing, the church of England ſhould be governed by the canons of the antient councils? They all agreeing, he produced a liſt of the canons; and, pitching upon ten, he ordered them to be read before the council, asking their conſent to each of them.

I. That Eaſter might be kept, in all the Engliſh churches, on the firſt Sunday after the full moon in March.

II. That no biſhop ſhould incroach on the juriſdiction of another.

III. That no monk ſhould quit his monaſtery, without leave from the abbot.

IV. That biſhops ſhould not meddle with the temporal concerns of the monaſteries.

V. That none of the clergy ſhould abandon their dioceſes, without the biſhop's leave; and that they ſhould not be received into another dioceſe, without a certificate under the biſhop's own hand.

VI. That biſhops, out of their dioceſe, ought not to exerciſe any part of their function, but be contented with an hoſpitable reception.

VII. That a ſynod ſhould be held twice a year. But this canon was alter'd to once a year.

VIII. That new ſees be erected, as the number of chriſtians increaſed. This was rejected.

IX. That the biſhops ſhould take their places at councils, according to their ſeniority.

X. That no marriage ſhould be diſannull'd, except for adultery; and that, if a man put away his wife, he ought either to be reconciled, or live ſingle.

Nine of theſe canons being approved of, the council denounced excommunication and degradation againſt all that ſhould make any infraction upon them, and ſo broke up.

Baronius pretends, this council was called, by the pope's order, and that Theodorus preſided, as legate of the holy ſee; but the cardinal advances nothing to ſupport his aſſertion, but the words of Theodorus, in his harangue, at the opening of the council, viz. that he was conſecrated by the pope, as if that were equivalent to his being made a legate. Bede, Malmsbury, and Florence of Worceſter, who take notice of this council, do not give the leaſt countenance to Baronius's notion.

The council of Hatfield. 680.

Theodorus convened another council at Hatfield †, upon the pope's requeſt, who was deſirous of knowing the ſentiments of the church of England, in reference to the hereſy of the Monothelites ‡, which then made a great noiſe in the world. The pope had all the ſatisfaction he deſired, the Engliſh being entirely free from that error. This ſynod received the five firſt general councils , and alſo the council held a little before at Rome, againſt the Monothelites.

The council of Becanceld. 694.

The next council met at Becanceld, in 694, being called by Withred king of Kent, who preſided himſelf, the council conſiſting of the clergy and nobility. All the conſtitutions were drawn up, in the form of a charter, wherein the king granted ſeveral immunities to the church, particularly, an exemption from the payment of taxes and other incumbrances incident to a lay-fee. He declares alſo,

alſo, that the church has a power to govern her own body, the prerogative royal not extending to religious affairs. This article has led ſome to think, that this council was not genuine *. They object, for inſtance, that the five abbeſſes, who ſubſcribed this charter, not only ſigned before all the prieſts, but even before Botred a biſhop, contrary to all precedent. Others †, on the other hand, as zealouſly defend it, as making for the independency of the church. It would be too great a digreſſion from my preſent deſign, to examine the reaſons pro and con; it is ſufficient to acquaint the reader, that there is ſuch a diſpute.

The council of Berkhamſtead. 697.

The enſuing year, the ſynod of Berkhamſtead * was held in the ſame reign; and, like the former, was compoſed of clergy and laity. Its canons chiefly related to the ſin of adultery, and the privileges of the clergy. As for adultery, it was decreed, that the guilty perſon ſhould undergo penance, and that, upon his refuſal, he ſhould be excommunicated; but, if a ſtranger, he was to forfeit 100 ſhillings.

* In Hertfordſhire.

As for the clergy, it was enacted, that the church ſhould be free and enjoy all her privileges.

That the breach of the church's peace ſhould be puniſhed with a fine of 50 ſhillings.

That the affirmation of a king, or a biſhop, ſhould be equivalent to an oath.

That if a biſhop, or an abbot, being accus'd of any crime, declares ſolemnly at the altar, that he ſpeaks the truth, this declaration ſhall be equal to his oath.

That, if any clergyman ſhould be proſecuted, the cognizance of the cauſe belongs to the church.

Thus, by degrees, the clergy obtain'd their privileges, which they have too often abus'd.

† In Northumberland.

The two councils of Londone and Alne †, in 714, being look'd upon by the beſt authors, as ſpurious, it would be a loſs of time, to ſay any thing about them.

The ſynod of Cloveſhoo. 747.

In 747, a national ſynod was held at Cloveſhoo or Cliff ‡ in the kingdom of Kent, at which Ethelbald, king of Mercia, was preſent, with 12 biſhops and many of the nobility. Cuthbert archbiſhop of Canterbury, who preſided, read pope Zachary's letter, wherein the pope admoniſh'd the Engliſh to reform their lives, threatening thoſe with excommunication, that perſiſted in their wicked courſes. They drew up a body of 28 canons, chiefly relating to the eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, the government of monaſteries, the duties of biſhops and other clergymen, the publick ſervice, ſinging of pſalms, keeping the ſabbath, and other holidays. I ſhall take notice of three of them, as containing ſomething particular in them.

The Xth orders the prieſts to be thoroughly acquainted with the doctrines of chriſtianity, and to teach the people the apoſtles creed and the Lord's prayer in Engliſh. Accordingly, Bede, in his letter to Egbert archbiſhop of York, tells him, that it was abſolutely neceſſary chriſtians ſhould know what they ſaid, when they prayed to God; and that, therefore, he had himſelf tranſlated the creed and the Lord's prayer into Engliſh, for the uſe of thoſe that did not underſtand Latin.

The XXVIth cautions chriſtians againſt the vain opinion, that, by giving alms, they could compound for their ſins, or diſpenſe with the diſcipline of the church.

The XXVIIth was enacted, by reaſon of a wealthy layman, who, being excommunicated, requeſted to be reſtored to the communion of the church, on his having procured ſeveral perſons to faſt in his ſtead; alledging that their penance, on his account, was more than he could have done for himſelf in 300 years. The canon declaims very ſharply againſt this intolerable preſumption, ſince, at that rate, the rich might more eaſily attain heaven, than the poor, contrary to the expreſs declaration of our Saviour.

In this canon, we have the form of a prayer for the dead, as follows: "O Lord, "we beſeech thee, grant that the ſoul of ſuch "a perſon may be ſecured in a ſtate of re- "poſe, and admitted, with the reſt of thy "ſaints, into the regions of light and bliſs."

The council of Calcuith. 783.

The council of Calcuith or Calchite, held in 783, or, as others think, in 787, in order to erect Litchfield into an archbiſhoprick, ratify'd the canons of the ſynod, that had been called juſt before in Northumberland. Gregory and Theophylact, who preſided, as the pope's legates, acknowledged, in their letter to the pope, that they were the firſt, that had been ſent into England with that character. The following canons of this ſynod were ratify'd by the council of Calcuith.

I. That all clergymen ſhould ſtrictly adhere to the council of Nice.

II. That baptiſm is only to be adminiſter'd at eaſter and whitſontide, unleſs in caſes of neceſſity; and that god-fathers ought to teach their god-children the creed and the Lord's prayer, both which all chriſtians are obliged to have by heart.

VIII. The antient privileges of the church muſt be carefully obſerved.

This was a ſtanding canon in all the councils.

IX. The prieſts ought not to eat alone, unleſs indiſpos'd. This ſeems to intimate, that the clergy were not diſpers'd in pariſhes, but lived all in the capital of the dioceſe in common.

The Xth forbids the clergy to celebrate divine ſervice, without ſtockins, and to make uſe of a chalice or patin of horn.

The XIth exhorts princes to govern their kingdoms, by the direction of the biſhops, to whom the power of binding and looſing is committed.

The XIIth excludes baſtards from the ſucceſſion to the crown.

The XVth condemns marriages within the prohibited degrees.

The XVIth makes baſtards, eſpecially the children of nuns, incapable of inheriting.

The XVIIth enforceth the payment of tithes, from the authority of the law of Moſes.

The XVIIIth urges a ſtrict performance of vows.

Some irregularities in the ſubſcription-liſt, in the ſeveral copies of the canons of this council, have led ſome to queſtion the matter of fact; but, perhaps, they are not ſufficient to render the whole doubtful *.

The ſynod of Finchale. 798.

In 798, Eanbald, archbiſhop of York, held a ſynod at Finchale in Northumberland, to make ſome regulations about diſcipline; but he took occaſion alſo to order the canons of the firſt five general councils to be read, which were unanimouſly received.

The council of Cloveſhoo. 800. Another there. 803.

The council of Cloveſhoo, in 800, was called by Adelard archbiſhop of Canterbury, for the recovery of certain church-lands uſurped by the kings of Mercia.

Three years after, another ſynod was held at the ſame place, wherein, according to pope Leo's conſtitution, and by the conſent of Cenulph king of Mercia, Litchfield was reduced to a biſhoprick, as formerly.

The council of Calcuith. 816.

In 816, Wilfrid, archbiſhop of Canterbury, held a council at Calcuith, at which Cenulph, king of Mercia, was preſent, with all the Engliſh biſhops, thoſe of Northumberland excepted. This ſynod drew up eleven canons; but the IId and Vth are the moſt remarkable.

The IId orders all churches to be conſecrated by the biſhop of the dioceſe, with the following formalities. The biſhop ſhall bleſs the holy-water, and ſprinkle the church with it, as the ritual directs. Having conſecrated the euchariſt, he muſt put it in a box, with ſome reliques, to be laid up in the church; and, if there are no reliques, the conſecrated elements, being the body and blood of our Lord, ſhall be ſufficient. Every biſhop ought to have drawn upon the altar, or the wall, the image of the ſaint, to whom the church is dedicated.

The Vth declares, that no Scotchman ſhould baptize or read divine ſervice in England.

There is mention made of two other councils in Mercia, in the reign of Bernulph, one in 822, and the other in 824; but, in all probability, the firſt is a mere fiction, and they are neither of them worth notice.

REFLECTIONS on the primitive ſtate of the Engliſh CHURCH.

I Shall conclude my account of the primitive ſtate of the Engliſh church, with a few reflections, that may be of uſe to give us a juſt idea of the thing itſelf. We are not to imagine, that the primitive church of England exactly reſembled that founded by the apoſtles, immediately after our Saviour's death. The chriſtian church, in her infancy, was perfect and ſpotleſs; but, in proceſs of time, ſhe loſt, by degrees, her original purity. From the days of the apoſtles to the VIIth century, ſeveral errors and abuſes had crept in, which ſtrangely deformed her; and, as theſe corruptions increaſed in the VIIIth and IXth centuries, true religion, at length, degenerated into ſuperſtition. Our notion, then, of the primitive church of England muſt correſpond with the ſtate of the chriſtian church, at that time. Without pointing out the ſeveral innovations in the doctrines and ſervice of the church, I ſhall only obſerve, that the chriſtian church, at the time of the converſion of the Engliſh, was very much corrupted. For inſtance, how many religious cuſtoms were introduced by the monks, who were become exceedingly numerous all over Chriſtendom, that were not of divine or apoſtolical inſtitution; as if our Saviour and his apoſtles had not given ſufficient inſtructions in theſe matters. Theſe voluntary acts of devotion, tho' introduced with a pious deſign, were already regarded by the generality of chriſtians, as the life and ſoul of religion. I will not enlarge on this ſubject, ſince I do not propoſe to enter into the controverſy; but ſhall content myſelf with this remark, that the Engliſh, converted in the VIIth century, are to be conſidered as in the ſame ſtate with the reſt of the chriſtian world in thoſe days, as it was impoſſible for them to know more than their maſters taught them.

Auſtin and his companions were the firſt, that preached the goſpel to the Anglo-Saxons, tho' the honour of their converſion is not entirely due to them; for the Scotch monks of St. Columba had, at leaſt, as great a ſhare in it as the Italians, as they recovered thoſe that relapſed into idolatry, or rather converted them a-new. This was the caſe in Eſſex, Northumberland, and Eaſt-Anglia, as I have, above, related; and the Italian miſſionaries had no concern at all, in the converſion of the Mercians. Auſtin, indeed, aſſumed the honour of converting the Engliſh, though the progreſs he made was not ſo very conſiderable. It is certain, he preached to the Saxons of Kent, as Mellitus did to thoſe of Eſſex, and with ſucceſs too; but it is highly probable, this work was begun, and in great forwardneſs, when Auſtin arrived in England. It is not eaſy to conceive, how theſe monks, who made uſe of interpreters, could have converted ſuch a vaſt number of pagans, even to the baptizing 10,000 in one day, in a few months after their coming, if the Saxons had not been already prepared. This conjecture receives farther confirmation, from the letters of Gregory I. to Theodorick king of Auſtraſia, to Theodbert his brother, and to queen Brunichild, to deſire them to aſſiſt Auſtin in his journey to England; for the pope aſſures them, he was credibly informed, that the Engliſh were earneſtly deſirous of becoming chriſtians; which evidently proves, that they were, in a manner, half-converted. It may very reaſonably be preſumed, that king Ethelbert had a favourable opinion of chriſtianity, by the means of his queen, and eſpecially Luidhard biſhop of Soiſſons, who attended her into England. This is poſitively aſſerted by the author of the hiſtory of St. Auſtin's monaſtery; and Malmsbury tells us, that Ethelbert was very deſirous to hear Auſtin's propoſals. Beſides, Auſtin's perſon, character, and conduct will not allow us to believe, that his progreſs was ſo great, as it is repreſented. Bede himſelf, who does not ſeem willing, in the leaſt, to leſſen his reputation, ſays nothing, that can give us a very great idea of his preaching. Inſtead of embelliſhing his hiſtory with the principal heads of Auſtin's firſt diſcourſe before Ethelbert, he only relates the king's anſwer; which renders it ſhrewdly to be ſuſpected, that he had no great opinion of this harangue. Moreover, Auſtin's queſtions, which he propoſed to the pope, do not convey to us a raiſed notion of his parts; and, doubtleſs, for this very reaſon, Bede abridged them as much as poſſible, even to make them ſometimes ſo obſcure, that their meaning is not to be apprehended, but by the anſwer.

It may be farther added, that Auſtin, in the height of his ſucceſs, for which he is ſo famous, ſettled no more than two biſhops, Juſtus at Rocheſter and Mellitus at London, tho' the pope had expreſly ordered him to eſtabliſh biſhops, wherever there was occaſion for them; a convincing proof, that his progreſs was not ſo conſiderable as Gregory imagined. But what can we think of this miſſionary, who, the very firſt year, deſerts his miſſion, and goes to Arles, to be conſecrated an archbiſhop, when, as yet, there was but a handful of chriſtians in England, or rather in the ſingle kingdom of Kent? Of what uſe was the title of archbiſhop and primate, when there was not a biſhop in being? Beſides, what conſtruction can we put upon the pope's anſwer to him, concerning the biſhops of Gaul, that he allows him no manner of juriſdiction over them? May it not be preſumed, that Auſtin, not ſatisfy'd with the primacy of Great-Britain, with which the pope honoured him, wanted to extend his juriſdiction over Gaul too? In a word, what can we think of Gregory's letter to him, wherein he exhorts him not to be elated at the gift of miracles, which God had beſtowed on him, unleſs Auſtin had inform'd him, that he had wrought ſeveral? But what were theſe miracles? Surely, Bede, who has particularly related thoſe of Aidan, Finan, Furſeus, and the other Scotch monks, whom he regarded as ſchiſmaticks, would not have omitted Auſtin's? And yet he gives us but one, of a later date than Gregory's letter, the moſt ſuſpicious that ever was; ſince, by his own confeſſion, it was wrought, to bring over the Britons to ſubmit to the pope's authority. What opinion can we have of Auſtin's zeal to reduce the Britons under the papal juriſdiction, whilſt five Saxon kingdoms were ſuffer'd to remain in darkneſs and idolatry? Why did he complain to the pope, that he wanted labourers in ſo plentiful a harveſt, when he did not employ thoſe he already had? If he did employ them, where are the fruits of their labours? What were their names? Where did they preach the goſpel. Hiſtorians are entirely ſilent, as to theſe things; and, except Juſtus and Mellitus, who preached at Rocheſter and London, they do not tell us, where he ſent his companions, who, according to the received opinion, were 40 in number.

Beſides, the converts, made by theſe Italian monks, were not, it is to be ſuſpected, well grounded in their religion; as evidently appears from the revolt of the people of Eſſex, Eaſt-Anglia, Northumberland, and Kent too, at a juncture, when, had they been true chriſtians, they would have given proofs of the greateſt zeal. Their converſion, therefore, ſeems to have been brought about, without any previous inſtruction, and rather the effect of their fear of, or complaiſance to their kings, than of a thorough conviction of the truth. It is, therefore, ſurprizing, that the converſion of the Engliſh ſhould be attributed to Auſtin, rather than to Aidan, Finan, Colman, Cedd, Diuma, and the other Scotch monks, who, doubtleſs, labour'd much more abundantly than he did. But, as theſe had not their orders from Rome, we cannot bring ourſelves to allow them any part of the glory of this work.

Let us, now, make ſome reflections on the manner of the converſion of the Engliſh. In the beginning of chriſtianity, and even for 300 years, the firſt converts were generally perſons of the loweſt rank; and we hear of nothing but perſecution and death, from the princes and magiſtrates. However, in England, the kings were the firſt that embraced the goſpel, who, by their authority and example, converted their ſubjects; and we meet with no martyrs, in thoſe primitive days of the church of England, except the two ſons of Wulfer king of Mercia, whoſe ſtory is very doubtful. How came this difference between the churches founded by the apoſtles themſelves, in ſo many parts of the world, and that planted in England in the VIIth century?

ry? Why was the devil leſs active, in obſtructing the converſion of the Engliſh, than that of ſo many other nations, during the life and after the death of the apoſtles? Theſe things afford matter for many remarks; but I ſhall leave them to the conſideration of the reader. I ſhall only obſerve, that the eaſy manner of the converſion of the Engliſh takes off the force of the argument, in favour of the chriſtian religion, drawn from the perſecutions of the Roman emperors.

Perſ. de Paſch. "Let a man conſider, ſays a famous author, the eſtabliſhment of chriſtianity; that "a religion, ſo contrary to nature*, ſhould "prevail in the world without any violent "or compulſive methods, and yet ſhould be "ſo firmly rooted, that the moſt cruel tor-"ments could not oblige the martyrs to re-"nounce the faith; and that all this ſhould "be done, not only without the aſſiſtance of "any prince, but in direct oppoſition to all "the kings of the earth, &c." This argument loſes much of its force, when applied to the converſion of the Engliſh.

Moreover, the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory mentions ſeveral ſaints in different parts of the world, but it alſo aſſures us, that ſcarce one of them eſcaped a terrible perſecution, or death itſelf, for the cauſe of the goſpel; whereas, in England alone, we find, in the ſpace of 200 years, an incredible number of male and female ſaints, who never underſtood the meaning of perſecution. Beſides, if we can believe the hiſtorians, theſe ſaints, for the moſt part, were endued with the gift of miracles, tho' the ſwift progreſs of the goſpel ſeems to render them uſeleſs; and many of theſe ſaints were kings, queens, or perſons of the higheſt birth and ſtations. We have, in this period, ſeven kings and as many queens, with eight princes and 16 princeſſes, diſtinguiſh'd by the title of ſaints; and the 10 kings and 11 queens, who reſign'd their crowns, for the ſake of a monaſtick life, might well be enrolled in the catalogue of ſaints. If it be enquir'd, why it was ſo eaſy, in the VIIth and VIIIth centuries, for the great to procure a ſaintſhip, I can aſſign no other reaſon, but that ſanctity conſiſted, then, in enriching the churches and monaſteries, which the rich were far more able to do, than the poor.

The Engliſh were no ſooner converted, but innumerable miracles were wrought among them. Bede's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory abounds with them; for he was very credulous, in theſe matters, as well as Gregory I. whoſe foible, in this reſpect, is viſible in all his works. It is no wonder, then, that his miſſionaries ſhould copy after him, or that the Engliſh ſhould be as eaſy of belief as their teachers. The benedictin monks, firſt, introduced miracles and brought them into vogue, ſome out of pure ſimplicity, and others with a view of attracting the veneration and bounty of all ranks of perſons to monaſteries. The monks of St. Columba, regardleſs of their temporal intereſt, conſcientiouſly attended on the ſervice of God, in the places where they lived in common; but the benedictins were never ſatisfied, till they obtained a vaſt number of monaſteries with large revenues, and the papal authority was recognized throughout the heptarchy.

The popes, however, did not eaſily attain this juriſdiction over the Northumbrians, Picts, and Scots. The northern nations could not ſee any reaſon for acknowledging the pope to be univerſal biſhop; and it is evident, that, before the ſynod of Whitby, the Britons, Picts, Scots, Iriſh, and Northumbrians unanimouſly declared againſt the papal authority. Bede ſays what amounts to this, when, ſpeaking of king Oſwy, he tells us: "He was, at "length, convinced, that the church of Rome "was the true, catholick, and apoſtolical "church, though he had his education in "Scotland." Upon this, Oſwy exerted himſelf to eſtabliſh the pope's authority in his dominions; and Scotland, at laſt, was brought to ſubmit to it, Egbert, an Engliſh prieſt, having gained over the monks of Jona.

The Engliſh had no ſooner owned the papal juriſdiction, than all imaginable means were made uſe of to ſecure it. To this purpoſe, none were admitted to govern the church, but Italian prieſts or monks, or ſuch Engliſh ones as had been educated at Rome or France. Accordingly, the Vth canon of the ſecond council of Calcuith prohibits any Scotchman to perform divine ſervice in England. Bede expreſly diſcovers the policy of Rome, when he aſſures us, that the pope ordered Adrian to attend Theodorus into England, leſt that prelate, being a native of Cilicia, ſhould introduce any cuſtoms into the church of England, contrary to thoſe of Rome.

I ſhall make but one reflection more, relating to the doctrine of the church of England, in the VIIth and VIIIth centuries and the beginning of the IXth. We ſhould be much miſtaken, to think the articles of faith, in the Engliſh church, were the ſame with thoſe of the Roman at this day. For example, it would be abſurd to imagine, the Engliſh believed, in thoſe times, the abſolute neceſſity of baptiſm, as the Romaniſts do now. Were this the caſe, the council of Calcuith would not have order'd that ſacrament to be adminiſter'd, only at eaſter and whitſontide. It would be equally erroneous to believe, that the Engliſh worſhipped images. The contrary appears, from a letter the famous Alcuin, an Engliſhman, wrote to Charles the great, about the ſecond council of Nice, which carried image-worſhip to a monſtrous height. The doctrine of the neceſſity of celibacy in prieſts, alſo, was not received by the church of England, till, at leaſt, 500 years after their converſion. I might add to theſe ſeveral other

* By this he ſuppoſes chriſtianity, in its primitive ſtate, to be clogg'd with all the abſurdities, that now attend it, eſpecially, among the Romaniſts; for, ſurely, nothing more ridiculous can be ſaid of revealed religion, than that it contradicts nature, ſenſe, or reaſon.

inſtances; but, as they are not peculiar to England, I ſhall only remark in general, that all the innovations in the doctrines of the church of England, from the converſion of the Engliſh to the reformation, owe their original to Rome.

The church of England had no concern in the controverſies on foot in the church, during the VIIth and VIIIth centuries; for, among all the councils held in England, within that ſpace, not one made any decrees, concerning the doctrines of religion, except the ſynod of Calcuith, which ratified the condemnation of the Monothelites. Their practice was to read the general councils, and then receive them; ſo that the church of England was not diſturbed with hereſies or diſputes, about the fundamental doctrines of religion. In thoſe times, the biſhops, prieſts, and monks were more ſollicitous about ways and means for enlarging their revenues, than the ſtudy of divinity. Some of them, alſo, were remarkable for the holineſs of their lives, or for their zeal in propagating the goſpel. I have already taken notice of a few; and I ſhall here ſubjoin a brief account of three or four, that make a conſiderable figure, in the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England *.

716. Egbert. Egbert, an Engliſh prieſt, having retired into Ireland to purſue his ſtudies, went over into Scotland, ſome time after, and prevailed upon the monks of Jona to receive the rules of the order of St. Benedict and ſubmit to the pope's authority. It was, perhaps, for this reaſon, that he is honoured with ſo many encomiums. However, it is reported, that, deſigning to preach the goſpel to the Saxons, he was diverted from his purpoſe, by an expreſs order from heaven; yet, ſo deſirous was he of the converſion of that nation, that he fixed upon Wilbrod to go in his ſtead.

692. Wilbrod. Wilbrod arriving in Germany, Pipin, mayor of the palace of France, ſent him into Frieſland, which he had lately conquered, to preach the goſpel. After ſome ſtay there, he went to Rome, where he was conſecrated biſhop of the Frieſlanders, by pope Sergius I. He eſtabliſhed his ſee at Utrecht, of which he was the firſt biſhop.

Winfrid. Winfrid, an Engliſh benedictin, was ſent into Germany, where he aſſumed the name of Boniface. Meeting with ſucceſs, he was made the firſt archbiſhop of Mentz and the pope's legate for all Germany. It is ſaid, that he was the ſon of a cartwright, and that, for this reaſon, the archbiſhops of Mentz bear wheels in their arms. Boniface was inhumanly murdered by the pagans in Frieſland, in 754†.

754. Guthlack. Guthlack ‡ was the firſt anchoret in England. He choſe, for retirement, a fenny place in Mercia, called Croyland, where the famous monaſtery of that name was afterwards founded **.

* Nennius, abbot of Bangor, thought to be one of the 50 monks that eſcaped, when 1200 of their brethren were ſlain by Adelfrid king of Northumberland. He flouriſhed in 626; tho' according to the beſt copies of his book, he wrote in 858, 24° Mervini regis. Nothing of his is extant, except his Hiſtoria Britonum. Bede is the next after Nennius, who wrote an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England, from Julius Cæſar's invaſion to 731, at the deſire of Ceolulph king of Northumberland, to whom it is dedicated. He was born in 673, in the precincts of the monaſtery of Jarrow, near the mouth of the Tyne in Northumberland. He was brought up, from his childhood, in the ſaid monaſtery, where he lived all his days. He was ordained a deacon at 19, and a prieſt at 30; from which time to the 59th year of his age, he continually employed himſelf in writing. His works are printed in eight tomes, beſides his opuſcula. He died in 735, aged 62. His body was removed from Jarrow to Durham, and placed in the ſame coffin with St. Cuthbert's.

† Pits tells us, he was of royal extraction. There is a collection of his letters extant; particularly, his letters to Ethelbald king of Mercia, publiſhed at Mentz by Serrarius. Du Pin cent. VIII.

‡ He was a ſoldier ſeven years, and ſuch was his humanity, that he uſually returned unto the enemy a third part of the plunder.

 Alcuin or Albin, a famous Northumbrian, lived in the VIIIth century. He was bred a benedictin, and made abbot of St. Auguſtin's, Canterbury. He was diſciple to Egbert archbiſhop of York; and, being ſent by Offa, on an ambaſſy to Charles the great, that prince obtained leave for him to ſtay at his court, and was inſtructed by him in logick, aſtronomy, and mathematicks. He perſuaded the emperor to found the univerſities of Paris and Pavia. Pits ſays, he wrote a great number of books. He died in 804.

THE

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK IV.

Origin of the Danes. Their continual irruptions, from the reign of Egbert to Edward the martyr. A full and curious account of the laws and cuſtoms introduced by Alfred the great, on which the preſent laws of England are founded. The ſtate of the church and religion.

IT might be thought, that the union of the ſeven kingdoms would have render'd England more ſecure than ever from foreign invaſions; yet the Danes attack'd the Engliſh as furiouſly, as themſelves had formerly done the Britons. For above 200 years, they continued their deſcents upon this iſland; ſo that it is not to be conceived, how their country could furniſh them with troops for ſo long and bloody a war, or how the Engliſh could withſtand ſo many reiterated attempts. But, before I proceed to particulars, it will be requiſite to enquire into the original of a nation, that, in the IXth century, became ſo formidable to all Europe, and eſpecially to England.

Scandia or Scandinavia *, lying in the north of Europe, is in length, from north to ſouth, about 960, and in breadth, from eaſt to weſt, about 360 miles. If we can give credit to the northern hiſtorians, this country was inhabited, ſoon after the flood, by two nations, or rather two branches of the ſame nation, viz. the Goths and Swedes, who erected two large kingdoms in this part of the world. From theſe two nations, who were ſometimes united and at other times divided, deſcended all thoſe colonies, which, upon the decline of the Roman empire, over-ran the reſt of Europe. But, without examining into the grounds of what they relate, about the conqueſts of theſe adventurers, I ſhall take them for my guides, in the account they give us of thoſe that remained in the northern countries.

In the reign of Erick, the ſixth king of the Goths †, Gothland was ſo very populous, that the country was unable to maintain its inhabitants. To remove this inconvenience, Erick was obliged to ſend away part of his ſubjects, to try their fortune in the neighbouring iſles ‡, who, at length, not only peopled the iſlands, but alſo Jutland on the continent, formerly called Cimbrica Cherſoneſus. The colonies, thus diſperſed, for above 700 years, were ſubject to the kings of Gothland. Humel, the 16th king of the Goths, making them independent, permitted them to have, for their king, Dan his ſon, from whom Denmark received its name *†. Norway alſo, in all likelihood, was peopled by Gothick colonies, ſince it was, for a long time, under the dominion of the kings of Gothland. After many revolutions, Norway was, at length, governed by judges independent of Gothland, till, about the end of the IXth century, it became ſubject to a king.

*† Dan, they pretend, was cotemporary with Gideon.

The Danes and Norwegians, being thus ſeparated from their anceſtors, the Goths and Swedes, grew ſo powerful, as to be in a condition to withſtand them both in ſeveral wars. The ſituation of their country, and the plenty of materials for the building and equipping a fleet, ſoon made them maſters by ſea. In proceſs of time, they employed all their naval forces, in ravaging the coaſts of Europe. France, England, and the Low-Countries were moſt expoſed to their depredations; and, for above 150 years, nothing was to be ſeen at ſea, but the Daniſh pyrates. They became ſo potent, that Charles the great could never ſubdue the Saxons, whilſt they were aſſiſted by the Danes. Hiſtory informs us, that the emperor, having ſent Pepin his ſon to make war againſt the Saxons, that prince was prevented in his deſigns, by Gothrick king of Denmark's ſending a reinforcement of Danes, on board 300 veſſels. A northern hiſtorian affirms, that Charles the great was never more agreeably pleas'd than with the news of Gothrick's death, having deſpaired of accompliſhing his ends, during the life of that prince.

Meurſius hiſt. Dan.

Jo. Magn. l. 17. c. 1.

As people increaſe and multiply exceedingly in cold countries, Denmark and Norway were often compell'd to ſend off numerous colonies, to make room for the reſt. Having a natural inclination to a ſea-faring life, they chearfully abandon'd their country, as they had, by this means, an opportunity for playing the pyrate, under the pretence of being in queſt of new habitations. The firſt adventurers meeting with ſucceſs, the richeſt and moſt powerful of their countrymen were tempted to ſeek their fortune, in the ſame manner. They enter'd into aſſociations, much of the ſame kind with thoſe at this day, made, in time of war, by the inhabitants of the ſea-port towns in France and Flanders, and always by the corſairs of Barbary; and, at length, they fitted out very large fleets. As they acted under the authority of their kings, who, having a ſhare in their plunder, provided them with admirals and generals; ſo, when a conſiderable prize was in view, they did not ſcruple to command them, in perſon. Theſe are the fleets, that made ſuch ravages in ſeveral parts of Europe, cauſing the inhabitants of France, England, and the Low-Countries to make diſmal lamentations, for the miſeries brought upon them by the northern nations*. They were called, in France, Normans, i. e. men of the north; but, in England, they were commonly called Danes or Goths. Doubtleſs, the Swedes and Goths very frequently join'd with the Danes, for a ſhare in the booty; and even the Frieſlanders were concerned with them, in ravaging the coaſts of France and England. For this reaſon, the Engliſh hiſtorians call them indifferently Getes, Goths, Juttes, Norwegians, Dacians, Danes, Swedes, Vandals, and Frieſlanders, as their armies were compoſed of theſe ſeveral nations.

It is obvious, from what has been ſaid, that the view of the Danes, when they firſt invaded England, was only to plunder; and, therefore, they did not make war, like regular troops, with a fixed deſign, but, like pyrates, what they could not carry off they ſack'd and deſtroy'd. As they were divided into ſeveral independent bands, it often fell out, that, as ſoon as one was gone, another came; ſo that the inhabitants had ſcarce any reſpite from their incurſions. On this account, the Engliſh were obliged to be always upon their guard, and in all places, the iſland being expos'd to attacks, on every ſide. On the contrary, their enemies, whoſe numbers were daily augmented, being under leaders, who had no authority over each other, there was no treating with them, one band diſputing what the other had agreed to. Thus, the Engliſh, who had nothing to gain, but much to loſe, were at a loſs what meaſures they ſhould take with thoſe dangerous enemies. I know, the Daniſh hiſtorians put theſe things in a quite different light. They ſtile the advantages, the Danes had over the Engliſh, in their firſt irruptions, conqueſts, and call the ſtruggles of the Engliſh, to free themſelves from oppreſſion, a revolt; but, notwithſtanding theſe ſpecious names, they are to be conſider'd, as before repreſented, at leaſt, for 100 years after they began their ravages.

Sax. Gram. Magnus, Jornand. Meurſius, Pontanus.

The Engliſh and Daniſh hiſtorians give very contrary accounts of theſe wars, as they each of them, on all occaſions, magnify the advantages of their own nation, and decry thoſe of the oppoſite party. However, it is evident, that the Danes could not have obtain'd ſuch footing in England, had they not been generally victorious. Theſe writers alſo diſagree, in chronological matters, and in the very names of the perſons of whom they ſpeak, which muſt, of courſe, occaſion the greateſt confuſion in hiſtory.

As the caſe ſtands, then, I am obliged to proceed, with all imaginable circumſpection; and, if my reader does not diſcover the ſtricteſt connexion and thoſe other embelliſhments he could have deſir'd, he muſt remember, that the narration of a war, carried on, for the ſake of plunder only, is hardly capable of theſe ornaments.

It is, now, time, having laid down ſome remarks I apprehended to be neceſſary, for the better underſtanding of what follows, to return to the reign of Egbert. This prince, in the preceding book, was repreſented, as king of Weſſex; but he is, now, to be conſider'd, as the real monarch of all the ſeven kingdoms of the heptarchy.

* A furore Normannorum, libera nos, Domine.

EGBERT.

EGBERT.

EGBERT 1ſt king of England. 828.

EGBERT, who received the crown of Weſſex, in 800, did not compleat his conqueſt, till 827 or 828, from which time, his title of king of England is to be dated. But, to prevent miſtakes, it muſt be obſerved, that the kingdom this prince was poſſeſſed of, as his own, conſiſted of the antient kingdoms of Weſſex, Suſſex, Kent, and Eſſex, that were peopled by Saxons and Juttes. As for the other kingdoms, inhabited by Angles, he was content with reſerving the ſovereignty over them, permitting them to be governed by kings who were his tributaries.

Tyrrel.

I have already related, how Egbert, before he attacked his countrymen, ſubdued the Britons of Cornwall and Wales. Tho' his power, upon this, was very much increaſed; yet the Welch, by their actions, plainly declared, that they deſigned to ſhake off this yoke. Egbert, being informed of their intent, directly marched into their country, with ſuch a powerful army, that they were compelled to ſubmit, without daring to come to a battle.

833. An. Sax.

Whilſt Egbert was enjoying the fruits of his victory, the Danes, who had before, at different times, invaded England, arrived at Charmouth * with 35 veſſels. Egbert, on the firſt news of this deſcent, went againſt them, with what troops he could muſter together, verily believing that, upon his approach, they would repair to their ſhips; and though, contrary to his expectation, they bravely ſtood their ground, he reſolved to attack them. However, Egbert ſoon found, he was engaged with a very formidable enemy; and, after a long and bloody battle, his army was entirely routed. They preſs'd upon him ſo cloſe, that he was forced, at length, to follow his flying troops, being indebted to the darkneſs of the night, for his very life. This being a great mortification to a prince, that had been always, hitherto, victorious, he projected other meaſures, for his defence againſt theſe new invaders; but the Danes, being, for the preſent, ſatisfied with their plunder, returned to their ſhips.

* In Dorſetſhire.

Egbert defeated by the Danes.

The Danes make another deſcent. 835.

Two years after, another band of Daniſh pyrates, being told by their ſpies, that the Corniſh Britons were extremely deſirous of throwing off the Engliſh yoke, landed in Cornwall, and were joyfully received. Being reinforced with ſome Britiſh troops, they began their march, in order to come to an engagement with Egbert, expecting to ſurprize him; but they found, that he was advancing directly towards them, with the ſame deſign. His former misfortune having taught him caution, he had his army in readineſs to march, upon the firſt notice of their arrival; and he engaged the enemy, near Hengiſt-dun * in Cornwall, obtaining a ſignal victory, which entirely repaired the diſgrace of his former defeat.

Egbert obtains a ſignal victory.

* Hengſton-hill.

After this fortunate turn of affairs, which ſecured the Engliſh, for a little while, from the irruptions of the Danes, we have but one particular in Egbert's reign, that deſerves to be taken notice of. It is ſaid, that this prince, by a publick edict, to which the general aſſembly of the nation gave their conſent, ordered that, for the future, the part of Great-Britain conquered by the Anglo-Saxons, and erected into ſeven kingdoms, ſhould be called England; but it is far more probable, he only confirmed or revived this name, which certainly bears date, before Egbert's reign. Bede, who wrote 150 years before Egbert's time, tells us, that the three nations, ſettled in Great-Britain, were indifferently called Angli or Engliſh; and he entitles his hiſtory, the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of the Engliſh nation, tho' it much more relates to the churches of Kent, Weſſex, Suſſex, and Eſſex, than to thoſe of Mercia, Northumberland, and Eaſt-Anglia. I have, above, obſerved, that the change of the name Britain into England muſt be carried back to the year 585 or 586; for the confirmation of which, and that Egbert was not the author of this change, I ſhall advance the following conſiderations, which, in my opinion, are very convincing. Firſt, what reaſon had Egbert to call the ſeven kingdoms England, who was himſelf a Saxon, and whoſe provinces were inhabited by Saxons and Juttes? beſides, the Angles or Engliſh, in Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland, were his vaſſals. Now, can it be imagined, that the conqueror ſhould impoſe on his ſubjects the name of thoſe they had ſubdued? This might, indeed, have been done inſenſibly, but, ſurely, he would never have enjoin'd it by an edict; but, as this is no more than a conjecture, I ſhall proceed to more ſubſtantial proofs. An hiſtorian expreſly affirms, that, ſoon after the heptarchy, the name of England was given to Britain, by the conſent of the ſeven kings; but this cannot be applied to Egbert's time, above 250 years after, ſince that prince could not have publiſhed an edict, before he became king of all England. Moreover, tho' the ſubjects of Ina, king of Weſſex, were Saxons or Juttes, in his laws enacted for the Weſt-Saxons, he only ſtiles them Engliſhmen. "If an Engliſhman, ſays he, "commit theft. Again, "If a Welch ſlave "ſhall kill an Engliſhman." If this name had not been common to the three nations, Ina would not have called his ſubjects Engliſhmen, but Saxons? In a word, it is no wonder, that, upon the founding the heptarchy, the Anglo-Saxons ſhould give the name of England to their conqueſts, ſince they were poſſeſſed of a larger tract of land, than both the Saxons

Egbert confirms the alteration of the name of Britain into that of England.

Saxons and Juttes; but it is unnatural to ſuppoſe, that this name was introduced by Egbert, when the three kingdoms of the Angles were in a declining, and that of the Weſt-Saxons in a flouriſhing condition.

Egbert's death. 838. Egbert died in 838, * after a reign of 37 years; 20 of them he was only king of Weſſex, for ſeven years he enjoyed the dignity of monarch, and ten years he reigned over all England. Redburg his wife did not aſſume the title and majeſty of a queen, becauſe of the law * made in Weſſex, on the account of the death of Brithrick. It is ſaid, ſhe perſuaded the king to prohibit the Welch, on pain of death, to come over Offa's dike, the boundary of Mercia and Wales.

* Vid. p. 58.

Rudb. hiſt. monaſt. Wincheſt. Egbert left behind him but one ſon, called Ethelwulph, who was his ſucceſſor, as king of Weſſex, Eſſex, Kent, and Suſſex, and as ſovereign of the other three kingdoms. Egbert had, doubtleſs, another ſon, ſeeing this was deſigned for the church. A modern author † gives the name of Ethelbert to Egbert's eldeſt ſon; but I cannot tell, what grounds he had for this aſſertion. Some ſay, he had alſo a daughter, named Edgith, who founded the abbey of Polleſworth *; but this is uncertain.

† Tyrrel.

* In Warwickſhire.

From what has been ſaid of Egbert, it appears he was a warlike prince; for he did not compleat his ends, by the means made uſe of by Hengiſt and Offa, but by the force of arms; a method, which, tho' equally criminal, does not ſo much tarniſh the reputation of thoſe that put it in practice, eſpecially, if it prove ſucceſsful. It is matter of lamentation, that ambition, by which princes are inclined to invade the property of others, ſhould be eſteemed a virtue; and that an hiſtorian, to gratify the depraved taſte of the world, ſhould not dare to paint it in its true colours, ſince, for the moſt part, ambitious princes are honoured with the ſirname of great.

2. ETHELWULPH.

ETHELWULPH. 838. An. Sax. A. Hunt. l. 5. ETHELWULPH, who ſucceeded his father Egbert, according to ſome, was obliged to have a diſpenſation from the pope, as he was in holy orders; but it is improbable, that Egbert, after the death of his elder brother, would permit him to be bred a churchman, ſince he had no other ſon to ſucceed him.

The Danes land at Southampton. Soon after this, a fleet of Danes, having roved up and down, for ſome time, landed at Southampton and made great devaſtations. Ethelwulph, who was a lover of peace and eaſe, ſent Wulfred his general againſt them, who forced them back to their ſhips; but, before his army returned, the king received information, that another Daniſh band, who landed at Portland, ravaged the country. Although Ethelwulph had no reaſon to be diſpleaſed with Wulfred, he ſent earl Ethelhelm to command the army in his room, who was ſhamefully defeated and put to flight. Herbert, the ſucceeding general, was not only vanquiſhed, but alſo ſlain in the battle. Theſe two victories gave the Danes an opportunity of over-running ſeveral counties; Kent and Middleſex, Canterbury, Rocheſter, and London were, in particular, exceedingly diſtreſſed, the enemy practiſing the moſt unparallel'd cruelties, before they returned to their ſhips.

839. Some think, Witglaph, king of Mercia, died this year 839. Others place his death in 837. But this variation is of no conſequence, as this prince made a very mean figure, after his ſubjection to the king of Weſſex. He was ſucceeded by Berthulph his brother.

† Some tell us, he died in 836 or 837.

840. The enſuing year, Ethelwulph, diſſatisfied with his two late generals, went, in perſon, againſt a body of Danes, that arrived in 35 ſhips, landing on the coaſt of Weſſex. The two armies engaging at Charmouth, the Engliſh were defeated, thinking themſelves happy, that their enemies were content with carrying off their booty, which was the only end of theſe Daniſh expeditions.

The deſtruction of the Picts. This year, or, as ſome affirm, the year before, was very remarkable, for the entire deſtruction of the Picts. After a long war with the Scots, they loſt two battles ſucceſſively, which put it out of their power to make any longer reſiſtance. Keneth II. king of Scotland, incenſed againſt them, for killing his father, and inhumanly mangling his corpſe, told the Scots, this was their time, to extirpate a nation that had always been their enemies; and, accordingly, they treated the Picts with ſo much barbarity, that, after this, there remained nothing, but the memory of that miſerable people, which ſo long had flouriſhed in Great-Britain. On this account, Keneth II. was eſteemed by the Scots as an illuſtrious prince, and one of the founders of their monarchy.

Buchan. Boeth. Holingſh.

The Danes continuing their incurſions, Ethelwulph, who was naturally indolent, thought himſelf unable alone to govern all his dominions; and for this reaſon, and, perhaps, his great affection for Athelſtan his natural ſon, he reſigned to him Kent, Eſſex, and Suſſex, reſting ſatisfied with the ſovereignty of all England and the kingdom of Weſſex.

841. ANdred, king of Northumberland, died in 841, and was ſucceeded by Ethelred his ſon.

Roderic, ſirnamed Mawr, i.e. the great, was then king of Wales. This prince, who is highly applauded by the Britiſh hiſtorians, attack'd Berthulph, king of Mercia, with ſignal ſucceſs. Ethelwulph, notwithſtanding his peaceable diſpoſition, went, in perſon, into Mercia, to ſtop the progreſs of the Welch prince; for, as he eaſily foreſaw the dangerous conſequence of ſuffering the Welch to recover any part of their country, that had been ſubdued by the Engliſh, he, at once, joined the king of Mercia. Whilſt Roderic was engaged with Berthulph only, he fancied he was able to diſpoſſeſs him, at leaſt, of a conſiderable part of his kingdom; but, as ſoon as he found, that Ethelwulph concerned himſelf in the quarrel, he ſued for peace, which was obtained, without much difficulty, the ſovereign and his vaſſal deſigning nothing more than to live in quiet. Roderic left behind him three ſons, among whom he ſhared his dominions, which, on this account, were divided into the three kingdoms of Venedotia, Demetia, and Powis.

Sim. Dun. M. Weſt.

Ethelred, who received the crown of Northumberland, in 841, was baniſhed, three years after, by one of the factions, that, for a long time, alternately, prevailed in that kingdom; and Redowald was placed on the the throne. The new king being ſlain, ſoon after, by the Danes, in a deſcent they made on Northumberland, Ethelred was recalled by his party, who were now in a condition to ſupport him.

M. Weſt.

845. The Danes conſtantly viſited England, once a year, merely, for the ſake of plunder. In 845, the earls Enulph and Oſrick, with biſhop Aliſtan, gave them battle, near the river Parret *, and obtained a remarkable victory; which, in all likelihood, was the reaſon, why the Engliſh were unmoleſted, for ſome years.

Ethelred reigned but three years, after his reſtoration; for, the oppoſite faction having put him to death, Osbert, a lord, was placed on the throne of Northumberland. During theſe diviſions, the Danes often plunder'd that kingdom; and, whenever they came, they were always welcome to the weakeſt party.

Whilſt the Danes were, thus, employed in the north, the ſouthern provinces enjoyed ſome quiet; but, in 851, they landed on the coaſts of Weſſex, where they committed the moſt horrible outrages. Having rifled the country, they were met, on their return to their ſhips, by earl Ceorle, Ethelwulph's general, who waited for them at Wenbury *. Being incumbered with their ſpoils, they fought in ſuch diſorder, that they were entirely routed. In proceſs of time, king Athelſtan, having fitted out a fleet, engaged the Danes, near Sandwich, and took nine of their ſhips; tho' he could not prevent another band of them, from wintering in the iſland of Sheppey.

852. The Danes land near London.

The Danes, however, not being, in the leaſt, diſcouraged, the next ſpring, came up the Thames with 300 ſail, and, without oppoſition, landed near London, where they began their uſual ravages. The two kings, not expecting this ſudden invaſion, durſt not immediately take the field, but endeavoured to raiſe an army to oppoſe them, with all poſſible expedition.

In the mean time, the Danes were intent upon plunder; and, not content with ravaging the country, they attacked the towns, which, for the moſt part, were obliged to open their gates to their mercileſs enemies. After they pillaged London and Canterbury, they marched into Mercia, and defeated an army Berthulph had brought againſt them, in defence of his country; and they would have overrun all England, had they not been informed, that Ethelwulph and Athelſtan deſigned to intercept them, in their return. They repaſs'd the Thames, to engage the two kings, who were encamped at Okely in Surrey; committing ſuch barbarities in their march, that the very mention of them would be ſhocking. Ar length, they came up to the two kings, and a bloody battle was fought at Okely, in which the Engliſh were victorious, who made ſuch havock of the Danes, that very few of them eſcaped with life.

The battle of Okely.

Berthulph, king of Mercia, died this year, and was ſucceeded by Buthred, with the approbation of Ethelwulph, whoſe daughter he had married.

Buthred king of Mercia.

After the battle of Okely, we have no account of Athelſtan, which makes it probable, that he did not long ſurvive that memorable victory, to which his valour had much contributed. Although Ethelwulph had ſeveral ſons born in wedlock, of age, to aſſiſt him in the adminiſtration of affairs, he would not give Ethelbald, his eldeſt, Athelſtan's kingdom; for, beſides his want of affection for him, he was jealous of his reſtleſs and turbulent ſpirit. Ethelbald, who thought he deſerved a crown, as much as Athelſtan his baſtard-brother, was extremely diſguſted.

Athelſtan's death.

ETHELWULPH alone.

The characters of Ethelwulph and his two favourites.

ETHELWULPH, both by temper and education, was very much inclined to religion. He would willingly, if he could have done it, without interruption, have converſed with the monks, whole days together, whilſt the Danes were employed in ranſacking his kingdom. The reſpite he obtained by the victory of Okely, from theſe barbarous enemies, gave him ſome leiſure to purſue the natural bent of his mind. He had two favourites, who had an equal ſhare in his affection and confidence; and they were both biſhops, but of very oppoſite characters. Swithin biſhop of Wincheſter was the firſt, who continually repreſented to the king the vanity of of all earthly glory and the joys of heaven; but Alſtan biſhop of Sherborn, the ſecond, was highly diſpleaſed, at the king's ſo entirely giving himſelf up to his devotions. He could have wiſhed, he had been more active in repulſing the Danes; and that he would make ſuitable preparations, againſt their next return. To this purpoſe, he, on all occaſions, reminded him of the glorious actions of his anceſtors, particularly, his father Egbert, which, moſt of all, affected him; and he not only excited him by lively exhortations, but ſupplied him alſo with money to carry on his warlike preparations.

H. Hunt. Malmsb. l. 2. c. 2.

Theſe two prelates bore an abſolute ſway over Ethelwulph, the one having the aſcendant in peace, and the other in war. Alſtan preſerved his intereſt in the king, for a long time, on the account of the frequent irruptions of the Danes, which deprived him of many opportunities for his devotions; but no ſooner had he the proſpect of enjoying ſome quiet, than he was wholly directed by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who confirmed him daily, more and more, in his natural inclination to a religious life, to the prejudice of Alſtan. He, above all, inſpired him with the greateſt affection for the church and clergy, which was look'd upon, in thoſe days, as the chief part of religion; and by his advice, it is pretended, this prince granted to the church the tithes of all his dominions *. The revenues of the church, as yet, were not very conſiderable; but they were, now ſo vaſtly augmented, that Ethelwulph's ſucceſſors often had occaſion to wiſh, he had left the clergy in their former ſtate. Such was his zeal for religion, that he ſent his youngeſt ſon Alfred, then about five years of age, to Rome; and, as he had a very ſingular affection for this child, he, doubtleſs, imagined, that the pope's bleſſing would be ratified in heaven and procure him great happineſs. If we can believe the hiſtorians, Leo IV. not only bleſſed this young prince, but honoured him with the ceremony of the royal unction; but this ſeems to be groundleſs, unleſs we can think, the pope knew by revelation, that Alfred ſhould hereafter come to the crown, tho' the youngeſt of four brothers. Beſides, Alfred had not the title of king, till long after, on the death of his three elder brothers. Some are of opinion, ſuppoſing this unction to be matter of fact, that the pope only anointed him with chriſm, at the ceremony of his confirmation. Ethelwulph, his kingdom enjoying, now, a profound tranquillity, determined to make the pope a viſit, in perſon, to receive his benediction, and, with this view, went to Rome, in 855. Upon his arrival, pope Leo gave him an honourable reception, and had, in return, all the reſpect that could be expected from ſo devout a prince. During his reſidence at Rome, he viſited the churches, chapels, holy reliques, and every thing elſe that could feed his devotion. The Engliſh college founded by Ina, and enlarged by Offa, being conſumed by fire, the preceding year, he rebuilt in a more magnificent manner; and, to render its revenues greater than ever, he extended the tax of Peter-pence all over his dominions, which had, hitherto, been only levied in Weſſex and Mercia. He promiſed alſo to ſend to Rome, yearly, the ſum of 300 mancus's or marks †, 200 to ſupply the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul with wax-tapers, and the remainder for the pope's private uſe. By reaſon of theſe inſtances of liberality, ſome hiſtorians have been led to aſſert, that Ethelwulph made England tributary to the holy ſee; but, how much ſoever they were afterwards abuſed, it is evident, they were no more, originally, than charitable allowances to the churches and Engliſh college.

incenſed againſt his father, for not inveſting him with the kingdom of Kent, upon Athelſtan's death; and, therefore, he eaſily came into the pernicious counſels of Alſtan. The prelate told him, that Ethelwulph lived more like a monk than a king, and, by his indolence, expoſed his kingdom to ruin; and that, as he was wholly taken up with the converſation of the monks, it was fit he ſhould retire into a monaſtery, and reſign his kingdom to his ſon, who knew better how to govern it. Ethelbald, all on fire to poſſeſs the crown, was ſtagger'd at this diſcourſe; and there was no need of repeating it, to gain him over. Beſides, the news of Ethelwulph's marriage came, juſt in the critical minute, to confirm his reſolution; for he was apprehenſive, that the children, by this ſecond marriage, might be in a capacity to diſpute his ſucceſſion to the throne, by the aſſiſtance of the king of France. Theſe conſiderations induced him to enter into a cabal with the nobles, how to prevent the king's return. Alſtan exerted himſelf to bring over the lords and commons to the prince's intereſt; and, in a ſhort time, he formed a very powerful party. Ethelwulph, being informed of this, immediately left France, and, before his ſon had taken all the neceſſary ſteps to hinder it, arrived in England; tho' Ethelbald ſtill purſued his deſign, and even openly declared it. As Ethelwulph had dignified his new ſpouſe with the title of queen, in regard of her royal extraction, Ethelbald made uſe of this, as a handle for his revolt. He alledged, that, by the expreſs terms of the law, made on the occaſion of Brithrick's murder, the Weſt-Saxons were abſolved from their oath of allegiance to his father. Every thing conſpired to bring on a civil war, which muſt, of courſe, prove fatal to England; as, beſides other evils, it would infallibly occaſion freſh invaſions from the Danes; but ſome of the wiſeſt of the nobility of both parties, foreſeeing theſe conſequences, by their mediation, brought matters to an accommodation. Tho' right and juſtice were entirely on the king's ſide; yet, being old and of a peaceable temper, and as his ſon denounced ſevere threatenings againſt all that oppoſed him, the balance ſeemed to be, in favour of Ethelbald. This treaty, which was managed by umpires, obliged Ethelwulph to ſurrender to his ſon the antient kingdom of Weſſex, and to reſt ſatisfied with that of Kent for himſelf, which compriſed alſo Eſſex and Suſſex. Some of his courtiers adviſed him not to ſign ſo partial a treaty; but he told them, that he had not ſuch a value for the dominions allotted to his ſon, as to purchaſe them, at the expence of a civil war; and that, tho' he ſhould be in a condition to recover them, yet, upon his death, his ſon would again be put in the poſſeſſion of them.

ETHELWULPH in Kent. ETHELBALD in Weſſex.

ONE would think, that Ethelwulph foreſaw his approaching death, ſince he ſurvived this partition but two years, which he ſpent in acts of charity, in adminiſtering juſtice to his ſubjects, and endeavouring, by his example, to prevail on them to live in conformity to the precepts of the goſpel. Ethelbald, on the other hand, depending on many years to come, thought of nothing but licentiouſneſs and debauchery.

Edmund king of Eaſt-Anglia. An. Sax. Fl. Wig. J. Tinmouth in ſancti.

The Saxon annals affirm, that, about this time, Edmund, a youth of about 15 years of age, was crowned king of Eaſt-Anglia. He was ſon to Alcmund, a prince of the blood-royal, who retreated into Germany, when Offa ſeized upon Eaſt-Anglia. We are not told, whether this was done, with the conſent of Ethelwulph and Ethelbald; or, whether, on the account of the diſſention between theſe two princes, they reſolved to have a king of their own. Edmund, during his youth, had the benefit of biſhop Humbert's advice, who form'd him to a virtuous life, and inſtill'd into him ſentiments of juſtice and equity, of which his ſubjects reaped the advantage. I will take no notice of the miracles, that are ſaid to have attended his birth, and ſhall, in another place, ſpeak of his tragical death, which is called a martyrdom.

Ethelwulph's laſt will.

Ethelwulph, finding he was near his end, made a will, wherein he diſpoſed of his dominions to Ethelbert his ſecond ſon, and, upon his deceaſe, to Ethelred his third ſon, and after him to Alfred the youngeſt. I am not certain, whether it was cuſtomary, in thoſe days, for kings to diſpoſe of their dominions, by will; or, whether Ethelwulph was the firſt that did ſo. However, it is evident, that Ethelwulph's ſons ſucceeded each other, by virtue of his will; by which he alſo obliged his heirs to maintain one poor perſon, for every tithing in his hereditary lands. He died * ſoon after, in 857, having reigned 20 years †, leaving behind him four ſons and one daughter, who was married to Buthred king of Mercia, and died at Pavia, in 888. his ſhare Kent, Eſſex, and Suſſex, compriſed under the name of the kingdom of Kent. As for Ethelred and Alfred, they were, at firſt, but meanly provided for, tho' in proceſs of time, they both came to the crown. Beſides Athelſtan, already mention'd, ſome tell us, Ethelwulph had another natural ſon, named Neot, who was afterwards profeſſor at Oxford; but I much queſtion, whether Neot was his ſon, it being more probable, that he was only a relation of the blood-royal of Weſſex.

3. ETHELBALD in Weſſex. ETHELBERT in Kent.

ETHELBALD's reign was not attended with any remarkable event, nor is there any action of his own, that deſerves to be recorded. All hiſtorians are agreed, that he was a prince of no merit. The Engliſh writers aſſure us, he made no ſcruple to marry Judith, his father's widow; tho' the French authors are ſilent on this head, who ſay, that her marriage with Ethelwulph not being conſummated, becauſe of her youth, ſhe return'd to France, from whence ſhe was carried off by Baldwin Iron-hand earl of Flanders. Perhaps, they were ignorant of her ſecond marriage, or thought it improper to mention it, as reflecting on the family of Charles the great. However, the Engliſh writers relate it, for fact; and one of them adds*, that Ethelbald was brought to a ſenſe of his fault, by Swithin biſhop of Wincheſter, and underwent a ſevere penance for it. This penance, which, in all probability, conſiſted in ſome grants and donations to the monaſteries, led an hiſtorian† to affirm, his death, in 860, was very much lamented. He reigned two years in Weſſex, during the life of his father, and about two years and a half, after his deceaſe. Ethelbert his brother, already poſſeſs'd of Kent, ſucceeded to the throne of Weſſex, purſuant to their father's laſt will and teſtament.

He dies in 860.

4. ETHELBERT alone.

The Danes return to England.

THE Danes, who had been quiet, for ſome years, immediately upon Ethelbert's coronation, renew'd their invaſions; and, being almoſt forgotten, and no preparations having been made againſt them, they penetrated as far as Wincheſter, the capital of Weſſex, reducing it to aſhes. They would have proceeded to greater outrages, if Oſrick and Ethelwulph, two Weſt-Saxon lords, had not forced them back to their ſhips.

They reduce Wincheſter to aſhes.

They are repulſed.

Another deſcent. Ethelbert offers them money to depart; and, tho' they accept it, they plunder in Kent.

After this, they landed in autumn, in the iſle of Thanet, where they wintered, in order to begin their incurſions in the ſpring; but Ethelbert, extremely uneaſy at their being ſo near him, and at a loſs how to help it, offer'd them a ſum of money, to depart in peace. They accepted his propoſal; but no ſooner had they received the money, than they ruſh'd into Kent, deſtroying all before them with fire and ſword. Tho' Ethelbert was not in a condition to revenge their treachery, it taught him, however, that nothing but force could reſtrain them; and he, therefore, reſolved to levy an army, to intercept them in their retreat. As they dreaded theſe preparations, they embarqued with their booty ſo abruptly, that it was impoſſible to prevent them.

Ethelbert's reign, which laſted but ſix years, had nothing in it of any importance. He died in 866, leaving behind him two ſons, Adhelm and Ethelward, neither of which ſucceeded him, his younger brother Ethelred, by virtue of Ethelwulph's will, mounting the throne.

He dies in 866.

5. ETHELRED I.

THE reign of Etheldred was ſhort and troubleſome; for, from the day of his coronation to his death, he had one continued conflict with the Danes. They, firſt, attack'd Northumberland, which, at length, they ſubdued, as they did, next, Eaſt-Anglia; and, having compell'd the Mercians to purchaſe their ranſom, with a ſum of money, they enter'd into Weſſex. In ſpite of Ethelred's valour, and the many battles he fought,

fought, he had the mortification, at his death, to leave them in the heart of his kingdom, and in a condition of ſoon compleating the conqueſt of the whole. Theſe are the moſt memorable events, during this reign, the moſt material circumſtances of which I ſhall proceed to relate.

Malmſ. The authority which Egbert reſerved over the kingdoms of Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland, and left to his ſon Ethelwulph, had been, for ſome time, much impaired, by the frequent invaſions of the Danes; for, whilſt the kings of Weſſex were employ'd in the defence of their own dominions, they had no leiſure to improve their ſovereignty over the three kingdoms of the Angles, to whom Egbert had left ſome ſhadow of liberty; and, therefore, at length, the Northumbrians, at the fartheſt diſtance from Weſſex, ſhook off their yoke. The factions, that had ſo long reigned among them, laying aſide, in a great meaſure, their mutual animoſities, unanimouſly agreed to place Osbert on the throne. This happy union might have raiſed Northumberland to its antient ſplendor, had not an unexpected accident plunged that country into a gulph of miſery, from which it was never able to recover itſelf. The troubles, which paved the way for the ruin of Northumberland, and proved fatal to all England, were occaſion'd as follows.

The cauſe of the troubles in Northumberland. Brompt. Osbert, who kept his court at York, returning one day from hunting, was diſpos'd to refreſh himſelf, at the houſe of earl Bruern-Bocard, who was guardian of the coaſts againſt the Daniſh irruptions. The earl being from home, his lady, to whoſe charming beauty was join'd the moſt agreeable behaviour, entertain'd her ſovereign with the reſpect due to his quality. Osbert, at once, was raviſh'd at the ſight of her; and, being deſperately enamour'd, reſolved, at all hazards, to gratify his paſſion. Accordingly, under the pretence of having ſome affairs of conſequence to communicate to her, in the abſence of the earl, he led her inſenſibly into a private room; where, after ſeveral attempts to bring her to a compliance, by fair means, he proceeded, at length, to downright force. Intreaties, tears, outcries, reproaches were all ineffectual to checque his raging paſſion; and, having committed this infamous deed, he left the counteſs, ſo oppreſs'd with grief and vexation, that it was impoſſible for her to conceal the cauſe from her husband. Such outrageous affronts are ſcarce ever forgiven. Tho' Osbert was a king, and earl Bruern his ſubject, he ſo highly reſented this injury, that he determin'd, at all adventures, to be fully revenged. He had a great intereſt with the Northumbrians; and Osbert's brutal action had a natural tendency to alienate the minds of his ſubjects from him. Accordingly, the earl ſo managed matters, that the Bernicians, ſoon after, revolting, and regarding Osbert, as unworthy to govern them, choſe Ella for their king, reſolving to ſupport him on the throne. Thus, the old diviſions were reviv'd; and Northumberland was, again, divided between two kings and two factions, who, continually aiming at each other's ruin, were but too ſucceſsful in their endeavours. Ella elected king of Bernicia.

A civil war being the conſequence, both princes exerted themſelves to decide their quarrel, by arms; but the equality of their forces prevented either of them from gaining any ground. One would have thought, the injur'd earl might have been ſatisfied, with Osbert's loſing half his dominions; but ſuch was his revenge, that he could not bear even to ſee him on the throne of Deira; and, rather than miſcarry in his deſign, he fatally reſolved to go and procure the aſſiſtance of the Danes. This was not the firſt time that the like injury had produced the like effect. Spain, in ſubjection to the Moors, felt, at that very juncture, the miſchiefs an affair of this nature had occaſion'd. As ſoon as the earl arrived in Denmark, he applied to king Ivar or Hinguar *, aſſuring him, that, if he would take the advantage of the preſent diſtracted ſtate of Northumberland, he might ſubdue the whole kingdom. Ivar readily engaged in an enterprize, to which the deſire of revenge, as well as his ambition, powerfully excited him; for Regnerus his father, having been taken priſoner in England, was thrown into a ditch full of ſerpents, where he miſerably periſh'd. This barbarity inſpir'd Ivar with ſuch a furious abhorrence of the Engliſh, that he gladly embraced the preſent opportunity of being revenged of them. Having concerted with earl Bruern all the neceſſary meaſures to put his deſign in execution, in the ſpring, he enter'd the Humber with a numerous fleet, that ſpread terror over all England. He was conducted by Bruern, and attended by his brother Hubba, the moſt valiant perſon of his time. As the Northumbrians had no intelligence of this invaſion, they were not in a poſture to diſpute his landing. Thus, Ivar, without oppoſition, ſubdued the northern ſhore of the Humber, and, from thence, marched directly to York, where Osbert was making preparations againſt him. Earl Bruern brings the Danes into England. Ivar invades Northumberland. Sim. Dunelm.

In this extremity, Osbert had recourſe to Ella, tho' his enemy; and Ella, conſcious of his cruel treatment of Ivar's father, chearfully agreed to drop their private quarrel, to join their forces againſt the king of Denmark. Accordingly, he was as expeditious as poſſible, in preparing a powerful reinforcement. Had Osbert remain'd in York, till Ella's arrival, who was on his march, he would certainly have embarraſs'd Ivar, who would, then, have been obliged to withſtand the enemy in two places at once; but his valour would not ſuffer him to proceed with caution. Perhaps, it was with regret, that he found himſelf under a neceſſity to make application to Ella; or, poſſibly, he ſuſpected, that he would prove perfidious. However, without waiting Osbert has recourſe to Ella.

* Pontanus, in his hiſtory of Denmark, does not place Ivar among the kings of that country; but Meurſius aſſures us, this prince was crowned in 836, differing in his chronology from the Engliſh hiſtorians.

for Ella, he ſallied out of York, and attack'd the Danes ſo furiouſly, that they were ſcarce able to ſuſtain the ſhock, and had like to have been put in diſorder; but their obſtinate defence, having, at length, abated the ardour of their enemies, they preſſed them, in their turn, forcing them, at laſt, to retire in a very confuſed manner. Osbert deſperately mortified to ſee the victory, thus, ſnatched out of his hands, uſed his utmoſt efforts to rally his troops, but was ſlain in the retreat, with a vaſt number of his men.

Osbert vanquiſhed and ſlain.

Meurſius hiſt. Dan.

The gates of York having been opened, by this victory, to the Danes, they entered the town, to refreſh themſelves, whilſt Ella advanced, with a view of repairing the loſs Oſbert had ſuffered by his raſhneſs; and Ivar, not believing him to be more formidable than the other king, whom he had defeated, went out to meet him. This battle was as bloody as the firſt, and no leſs fatal to the Engliſh. Ella loſt his life, and his army was entirely routed. Some tell us, this prince, being taken priſoner, was flead alive, by Ivar's order, in revenge for the death of his father. The field of battle was named Elléſcroft, i. e. Ella's overthrow.

Ella's defeat and death.

Ivar enters Mercia.

Upon this, Ivar, without any reſiſtance, took poſſeſſion of all Northumberland; but, it not ſatisfying his ambition, he marched into Mercia, ravaging, without mercy, all before him. Buthred king of Mercia, having had time to prepare himſelf, obtained the aſſiſtance of Ethelred his brother-in-law, who joined him with all the forces of Weſſex. Ivar was advanced as far as Nottingham, expecting to ſurpriſe the king of Mercia; but no ſooner did he receive information, that the two kings were together, than he halted, aſtoniſhed to find, that his forces were inferior to theirs. The two armies ſtood in the ſight of each other, for ſome time, expecting to engage, every moment; but the conſequence of a battle, which, in all probability, would be deciſive, kept them in ſuſpence. At laſt, having gazed at each other for a conſiderable ſpace, they parted, without a battle. Buthred judged it more adviſable to bribe the enemy, with a ſum of money, than to hazard an engagement, the ſucceſs whereof was very uncertain. Beſides, he apprehended, there was nothing to be got from the Danes, tho' fortune favoured him; whereas his all was at ſtake, if he ſhould be deſeated.

Ethelred joins the king of Mercia.

Buthred bribes the Danes, with a ſum of money, to retire.

Ivar, from his arrival, had always rifled all the places wherever he came, eſpecially, the monaſteries, where the Engliſh concealed their moſt valuable effects. It is natural to imagine, the idolatrous Danes had no great veneration for the nuns, and that many of them were expoſed to their brutal luſt. We have a remarkable ſtory, to this purpoſe: The abbeſs of Coldingham, upon the approach of the Daniſh army, perſuaded her nuns to cut off their noſes and upper lips, to prevent their outrages. This notable expedient, indeed, preſerved their honour, tho' at the expence of their lives. The ſoldiers, beholding, unexpectedly, ſuch monſtrous viſages, ſet fire to the monaſtery, compelling them, in the flames, to compleat the ſacrifice of their perſons, which they had already begun to offer unto God.

Sim. Dunelm.

The monaſtery of Coldingham deſtroyed by fire.

Ivar, not having had, in Mercia, the ſucceſs he expected, turned his arms another way, where, in all probability, he might meet with leſs oppoſition. Leaving Hubba his brother in Northumberland, with the flower of his troops, he embarqued for Eaſt-Anglia, where Edmund reigned, as I have, above, related. This young prince, being more inured to devotion, than to the exerciſe of arms, in a battle with the Danes, was eaſily defeated, being forced to retire, for his own ſafety. He thought to have concealed himſelf in a church; but, being diſcovered, he was brought before Ivar, at Hegilſdon*. Ivar offered to leave him in poſſeſſion of his kingdom, provided he would own him for his ſovereign, and become his tributary. Edmund rejecting this propoſal, Ivar ordered him to be tied to a tree, ſhot at with arrows, and then to be beheaded†; and Humbert, biſhop of the Eaſt-Angles, was alſo put to death. Edmund's head being found, ſome time after, was buried with his body at St. Edmund's-Bury, which was ſo called from him. Whilſt the Roman-catholick religion flouriſhed in England, great numbers of miracles were ſaid to be wrought at his tomb. I cannot divine, how his corpſe came to be at Tholouſe, where, they pretend, it was found, in 1667.

871. Ivar invades Eſſex.

† Tho' Rapin, as the moſt probable opinion, repreſents Osbert's raviſhing earl Bruern's lady to be the occaſion of the Danes invading Northumberland, there is alſo another reaſon aſſigned, for that and the barbarous murder of Edmund. It is ſaid, that Lodebroch king of Denmark, as he took the diverſion of hawking in a boat, was driven out to ſea, by a ſtorm, and caſt upon the Engliſh coaſt near Yarmouth. He was ſeized and brought to Edmund's court, then king of Eaſt-Anglia, who, finding him a great ſportſman, was pleaſed with his company. Bern the king's falconer, envious at his being excelled in his own buſineſs, by this ſtranger, led him into a wood, pretending to ſhew him game, and inhumanly murdered him. Lodebroch's dog, almoſt ſtarved, comes to the palace, and, being fed, goes away again. The dog having done this ſeveral times, the king's ſervants followed him, and were ſo brought to a ſight of the corpſe. Bern, being tried and found guilty of the murder, was condemned to be put into Lodebroch's boat and committed to the mercy of the ſea, without tackling or proviſion; and he was carried to the Daniſh ſhore. The boat being known, Bern was examined about Lodebroch. He told them, that, being caſt on the ſhore of Eaſt-Anglia, he was put to death, by king Edmund's order. Upon this, Ivar and Hubba, Lodebroch's ſons, embarqued for Eaſt-Anglia, with a powerful army, but were forced, by bad weather, into Northumberland. Coll. eccl. hiſt.

England,

England, they began to form new projects. Ivar, who had a perfect intelligence of the ſtate of the iſland, found he muſt, firſt, attack Weſſex, in order to accompliſh his deſigns, expecting, that, upon the ſubjection of that kingdom, the reſt would ſubmit, of courſe; and he alſo knew, that all his conqueſts, in other places, would be precarious, whilſt the king of Weſſex was in a condition to aſſiſt his neighbours. For theſe reaſons, he reſolved to attack Ethelred; and, embarquing his troops, he ſailed for the coaſt of Weſſex; where, landing his army, he advanced as far as Reading. Ethelred, apprehenſive of this, had his army in readineſs, and marched towards that quarter, accompanied by Alfred his brother. It would be tedious, and, perhaps, impracticable to give an account of the particulars of this war. It is ſufficient to relate, that, in the compaſs of one year, Ethelred fought nine pitch'd battles, and, on all occaſions, gave remarkable proofs of his courage and conduct, tho' he was not always ſucceſsful. In the laſt battle, near Wittingham, he received a mortal wound, of which he died, in 872, after a reign of five years *.

872. Ethelred's death.

Ethelred ſeems not to be altogether exempt from blame, in permitting the Danes to over-run Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, without reſiſtance; but, perhaps, being ſurprized at the defeat of the two kings of Northumberland, and the ſwift progreſs of Ivar's arms, he thought himſelf in no condition to repair the misfortunes occaſioned by the diſſentions of the Northumbrians. Beſides, he was, doubtleſs, unwilling to expoſe, in the defence of Northumbria, the forces he foreſaw to be neceſſary, for the preſervation of his own kingdom; and the terror alſo, that was ſpread over all England, probably, put it out of his power to diſpoſe of his army, as he could have wiſhed, the Engliſh being in ſuch a conſternation, that they would not march againſt ſuch formidable enemies, till they were obliged to it, for their own defence and ſecurity.

Ethelred was famous for his valour, but more ſo, for his piety. An hiſtorian affirms †, that being at prayers, upon a day of battle, he determin'd not to ſtir, till the ſervice was over, tho' the fight was begun, and the Danes had ſome advantage. God rewarded his devotion with a remarkable victory *.

† Aſſer. de Alfr. reb. geſt. p. 7.

* At Aſhdown in Berkſhire.

Ethelred left behind him ſeveral children, particularly, Alfred, the great-grand-father of Ethelwerd the hiſtorian. Some relate, he had alſo a daughter, named Thyra, married to Trothorn VI. king of Denmark. Ethelred's ſon did not ſucceed him; but his brother Alfred, purſuant to Ethelwulph's will, was placed on the throne, without oppoſition.

During Ethelred's reign, the Danes demoliſh'd the famous monaſteries of Croyland, Ely, Peterborough or Medeſhamſtead, beſides Coldingham already mentioned. The hiſtorians have been very particular, in deſcribing the miſeries of the abbies, whilſt they have paſs'd over in ſilence other events, more worthy the notice of a curious reader.

6. ALFRED the great.

Alfred the great.

ALFRED, as well as his brother and predeceſſor, was moleſted by the Danes; and he had frequent occaſions, for the exerciſe of his courage, conduct, and all the other virtues Heaven had beſtowed upon him. But their fortune, however, was different; for as Ethelred was never reduced to ſo low a condition as Alfred, ſo neither was he ever exalted to that height of glory. One would think, that Divine Providence, in the perſon of Alfred, was willing to convince the world, how the Almighty ſets up and pulls down kings, according to his good pleaſure. I ſhall illuſtrate this truth, in the life of this prince, taking a celebrated hiſtorian for my guide, who has given us an accurate account of Alfred's actions.

The ſtate of Weſſex.

Ethelred left the affairs of his kingdom in a deplorable ſituation, the Danes, who were maſters of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, being in the very heart of Weſſex; and, notwithſtanding the many battles he had given them, they were poſſeſſed of ſeveral towns, and in a fair way of ſubduing the whole kingdom. Alfred had ſcarce been a month on the throne, when he was obliged to take the field againſt theſe formidable enemies, who were advanced as far as Wilton; and there he firſt attack'd them, after his brother's death †. He flatter'd himſelf, for ſome time, that he ſhould prove victorious; but, the ſcene changing on a ſudden, he was forced, at length, to leave the Danes maſters of the field. His loſs, however, was not ſo conſiderable, as to lead him to deſpair of being revenged; for, as the enemy had loſt a great number of their men, he endeavour'd, with all expedition, to get his army in readineſs to engage them again, before they ſhould be reinforced. The Danes, aſtoniſh'd at his conduct, though victorious, ſued for peace, being unable to carry on the war. How much ſoever Alfred confided in his troops, who ſeem'd to be deſirous of engaging, he thought it moſt expedient to get rid of his enemies, without the hazard of a ſecond battle. As they offer'd to depart from his dominions, provided he would not interrupt them in any other part of England, he gladly complied with their terms, taking them to be advantageous, in his preſent circumſtances; and, indeed, this treaty gave him leiſure to make preparations againſt a freſh invaſion, which he had great reaſon to expect. Beſides, had he been defeated, upon giving them battle, his whole kingdom would infallibly have fallen into the hands of his enemies.

Alfred enters into a treaty with the Danes.

The Danes retir'd to London *, which they had taken, during the laſt war. Ivar, returning to Denmark, left the command of the army to his brother Hubba, who turn'd his arms againſt Mercia. Buthred, not being in a condition to withſtand him, and expecting no aſſiſtance from Alfred, who was under articles to the contrary, judged it moſt expedient to bribe the Danes with a ſum of money, to ſecure his kingdom from their depredations. Upon the receipt of it, they ſet out for Northumberland, deſigning to take up their quarters with their countrymen; but, by reaſon of the ſcarcity of proviſions, occaſioned by their own devaſtations, they were forced to return into Mercia. Whilſt in Northumberland, they dethroned Egbert, to whom they had given the crown, and made Ricſige, a Daniſh earl, king, in his ſtead. Buthred, finding they were again in his dominions, complain'd of their breach of faith; but they obliged him, however, to give them another conſiderable ſum of money, which was no ſooner paid, than they began to commit ravages, convincing Buthred, that even his own perſon was in danger. The dread of falling into their hands compell'd him to abandon his kingdom; and retire to Rome, where he ſpent the remainder of his days in the Engliſh college. Mercia being, thus, without a king, and Alfred under obligations not to ſend any ſuccours, the Danes eaſily ſubdued that ſpacious kingdom; and, leſt the Mercians ſhould be too much terrified, they placed Ceoluph, one of Buthred's domeſticks, on the throne. Tho' the new king was an Engliſhman; yet, as he held his kingdom, during the pleaſure of his maſters, he was reſolved to make uſe of his time, to fill his coffers; ſo that the Mercians were as great ſufferers by the rapines and extortion of their countryman, as they would, perhaps, have been by thoſe of a foreigner.

The Danes enter Mercia, and are bought off with money.

Ingulgh.

Tho' the Danes were poſſeſſed of Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland, they had their eyes intently fixed upon Weſſex, which contained the other four kingdoms; but, as they had always met with princes there, that diſputed every inch of ground with them, they were under a neceſſity to enter into an alliance with Alfred, till they had a more favourable opportunity. In the interim, they manured their lands, conſidering the country, they had ſo often and horribly ravaged, as their own. England being, thus, divided between the Engliſh and the Danes, peace and tranquillity ſeemed to be in a fair way of being reſtored; but the miſeries of England were, as yet, far from a period.

England divided between the Engliſh and the Danes.

Whilſt Alfred entertained hopes of enjoying ſome quiet, Halfden, a Daniſh general, having fitted out a fleet, made a deſcent on Eaſt-Anglia; and, the ſeaſon being far advanced, winter'd there, deſigning, in the ſpring, to invade Weſſex. Halfden's arrival with freſh troops ſhould have put Alfred upon his guard; but, confiding in the treaty he had lately made with the Danes, he made no preparations, of which Halfden took the advantage. Early in the ſpring, he ſet ſail, and took, by ſurprize, Warham-caſtle *, the ſtrongeſt place in all Weſſex. The Engliſh, hitherto, conſidered the Daniſh irruptions, as a regular war, in which the whole nation was concerned, and, accordingly, they imagined, that a treaty, concluded with one band, would oblige all the reſt; but the Danes were of another opinion. They, with the conſent of their kings, entered into private aſſociations to man out fleets, and divide the ſpoils they ſhould carry off from England and other countries; and theſe ſeveral parties, being independent of each other, had no regard for any treaties but thoſe made by themſelves. Alfred had entered into a treaty with Hubba; but Halfden did not think himſelf included in it. However, the Engliſh, looking upon the ſurprize of Warham, as downright treachery, called Heaven and earth to witneſs the violation of their faith; but Halfden, regardleſs of their complaints, would have penetrated farther into Weſſex, had not Alfred came into a particular treaty with him. The author of his life tells us, the Danes ſwore by the holy reliques of the church, that they would never return into Weſſex †; and, in all likelihood, the king was at great expences, to bring them to theſe terms. It is very ſurprizing, that Alfred ſhould inſiſt upon their ſwearing by the holy reliques, who were, as yet pagans, rather than by their bracelets, which was their uſual oath; but, perhaps, he thought, that, if they ſhould violate this chriſtian oath, Heaven would, the more aſſuredly, puniſh them for it. However, they had no more conſcience for this than their former oaths, as they broke it, even before they had quitted Weſſex; for being on their march to Mercia, and meeting with a body of Engliſh horſe, who had no apprehenſions of danger, on the account of the treaty, they attacked them, unexpectedly, and the greateſt part of them were ſlain. The horſes, taken by the Danes, on this occaſion, were of uſe to carry them, with more expedition, towards the weſtern parts of Weſſex, where they beſieged Exeter †.

The war is renewed.

Alfred, finding that all treaties with ſuch a perfidious people were uſeleſs, was reſolved to take more effectual meaſures, to ſecure himſelf from their treachery. With this view, he held a general aſſembly, and, in a pathetick ſpeech, repreſented to them, that they had nothing to depend upon but their valour, to deliver them from their miſeries; that, at this juncture, they were under a neceſſity to hazard their lives, in the defence of their country, and to ſacrifice part of their eſtates to preſerve the reſt; and, laſtly, that an heroick reſolution was the only means to avoid the calamities, in which their neighbours were involved. Theſe remonſtrances having anſwered his end, Alfred raiſed an army with which he engaged the enemy, ſeven times in one campaign; but, as he was not equally ſucceſsful, in all theſe battles, he was forced, at laſt, to treat with the Danes. Tho' he could have but little dependence upon their faith, he had no other way left to put an end to this dangerous war. This new treaty, however, which obliged the Danes to return no more into Weſſex, was more ſtrictly obſerved than the former.

Rollo's arrival in England. 876.

The Weſt-Saxons regarded the retreat of their enemies, as a ſignal deliverance; but no ſooner had they departed, than a new ſwarm arrived, under the command of Rollo, the famous Norman general, who became, in proceſs of time, a ſcourge to France. It happened that Alfred was in a poſture to receive them; and, after ſome attempts, Rollo deſpairing of a ſettlement in England, determin'd to try his fortune in France. In all appearance, as he found the beſt part of England in the hands of his countrymen, and Alfred prepared to diſpute the reſt with him, he thought he ſhould meet with better ſucceſs there; and, ſome ſay, it was revealed to him in a dream, that he ſhould be very ſucceſsful on the other ſide of the water.

He departs, to try his fortune in France.

Alfred equips a fleet.

Upon Rollo's departure, Alfred enjoy'd ſome quiet, which furniſh'd him with an opportunity to contrive, how to prevent theſe frequent invaſions. The beſt and ſpeedieſt method, he apprehended, was to equip a good fleet, to engage the Danes, before they came to land, where they generally had the advantage. As naval engagements were the fartheſt from their thoughts, their ſhips were only fit for tranſports, whereas Alfred had built his, on purpoſe for ſervice; and, in a little time, he reaped the fruits of his invention. His fleet, meeting with ſix Daniſh veſſels, chaced them; and one of the largeſt was taken, the ſoldiers and mariners being thrown over-board. After this, 120 ſail of Daniſh ſhips making to the ſhore, to land their men, the king's fleet engaged them; and moſt of them were ſunk; and, the enſuing year, another Daniſh fleet, ſailing weſtward, was ſo diſtreſſed by a tempeſt, that all the ſhips periſh'd, except a few, that fell into the hands of the Engliſh.

The Danes entirely abandon Weſſex.

Alfred, being animated by theſe ſucceſſes, reſolved upon attacking the Danes in the weſt, where they had fortified themſelves, by the taking of Exeter; and, beſides, the Corniſh men had, all along, ſided with them. He executed his deſign, with ſo much vigour and reſolution, that, at length, he compelled the Danes to give him hoſtages, and entirely abandon Weſſex; and they retir'd into Mercia, where, being weary of their unſettled lives, they incorporated with their countrymen, who were poſſeſs'd of that kingdom. They unanimouſly agreed to depoſe Ceoluph, and divided the land among themſelves. What form of government they eſtabliſhed, we know not; for the Engliſh hiſtorians, overlooking the civil affairs of the Danes, mention only their wars. Thus, a period was put to the kingdom of Mercia, after it had ſubſiſted near 300 years.

877. The end of the kingdoms of Mercia and Northumberland.

The preceding year, the kingdom of Northumberland had the ſame fate. Halfden, who went thither, had made Egbert king, in the room of Recſige, who died in 876. The new king or viceroy had but a ſhort reign, for, in the firſt year of it, Halfden dethron'd him, dividing the land among his countrymen; and, doubtleſs, the Danes in Mercia followed their example. Thus, the kingdom of Northumberland, which had continu'd 330 years, was canton'd out among the Daniſh officers; and it proved a very difficult matter to expel them, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

The Danes invade Weſſex.

Tho' the Danes were poſſeſſed of the three antient kingdoms of the heptarchy, yet there was not room enough for theſe already in England, and thoſe that were continually coming over, in queſt of habitations. The new-comers beheld Eſſex with a greedy eye; and the others, who were ſettled, perceiving that their countrymen envied their good fortune, were jealous, leſt they ſhould diſpoſſeſs them, if they were not provided for. Upon this, they all agreed to exert their utmoſt vigour, in ſubduing that kingdom, which had, hitherto, ſo bravely withſtood their attacks; and they carried on their deſign, with the greateſt ſecrecy and expedition. On a ſudden, a more formidable army, than had yet been ſeen, advanced towards Weſſex, before it was poſſible for Alfred to be in a condition to receive them. They proceeded directly to Chippenham *, one of the fineſt and ſtrongeſt cities of the kingdom. The taking of this place, in a few days, ſo terrified the Weſt-Saxons, as entirely to diſpirit them. Some retreated into Wales or beyond ſea, whilſt others went over to the Danes, ſwearing allegiance to them. In this revolt, Alfred was left alone with a few domeſticks, who, from duty and affection, were unwilling to deſert him in adverſity; but, as they were chargeable to him, and could do him but little ſervice, he diſmiſs'd them all, that he might the more conveniently ſhift for himſelf. In this extremity, he was forced to conceal himſelf at a neatherd's, in the iſle of Athelney in Somerſetſhire †. This place was ſurrounded by a large moraſs, thro' which there was but one narrow foot-path leading to the neatherd's cottage, that was hid by briars and thorns. Here the king lay concealed, for ſome time, from his friends as well as his enemies, without being known even by the neatherd's wife, who employed him about her little houſhold affairs ‡. This was a miſerable condition for a prince; but God, who deſigned only to exerciſe his patience, did not leave him long in theſe circumſtances. In leſs than ſix months, the ſcene was ſurprizingly changed. It is ſaid, that St. Cuthbert, formerly biſhop of Lindisfarn, repreſented to him, in a dream, that he ſhould ſuddenly be raiſed to an infinitely more glorious ſtate, than that from which he fell; but, paſſing over theſe idle tales of the monks, who could not take notice of an extraordinary event, without introducing ſome apparition or miracle, I ſhall ſhew, how this grand revolution was brought about, by the means of a deſperate undertaking.

Alfred deſerted by all.

Is forced to conceal himſelf at a neatherd's.

Hubba, who was commander of the Daniſh troops, in the abſence of his brother Ivar, had invaded Wales, deſtroying all before him, with fire and ſword; and he afterwards, with the ſame view, entered Devonſhire in the kingdom of Weſſex. At his approach, the earl of Devon, with a handful of brave fellows, retired into Kinwith-caſtle *, to avoid the firſt ſhock of the Daniſh fury; and Hubba ſoon beſieged the caſtle, confident that the garriſon, being ſmall, would, in a little time, be obliged to ſurrender. The earl of Devon, finding all the defence he could make would be to no purpoſe, laid before the beſieged the danger they were in, of being expoſed to the fury of their mercileſs enemies, aſſuring them, they had but one way to eſcape, by opening a paſſage, with their ſwords, thro' the enemy's army. He told them, that, undoubtedly, the Danes were negligent and ſecure, regarding them only, as a handful of men pent up within walls; and that his propoſal was far from being impracticable, provided they immediately put it in execution; and that, after all, they only ventured their lives and liberties, which would be in much greater danger, by ſtanding a ſiege. Upon this, the beſieged, without deliberating on the matter, ſallied out, ſword in hand, upon the Danes, and put them into the greateſt diſorder; and this auſpicious beginning inſpired them with reſolution to purſue their advantage. They preſſed upon the Danes with freſh vigour, not allowing them time to recover out of their ſurprize; and having, at length, entirely diſperſed them, made a dreadful ſlaughter. Hubba was ſlain, and his famous ſtandard, namen Reafen or the raven, was taken by the Engliſh. The Danes imagined, there was a ſecret virtue in this ſtandard, which Ivar's ſiſters had wrought with their own hands . By the means of a ſtrong fancy, or the deluſion of the devil, they thought they ſaw this raven, before a battle, clap his wings, as an omen of victory, or hang down his head, as a preſage of their defeat. This, at leaſt, is related by the hiſtorians, who add, that the loſs of their ſtandard did not a little diſpirit them.

Hubba ravages Wales, and entres Weſſex.

* On the river Tau.

The news of this defeat and the death of Hubba having reached Alfred, at the neatherd's, he directly projected, how to make the beſt uſe of this fortunate blow. He diſcovered to his friends, where he was, that they might come and conſult with him, about proper meaſures at this juncture; and, having conferred with them, he order'd them to muſter together, in ſeveral parts of his kingdom, ſmall bodies of troops, that, at a minute's warning, might be ready to join one another. The moſt critical, as well as important point was, to have exact intelligence of the poſture of the enemy, that ſuitable ſteps might be taken accordingly. Alfred, at a loſs for a fit perſon to engage in this neceſſary work, took the boldeſt reſolution, that ever enter'd into the mind of a prince, viz. to go, in perſon, into the Daniſh camp, to be inform'd, by his own eyes, of the ſtate of the enemy. Having diſguis'd himſelf, with a harp in his hand, as if he got his living, by playing on that inſtrument, he enter'd the Daniſh camp, ſtaying there ſeveral days to make uſeful obſervations, to the utmoſt of his power. Among other things, he found, that they had not, as uſual, encamped on a hill, nor were there any advanced guards, to ſecure the avenues to their camp, having nothing to fear, as the enemy had not an army in the field ††. When he had made theſe diſcoveries, he return'd to his friends at Athelney, and appointed Selwood † foreſt, for the general rendezvous of all his troops. This affair was managed with ſuch ſecrecy and expedition, that, in a little time, the king appeared at the head of an army, before the Danes had any apprehenſions of his deſign; and they were in the greateſt conſternation, to behold, on a ſudden, the Engliſh army advancing to attack them. Alfred was unwilling to let them recover out of their ſurprize; and, therefore, exhorting his troops, in a few words, not in the leaſt, to dread an army already vanquiſhed by their own fears, gave the ſignal of battle. The Danes, however, made a brave defence; but, whether they had not leiſure to draw up their troops in order, or, whether the loſs of their ſtandard had poſſeſſed them with a notion, that their gods had abandon'd them, they were, at length, entirely routed, and the greateſt part of their army cut to pieces. The ſmall number of forces, that eſcaped, retreated to a caſtle, where they were immediately beſieged. Alfred preſs'd them ſo vigorouſly, that they were ſoon obliged to capitulate, tho' on more advantageous terms than they could have expected, in their preſent condition; for he agreed to reſign the lands of Eaſt-Anglia to thoſe that would embrace chriſtianity, requiring the reſt, directly, to take their laſt leave of England, and to give hoſtages for the performance of articles. Guthurn, governor of Eaſt-Anglia, who, ſince Hubba's death, commanded the Daniſh army, acceding to theſe conditions, came to Alfred, with 30 of his chief officers, after he had ſhipped off all thoſe that refuſed baptiſm *.

This ſignal victory crown'd Alfred's wiſhes, having, by a ſingle battle, expell'd the Danes, and regained his kingdom; and his ſubjects daily return'd to their allegiance, whom fear had diſpers'd or prevailed on to ſubmit to the enemy. Guthurn and his attendants met with a gracious reception, and Alfred was very punctual in the obſervance of his promiſes to them. All the hiſtorians are agreed, that the Daniſh general was inveſted with the title of king of Eaſt-Anglia; but they do not tell us, whether it was by virtue of ſome private treaty, made before with him, or whether Alfred propoſed by it to ſecure his affection and confidence. However, it is evident, Guthurn held, with the title of king, the kingdom of Eaſt-Anglia, which was entirely inhabited by Danes, and of which Ivar had made him governor. He divided the lands among his countrymen, and exerciſed the regal authority, to the time of his death. Some, particularly Aſſerius, add, that Alfred gave him alſo the kingdom of Northumberland; but it is very improbable, ſince the Danes had been long before poſſeſſed of Northumberland, and had ſhared the lands among themſelves. The caſe was otherwiſe in Eaſt-Anglia, where the Danes had no fix'd habitations, it being ſtill conſider'd, as a part of the Engliſh monarchy, tho' the Danes were moſt powerful there; ſo that Alfred only confirm'd them in the poſſeſſion of that kingdom, by granting them a king of their own nation, who was to be his vaſſal and tributary.

All the Danes own Alfred for their ſovereign.

From the whole of what has been ſaid, it may be obſerved, that, at the time of the laſt battle, there were two ſorts of Danes in England, thoſe already ſettled, and thoſe that were endeavouring to procure a ſettlement. Theſe laſt were they, with whom Alfred treated; for the others, ſeeing their brethren ſo roughly uſed, thought it a happineſs to be able to preſerve their own poſſeſſions. As the fortune of war is uncertain, they rather choſe to acknowledge Alfred for their ſovereign, than endanger the loſs of their all, by continuing the war; and, accordingly, thoſe, ſettled in the three kingdoms of the Angles, ſwore allegiance to him. It was ſcarce poſſible, indeed, that all of them ſhould be equally ſatisfied. Several accepted of the terms of the laſt treaty, merely, becauſe they knew not where to go; and, if they became chriſtians, it was for a ſubſiſtence, whilſt they waited for a fair opportunity of returning to their former courſe of life. This is manifeſt, from what followed; for, when it was leaſt expected, the moſt conſiderable among them, headed by one Haſtings, ſtrenuouſly ſollicited Guthurn to renew the war in Weſſex; and, not prevailing, they put to ſea, and ravaged the coaſts of Flanders. Soon after, another troop, as numerous, being told of the great booty, the firſt had met with at Ghent, embarqued, in order to join them. Theſe two bands over-ran Brabant, Haynault, Flanders, Picardy, and Artois, acting unparallel'd cruelties. After this, being divided into two bodies, one of them return'd to England, in hopes of plundering the country, where they fancied they ſhould come unexpectedly; and, having landed at Kent, they advanced towards Rocheſter, deſigning to ſurprize the city; but Alfred, whoſe army was in readineſs, having poſted it in thoſe parts, upon the firſt notice of their arrival, forced them to retreat to their ſhips, in ſuch a hurry, that they left their booty behind them. Being diſappointed in their deſign upon England, by Alfred's vigilance, they returned to France, and, rejoining their companions, continued their depredations in that kingdom.

The Danes return to England, and are repulſed.

Hitherto the Engliſh were only on the defenſive, expoſed to the continual irruptions of the Danes; and, not knowing where the enemy would land, were, for the moſt part, ſurprized, before it was in their power to make preparations. As the ſea-coaſts were uninhabited, there was nothing to hinder theſe pirates from landing where they pleaſed; but Alfred, having now ſome peace and leiſure, was reſolved to put his affairs in a better poſture. He took care, in the firſt place, to fit out a conſiderable fleet, the advantage of which he had known by his own experience; and, as ſoon as it was ready to ſail, the admiral had orders to cruiſe along the coaſts, and attack all the Daniſh ſhips, wherever he ſhould find them. He ſurprized 16 in the port of Harwich *, in Eaſt-Anglia; and, taking ſome and ſinking the reſt, he carried off a conſiderable booty. Guthurn, incenſed at this act of hoſtility, in one of his harbours, permitted the parties concerned to endeavour to repair their loſſes, and even furniſhed them with means. Soon after, they attacked the king's ſhips, in the night, and had ſome advantage over them; but the fleet, notwithſtanding, kept theſe rovers in awe, freeing England from their ravages.

He fortifies ſeveral towns. 887.

Alfred, having, thus, ſecured the ſea-coaſts, fortified the reſt of the kingdom with caſtles and walled towns, which he very much wanted. He repaired thoſe that were gone to ruin, and built others in ſo ſtrong a manner, that they could not eaſily be aſſaulted; and there was not a paſs or avenue, fit for that purpoſe, but what was defended by ſome works, to prevent the ſudden incurſions of the Danes. But, after all, he could not be completely guarded againſt them, without one important place, the city of London, conſiderable both for its largeneſs and ſituation; which, being poſſeſs'd by the Danes, would open them a free paſſage into Weſſex, whenever they ſhould be inclined to invade that kingdom. On this account,

He beſieges and takes London, and gives it to his ſon-in-law Ethelred.

he determined to beſiege it, knowing the garriſon was not able to hold out long; and, accordingly, the beſieged were ſoon oblig'd to come to a capitulation. He had no ſooner ſubdued this large city, but he exceedingly added both to its ſtrength and beauty † He made Ethelred governor of it, who had married his daughter Elfleda, or rather he gave it him in fee, with the title of earl of Mercia. Some think, he conferred upon him the title of king; but, in my opinion, without any grounds. By creating him earl of Mercia, he inveſted him only with power over London, all the reſt of Mercia being poſſeſſed by the Danes, over whom he claimed no other right but that of ſovereignty, to which they had lately conſented; ſo that Ethelred had only an empty title, till, by his valour, he ſubdued a conſiderable part of that province.

The Danes ſtand in awe of Alfred.

The many towns, Alfred repaired and fortified, employed him, for ſome years. Theſe fortifications not only defended the kingdom againſt the foreign Danes, but kept thoſe in awe that were ſettled in the iſland. Theſe, obſerving Alfred's wiſe regulations, were the more induced to continue in obedience; and they even ſuffered ſeveral of the Engliſh, whom they had expelled, to return and live among them, under the king's protection.

England enjoys quiet 12 years.

It was, at this time, that Alfred had the ſatisfaction to ſee peace and tranquillity reſtored, after ſo many years of trouble. This pleaſing ſtate of things continued 12 years *; during which, he had leiſure to rectify the diſorders, introduced by ſuch a tedious war, both in church and ſtate. As I ſhall, hereafter, take particular notice of Alfred's regulations, in this interval, I ſhall proceed to make an end of his wars. It is ſufficient, at preſent, to obſerve, concerning theſe peaceable times, that he was indefatigable in his endeavours to promote the happineſs of his ſubjects, till he was interrupted by freſh invaſions, of which I ſhall give the following account.

* According to Spelman, Milton, &c. 8 years.

The Danes renew their invaſions.

The Danes, who, under Haſtings, ravaged, for 12 or 13 years together, France and the Low-Countries, were not ſatisfied with the immenſe booty they had acquired; for, according to the cuſtom of pyrates, they prodigally ſpent what they had obtained, without pains or labour, and ſo were always reduced to a neceſſity of renewing their ravages, for their ſupport. However, being diſcouraged by two dreadful cheques given them by Eudes and Arnulph, kings of France and Germany, they determined to return to England, more for plunder, than with a view of ſettling there. They fitted out 300 ſhips, which they divided into two fleets. With one of them, conſiſting of 200 ſail, they arrived on the coaſt of Kent, and took Appledore; and this place, then very conſiderable, made them maſters of that province, as well as of Suſſex and Surrey. The other fleet, commanded by Haſtings, entered the Thames and landed at Middleton ‡. It would be no eaſy matter to deſcribe the miſeries, the inhabitants of theſe counties were expoſed to, by theſe barbarians; but when we call to mind, that they were idolatrous rovers and pyrates, we muſt naturally conclude, they made no ſcruple of committing the moſt enormous cruelties. Alfred was then in Eaſt-Anglia, on account of Guthurn's death; and as he had no intelligence of their deſigns, he had made no preparations for his defence. All, that he could then do, was to take a new oath of allegiance from the Eaſt-Anglian

Take Appledore and Middeton.

Cambd. Addit. to Eſſex.

† The original of this famous city is uncertain; but, as there was no ſuch place in Cæſar's time, and it was a great town in Nero's, it was, probably, founded in the reign of Claudius, and inhabited by the Britons and Romans together, being a trading though not a military colony, from the very beginning. It is ſaid the walls were built by Conſtantine the great, at the requeſt of Helena his mother, containing within them an oblong ſpace of three miles in compaſs. That part, which ran along the Thames, is quite waſh'd away, tho' the reſt remains to this day. There are ſeven gates, Ludgate, Newgate, Alderſgate, Biſhopſgate, Cripplegate, Moregate, and Aldgate. Cæſar's ſaying, the Britons called the places fenced round with woods and groves, cities or towns, led Cambden to conjecture London was ſo called from Llhwn, in Britiſh, ſuch a town, as if we ſhould ſay, by way of eminence, the city. Danes, Danes; which they obſerved no longer than he continued among them. As ſoon as he was gone, they join'd Haſtings, for a ſhare in the plunder. Alfred, notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, preſerved his courage, and with what troops he could muſter together, marched againſt the Danes, who were pillaging Kent; but, being inform'd, on his way, that another body of Danes had enter'd Weſſex, he turn'd his arms againſt theſe laſt, as judging them to be the moſt dangerous. The Danes, who were then before Exeter, raiſed the ſiege in a great hurry, departing to vent their fury in ſome other place.

They are joined by the Danes of East-Anglia.

It is impoſſible to give a particular account of this war, it being related by the hiſtorians in ſo confuſed a manner. As there were ſeveral bands of Danes in England, at the ſame time, one in Kent, and another in Weſſex, and roving continually from place to place, the Engliſh hiſtorians could not acquire a diſtinct knowledge, ſince a war undertaken, for the ſake of plunder only, muſt, of courſe, be irregular. Accordingly, we find, in their hiſtories, the ſame leaders, ſometimes in one province, ſometimes in another, without being able to apprehend, when, or how, they got thither.

Hiſtorians give a confuſed account of this war.

We are ignorant alſo, by what lucky accident, Alfred was, on a ſudden, freed from his cruel enemies, who had over-run his whole kingdom. It is certain, however, that, having reduced England to a miſerable condition, they ſhipp'd off again, tho' hiſtorians are ſilent, as to the cauſe. I am apt to think, their ſudden departure was occaſion'd by the plague, which raged then in England, and carried off great numbers of the Danes as well as Engliſh; and, beſides, they had made ſuch devaſtations in the country, that there was nothing left to pillage. The greateſt part of the Daniſh rovers went to France, under Haſtings; but they did not remain there any time, Haſtings having new projects on foot. The terror he had every where ſpread, along the ſea-coaſts, having put all upon their guard, reſolving to ſteer his courſe, where he ſhould not be expected, he ſet ſail for the Mediterranean; and, whilſt he was there, by an impious and perfidious ſtratagem, he became maſter of Luna, on the coaſt of Tuſcany. He pretended he had a mighty deſire to become a chriſtian, and was baptized by the biſhop, who came to him, for that purpoſe. A few days after, the biſhop was informed, that his new convert was deceaſed, and that he died like a good chriſtian, earneſtly deſiring to be buried in the church of Luna, to which he had bequeathed a conſiderable legacy. By this device, a great number of Danes, under the pretence of attending the corpſe, entered the city, which they had no ſooner done, than they began to murder as well as plunder the inhabitants.

The Danes go off, on a ſudden.

Haſtings, having brought ſo many miſeries on England, France, and the Low-countries, retired to the city of Chartres †, which Charles the ſimple gave him, on purpoſe to keep him quiet; and he died there, in peace, after he ſpent the moſt of his days in plundering the greateſt part of the maritime countries of Europe. The Danes, that would not attend him, when he left England, ſubmitted to the command of Sigefert ſettled in Northumberland. For ſome time, theſe alſo ravaged the coaſt of Weſſex, not daring to make any farther advances into the country, by reaſon of their being but few in number; and, at laſt, they went off to ſeek their fortune in other places ‡.

Haſtings retires to Chartres, and dies there.

† 42 miles from Paris.

Alfred, being freed from his enemies, paſs'd the reſidue of his life in profound tranquillity. Hitherto, I have treated of this prince, as a warrior only, ſometimes victorious, and at other times defeated; but, whatever his ſucceſs was, always affording ſignal ſpecimens of his valour and conduct *. I ſhall now repreſent his other virtues, and conſider him, as a juſt, learned, and religious prince, the father of his ſubjects, and an indefatigable promoter of arts, ſciences, juſtice, and religion; but, that I may not confound his civil with his moral virtues, I ſhall begin with what he did for the benefit of his people, as their ſovereign, and then ſhall ſpeak of his private life, and the manner how he managed his domeſtick affairs.

The kingdom freed from the Danes.

When the Danes ſettled in England, finding they had no reaſon to expect any ſuccours from their countrymen, their care was to ſecure their preſent poſſeſſions. The carrying on of the war was ſo far from being likely to prove advantageous, that it endangered the loſs of what they already enjoyed; and, tho' they might, by this means, have maintained their ground, yet as they muſt have been always with their ſwords in their hands, it would have prevented them from manuring their lands, to their great prejudice. On theſe accounts, they at length, ſubmitted to Alfred, as the ſovereign of all England. Hiſtorians do not inform us, whether he made uſe of any force to reduce them; but it is evident, his authority was owned in Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia, as well as in Weſſex. The Welch themſelves, who had been terribly harraſſed by the Danes, being in no condition to withſtand them, became his tributaries . They add alſo, that the king of Scotland paid him homage; but this is too diſputable a point to be affirmed for a truth ††.

The Danes own Alfred for their ſovereign.

‡ Spelman tells us, Alfred equipped a fleet, and, in a chaſe, took twenty of their ſhips, hanging up the pyrates along the ſea-coaſt, for a terror to the reſt.

* It is ſaid, he fought 56 pitched battles with the Danes.

 That is, the inhabitans of South-Wales, who, tho' they had been reduced before, finding Alfred engaged in other wars, had thrown off their obedience. As for North-Wales, the Ordovices, who were fierce and troubleſome, are hardly to be look'd upon, as entirely ſubdued, before Edward I. time, 200 years after the Norman conqueſt. Spelman.

†† Gregour, king of Scots, is ſaid to have ſerved him in all his wars; and it is alſo affirmed, that Donald, his ſucceſſor, aſſiſted him with 5000 horſe, dying in his ſervice. Spelman. Holingſh. p. 121.

Alfred compiles a body of laws.

No ſooner did Alfred become abſolute, than he employed his power for the good of his ſubjects. As the laws, during the wars, were not only very much diſregarded, but almoſt unknown to the people, he was induſtrious, for ſome time, in making a collection of the beſt laws he could meet with; in which he inſerted ſeveral of the judicial laws * of the old teſtament, and a great number of thoſe formerly enacted by Ina king of Weſſex and Offa king of Mercia †. To theſe he added many of his own, adapted to their preſent circumſtances; and we may obſerve, in all his laws, an ardent zeal for juſtice and a ſincere deſire of totally ſuppreſſing all violence ‡. They were mild, indeed, compared with thoſe of later ages, as moſt offences were puniſhed by mulcts and fines ; but Alfred's ſtrict execution of them counterbalanced their lenity. If, with reſpect to private perſons, the rigour of the law was ſomewhat abated, the caſe was otherwiſe, with regard to corrupt magiſtrates, to whom Alfred was ever inexorable; for he very well knew, that it would be in vain to expect obedience from his ſubjects, if the magiſtrates gave them a bad example. Within the compaſs of a year, he is ſaid to have taken away the lives of 44 judges, for not doing juſtice ††.

Juries are inſtituted.

Theſe proceedings ſeemed to be ſufficient, to prevent oppreſſion; but as Alfred was very ſenſible, that an oppreſſing ſpirit naturally grew upon men in authority, he ordered, that, in all criminal actions, 12 men, choſen for that purpoſe, ſhould determine the matter, and that the judge ſhould pronounce ſentence, according to their verdict. This privilege, which the Engliſh enjoy to this day, is, doubtleſs, the nobleſt and moſt valuable, that can be poſſeſſed by any ſubjects. An Engliſhman, accuſed of any crime, is to be tried only by his peers, viz. perſons of his own rank and condition; ſo that he is in no danger of being oppreſſed by the moſt powerful accuſers. Theſe 12 men, choſen with the approbation of the perſon accuſed, are called by the collective name of jury, and determine about the life or death of the accuſed. How happy are the people, that enjoy ſo glorious a privilege!

The kingdom is divided into ſhires, hundreds, and tythings.

The wars had occaſioned ſuch diſorders in the kingdom, that every part of it abounded with vagabonds and vagrants, who committed all manner of crimes with impunity, being ſcreened from juſtice, by their poor and mean condition; for, as they had no fixed habitations, upon the commiſſion of an offence that deſerved puniſhment, they ſhifted their quarters, and it was a difficult matter to apprehend them. Alfred, incenſed to behold honeſt men thus expoſed to the inſults of villains, was extremely deſirous to put a ſtop to ſo great an evil; and, having firſt conſulted, about this affair, with thoſe whom he thought capable of adviſing him, to prevent any perſon from living in his dominions, without being obliged to give an account of his actions, he divided all England into ſhires ‡‡ or counties *†, the counties into hundreds, and the hundreds into tythings. Upon this, all the inhabitants of the kingdom were obliged to belong to ſome tything; and they were otherwiſe look'd upon as vagabonds, and, as ſuch, denied the protection of the law. Every houſholder was anſwerable for his wife, his children under 15 years of age, and his domeſticks; and, if any one fell under a ſuſpicion of doing ill, he was obliged to give ſecurity for his good behaviour; and, if he could find none, the tything impriſon'd him, to avoid the puniſhment he ſhould incur by his faults †‡. Thus, as the houſholders were reſponſible for their families, the tything for the houſholders, the hundred for the tythings, and the counties for the hundreds, every one was watchful over his neighbour's actions. If a ſtranger, guilty of any crime, made his eſcape, information was taken of the houſe, where he lodged; and, if he had been there three days, the maſter of the family was condemned to pay his fine; but, if he had not been there ſo long, the houſeholder was acquitted, upon making oath, that he was not privy to his crime. † And Ethelbert alſo, king of Kent, who was the firſt that put the Saxon laws into writing.

‡ If king Alfred compiled a complete body of laws, it is now loſt; for thoſe lately publiſhed by Dr. Wilkins, who has given us all the laws extant, from Ethelbert, the firſt chriſtian lawgiver in England, to the Magna Charta of Henry III. are but an imperfect ſyſtem. Alfred's laws are ranged under two heads: 1. The laws of Alfred, 40 in number. 2. The league between Alfred and Guthurn, in all probability, no more than articles of pacification. The 37th law ſecures the entail of eſtates, enacting, "That thoſe, who have book-land or eſtates in land left them "by their parents, ſhould not alienate it from their heirs, provided it could be proved, that he, who firſt granted "the eſtate, ſettled it, upon condition of nonalienation." Another law prohibits "the buying a man, a horſe, "or an ox, without a voucher to warrant the ſale." The occaſion of this law was, as follows: When the Danes firſt ſettled in England, it was a common practice between the two nations, not only to ſteal horſes and oxen, but men and women, and ſell them to each other. Afterwards, fairs and markets obtained the ſame privilege, vouchers had before; but, as to horſes, the frauds were ſo common, that the ſtatute of 31 Eliz. 12. revived the expreſs law of Alfred.

 The 40th law ſet a certain value upon every limb and member, as well as upon all perſons, from a king to a bond-ſlave.

†† He uſually re-examined the cauſes tried in his abſence; and if he diſcovered, that any injuſtice was done, out of favour or intereſt, he ſeverely puniſhed the judges. If they pleaded ignorance, he ſharply reprimanded them, for their preſumption to take a commiſſion to determine about life and property, when they were conſcious of their being ſo wretchedly unqualified, giving them orders to be better informed, or quit their ſtation. Thus, the earls and great men, rather than be turned out of their office with diſgrace, applied themſelves to ſtudy. Vid. Mirror of of Juſtice, c. 20. and Malm. l. 2. p. 25.

here take notice of many other particulars, not ſo entertaining to foreigners, as to the Engliſh, who view with pleaſure, in thoſe regulations, the origin of thoſe laws they ſo happily live under at this day; but it is ſufficient to obſerve, that theſe inſtitutions produced ſuch good order and tranquillity, as had never, hitherto, been known in England.

In fine, to ſecure the kingdom againſt foreign enemies, Alfred ſo regulated his militia, that he was in a condition to withſtand them, ſhould the Danes renew their incurſions. He had in each county a body of troops in readineſs to march, under the command of the earl or governor; and, upon the firſt notice of an invaſion, the earls received orders to join their forces at certain places, under the conduct of a generaliſſimo appointed by the king; and, by this means, together with a powerful fleet which was always ready to put to ſea, or cruiſing round the iſland, he kept the foreign Danes in ſuch awe, that they durſt not attempt to make a deſcent, during the remainder of his life; and, for the ſame reaſon, thoſe that lived in the iſland were forced to be quiet.

He orders merchant-ſhips to be built.

When Alfred had, thus, provided for the ſafety of the ſtate, that his ſubjects might reliſh the fruits of peace, he took care to introduce trade and commerce. He built a good number of merchant-ſhips, which he let out to the principal merchants, for the encouragement of traffick; ſo that, by degrees, the Engliſh were enabled to repair the loſſes they had ſuſtained, by ſo long a war. It is ſaid, that ſome of theſe merchants traded as far as the Eaſt-Indies, from whence they imported ſeveral things before unknown to the Engliſh *.

Trade to the Eaſt-Indies.

Theſe things being ſettled, he applied his thoughts to the arts and ſciences, which the wars had almoſt entirely baniſh'd from the land. He invited over, from foreign countries, learned men, to whom he gave penſions, diſperſing them in the ſeveral dioceſes, to inſtruct the people; and, being particularly deſirous of having in his own kingdom a ſeminary of learning, he founded four ſchools or colleges at Oxford. In the firſt, the abbot Neots and Grimbald read divinity; in the ſecond, Aſſerius, a benedictin, taught grammar and rhetorick; in the third, John, a monk of St. David, ſet up a chair for logick, arithmetick, and muſick; and, in the 4th, Johannes Scotus profeſſed geometry and aſtronomy. This laſt was ſirnamed Erigena, that is, the Iriſhman, from Erin or Iren, the true name of Ireland; and he was, for the ſame reaſon, called Scotus, the inhabitants of Ireland being then ſtiled Scots. It is ſaid, that this Johannes Scotus, ſo famous in the republick of letters, was ſtabb'd to death by his pupils, with pen-knives; but otherwiſe firm, he taught in Malmsbury-abbey, and not at Oxford †. We find alſo among the learned men, encouraged by Alfred, Plegmund, a Mercian, who became archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſome others, whoſe names, as they will not render them more known to us, it is needleſs to mention; as it would likewiſe be to examine, whether the colleges, founded by Alfred, were the firſt foundations of the univerſity of Oxford; or, whether before this time, there were ſchools at Greeklade, which were removed from thence to this city? As this diſpute would carry me too far, it would, after all, be of little advantage, as very few concern themſelves about it; it is ſufficient, then, to obſerve, that the univerſity of Oxford, now famous over all Europe, grew up to its preſent height, from theſe ſmall beginnings.

Alfred invites ſeveral learned men into England. 886.

He founds the univerſity of Oxford.

The original of the ſeveral councils.

Tho' Alfred was very capable himſelf of projecting means, for putting his laudable deſigns in execution; yet he conſulted others, that were eminent for their abilities, paying a great deference to their opinions. He had ſo order'd matters, that all reſolutions, relating to the publick, paſs'd thro' three ſeveral councils. The firſt was a cabinet-council, to which none but the king's ſpecial favourites were admitted, who debated all affairs that were to be laid before the ſecond council, which conſiſted of biſhops, earls, viſcounts, and ſome of the principal thanes, named afterwards barons. This reſembled the preſent privy-council; and none were members of it, but thoſe whom the king was pleaſed to appoint. The third was a general council or an aſſembly of the nation, called in Saxon, Wittenagemot; and quality or offices gave a right to ſit in it, independent of the king. This aſſembly, now called the parliament, a name derived from the French, was compoſed of the two archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, the biſhops, earls, viſcounts or high-ſheriffs of the counties, and the thanes of the firſt rank or barons. It is now warmly diſputed, whether the people had a right to ſend repreſentatives to this aſſembly; but I ſhall refer the diſcuſſion of this point to another place. However, we may ſee, in theſe three councils, the original of privy-councils, as well as the antiquity of parliaments. Theſe

* This is improbable, as the mariner's compaſs was not then invented. You may read this account, at large, in Spelman's life of Alfred, l. 2. c. 82. Malmsbury relates, that Alfred ſent a preſent to the Indies, in honour of St. Thomas, by Sigelin biſhop of Sherborn, who ſucceeded in his voyage, bringing back with him precious ſtones, perfumes, and other commodities, then great curioſities in England. It is thought, that Alfred ordered a more auguſt and imperial crown, than that uſed before, to be made of theſe diamonds; for in the arched roof in the cloiſters of Weſtminſter abbey, where the antient Regalia of the kingdom are kept, upon a box, the cabinet of the moſt antient crown, are the following words; "Hæc eſt principalior corona, cum qua coronabantur reges Alfredus, Ed-"wardus, &c." This crown is a very antique piece of work, having flowers adorned with ſtones of a plain ſetting. Spelman.

† Cambden tells us, Alfred founded only three halls or ſchools; the firſt at the end of High-ſtreet, for grammarians, called Little Univerſity-hall; the ſecond in School-ſtreet, for philoſophy, ſtiled Leſs Univerſity-hall; and the third in High-ſtreet, more to the weſt than the firſt, for divinity, named Great Univerſity-hall, now Univerſity-college.

councils,

councils, eſpecially the Wittenagemot, which was held generally once a year, and for the moſt part at London, doubtleſs, added to the ſplendor of that city. The Danes, who had been poſſeſſed of it, for ſome time, ſo demoliſhed it, that it could hardly be known; but Alfred took a pride in beautifying it and augmenting its privileges, and the figure it afterwards made, and ſtill makes, is, in ſome meaſure, owing to the care of that prince.

Alfred introduces the way of building, with brick and ſtone.

Among other regulations, Alfred, who always conſulted the good of his ſubjects, introduced among them the way of building their houſes with more ſtrength and regularity, than they had hitherto done; which was not only uſeful, in itſelf, but very ornamental to the kingdom. They, at this time, ſeldom made uſe of any thing, but timber, in building; and, if a houſe was built of any other materials, it was matter of admiration; but Alfred, having raiſed his palaces with ſtone or brick, the nobility, by degrees, began to imitate his example, tho' the bulk of the people came not into this manner of building, till ſeveral ages after. The monaſteries it is to be ſuppoſed, deſtroy'd by the Danes, and afterwards rebuilt, had their ſhare in this improvement of architecture, as they were held in greater veneration in the next than in that century. The abbies, however, were not inhabited, till the ſucceeding reigns; for, in the preſent, they were almoſt quite abandon'd, the Daniſh wars having occaſioned the alienation of the eſtates left for the maintenance of the monks, that ſcarce a man could be found, that was willing to embrace a monaſtick life. This evidently ſhews, that it was not ſo much devotion, as the hopes of being ſupported, without working, that filled the religious houſes. During Alfred's reign, the averſion to a monaſtick life was ſo great, that he was forced to ſtock the monaſteries with foreigners; but, after his deceaſe, the eſtates reverting to them, the zeal for that kind of life began to revive. Whereas in Alfred's days, there were more monaſteries than monks, a few years after, the monks became ſo numerous, that there were not religious houſes enough to contain them.

His private life.

We have, hitherto, conſider'd Alfred, as ſo induſtriouſly engaged in publick affairs, that one would think he had no leiſure for his private concerns; but we muſt form quite another notion of this great prince. He was among the number of theſe happy genius's, to whom every thing ſeems natural, who are continually employed, without appearing to be ſo. He was too ſenſible of the value of time to loſe any part of it, and ſo far was he from fancying, with the generality of princes, that his exalted ſtation gave him the privilege of ſpending his days in trifling diverſions, that he was ſollicitous to make the beſt of every moment. Whilſt he lay concealed in the iſle of Athelney, he made a vow to ſet the third part of his time, for the ſervice of God, as ſoon as he ſhould be reſtor'd to a ſtate of tranquillity; and he punctually obſerved his vow, allotting eight hours every day to acts of devotion, as many to publick affairs, and the reſt to ſleep, ſtudy and neceſſary refreſhment. As the uſe of clocks and hour-glaſſes was not yet introduced into England, he meaſur'd time by wax-candles, marked with circular lines of various colours, that ſerved as ſo many hour-lines *, and that the wind might not hinder them from burning ſteadily, he is ſaid to have invented the expedient of incloſing them in lanthorns †. But, whether this invention be of ſo late a date, may be made a queſtion.

The diſtribution of his time.

His charity, and inclinations.

His charitable actions were very extraordinary, conſidering his revenues, and ſo much the more laudable, as they were performed ſecretly, and without the leaſt oſtentation. He educated at court, or at Oxford, a great number of young gentlemen, who were inſtructed in all things neceſſary to qualify them for the ſervice of their country; and, by his own example, he exceedingly promoted the arts and ſciences, for no prince was ever more devoted to his ſtudies. The progreſs he made in learning, notwithſtanding his long wars and the adminiſtration of the government, demonſtrate, how much he improved his intervals of leiſure from publick buſineſs. Aſſerius aſſures us, he was the beſt Saxon poet of his time, an excellent grammarian, orator, philoſopher, architect, geometrician, and hiſtorian. He was the author of ſeveral works, that were highly eſteemed; and, among others, he tranſlated into Saxon Gregory's paſtoral, Boetius de conſolatione ‡, and Bede's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory . What a ſhame and diſhonour was it for the Engliſh nation to be ſo ignorant, who were governed by ſo learned a king? This accompliſh'd prince complained bitterly, that, from the Humber to the Thames, there was not a prieſt that underſtood the liturgy in his mother-tongue; and that, from the Thames to the Sea, there was not a man, that knew how to tranſlate the eaſieſt piece of latin. This univerſal ignorance, and the little taſte

* He ordered a certain quantity of wax to be made into ſix candles, twelve inches long, with the diviſion of the inches marked diſtinctly; which, being lighted, one after another, did uſually burn four hours a-piece, i. e. every three inches an hour, ſo that all the ſix candles laſted exactly 24 hours, the watching of them being committed to the keepers of his chapel, whoſe office it was to remind him how each hour paſſed. Spelman.

† Glaſs was then ſuch a rarity in England, that the king was forced to order ſome fine horn to be ſcrap'd ſo thin as to become tranſparent, and put into cloſe frames of wood, to defend the candles from the injury of the wind. Thus, lanthorns, tho' of vulgar uſe and eſtimation, were invented by a king. Spelman.

they had for learning, led the king to embrace every opportunity of urgently inviting over foreigners, that were eminent in their profeſſions. He had always about him the moſt celebrated artiſts and architects, and and continually employed them purely to improve their skill. He ſettled in the chairs at Oxford, men that were famous for their knowledge, allowing them handſome ſalaries; and his view was to excite in his ſubjects a becoming emulation. The fame of his wiſdom and piety having reached as far as Rome, the pope ſent him a large quantity of reliques, and, out of reſpect to him, enlarged the privileges of the Engliſh college; and Abel alſo, patriarch of Jeruſalem, made him a preſent of reliques, which the king received with great ſatisfaction.

How he diſtributed his revenues.

I ſhall now preſent the reader, with a view of the manner of his managing his domeſtick affairs, in which his prudence was no leſs conſpicuous. He made three diviſions of his attendants, who waited on him monthly, by turns; which cuſtom, tho' then not uſed in other courts, was afterwards followed by other princes. As for his revenues, he divided them into two parts, one of them being wholly aſſigned to charitable uſes, and ſubdivided into four portions. The firſt was, for alms to the poor; the ſecond, for the maintenance of the monaſteries he had founded; the third, for the ſupport of the profeſſors and ſcholars at Oxford; and the fourth, for poor monks, as well foreigners as Engliſh. The other half was divided into three parts, one of them for his family-expences, and another, for the payment of his architects and other curious artificers, the remainder being ſpent in penſions upon ſtrangers, whom he had invited to his court, for the inſtruction of his ſubjects. By Alfred's revenues, I mean his hereditary eſtate; for it was not uſual, in thoſe Days, for princes to levy taxes upon the people, in order to ſquander the money in a luxurious and extravagant manner.

From what has been ſaid, we may learn the principal tranſactions in Alfred's reign, and be able to form an idea of his perſonal qualities. I might have added many other particulars, his life alone affording ſufficient matter for a large volume; but without any injury to the memory of this illuſtrious monarch, who is juſtly ſirnamed great, I think I may venture to ſtop here. No hiſtorian charges him with any vice; and they all agree in repreſenting him as one of the moſt glorious princes, that ever ſat on the throne *.

900. Alfred's death.

He died in 900, in the fifty-ſecond year of his age, after a reign of 28 years and ſix months, the greateſt part of which was ſpent in wars and troubles, and the reſt in peace †. We have ſeen, that, both in war and peace, he governed with prudence and ſteadineſs; but what principally diſtinguiſh'd him from the generality of princes, was his ſincere and cordial affection for his people. Of this he gave demonſtrative proofs, not by words only, as is often the caſe, but by real and ſubſtantial actions. Accordingly, no prince was ever better beloved by his ſubjects; and, doubtleſs, their mutual love was a powerful means to make the Danes deſpair of ſhaking off his yoke, after they had once ſubmitted to it.

Alfred had ſeveral children, by Alſwitha his queen; and ſome of them, particularly Edmund his eldeſt ſon, whom he deſign'd for his ſucceſſor, died before him. Of thoſe he left behind him, Edward ſucceeded him. Ethelward, who was educated at Oxford, was a very learned man, and died in the fortieth year of his age, in 922. Elfleda his eldeſt daughter, wife to Ethelred earl of Mercia, became very famous in her brother Edward's reign. Alſwitha or Ethelſwitha, ſtiled alſo Eltrude by the Flemiſh writers, married Baldwin earl of Flanders. Ethelgitha, who choſe the life of a nun, was made abbeſs of Shaftsbury-nunnery, founded by Alfred ‡.

7. EDWARD the elder.

The ſtate of the kingdom.

WHEN Edward came to the crown, England was almoſt equally divided between the Engliſh and Danes. The Danes inhabited Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, from whence they had expell'd the Engliſh, during the wars; and the Engliſh were ſtill poſſeſs'd of Weſſex, containing the antient kingdom of Eſſex, and all the country, ſouth of the Thames. As for Mercia, it was peopled with a mixture of Danes and Engliſh, the former being moſt numerous in the eaſt and north, and the latter in the ſouth and weſt parts. For ſome time before Alfred's Death, the Danes had been very quiet, leſt

* A great man gives us his character, to the following purpoſe: "O Alfred, the wonder of all ages! If we "reflect on his devotion, one would think he always lived in a cloyſter; if on his conduct and exploits in the "field, he ſeems to have ſpent his days in a camp; if on his writings and ſtudies, one would conclude the uni- "verſity had taken up all his time; and, laſtly, from his prudence and skill, in the adminiſtration of publick "affairs, that he made law and politicks the main buſineſs of his life."

† He was born at Wanating, now Wantage in Berkſhire, formerly a royal manor. His body was firſt interr'd at Wincheſter, then removed into the church of the new monaſtery, and laſtly, his body, monument, church, and monaſtery, were all removed, about 200 years after, without the north-gate of the city, afterwards called Hide.

they ſhould provoke him to invade them; and beſides, they were glad of ſome reſpite, in order to fortify their ſettlements in England. The departure, therefore, of their countrymen was rather an occaſion of joy than ſorrow; for they could never have attained their ends, if the war had been continually renew'd, by the arrival of the other Danes, who under the name of friends would have been as prejudicial to them, as the Engliſh themſelves. The retreat of theſe dangerous gueſts, and the profound tranquillity of the whole kingdom, having given them leiſure to cultivate their lands, as well as to augment their riches by commerce, they began to think of ſhaking off the Engliſh yoke. Accordingly, they catch'd at the firſt fair occaſion, to excite new troubles in England, as the beſt means to put their deſigns in execution.

Ethelward pretends to the crown.

I have, above, obſerv'd, that king Ethelbert, Alfred's elder brother, left behind him two infant ſons. Ethelward, the eldeſt being arriv'd to man's eſtate, thought it was time to aſſert his right to the crown. He pretended, that Ethelwulph, his grandfather, was guilty of injuſtice, in leaving his kingdom to all his ſons ſucceſſively, to the detriment of the children of the eldeſt; that, tho' he had a right to do this, there was no reaſon the ſucceſſion after the death of the four Brothers, ſhould continue in the family of the youngeſt, whilſt the heirs of the ſecond were alive; that, beſides, at moſt, he could only intail the kingdom of Kent, being all that he was poſſeſs'd of, and not the kingdom of Weſſex, which was not in his hands, when he made his will. Tho' theſe reaſons ſeem'd very plauſible, they had no influence on the Engliſh. Doubtleſs, their veneration for Alfred's memory led them to adhere to his ſon; or, perhaps, they did not queſtion the validity of Ethelwulph's will. As the antient hiſtorians have not cleared up this point, and it is extremely difficult to decide the matter, by the publick laws of the Saxons, which are not ſufficiently known, I ſhall only obſerve, that Ethelward, finding his countrymen would not ſupport his title, was obliged to apply to the Danes, who, in all probability, prompted him to this undertaking.

Ann. Sax. H. Hunt. l. 5.

Ethelward takes Winburn, loſes it again, and flies to the Danes, who proclaim him king.

Ethelward began with ſeizing upon Winburn, a fortified town in Dorſetſhire, expecting to be attacked; but he entertained hopes, if that place made any defence at all, the Danes would ſo fully employ Edward in other parts, that it would not be poſſible for him to retake it. His hopes, however, proved abortive. Edward came upon him with ſuch ſpeed, that he ſcarce had time to eſcape out of the town, and to get to the Danes, who were up in arms. Upon this, they proclaimed him king of England, pretending, that, as they were in poſſeſſion of half the kingdom, they had the ſame right to make a king, as the Weſt-Saxons.

Ethelward's retreat among the Danes convinced the king, that he was about to be involved, in a troubleſome and dreadful war; not that he thought himſelf unequal to the Danes ſettled in England, but, becauſe he apprehended, the foreign Danes would take this opportunity to reduce the kingdom to its former calamities. He, therefore, reſolved to do all that was poſſible to put an end to the war, before the Danes could call in their countrymen to their aſſiſtance. No ſooner had he taken Winburn, than he marched towards Northumberland, at the head of his army, which daily increaſed, by troops that flocked from all parts. The Danes being aſtoniſhed at this expedition, and in no condition to reſiſt him, were forced to abandon and baniſh from their country Ethelward, whom they undertook to protect; and they ſoon had reaſon to repent, that they had eſpous'd his cauſe, or had not defended it to better purpoſe. By this fruitleſs attempt, they loſt ſeveral ſtrong-holds in Mercia, which Edward judged it neceſſary to ſecure. He did not chaſtiſe them any farther, at this juncture, leſt the war, which ſeemed to be over, ſhould break out a-freſh, if he obliged them to ſend for ſuccours from Denmark; and he, therefore, only repaired ſome fortreſſes in Mercia, to reduce them into a narrower compaſs. Ethelred, earl of Mercia, and Elfleda his wife were very ſerviceable to the king, in this war, by oppoſing the Mercian Danes and preventing the Welch from coming to their aſſiſtance. It is ſaid, of Elfleda, that, having had a very difficult labour, with her firſt child, ſhe reſolved never to come into the like condition again, which ſhe punctually obſerved. From this time, ſhe entirely devoted herſelf to arms, and, like a true Amazon, gave proofs of her courage, in all her brother's wars with the Danes. She was generally ſtiled, not only lady and queen, but king alſo, in admiration of her manly and royal qualities.

902. Ethelward is abandoned by the Danes.

903. The courage of Elfleda, the king's ſiſter.

Ethelward returns into England with Norman troops.

In the interim, Ethelward, tho' abſent, was not idle. Having, upon his leaving England, made application to France and obtained a powerful ſupply of Normans, he landed in Eſſex, which he eaſily ſubdued. Edward, who had no apprehenſions, that his enemy could have been in a condition ſo ſuddenly, to make a new attempt upon the crown, had only ſecured Mercia againſt the Northumbrian Danes, not imagining that Eſſex had been in any danger.

The Danes riſe in his favour.

The arrival of the Normans encouraged the Northumbrian and Eaſt-Anglian Danes to appear in arms again, in favour of Ethelward; and, ruſhing into Mercia, they rifled the country inhabited by the Engliſh, in a mercileſs manner. Edward, with extreme regret, found himſelf forced to bear their inſults, till he could muſter together the troops he had diſmiſſed; but, the moment he was at the head of his army, he made the Danes pay dear, for their cruel treatment of the Engliſh. In this war, he ſo often defeated them, that the Danes deſpaired of throwing off the Engliſh yoke, and his couſin alſo, of aſcending the throne. At length, Ethelward being

905. Ethelward slain. being slain in battle *, and the Danish forces considerably diminished, they were not able to carry on the war, with the vigour they, at first, discovered, tho' they continued it it two years after Ethelward's death; but, having, in vain, attempted to repair their losses, they sued for peace, which Edward readily granted them, provided they would acknowledge him for their sovereign, and that the Normans immediately return'd to France.

Pont. Hist. Dan. 907.

Edward makes a treaty with the Danes. This peace between two nations so near neighbours, and so incensed against each other, could not be of any long continuance. Three years after, the war broke out a-fresh; † and it proved fatal to the Danes, who, in a very little time, lost two battles. Edward, who knew how to improve his victories, took from them several towns in Mercia, and, at length, expelled them. It was then that Ethelred, who, all along, bravely seconded the king his brother-in-law, became, in reality, earl of Mercia, which title he did not long enjoy, dying almost as soon as Mercia was united to his government. This earl was not merely governor or viceroy of Mercia; for he had some particular power, the nature of which it is very difficult to learn from the historians, who mention it. Malmsbury tells us, he held the country as a fief of the crown, much after the manner the German princes hold their territories of the empire ‡; and this receives farther confirmation, from Elfleda, his widow's, resigning to the king her brother the cities of London and Oxford, for had Ethelred been only governor or viceroy, she would have had no right to deliver up these places.

The war breaks out a-fresh. 910.

912. Ethelred, earl of Mercia, dies.

Elfleda, taking upon her the government of Mercia, after Ethelred's death, followed the example of her father and brother, in fortifying towns, to prevent the Danes from settling in Mercia again. The principal places, she repaired or fortified, were Warwick, Tamworth, Wedensbury, Charbury, Eadsbury, and Chester, which last had lain in ruins, for some time ; and, when Elfleda had finish'd her fortifications, she led her forces into Wales, after several victories, obliging the Welch to become her tributaries.

915. The university of Cambridge is founded. The year 915, according to some, is remarkable for the founding of the university of Cambridge by king Edward; but the truth of this fact is disputed. Some assert, the origin of this famous university is of a much later date; whilst others, on the contrary, attribute the founding of it to Cantabar, a Spaniard, 315 years before the birth of our Saviour. Some again affirm, that Sabert, who reigned in Essex, in the beginning of the VIIth century, was the first founder. I shall not presume to determine this controversy, which the emulation between Oxford and Cambridge has carried to a great height. However, I shall beg leave to observe, that, if the university of Cambridge was founded in king Sabert's time, or even in Alfred's, it is extremely surprizing, that neither Bede nor Asserius should take the least notice of it.

From the year 910, when the war between the English and Danes broke out a-fresh, to the year 922 we have nothing but the relation of a long series of battles, an account of which, must, of course, be ungrateful to the reader. I shall, therefore, without scruple, overlook them, and only mention their most remarkable consequences.

918. The princess Elfleda dies. Elfleda, sister to king Edward, died, during this war *†, leaving behind her an only daughter, named Elfwina, then marriageable. Elfleda had succeeded her husband in the sovereignty of Mercia, for it is certain it was more than a bare government; but that I may convey right notions of this affair, I shall consider the state of Mercia at the time I am speaking of. As historians have left us in the dark as to this point, it must be remembred, that Ethelred, with the title of earl of Mercia, was only possessed of London and the neighbouring country, or, at most, of the county of Middlesex; and that London, once the capital of Essex, was become the metropolis of Mercia. In process of time, Ethelred's narrow territories, being exceedingly enlarged by his conquests from the Mercian Danes, the present, Alfred made his son-in-law, was so considerable, that it might be regarded with a jealous eye, by a new king, and lead him to apprehend, that Ethelred's successors would grow too powerful. However, during Elfleda's life, he did not entertain any thoughts of dispossessing her of what her own valour had very much contributed to acquire. But, upon her decease, he judged it convenient to deprive Elfwina of a demesn, which put it in her power to raise new troubles in England, by some disagreeable match; and, indeed, some historians affirm, she had resolved to marry a Danish prince. He was, doubtless, afraid, that she would introduce the enemies of the kingdom into those very places, that had, with so much difficulty, been wrested out of their hands. Having seized upon Mercia, he carried his niece along with him into Wessex; and, in all probability, she pass'd the remainder of her days in a nunnery. Whether Elfwina's intention of marrying a Dane was matter of fact, or only

Edward seizes upon Mercia, to prevent its being surrendered to the Danes.

* The Saxon annals say, the battle was obstinate and bloody, on both sides. The king lost the earls Sigulph and Sigelm, with many other of his nobles; and the Danes lost more men than the English, Eolrick, their king, being slain, tho' they had the honour of keeping the field and burying their dead. Sax. ann. 905.

† The annals do not inform us who broke the treaty; but Hovedon charges it upon the Danes.

‡ Ethelred had the title of subregulus Merciorum. Selden tells us, subregulus is the same with earldom or count. Du Cange affirms, it sometimes signifies earl, at other times semi-rex or demi-king. We must understand it in the last sense, with respect to Ethelred, according to Malmsbury, who says: "Edwardus du regna Mercio-"rum & Visi-Saxonum conjunxerat, Merciorum nomine tenus, quippe commendatum duci Ethelredo."

 It was first demolished by Ecfrid king of Northumberland, and afterwards by the Danes.

*† Ingulph tells us, that, in respect of the cities she built the castles she fortified, and the armies she managed, one would have thought she changed her sex. She died at Tamworth in Staffordshire, and was interr'd in the porch of the monastery of St. Peter in Gloucester, which she and her husband had founded.

an

an invention to vindicate the king in his proceedings againſt her, it equally confirms my obſervation, that Ethelred and Elfleda were proprietors of Mercia; for had they been only governors, Edward would have had no occaſion to alledge her deſigned marriage, as a reaſon for depriving her of the government; as, on the contrary, there would have been no need for his inventing ſuch a pretence, without a foundation. I have been the more copious on this ſubject, on the account of the great variety of opinions, about the right and title of earl Ethelred to Mercia.

921, and 922. The Danes ſubmit to Edward.

In their wars with Edward, the Danes daily loſt ground, whilſt the king, cloſely purſued them, not allowing them the leaſt reſpite; and, at length, they were obliged to own him, once more for their ſovereign. The Mercian Danes, firſt, laid down their arms; as did the Eaſt-Anglians ſoon after, without coming to terms; and the Northumbrians were the laſt that ſubmitted. The progreſs, Edward made in the other provinces, convinced them, that it would be better for them to put a ſtop to the war, which would inevitably end in their ruin. They were governed by three kings. Sithrick and Nigel his brother ruled beyond the Tyne; and Reginald, who kept his reſidence at York, reigned over all the country lying between the Tyne and the Humber. In proceſs of time, Sithrick, having ſlain his brother Nigel, became ſole king of the north.

Edward ſubdues the Welch.

The ſtate of the Welch depending, in ſome meaſure, on that of the Danes, whilſt the Danes were in arms, the kings of England did not give the Welch any interruption; but, as ſoon as they were out of danger from the north, they often attacked them, and, accordingly, we find, that Elfleda forced them to become her tributaries. Upon the death of that princeſs, the Welch attempted to recover their liberty; and, to keep Edward employed, ſent a powerful reinforcement to the Danes. Edward being, at preſent, diverted by other buſineſs, took no notice of their proceedings; but, no ſooner had he concluded a peace with the Danes, than he marched againſt Rees ap Madoc * king of Wales, who was aſſiſted by Leoffreth a Daniſh general. After ſeveral skirmiſhes, Edward, at laſt, obtained a ſignal victory, which obliged the Welch to ſue for peace, with a promiſe of paying the uſual tribute; and the Britons of Cumberland who went over to the Danes ſubmitted alſo to Edward. Some hiſtorians pretend, the king of Scotland following their example, did homage for his kingdom to the king of England; but the Scotch not only deny the fact, but maintain it could not poſſibly be, ſince the word homage was never uſed in Great-Britain, till after the Norman conqueſt. But this reaſon is not concluſive, ſince the thing ſignified, under that name, might have been otherwiſe called. The ſovereignty of Alfred and Edward over the Northumbrian Danes, and the Mercians, in in the time of Ethelred and Elfleda, was nothing more than a right of homage from thoſe countries, though, perhaps, that term was not then received.

The Cumberland-Britons ſubmit, and alſo the king of Scotland.

Edward dies. 925.

Edward was fear'd and reſpected by all at home, and highly eſteemed by princes abroad, when he departed this life in 925, after a reign of 24 years †. He was as much reputed for his valour, as the king his father, ſince, like him, he had preſcribed laws to all England, and had obtained for the kingdom ſuch peace and tranquillity, as had ſcarce ever been enjoy'd, ſince the Danes had begun their ravages; but it muſt be acknowledg'd, he was vaſtly inferior to his illuſtrious father, in all other reſpects.

The ſtory of Edward and Egwina.

He had iſſue by three wives; the firſt, ſtiled Egwina, was only a concubine, a ſhepherd's daughter. A certain writer gives us a romantick account of this woman, not improper to be here inſerted. I call it a romance, becauſe, by the author's own confeſſion *, it was only founded upon ſome antient ſongs, tranſmitted to this time ‡, not unlike the Spaniſh romances. The hiſtorian affirms, that Egwina, the daughter of a ſhepherd, as ſhe lay aſleep in the fields, dreamt that the moon ſhone ſo bright out of her womb, that all England was enlighten'd by the ſplendor. Some time after, ſhe related her dream to an old woman, formerly king Edward's nurſe. This perſon, who valued herſelf exceedingly upon her skill, in the interpretation of dreams, fancied there was ſomething extraordinary in this; and, taking Egwina home, ſhe brought her up, not as a country-wench, but as a perſon of quality. Egwina anſwered all the nurſe's expectations about her, and became an accompliſhed beauty. Whilſt ſhe was here, prince Edward, before he was king, paſſing by, had the curioſity to make her a viſit; and no ſooner had he viewed her, than he was deſperately enamour'd. Such was his paſſion, that, in the moſt pathetick manner, he ſollicited the nurſe, to promote his intereſt in the charming Egwina; and the old woman, who had a great friendſhip for Edward, and was ſtill fond of her dream, complied to his requeſt, bringing Egwina to his deſire. From this moment, Edward had ſuch a tenderneſs for her, that he had by her three children, of whom Athelſtan, the eldeſt, ſucceeded him. Alfred the ſecond died before his father; and the third was a daughter, called, by ſome, Editha, and by others Beatrix.

By another wife, Edward had two ſons and ſix daughters. Elſward the eldeſt ſon died at Oxford, a few days after his father; ſo that he had no opportunity of taſting the ſweets of a crown. Edwin the ſecond was deprived of his juſt right, and had a tragical end, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Of his ſix daughters, ſome were married to powerful Ogina was married to Charles the ſimple, king of France, and was mother to Lewis d'Outre-Mer. Edilda ſpent her days in a monaſtery. The fourth, of the ſame name, was eſpouſed to Hugh the great, earl of Paris, father to Hugh Capet. Edgitha was married to Otho emperor of Germany. Edgiva the youngeſt was married to Lewis the blind, king of Provence, who had a ſon by her, called Conſtantine.

His children by his third wife.

By Edgiva his third wife, Edward had two ſons and two daughters. Edmund and Edred, the two ſons, were both kings of England. Edburga was a nun, and her ſiſter Edgiva was eſpouſed to Lewis prince of Aquitain. Probably, this Edgiva was confounded with her ſiſter of the ſame name, by a ſecond wife, who was married to Lewis king of Provence, becauſe there was then no prince of Aquitain, mentioned in hiſtory.

The Daniſh hiſtorians ſay, Edward had another daughter, called Thyra, who, they aſſure us, was eſpouſed to Gormon III. one of their kings; but all the Engliſh writers are ſilent, as to this particular, tho' it relates to a princeſs of England.

Rollo ſeizes on Normandy.

During Edward's reign, Rollo, chief of the Normans in France, ſeized upon Neuſtria; and it was not in the power of the French to expel him thence. Charles the ſimple, then king of France, was obliged, for his own ſecurity, to give him a grant of that part of Neuſtria, he was poſſeſſed of, lying between the Seine and the Epte, with the title of duke of Normandy, on condition he ſhould do homage for it to the crown of France, embrace chriſtianity, and marry Giſelle the king's daughter. Rollo died, according to Mezerai, in 917. Some place his death, in 924, and others, more probably, in 928. William his ſon, by Poppa daughter to the earl of Bayeux, ſucceeded him in his dutchy.

8. ATHELSTAN.

ELSWALD, Edward's eldeſt ſon, ſurviving his father but a few days, and all the other legitimate children being in their minority, Athelſtan, Egwina's ſon, was placed on the throne, with the conſent of the clergy and nobility; and, tho' he had a mixture of baſe and noble blood in his veins, the latter wiped off the blemiſh of the former. Alfred, his grandfather, had conferred the honour of knighthood upon him, by girding him with a ſword, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times. Edward, his father, had committed the care of his education to Ethelred his brother-in-law and Elfleda his ſiſter, who did their utmoſt to train him up to virtue. Having been preſent at all their councils, and in all their martial expeditions, he had gained ſuch experience, both in military and political affairs, as, with his natural parts, attracted the eſteem of all the world; ſo that, when he received the crown, in his 30th year, he was very capable of holding the reins of government. His father, however, thought his illegitimate birth a ſufficient reaſon to ſuperſede him, having nominated, for his ſucceſſor, another of his ſons, born in wedlock, tho' younger than Athelſtan; but, in all likelihood, upon Elſwald's death, Athelſtan, on the account of his mature age and noble qualities, had the preference before Edwin, the eldeſt of the legitimate ſons, who was in his minority*.

A plot againſt Athelſtan.

Some of the principal of the nobility, however, diſdaining to be governed by a baſtard, plotted how to dethrone Athelſtan and advance Edwin in his room. Alfred, the chief of the conſpirators, had projected means to ſeize on Athelſtan at Wincheſter, deſigning to put out his eyes; but, the plot being detected, he was apprehended, by the king's order, tho' he would confeſs nothing, obſtinately perſiſting in the proteſtation of his innocence, and offering to purge himſelf by oath, before the pope. This method of juſtification, tho' no proof of his innocence, gave ſatisfaction to Athelſtan, who ſent him to Rome, to to take his oath, in the preſence of pope John. Perhaps, the king was unwilling to begin his reign with blood, or apprehenſive, that the treating, with too much ſeverity, a perſon of the firſt rank, would draw upon him the odium of his nobles. Soon after, he received intelligence from Rome, that Alfred, upon ſwearing his innocence, before the pope, fell ſuddenly into a fainting fit, which carried him off in three days; and that the pope, convinced by this accident, that Alfred had perjur'd himſelf, ordered his corpſe to remain in the Engliſh college, till the king's pleaſure ſhould be known about it. Athelſtan, contented with the death of his enemy, without being directly concerned in it, conſented, that he ſhould have chriſtian burial; but he confiſcated his whole eſtate, giving it to Malmsbury-monaſtery; and he inſerted, in the grant, the above-mentioned particulars, to ſatisfy the world, that he did not dedicate to the Almighty an eſtate, acquired by baſe or unjuſt means.

The Danes begin to riſe.

In the interim, as the Danes, ſettled in England, had been ſubdued by force, they were reſolved to make uſe of the ſame, to recover their liberty. Edward's death and Alfred's conſpiracy giving them, as they imagined, a fit opportunity to revolt, they enter'd upon ſuch meaſures, as obliged Athelſtan to march into their country; and, as they had not, as yet, muſtered all their forces together, they were ſo ſurprized by the king's arrival on their frontiers, that, without coming to a battle, they returned to their allegiance. Sithrick, one of their kings, came to Athelſtan and ſued for peace, on his own terms, who, deſirous of a treaty with the Danes, to eſtabliſh himſelf on the throne, not only pardon'd his revolt, but gave him his ſiſter Editha in marriage, on condition he would receive baptiſm *.

He marches a ſecond time thither.

The troubles in the north being appeaſed, the king returned to Weſſex; and, ſoon after, he received the news of Sithrick's death, who left behind him two ſons, by a former marriage, Anlaff and Godfrid. The hiſtorians do not particularly inform us, why Athelſtan reſolved to deprive theſe two princes of their father's dominions. Whatever was the reaſon, he no ſooner heard of Sithrick's death, than he went into Northumberland, at the head of his army; and his march was ſo expeditious, that Anlaff and Godfrid, as well as Reginald another Daniſh king, who reſided at York, had ſcarce time to eſcape falling into his hands; and, by their ſudden flight, he became maſter of all Northumberland, except the caſtle of York.

Tho' he ſecured his conqueſts, by placing able garriſons in all the towns, yet the eſcape of the three Daniſh princes gave him great uneaſineſs. He could get no intelligence at all, about Reginald; and Anlaff retreated into Ireland, where he could not eaſily come at him. Athelſtan, therefore, was forced to acquieſce in requiring Conſtantine, king of Scotland, to ſurrender Godfrid, who had fled for refuge into that kingdom. Conſtantine, finding himſelf in no condition to deny any thing to a prince, who was at the head of ſuch a powerful army, complied with his demand, promiſing to give him a meeting at Dacor; but, whilſt he was making preparations for his journey, Godfrid made his eſcape, either thro' Conſtantine's neglect or connivance, who, however, ſet out to meet Athelſtan, accompanied by Eugenius king of Cumberland. Athelſtan admitted the excuſes of Conſtantine, for Godfrid's eſcape, tho', if the Engliſh hiſtorians are not miſtaken, he obliged both the kings to do homage for their kingdoms. The Scotch, however, poſitively aſſert, that England had not any right of ſovereignty over Scotland, until the XIIth century; but this diſpute, which was never decided, will be dropp'd, for the future, as England and Scotland are now united into one kingdom.

The kings of England and Scotland have an interview.

Before Athelſtan left the north, Godfrid made an attempt upon York, by means of the caſtle, where he had ſtill ſome friends; but, his deſign proving abortive, he put to ſea, and, for ſome time, practiſed pyracy. Tired, at length, with this way of life, he ſubmitted to the king of England, who received him graciouſly, allowing him a handſome penſion, tho' ſome time after, upon ſome diſguſt or groundleſs ſuſpicion, he withdrew again, and was never heard of more.

Conſtantine joins Anlaff againſt Athelſtan.

Anlaff, a prince of greater accompliſhments than his brother, concerted better meaſures, for the recovery of his dominions. Having retired into Ireland, where he had intelligence, that the king of Scotland was diſpleaſed with Athelſtan, he took this opportunity of perſuading him to eſpouſe his cauſe. With this view, he went over into Scotland, and repreſented to Conſtantine, that Athelſtan, having, by ſurprize, ſeized on Northumberland, without alledging the leaſt ſhadow of reaſon for his proceedings, might treat Scotland in the ſame manner; and that, therefore, it was abſolutely neceſſary to prevent him. To this, he added the offer of a powerful reinforcement from Ireland, aſſuring him, that, with their aſſiſtance, he might eaſily force Athelſtan out of Northumberland, and rid himſelf of ſuch a dangerous neighbour, by reſtoring that kingdom to the Danes, who would ſerve as a barrier for him againſt England. Anlaff ſoon brought over the king of Scotland, who was not only ſecretly exaſperated at the haughty reception he met with, at the late interview, but highly diſſatisfied with Athelſtan's ſucceſſes, and apprehenſive of being invaded himſelf. He determined, therefore, to embarque in this enterprize; and, having conſulted with Anlaff, about proper meaſures, they parted, in order to prepare the quota of troops, each of them had engaged to provide.

Malm. Hovedon.

In the mean time, Athelſtan, having reviewed his garriſons, and taken every ſtep, he judged neceſſary, to ſecure his late conqueſts, returned to Weſſex, where he continued in peace, having no apprehenſions of what his enemies had plotted againſt him; but, ſoon after, he was involved in a war with Howel king of Wales; which was projected by Conſtantine, to keep Athelſtan employed againſt the Welch, whilſt he and Anlaff ſhould make a deſcent upon Northumberland. The king of England, however, the moment he received the news of the motions of the Welch, and that Conſtantine had ſent them ſuccours, ſet out for Wales; and, giving Howel battle, he entirely defeated him, augmenting, on this occaſion, the tribute that prince paid to England.

Athelſtan defeats the king of Wales.

Upon this, Athelſtan marched into Scotland, to revenge himſelf on Conſtantine, for having aſſiſted the Welch; and no ſooner had he entered the Scotch territories, than he took ſome of their towns, giving them reaſon to expect more conſiderable loſſes. As Anlaff was not yet arrived with his troops, Conſtantine durſt not venture, alone, to engage ſo formidable an enemy, who was already in his dominions, and in a condition to purſue his conqueſts; and, therefore, he ſued for peace,

peace, to gain time, till the Iriſh had join'd him. Athelſtan, at once, comply'd with his requeſt, being exceedingly deſirous of that prince's friendſhip, leſt he ſhould foment the inſurrection of the Northumbrians; and, accordingly, he reſigns all the places he had taken, to gain him over to his intereſt, by his generoſity. Some writers, however, aſſure us, that Athelſtan oblig'd Conſtantine to do him homage for Scotland; but this is what the Scots will never acknowledge.

He enters into a treaty with Conſtantine.

933. Conſtantine renews the war.

Conſtantine, notwithſtanding Athelſtan's generous proceedings, purſued his firſt deſigns; nay, he carried on his preparations with the greater expedition, being extremely mortified to be under obligations to a prince, whom he always regarded, as his enemy. In the interim, Athelſtan, upon his return to Weſſex, expected to enjoy ſome quiet; but, a war could not have given him greater uneaſineſs, than an event that happened in his own family.

Athelſtan puts prince Edwin to death, and repents of it. Malm.

A certain lord at court, prince Edwin's enemy, accuſed him of being concerned in Alfred's conſpiracy. The king too readily gave into this accuſation againſt his brother, being eaſily induced to believe, the prince had ſome concern in a plot, that was formed, purely upon his account; and, perhaps, he was not diſpleas'd to find him guilty, as it furniſhed him with an opportunity of diſpatching him out of the way. He would not, however, publickly put him to death, but order'd him to be expos'd to the fury of the waves, in a veſſel without ſails or rudder. The young prince went on board, proteſting his innocence; and, finding the king was inexorable, he jump'd headlong into the ſea. Athelſtan, at firſt, had a ſecret pleaſure, in having got rid of his brother; but, ſoon after, he was touch'd with remorſe. To pacify his conſcience, he was adviſed to make atonement for his crime, by a meritorious action; and, with this view, he founded the abbey of Middleton in Dorſetſhire *, where prayers were offer'd up to heaven, day and night, in his behalf, and for the ſoul of his brother. Hiſtorians alſo tell us, that he ſubmitted to a ſeven years penance; but they do not inform us, wherein it conſiſted. Edwin's accuſer had no reaſon long to rejoice at the ſucceſs of his villany; for as he, one day, waited at table with the king's cup, one of his feet ſlipping, he would certainly have fallen, had he not recovered himſelf with the other. On this occaſion, he jocoſely ſaid: "See, how one brother helps another." This jeſt coſt him his life; for Athelſtan, over-hearing him, and taking it to be a reproach or banter upon him, order'd him to be executed immediately, thus, revenging his brother's death by that of his malicious accuſer †.

Conſtantine and Anlaff invade Northumberland.

In the mean time, Conſtantine went on with his military preparations; Anlaff, whom ſome, without any foundation, call king of Ireland, had prevailed on him to enter into a league with the Iriſh, Welch, and Northumbrian Danes, who were extremely deſirous of having a prince of their own nation on the throne. Anlaff was at the head of this league, tho' Conſtantine was equally concerned in it, as he was to be the principal in the war. They carried on their deſigns, with ſo much ſecrecy, that Anlaff enter'd the Humber, with a fleet of 600 ſail, and invaded Northumberland, before Athelſtan had any intelligence of the affair; and, with ſo conſiderable forces, increas'd by the Danes ſettled in thoſe parts, eaſily ſubdued ſeveral ſmall towns, that were but meanly defended. The fortified places, however, that were garriſon'd by the Engliſh, ſtopp'd his progreſs, giving Athelſtan time to muſter his army together; and he was ſo expeditious, that he ſurprized the confederate princes. They were on their march towards Bernicia, to conquer that kingdom for the king of Scotland; but they were obliged to return, to oppoſe Athelſtan, who was advanced very near them, when they fancied he had not, as yet, finiſhed his preparations. A bloody battle was fought at Brunanburgh ‡, in which Athelſtan prov'd victorious, the allies having loſt Conſtantine king of Scotland, ſix Iriſh or Welch kings, and twelve earls and general officers. This victory was principally owing to the valour of Turketul, the king's couſin, who was afterwards abbot of Croyland. Athelſtan extended his conqueſts into Scotland, and chaſtiſed the Welch, by raiſing their tribute to 20 pound weight of gold, 300 of ſilver, and 25,000 head of cattle; and he pent them up beyond the river Wye, diſpoſſeſſing them of all the country between that and the Severn. As for the Northumbrian Danes, he made their yoke much heavier; and he afterwards march'd againſt the Corniſh Britons, who had alſo aſſiſted the confederates. He took Exeter, formerly deſtroy'd by the Danes, ordering it to be immediately repair'd and fortified; and, from that time, the Britons were conſtrained to keep beyond the Tamar, that ſerved, as a

† As Edwin's affair is the only thing, that tarniſhes Athelſtan's memory, Malmsbury, who relates it, looks upon the whole ſtory, as a fiction, by reaſon of his kindneſs to his other brothers and ſiſters, and owns it has no other foundation, than ſome old ballads. Huntingdon mentions the loſs of Edwin, by ſea, but as a deplorable accident and a great misfortune to Athelſtan.

Miracles, in favour of Athelſtan.

Almoſt every page of the hiſtories of thoſe times abounds with miracles, wrought in behalf of the friends and protectors of the monks; and as Athelſtan had been a great benefactor to them, to atone for the murder of his brother, they have not fail'd to give him the uſual marks of their gratitude. They tell us, that, at the word of St. John of Beverley, he ſtruck his ſwords three yards deep into a ſolid rock, which yielded like ſo much butter; and alſo, that, having loſt his ſword, in the battle of Brunanburgh, another deſcended from heaven, ſheathing itſelf in his ſcabbard. It would be a loſs of time to relate all the miracles the monks have recorded in their hiſtories; tho' it will not be improper to obſerve, that the cuſtom of embelliſhing uncommon events with miracles was in faſhion, for ſeveral ages.

A ſoldier prevents his being ſlain.

I ſhall cloſe the reign of Athelſtan with an incident, taken notice of by the beſt hiſtorians. A few days before the battle of Brunanburgh, Anlaft went, as a ſpy, into the Engliſh camp, diſguiſed like a harper, as did formerly Alfred the great, to diſcover the poſture of the enemy; but he was known by a ſoldier, who, notwithſtanding, ſuffer'd him to eſcape, undiſcover'd. As ſoon as the ſoldier thought him out of danger, he told Athelſtan what had happen'd, adviſing him to remove his tent, as he apprehended, that Anlaff had ſome deſign upon that quarter; and, to excuſe himſelf, for not acquainting him with this ſecret ſooner, he ſaid, that he had formerly taken a military oath to Anlaff, and, therefore, could not reſolve to betray him. Athelſtan, forgiving him, fell in with his advice, which he ſoon found to be of great importance. The following night, the Daniſh prince, with a body of choſen troops, attack'd the Engliſh camp, penetrating to the place where he had ſeen the king's tent; and a biſhop, who, by accident, had pitched his on that very ſpot, had the misfortune to be ſlain *.

491. Athelſtan dies.

Athelſtan, three years after the battle of Brunanburgh, died a natural death, in 941, in the 46th year of his age, and the 16th of his reign †. Hiſtorians have been very large in their accounts of the ſignal ſucceſs of his arms, but they have been yet more copious on the miracles Heaven wrought in his favour; but, paſſing over the wonders his hiſtory abounds with, I ſhall content myſelf, in giving him the following character: Such were his merits, that he was equally feared by his neighbours, beloved by his ſubjects, and reſpected by the greateſt princes in Europe ‡. The emperor Otho and Hugh the great, his brothers-in-law, frequently demonſtrated their eſteem for him by valuable preſents; and the noble matches he made for ſuch of his ſiſters, as preferr'd the world to a cloyſter, evidently atteſt his great reputation. His ſiſter Ogina, widow to Charles the ſimple, king of France, having fled for refuge into England, with her ſon Lewis, who, upon this, was ſirnamed Outremer, met with an honourable reception; and the king handſomely ſupplied them, during their exile. It is even ſaid, that his application and credit did exceedingly contribute to the reſtoration of the king, his nephew, to the throne of his anceſtors. Tho' he ſeem'd moſt intent on military affairs; yet he took care alſo of civil matters, and was ſollicitous to make juſtice flouriſh in all his dominions. The truth of this appears from the excellent laws he added to thoſe of Alfred his grandfather; and ſeveral of them, ſtill extant, ſhew, that it was his deſign, that all perſons, eccleſiaſtical as well as civil, ſhould be ſubject to them. He gave no countenance to thoſe privileges and immunities the clergy have ſo greatly improved, which, very often, only authorize wickedneſs, and prove a ſanctuary to criminals.

He employs fit perſons to tranſlate the bible into Saxon.

Among the monuments of his piety, which chiefly conſiſted in founding and endowing monaſteries, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, the tranſlation of the bible into Saxon, then the vulgar tongue, was, doubtleſs, a very uſeful work; for, in order to have it well done, he employ'd the moſt learned perſons in the kingdom. Hence it appears, what great improvements learning received by the wiſe regulations of Alfred; ſince, in his days, no Engliſhman was capable of performing a work of this nature.

Dunſtan's birth.

The famous Dunſtan, ſo often mentioned in the ſequel, was born in the firſt year of this reign.

Edmund ſucceeds Athelſton.

Athelſtan dying without iſſue, Edmund, the eldeſt of Edward the elder's legitimate ſons, ſucceeded him, by the unanimous conſent of the people.

* Brompton and others tell a romantick ſtory, that relates to this reign: When Athelſtan was at a loſs for a champion to fight Colebrand, a great Daniſh giant, that had defied all the Engliſh, Guy earl of Warwick, being return'd from the Holy-Land, in the habit of a pilgrim, and unknown to all but the king, having accepted the challenge, fought and killed the giant, near Wincheſter; upon which, the Danes ſubmitted, and Guy retreated to a hermit's cell, where he ended his days.

† He died at Glouceſter, and was interr'd, with a great number of trophies, at Malmsbury.

9. EDMUND

9. EDMUND I.

EDMUND I.

ATHELSTAN left England in profound tranquillity. The Welch punctually paid their tribute; Anlaff, having retired into Ireland, ſeem'd to have laid aſide all thoughts of any farther deſigns; and the Danes continued in ſubjection. The Danes, however, upon Athelſtan's death, made preparations for a revolt, entertaining hopes, from Edmund's youth, that they ſhould, at length, be able to ſhake off the Engliſh yoke, and have a king of their own nation. Anlaff, finding them thus inclin'd, determin'd to embrace the preſent opportunity, to recover the crown of Northumberland, but being ſenſible he could not accompliſh his deſign, with a foreign aid, he perſuaded Olaus, king of Normandy, to eſpouſe his cauſe, who promis'd to exert himſelf, in his intereſt. With the troops he had from this prince, he once more invaded Northumberland; and, coming before York, the gates were open'd to him, ſuch was the good underſtanding between him and the chief inhabitants. This example was followed by moſt of the other towns, whoſe garriſons were either expell'd, or cut in pieces by the citizens, who were generally of Daniſh extraction. Anlaff, having ſubdued Northumberland, marched into Mercia, where his countrymen received him with open arms, aſſiſting him to recover ſeveral places, Edward the elder had formerly taken from them.

Anlaff, again, invades Northumberland.

Though Edmund was no more than 17 or 18 years of age, the enemy's progreſs was ſo far from daunting his courage, that it made him the more eager to come to a deciſive battle. No ſooner had he drawn his forces together, than he advanced towards the north, though he was ſenſible, that the enemy's army was ſuperior to his, in number; and, on the contrary, Anlaff finding that Edmund was on his march, to give him battle, approach'd him with equal reſolution. The two armies, meeting near Cheſter *, came to an engagement; and, when night came on, neither party could boaſt of the leaſt advantage, tho' they both prepared to renew the fight, as ſoon as day ſhould appear. The archbiſhops of York and Canterbury *, however, who were in the two armies, ſo actively promoted a peace, that a treaty was begun that very evening, and concluded by break of day. This peace was made up with the greater eaſe, as neither ſide could inſiſt on any advantage in the action of the day, their own or the enemies loſſes being unknown. Purſuant to this treaty, Edmund reſigned to the Danes all the lands, north of the Roman high-way, call'd Watling-ſtreet, which divided England into almoſt two equal parts, from North-Wales to the moſt ſouthern part of Kent, quite to the ſea *. Edmund was, in a manner, forced to agree to theſe terms, by the nobles in his army, who judged it more prudent to end the war on thoſe conditions, than run a greater riſque by continuing it; and doubtleſs, the remembrance of England's former calamaties made them more willing to bring matters to an accomodation. Accordingly, Anlaff took poſſeſſion of Northumberland, including ſeveral counties never enjoy'd by his father Sithrick.

* Odo and Wulſtan.

Edmund and Anlaff divide England between them.

* Vid. p. 28.

The Northumbrian Danes had no reaſon to rejoice long at Anlaff's reſtoration, who laid heavy taxes on the people, to diſcharge the debts he had contracted with the king of Norway, for the troops he had lent him. The inhabitants of Decra, being the firſt that revolted, ſent for Reginald, his brother Godfrid's ſon, whom they crowned king at York. Reginald immediately made military preparations againſt his uncle, who was preparing alſo to attack him; and upon this, Edmund marched towards the north, as well to lay hold on any opportunity that ſhould offer itſelf, as to appeaſe the troubles there, leſt they might occaſion the return of the foreign Danes into England. He arrived on the borders of Northumberland, when the uncle and nephew, intirely intent upon their private quarrel, had nothing leſs in their thoughts, than repulſing the Engliſh; and tho' in all likelihood, he might very eaſily have ſubdued that kingdom, he made peace between the two kings, and Reginald kept the crown he had a little before received, being both of them obliged to ſwear allegiance to Edmund, and alſo to be baptized, himſelf being the god-father.

The war breaks out a-freſh.

This peace, made by force, was of a ſhort continuance; for Edmund was ſcarce returned into Weſſex, when the two Daniſh princes jointly took up arms, to ſhake off his yoke, having firſt engaged the Mercian Danes and the king of Cumberland to eſpouſe their quarrel. Edmund, inform'd of theſe proceedings, directly marched into Mercia; and before the Mercian Danes could be joined by the Northumbrians, he took from them Leiceſter, Stafford, Darby, Nottingham and ſome other places. Upon this, he advanced, with the ſame expedition, into Northumberland, ſurprixing the two kings, before they had muſter'd their forces together, who dreading to fall into Edmund's hands, judged it moſt adviſible to abandon the iſland; and their flight diſpiriting the Danes, they threw down their arms, and ſubmitted to Edmund, owning him for their ſovereign.

945. Edmund gives Cumberland to the king of Scotland.

Before he returned to Weſſex, Edmund was reſolved to puniſh the king of Cumberland, who had ſided with the Danes; and he ſoon ſubdued that little kingdom, which he gave to the king of Scotland, to attach him to his intereſt. However, he obliged that prince to do him homage for it, and to appear at the king of England's court, at the time of the ſolemn feſtivals, if ſummon'd. This, perhaps, was the occaſion of ſaying, that the kings of Scotland were vaſſals to thoſe of England; but, tho' they were, undoubtedly, ſo, as to Cumberland, it does not follow they did homage for the kingdom of Scotland.

Edmund was famous, both at home and abroad, for his valour and abilities; inſomuch, that the king of Denmark, tho' often ſollicited by the Danes in England, did not think it proper to aſſiſt them againſt a prince of his reputation, and from whom ſo little was to be expected.

Edmund's laws. Brompt.

Edmund was not entirely taken up with martial affairs; for ſome of his laws, ſtill extant, demonſtrate his great regard for the happineſs of his ſubjects. As he had obſerved, that pecuniary puniſhments were not effectual to prevent robberies, which were, for the moſt part, committed by perſons who had nothing to loſe; he order'd, that in gangs of robbers, the eldeſt of them ſhould be condemn'd to the gallows, being the firſt law in England, that made it death to rob or ſteal.

948. Edmund's tragical death. G. Malm.

Had Edmund's reign been longer, in all probability, his people would have been rendered happy; but a fatal accident carried him off, when he had but juſt taſted the fruits of his victories. On a certain day, ſolemnizing a feſtival * at Pucklekirk † in Gloceſterſhire, he ſpied Leolf, a notorious robber, who, tho' baniſh'd for his crimes, had the preſumption to come and ſit at one of the tables in the hall, where the king was at dinner, who, incenſed at his impudence, commanded him to be apprehended; but, perceiving him to draw a dagger, in his own defence, the king, riſing up in a great paſſion, and catching hold of his hair, dragg'd him out of the hall. This raſh action occaſioned his death; for, whilſt he was wholly employ'd in venting his fury, Leolf ſtabb'd him in the breaſt with his dagger, upon which he fell down dead on the body of his murderer. This was the tragical end of king Edmund, in 948, in the 25th year of his age, after a reign of 8 years ‡. By Elgway his wife he had two ſons, Edwy and Edgar, who did not ſucceed him, by reaſon of their minority, Edred his brother being placed on the throne, by the conſent of the clergy and nobility.

His wife and children.

Dunſtan.

During this reign, Dunſtan began to be diſtinguiſhed, being highly eſteemed by Edmund, who made him abbot of Glaſſenbury.

The affairs of Normandy.

About the ſame time, William Long-ſword, the ſecond duke of Normandy, was aſſaſinated by Arnold earl of Flanders, in a little iſland of the Somme oppoſite to Peguigni; and Richard I. his ſon, a minor, was his ſucceſſor. As the affairs of Normandy, in the ſequel, will be often intermixed with thoſe of England, it is highly neceſſary, to give a previous account of the ſucceſſion of the dukes in that dutchy.

10. EDRED.

EDRED.

THE Northumbrian Danes were ſo impatient under the Engliſh yoke, that nothing but downright force, could keep them in ſubjection; and they catch'd at every opportunity for a revolt. Tho' their ſucceſs in Edmund's time, was very indifferent; yet, upon his deceaſe, they entertained hopes of regaining their liberty, imagining that Edred, whom, as yet, they did not know, wanting his bravery, or, at leaſt, his experience, would not have the ſame advantages over them. The more effectually to accompliſh their deſigns, they engage Malcolm king of Scotland in their intereſt, who thought all obligations were cancelled by Edmund's death; for this prince, as well as the Danes, flatter'd himſelf that Edred, on the account of his youth, would be ſo much confounded, at their ſudden attack, as not to be able to make any reſiſtance. The event, however, diſappointed their expectations; for Edred, who was not inferior to his predeceſſor, either in courage or conduct, expeditiouſly penetrated into the very heart of Northumberland, before they were in a condition to oppoſe him; and they were extremely aſtoniſh'd to find themſelves attack'd, when, as yet, they had hardly diſcover'd their intentions of revolting, and were, as the caſe ſtood, obliged to ſue for peace on any terms.

* In honour of St. Auguſtin, the firſt preacher of the goſpel to the Anglo-Saxons.

† Now Puckle-Church, a ſmall village, the ſeat of the Dennis's, whoſe family have been, 18 times, ſheriffs of that county.

‡ He was interr'd at Glaſſenbury, where Dunſtan was abbot; and the town of Pucklekirk was given to the ſame monaſtery, to ſing maſſes for his ſoul.

Edward,

He puniſhes the Danes.

Edred, having chaſtis'd the Danes, by fining ſome, and puniſhing others, who were the chief authors of the revolt, advanced towards Scotland, to be revenged on the ungrateful Malcolm; who finding he had no reaſon to expect any ſuccours from the Northumbrians, ſtruck up a peace with Edred, paying him homage.

Anlaff, being recalled, recovers all Northumberland.

Upon this, Edred returned to Weſſex, believing he had nothing more to fear from the north; but he had not a thorough knowledge of the Danes. Scarce had he taſted tranquillity, when, revolting again, they recalled Anlaff. So well concerted were their meaſures, and ſuch was Anlaff's expedition, that he ſubdued ſome of the moſt conſiderable towns, before Edred could muſter his forces together; and, whilſt he was making preparations Anlaff enlarged his conqueſts, inſomuch that it was impoſſible to recover that kingdom from him. Anlaff's turbulent and imperious temper, however, did not permit him to treat his ſubjects in a better manner, than formerly; for, in a little time, ſo powerful a party was formed againſt him, that he was forced, once more, to retreat into Ireland, and Eric was placed on the throne.

He is expell'd by his ſubjects.

Edred reduces Northumberland to a province.

In the interim, many of the Northumbrians ſtill adhering to Anlaff, Northumberland was divided into two factions, which furniſhed Edred with an opportunity he was very capable of improving to his advantage. He directly marched into the north, whilſt all things were in confuſion, before the Northumbrians had taken any meaſures to oppoſe him; and, upon his approach, Eric retired into Scotland, leaving his people to Edred's mercy, who threatened that he would utterly deſtroy their country. Tho' they could not well expect a ſecond pardon, who had ſo notoriouſly abuſed the firſt, yet, in this extremity, they implor'd it, amuſing him with ſolemn oaths and proteſtations; and, being of a generous temper, he was ſo touch'd, by their ſubmiſſive carriage, that he re-placed Eric on the throne, ſatisfied with obliging him to pay tribute and take an oath of allegiance to him. Theſe commotions being as he thought allayed, he returned to Weſſex, not ſuſpecting any treachery from a people, that had ſo lately received ſuch remarkable proofs of his clemency; but the Danes, who were brought to ſubmit, rather by force of arms, than from a ſenſe of his goodneſs, privately meeting together and lying in ambuſh for him on the way, ſuddenly attack'd his rear and put them in the greateſt diſorder; and, were it not for the valour and conduct of the king, his army would infallibly have been cut to pieces. Edred, incenſed at their perfidiouſneſs, marched back into Northumberland, reſolving to puniſh them in a mercileſs manner, which cauſed an univerſal conſternation; for they apprehended, that their ruin was remedileſs, if they ſo much as offered to make any reſiſtance. Submiſſion then being their only remedy, knowing alſo that the king of England would not be impoſed upon again, by general proteſtations, they threw themſelves upon his mercy, on whatſoever terms he ſhould be pleas'd to preſcribe; and the more effectually to convince him of their ſincerity, they ſolemnly renounced their allegiance to Eric, and put Amac the ſon of Anlaff to death, as being the principal author of their treachery *. Edred was pacified, by theſe means; but to prevent the like revolts, for the future, he ſecur'd all their towns, and plac'd in them garriſons of Engliſh ſoldiers. Having entirely diveſted Northumberland of its royalty, he reduc'd it to a province, appointing earl Oſulf, an Engliſhman, to be the firſt governor; and, on theſe accounts, the Northumbrians were kept in ſuch ſubjection, that they gave England no farther diſturbance, till the foreign Danes made a conqueſt of Northumberland, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

Edred devotes himſelf to religious affairs.

The Northumbrians being, thus, quelled, Edred lived in profound tranquillity; for he was the abſolute lord of all England, and dreaded by the kings of Scotland and Wales. Enjoying ſuch a perfect quiet, he devoted himſelf entirely to religious affairs, being directed by the advice of Dunſtan abbot of Glaſſenbury, who had a mighty influence over him; and he had the art of improving his credit with the king, to ſuch a degree, that he became maſter of his conſcience, and conſequently of all affairs relating to the ſtate. Whenever a prince ſuffers his conſcience to be governed by his ghoſtly father, he will find it extremely difficult, to exclude him from the management of his temporal concerns, as there is ſcarce any one particular but what may be conſider'd, as relating to religion, in ſome reſpect or other. So great a confidence had Edred in Dunſtan, that he not only took his directions, in all things, and made him his treaſurer, but, on ſome occaſions, even ſubmitted to receive diſcipline from his hands, being perſuaded, that his blind ſubmiſſion, which Dunſtan was induſtrious in preſerving, was the neareſt way to heaven. To gratify Dunſtan, he undertook the rebuilding of Glaſſenbury church and monaſtery, in a very magnificent manner, laying out upon it immenſe ſums of money, without having the ſatisfaction to ſee it finiſhed.

Guided entirely by Dunſtan.

The Monks made uſe of their protector's intereſt, to get into the eccleſiaſtical benefices, which, otherwiſe, they would have vainly attempted; and tho' Dunſtan's proceedings excited the clamours of the ſecular clergy againſt him, he over-look'd them, ſo long as he obtain'd his ends. However, his imperious conduct gain'd him a great number of enemies, who, in the ſucceeding reign, made him feel the effects of their hatred,

* Wulſtan, archbiſhop of York, was taken into cuſtody, as an abettor of this rebellion; but after ſome time, Edred ſet him at liberty, on the account of his character, tho', it is ſaid, that ſuch was his concern for his diſgrace, that it occaſion'd his death. Malm. l. 2.

hatred, which they had ſtifled, during Edred's life; but, as Dunſtan had been a friend to the monks, they were no leſs zealous to promote his glory. They, in all places, proclaimed, that Dunſtan was an eminent ſaint, that miracles were daily wrought, in his favour, and that he was often honoured with divine revelations; and, in their opinion, neither the ſaints of the firſt rank, nor the apoſtles themſelves, were equal to him, as to the number of their graces.

955. Edred's death. Malm. l. 2.

Had Edred lived, Dunſtan and the monks would, doubtleſs, have carried their point; but he died, juſt as the monks began to be admitted into the benefices. The hiſtorians, who have been ſollicitous to extol Dunſtan's merits and ſanctity, aſſure us, that Edred's death was revealed to him, by a voice from heaven, as he was on the road, in order to make him a viſit; and that his horſe fell down dead under him, at the prodigious noiſe of the voice; but judicious authors have taken no notice of tales of this nature.

Edred is ſucceeded by Edwy his nephew.

Edred reigned but 10 years *. Elfred and Bedfrid, his two ſons, whom he left in their minority, did not ſucceed their father; for Edwy, ſon to Edmund his elder brother, was placed on the throne. This election, by the way, ſeems equally to countenance thoſe who are of opinion, that, in the Saxon times, the ſucceſſion to the crown entirely depended on the ſuffrages of the clergy and nobility, and thoſe, who affirm, it of right, belonged to the next heir; for Edred's ſons were excluded from the ſucceſſion, and, at the ſame time, the crown was given by the great men, to the ſon of the elder brother, to the prejudice of thoſe of the younger.

From one of Edred's charters it appears, that he aſſumed the title of monarch of Albion; and, from another, that he ſtiled himſelf king of Great-Britain, in which he was followed by Edgar his nephew. If theſe charters be genuine, it may be inferr'd, that Edred ſubdued Scotland; but this is no proper place to examine an affair, which has occaſioned ſuch warm diſputes between the Engliſh and Scotch. However, the title Edred and Edgar affected, was diſus'd by their ſucceſſors, till the time of James I. at the end of the ſixteenth century.

II. EDWY.

Edwy.

Dunſtan's diſgrace.

EDWY † received the crown, at 14 years of age, whoſe thoughts concerning Dunſtan, were different from thoſe of his predeceſſor. Whether he had contracted a prejudice againſt him, by the means of his enemies, or, whether he had ſome particular reaſon to be diſguſted at him, he was no ſooner on the throne, than he order'd him to give an account of the ſums the late king had entruſted him with. Dunſtan reply'd, the money, that paſs'd through his hands, having been applied to pious uſes, he was not liable to be called to an account for an affair, that was entirely religious. As he promoted the building of Glaſſenbury, which the late king had ſo much at heart, Edwy's council judg'd it improper to puſh the matter any farther, leſt the people ſhould eſpouſe the abbot's cauſe. The founding and repairing of monaſteries were, at that time, ſo ſacred, that whoſoever ſpoke againſt them was branded with the character of impious and profane; and, therefore, the king's council, as they could not attack Dunſtan on that ſcore, without running a riſque, to undermine his credit, revers'd all that had been done, in favour of the monks. Accordingly, the religious were turn'd out of their benefices, and the ſecular prieſts put in their places. This ſudden blow was given, firſt, to mortify Dunſtan; ſecondly, to leſſen his reputation among the people, as they, by this, demonſtrated, they had no great opinion of his ſanctity; thirdly to ſhew, that he had acted very unjuſtly, in depriving the ſecular clergy of their benefices; and, laſtly, as Dunſtan and the monks were ſo inſeparably link'd together, it was impoſſible for them to ſuffer any diſgrace, without reflecting a diſhonour upon him. The perſecutions of the moſt inhuman tyrants never extorted from the primitive chriſtians ſuch bitter invectives, as did this pretended perſecution from the monks. According to them, the church was never in ſo great danger; and the moſt pernicious hereſies were nothing, in compariſon of the preſent proceedings. The monks of Malmsbury, who were moſt concerned in this affair, were the moſt clamorous; and, for this reaſon, they were turned out of their monaſtery, which was given to the ſecular prieſts. William of Malmsbury, who belonged to this houſe, tells us that "After it had been "inhabited by monks 270 years, it was made "a ſtable for clerks." Whether Dunſtan had excited the monks to utter theſe complaints, or, whether the charging him with it was made uſe of, as a handle, to puniſh him, he was baniſh'd the kingdom, tho' ſome affirm, he voluntarily went into exile. However that be, he retir'd into a monaſtery in Flanders, where he reſided, in expectation of ſome lucky turn, in his favour. Malm. l. 2.

Dunſtan is baniſhed.

Dunſtan's enemies triumph'd at his diſgrace, and the king himſelf was not a little delighted in being rid of one whom he deteſted,

detested, and who, in the late reign, had shewed him marks of disrespect; but he soon found, by fatal experience, that ecclesiasticks are not to be offended, with impunity, and saints the least of all others. The monks, provok'd to the last degree, at the loss of their benefices, bespatter'd, to the utmost of their power, Edwy's administration, whom they regarded as the chief author of their disgrace; and, by their false calumnies, which they spread abroad, in all places, at length, made their votaries believe, that he was the most impious of men. Upon this, great numbers of malecontents appear'd in Mercia, under Edgar, the king's brother, their head and protector. Perhaps, the monks persuaded him, that he should do God good service, in deposing his wicked brother; or, rather, he made use of this pretence to obtain the crown, of which he had but very distant hopes. However, having secured Mercia, he went into Northumberland and East-Anglia, where he found the Danes in readiness to join him, who were fond of nothing more, than to embarrass the affairs of the English. This insurrection did the more surprize Edwy, as he had never given his subjects, much less his brother, any just cause of complaint; and, besides, he did not apprehend, that the monks could have sufficient interest to raise so great commotions. In this extremity, being in no condition to recover what he had lost, or extinguish the flame already kindled, he chose to reduce himself to the sole kingdom of Wessex, which faithfully adhered to him, and surrender all the rest.

An insurrection against Edwy, of which Edgar is the head.

Edwy surrenders Mercia.

In the interim, the revolters, dreading to fall again under Edwy's dominion, resolved to have a king of their own, whose interest would oblige him to defend them; but, being a mixture of English and Danes, each nation was desirous, that one of their countrymen should be elected. The Danes, to obtain their ends, represented, that the only way to be safe from Edwy's attacks, was to call in the assistance of the king of Denmark; but, in reality, their view in it was to carry the election. The English, perceiving their design, did all that was possible to hasten on the election, by shewing the fatal consequences of their present state of anarchy and confusion; but, the more forward the English seem'd to be, the more backward were the Danes, who daily started fresh obstacles, hoping that, at length, they would be obliged to send for succours from Denmark. Having spent a year in debates, Edwy making no attempts, for the recovery of his dominions, and, therefore, the Danish succours becoming unnecessary, prince Edgar was chosen, with the title of king of Mercia, which included all the country, north of the Thames, except the antient kingdom of Wessex. To enhance Edgar's merit, it was reported, that, whilst the great men were in consultation, about the choice of a king, a voice was heard from heaven, commanding them to elect Edgar. This revelation was easily swallowed by the people, at a time, when it was generally believed, that no remarkable event happen'd, without a miracle attending it.

EDWY in Wessex. EDGAR in Mercia.

EDWY. EDGAR.

THis partition of England was of a short continuance; for the loss of Mercia, and the monks triumph over his misfortunes made such an impression on Edwy's mind, that he fell into an excess of melancholly, which occasion'd his death, after a reign of four years and some months *.

Edwy's death.

* Interr'd at Winchester.

The monkish writers represent Edwy, as a very wicked prince; but, among all the charges they have alledged, to tarnish his reputation, there is only one that has any foundation, and even that seems to be fictitious, or, at least, is highly aggravated. They relate, that he kept the wife of one of his courtiers, for his mistress; and that, on the very day of his coronation, he abruptly withdrew from the company of the nobles, who were assembled on this occasion, and went to this lady's apartment, from whence he was brought back by Dunstan, who, alone, had the courage to reprimand him for his crime *. From this time, they tell us, Edwy and his mistress were so exasperated against this holy man, that they would have taken away his life, had he not prevented their designs, by a voluntary exile. Besides, the more effectually to demonstrate the king's impiety and Dunstan's sanctity, they have vented a story, which evidently shews, what spirit they were of. They affirm, that, after Edwy's decease, his soul being dragg'd into hell, by a legion of devils, one of them was dispatch'd to Dunstan, with the agreeable news; but the saint pray'd so devoutly for it, that the Almighty, snatching it from the devils, translated it into paradise. This instance of the fury of the monks, against Edwy, renders their charge of adultery extremely suspicious, especially, if it be consider'd, that he was not above 14 years of age, when he received the crown; and that, according to some historians, this pretended mistress was his lawful wife †. However, it is certain, Edwy might have had one or more mistresses, without all this clamour against him, had he been a friend to the monks; for his brother Edgar was much more guilty, in this reſpect, than himſelf, tho' as he was a benefactor to the monks, he was treated in another manner. Some of the hiſtorians, notwithſtanding, have given us a quite different account of Edwy's character, either in overlooking theſe frivolous accuſations, or attributing to him the commendation he deſerved ‡.

12. EDGAR the peaceable.

EDGAR. EDWY, dying without iſſue, had, for his ſucceſſor, Edgar his brother, who re-united the two kingdoms of Weſſex and Mercia; and, tho' he was no more than 16 years old, his great genius and ſound judgment render'd him more capable of ſwaying a ſceptre, than many other princes of a more advanced age. It muſt be confeſs'd, ſome men are born with ſuch natural parts, that their judgment ripens, before the uſual time. Edgar was one of this number; and, if he diſcover'd his abilities, in depriving his brother of the half of his dominions, they were no leſs conſpicuous, when he reigned alone. He had the art of ſecuring the obedience of his ſubjects and the fear of his enemies, which were undeniable proofs of the greatneſs of his capacity.

He was no ſooner elected king of Mercia, than he recalled Dunſtan, promoting him to the ſee of Worceſter then vacant; from which it may be conjectur'd, that this prelate, notwithſtanding his abſence, had ſome concern in the inſurrection, that placed Edgar on the throne of Mercia; and this appears ſtill the more probable, from his great intereſt at court, during this prince's reign.

Edgar's mighty preparations procure him a laſting peace.

Such was the tranquillity of Edgar's reign, for which it was moſt remarkable, that he was ſirnamed the peaceable. This uninterrupted calm was neither the fruit of his victories, nor of an unactive life, but the effect of the extraordinary preparations he made againſt a war; for, by this means, he became ſo formidable, that no one durſt venture to attack him. He always had a ſtanding army in the northern provinces, not only to terrify the kings of Scotland and Wales, but to keep in awe his own ſubjects, eſpecially the Danes, who, on all occaſions, took the advantage of any troubles in the ſtate, as he learned from his own experience; and, to prevent the invaſions of the foreign Danes, of whom he had no leſs reaſon to be jealous, he equipp'd a fleet, conſiſting of 4000 ſhips, tho' ſome raiſe the number to 4800. It is not improbable, that they have exceeded in this account; yet it is certain, his fleet was vaſtly numerous, which he order'd to cruiſe continually round the iſland, and examine every ſhip that came on the coaſts, to prevent the incurſions of the Daniſh pyrates. By theſe preparations, Edgar, without once drawing his ſword, not only defended himſelf againſt deſcents from abroad, but obliged the kings of Wales, Ireland, and the iſle of Man to acknowledge him for their ſovereign. To prove this, hiſtorians relate a very extraordinary event, which, if true, ſufficiently confirms their aſſertion. They ſay, that Edgar, when he kept his court at Cheſter, being inclin'd to go, by water, to the monaſtery of St. John the Baptiſt, was row'd down the Dee in a barge by eight kings, himſelf ſitting at the helm.

961. He frees the kingdom from wolves.

Edgar, for the farther ſecurity of his ſubjects, judg'd it neceſſary to deliver them from two domeſtick plagues that infeſted them. The one was a vaſt number of wolves, that, coming down, in droves, from the mountains in Wales, made ſuch terrible havock among the flocks and herds, that the country was in a continual alarm; but Edgar found out an expedient to free them from this evil. Firſt, he converted the tribute of gold, ſilver, and cattle the Welch had paid him, annually, into 300 wolves heads; and then he publiſh'd over all England a general pardon for all paſt offences, provided each criminal brought him, by ſuch a time, ſo many wolves tongues, in proportion to the nature of his crime. Upon the publication of this act of grace, the wolves were deſtroy'd to ſuch a degree, that, in three years, there was not one left in the kingdom.

Edgar's ſeverity to corrupt magiſtrates.

The other plague was equally deſtructive; for there were another ſort of wolves, who devoured houſes and families, viz. the magiſtrates. Theſe mercenary judges, abuſing the exorbitant power they uſurped, during the wars, were become an intolerable burthen, as, without any regard to law or equity, they conſulted only their own intereſt. They, who bribed them moſt, were ſure of their favour; and tho', at this rate, the poor were moſt oppreſſed, the rich were not altogether ſcreen'd from their partial proceedings. Alfred the great attempted to remedy this evil, by an extraordinary act of ſeverity; but the following wars hinder'd his ſucceſſors, from putting his deſign in execution. Edgar was ſo intent in reforming this abuſe, that he took a progreſs, every year, thro' ſome part of England, to hear the complaints againſt thoſe judges, who abuſed their authority; and, to prevent them, for the future, he made a law, that every judge, convicted of giving ſentence, contrary to law, ſhould be fined 26 ſhillings, if it was done ignorantly, but, if wilfully, caſhiered for ever. It muſt be granted, that, in this, he acted like a great prince; and that ſubjects,

jects, guarded againſt invaſions from abroad and oppreſſions at home, are perfectly happy. Such is the condition of the Engliſh, at this day, under the preſent adminiſtration.

A proof of Edgar's being thought a courageous prince.

If Edgar was deſirous of peace, it did not proceed from the want of courage, for that was never charged upon him; and the following ſtory, tho' it ſeems to be fictitious, proves at leaſt, that he was taken to be a valiant prince. It is ſaid, that being told, that Keneth III. king of Scotland, had made a jeſt of the ſmallneſs of his ſtature, he ſent for him to court; and, walking with him in a place, where he had order'd two ſwords to be conceal'd, he deſir'd him to take his choice, telling him, that he ſhould ſee, if he pleas'd, what a little man could perform. Keneth, it is affirmed, was ſo far from accepting the challenge, that he begg'd his pardon; but this account is highly improbable. Firſt, it is generally referred to the beginning of Edgar's reign; whereas Keneth III did not receive the crown of Scotland, till five or ſix years before that prince's death. Secondly, Keneth's character, as given by the Scotch hiſtorians, is inconſiſtent with his being capable of ſuch a piece of cowardice. Laſtly, this adventure ſeems to be confounded with another of the ſame nature, between a king of Scotland and a lord of his court, related by Buchanan.

Edgar's attachment to the monks was the occaſion of his great fame.

Edgar's illuſtrious qualities, and the tranquillity of the kingdom, during his reign, doubtleſs, highly recommended him; but, perhaps, they would have been buried in eternal oblivion, had not his friendſhip for the monks engaged them to proclaim his praiſes, even to an extravagant degree. His bigotry, then eſteemed to be the moſt ſublime virtue, was the chief reaſon of the vaſt encomiums given him by the hiſtorians, and of his being ſainted, after his deceaſe. It is ſaid, that he was the founder of 40 monaſteries; and that he repaired or beautified many others, particularly, that at Glaſſenbury built by his uncle Edred. In a word, he was as generous a benefactor to the monks, as his circumſtances could well admit. Ingulphus, in his hiſtory of the abbey of Croyland *, affirms, that, in Edgar's reign, the treaſure of that monaſtery amounted to 10,000 l. beſides holy veſſels, ſhrines, &c. a vaſt ſum, if we conſider that religious houſes had not been rebuilt 30 years; and, from hence, we may gueſs at the immenſe riches of the monaſteries, in thoſe times.

Edgar undertakes to reſtore the monks to the benefices.

Edgar alſo undertook to reſtore the monks to poſſeſſion of the eccleſiaſtical benefices, and with a high hand, Dunſtan, now archbiſhop of Canterbury, being his principal agent in the affair. This prelate was more in Edgar's favour, than even in Edred's; and, as he made a very conſiderable figure, both in this and the ſucceeding reign, it will be expedient to take a nearer view of him, eſpecially, as he was held in veneration, as a ſaint of the firſt claſs, and, to the laſt degree, applauded by the hiſtorians.

An account of Dunſtan.

Dunſtan, the ſon of Herſtan and nephew of Athelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born at Glaſſenbury, in 925. He ſpent his youth with his uncle the archbiſhop, who took care to have him inſtructed in all the ſciences, as far as that age of ignorance would permit. He excelled, particularly, in muſick, painting, and engraving, in which he was much delighted, all his days. Having finiſhed his ſtudies, his uncle recommended him to king Athelſtan, who ſent for him to court, but gave him no preferment. The author of his life † pretends, the courtiers, who envied his virtue and learning, maliciouſly repreſented him to the king, as a man of bad morals, upon which the king forbade him the court, without examining into the truth of the report. In proceſs of time, the archbiſhop having found the means to undeceive the king, Dunſtan was reſtored to favour, and received, as a gift, ſome lands near Glaſſenbury, where he retired for ſeveral years, with ſome religious men, leading a ſort of monaſtick life. Glaſton or Glaſſenbury was, originally, a ſmall church, founded, according to the vulgar opinion, by Joſeph of Arimathea, as has been, already, obſerved; and, this church being deſtroyed, Devy, biſhop of St. David's, built another, in the ſame place. This alſo, being in ruins, was repaired by 12 devout men, who, coming from Armorica, ſettled there. Ina king of Weſſex, having pulled it down to the ground, built a magnificent church, dedicating it to Chriſt, St. Peter, and St. Paul. Several, eminent for their piety, moſt of them Iriſh, retired to this church, where they were maintained by Edgar's bounty; and, from that time, there were continually devout perſons, who choſe this place, for their retreat †.

† Osbern.

Glaſſenbury church and monaſtery.

Dunſtan is made abbot of Glaſſenbury.

Dunſtan, having been ſome time at Glaſſenbury, Edmund, Athelſtan's ſucceſſor, who had a great eſteem for him, founded a monaſtery there ‡, and made him abbot; and Dunſtan, being a perſon of great addreſs, managed him ſo dextrouſly, that he was exceedingly in favour with him, all his reign. In Edred's time, his intereſt was ſuch, that he was his prime miniſter, favourite, and father-confeſſor. His fondneſs for a monaſtick life led him to exert himſelf, in ejecting the ſecular prieſts, and inveſting the monks in their places; on this account and his imperious carriage, he not only procured a vaſt number of enemies, but drew on him the diſpleaſure of Edwy, who ſucceeded Edmund, as has been, above, related. As

* He takes notice, that, in 974, in the reign of Edgar, Swarling, a monk of Croyland, died in the 142d year of his age, and another in the 115th; which is the more remarkable, as that abbey was in a fenny and watrey part of Lincolnſhire.

† It is ſaid, they taught here the liberal ſciences, muſick, &c.

‡ Cambden tells us, Dunſtan introduced the order of the benedictins, whoſe wealth exceeded that of kings, who, having, as it were, reigned in England, for above 600 years, were expell'd by Henry VIII. and the monaſtery was, by degrees, entirely demoliſh'd. In his time, there was a walnut-tree in the church-yard, but now there is only a young one in its place, ſaid never to bud before Barnabas's day, the 11th of June, and always to ſhoot out its leaves on the day aforeſaid. There was alſo a hawthorn-tree, in Wirral-park, that budded on Chriſtmas-day, as if it were in May; which has been cut down, for many years, tho' there are ſtill ſome in the county, from branches of the old tree.

Edgar

Edgar ſo ſpeedily recalled him from Flanders, it is evident he was indebted to him for the crown of Mercia. Upon Dunſtan's return to England, Edgar made him biſhop of Worceſter; and, afterwards, the ſee of London being vacant, he entruſted him with the management of it; and, therefore ſome writers have imagined, tho' without ſufficient grounds, that he enjoyed both theſe biſhopricks, at the ſame time. Edgar daily gave Dunſtan freſh proofs of his value for him, which was the more confirmed by the miracles aſcribed to him. The monks took ſpecial care to ſpread the fame of them in all places, being ſo very exact in their circumſtances, that a man muſt have been much more unprejudiced, than was common in thoſe days, to have called them in queſtion. It is, however, extremely improbable, that Edgar himſelf, who was not ſo credulous as the vulgar, did, in reality, believe the truth of all theſe miracles; tho', perhaps, he thought, ſuch pious frauds were of no prejudice to religion. It is certain, he had a great veneration for Dunſtan's ſanctity. Athelm dying, Odo, a Dane, was made archbiſhop of Canterbury, tho' he did not ſurvive his inſtallment. Elfin was his ſucceſſor, who departed this life, on his way to Rome, for his pall *. This falling out in the beginning of Edgar's reign, Brithelm, biſhop of Bath, was elected to the vacant ſee; but the king, deſirous of promoting Dunſtan to the archbiſhoprick, held a council, wherein he repreſented Brithelm, as unfit for ſo great a poſt, ordering him to return to his former dioceſe, and Dunſtan was choſen in his room. This election not being, in all reſpects, canonical, it was thought convenient, that Dunſtan ſhould go to Rome, on pretence of receiving the pall, that he might juſtify theſe proceedings. The pope, ſenſible of Dunſtan's ſway in the Engliſh court, and of his zeal for the intereſt of the Romiſh church and the monks, not only ratified his election, but appointed him his legate for England. Upon his return, he obtained the ſee of Worceſter for Oſwald his relation, and that of Wincheſter for Ethelwold his intimate friend; and theſe three prelates, in conjunction, entirely governed the church, during this reign, for Edgar granted them not only all their requeſts, but took a pleaſure in conferring on them favours, unasked.

Dunſtan is made biſhop of Worceſter.

Dunſtan is promoted to be an archbiſhop

As ſoon as Dunſtan found his credit was thoroughly eſtabliſhed, he revived his project, in favour of the monks, which he had been obliged to drop, during Edwy's reign; but this affair was not without its difficulties. The great men of the kingdom regarded it, as a vaſt misfortune, that the government of the churches ſhould be wreſted from the antient and lawful governors, and committed to the monks, who, according to the rules of their order and the cuſtom, hitherto, obſerved, were excluded from the paſtoral functions, that they might devote themſelves entirely to the ſervice of God, in their monaſteries. Beſides, they thought, that, inſtead of enriching the monks, it would be more adviſable to put a ſtop to the people's zeal, who continually left them conſiderable legacies, their eſtates paſſing away in mortmain, to the great prejudice of the nation; ſo that it was eaſy to apprehend, that Dunſtan's ſcheme would be vigorouſly oppoſed by the nobility. The people, on the other hand, not ſo conſiderate, were altogether in the intereſt of the monks, being highly offended at the ſcandalous lives of the ſecular clergy, who applied the revenues of the church to uſes directly contrary to the intent of the donors †. It cannot be denied, that pride, avarice, gluttony, drunkenneſs, and luxury openly reigned among the clergy, in thoſe days; and Dunſtan, with his party, did all that was poſſible to expoſe theſe irregularities, to incenſe the people againſt their paſtors. They were ſo ſucceſsful, that multitudes eſpouſed the cauſe of the monks, merely, from a contempt of the ſecular clergy; but what did them the moſt ſervice was their intereſt in the king, whoſe eſteem for them was ſtill increaſed, by his comparing them with the ſeculars, who, indeed, were guilty of the greateſt exceſſes. For this reaſon, Edgar imagined, he was extremely ſerviceable to the church, in committing the government of it to the monks, whom he looked upon, as ſo many ſaints; and, therefore, Dunſtan eaſily prevailed on him, to countenance a reformation he believed to be ſo advantageous to the church. To compleat his deſign, he ſummoned a council, hoping that their authority, in conjunction with the king's, would ſurmount all obſtacles. Edgar was preſent, in perſon; and the ſpeech, he made, evidently ſhews, that he was very much prejudiced, in their favour. As this harangue plainly diſcovers the temper of the king, Dunſtan, and the other directors of the affairs of the church, with reſpect to the ſecular clergy, it will, perhaps, be convenient to relate it, at large, eſpecially, as it refers to one of the principal events of this reign.

Dunſtan revives his project of ejecting the ſecular clergy.

Edgar's ſpeech to the council.

'The Almighty having vouchſafed, of his infinite mercy, to manifeſt his goodneſs to us, in a remarkable manner, it is moſt reaſonable, reverend fathers, that we ſhould exert ourſelves, in a ſuitable return. That we are poſſeſſed of this plentiful country is not owing to our own ſtrength, but to his all-powerful aſſiſtance, who has been pleaſed to ſhew his loving-kindneſs towards us. It is our duty, therefore, to bring our ſouls and bodies in ſubjection to him, who ſubdued all things for us; and it ſhould be our care, that all under us ſhould obey his laws. It is my office, reverend fathers, to adminiſter juſtice impartially; to repreſs the rebellious, puniſh the ſacrilegious, and protect the poor and weak from oppreſſion. It is incumbent on me alſo to take care, that the church and her miniſters, the holy fraternities of the religious, be maintained and encouraged; but it is your buſineſs to inſpect into the lives of the clergy;

'to ſee that they act up to their ſacred cha'racter; that they are ſober, temperate, chaſte,
'and given to hoſpitality; that they diſcharge
'the offices of their function, with diligence
'and conſtancy; and, in a word, that they,
'in all reſpects, behave, as the miniſters of
'Jeſus Chriſt. With ſubmiſſion be it ſpoken,
'reverend fathers, had you been ſufficiently
'careful, as to theſe things, I ſhould not have 'had ſuch diſagreeable accounts, from all 'hands, of the enormities daily commited by
'the clergy of this kingdom. I do not inſiſt
'on the ſmallneſs of their tonſure, contrary to
'the canons, their effeminate habits, haughty
'geſtures, or immodeſt diſcourſes, which evi'dently prove their inſincerity. I paſs over 'their negligence in the adminiſtration of di'vine ſervice: they will ſcarce give their at'tendance at the publick prayers; and, when
'they come to celebrate the holy myſteries,
'one would think they were going to act a
'play. But what I ſhall principally complain
'of, I ſpeak it with the greateſt regret, mi-
'niſters occaſion of grief to the good, and of
'joy to the profane, I mean the ſcandalous
'lives of the clergy, who ſpend their time in 'diverſions, entertainments, drunkenneſs, and
'debauchery. Their houſes may be ſtiled ſo
'many ſinks of lewdneſs, publick ſtages, and
'the receptacles of libertines; where they have 'gaming, dancing, and obſcene ſinging. It is,
'thus, reverend fathers, the bounty of my 'predeceſſors to the church, their charitable
'donations, for the maintenance of the poor,
'and even the adorable blood of our Saviour,
'are conſumed. Was it with this view, that 'our anceſtors exhauſted their treaſures, and 'were ſo liberal of their eſtates? Was it to 'deck the concubines of the prieſts, provide
'for them ſumptuous banquets, and furniſh
'them with dogs and hawks? Theſe are the 'crimes, of which the people complain in 'private, and the ſoldiers in publick, that are
'ſung in the ſtreets, and acted on the ſtage;
'and yet they are forgiven, overlook'd, and
'conniv'd at by you! Where is Levi's ſword,
'Simeon's zeal, or the wrath of Moſes againſt
'the worſhippers of the golden calf? Where 'is St. Peter's indignation againſt Simon the 'magician? Imitate, reverend fathers, the 'zeal of theſe holy perſons, and follow the 'way of righteouſneſs, ſhewn you by the Lord.
'It is high time for you to draw St. Peter's
'ſword, whilſt I make uſe of that of Conſtan-
'tine the great. Let us join our forces to ex-
'pel the lepers out of the temple, cleanſe the
'ſanctuary, and cauſe the Lord to be ſerved
'by the true ſons of Levi, who ſaid to his fa-

"and to his brethren, I know not who you
"are." Let the contempt of the reliques of 'the ſaints, the daily prophanation of the ho'ly altars, and the great abuſe of the piety
'of our forefathers excite your zeal. One of 'my predeceſſors, you all know, dedicated to 'the church the tythes of the kingdom; the 'glorious Alfred, my great-grandfather, apply'd
'his revenues to religious uſes. You are no
'ſtrangers to the great benefactions of my fa'ther and uncle, which it would be highly
'diſhonourable ſo ſoon to forget, as the altars
'are, to this day, adorn'd with them. You,
'O Dunſtan, father of fathers, raiſe your ima'gination, I beſeech you, and fancy he looks 'down from heaven, and expoſtulates with 'you in this manner: "It was you that ad-
"vis'd me to found ſo many churches and mo-
"naſteries, whom I choſe for my ſpiritual
"guide. Did I not always obey your voice,
"preferring your advice before riches; and
"how liberally did I expend my treaſures, by "your direction? My charities were always "ready, when you call'd for them; and all "your requeſts, in behalf of the church, were "immediately granted. If you told me, the "monks were in want, they were directly
"ſupplied; and you aſſured me, ſuch bounti-
"ful actions brought forth immortal fruit and
"were highly meritorious, as they ſupported
"the ſervants of God and maintained the "poor. Now, is it not an intolerable ſhame,
"they ſhould be of no other uſe, than to a"dorn a pack of proſtitutes? Is this the pro"duct of my benefactions? Are theſe the ef"fects of your glorious promiſes?" Theſe,
'O Dunſtan, are the complaints of the king
'my father. What reply can you make to
'this charge? I know you have, hitherto,
'been unblameable; for, when you ſaw a thief,
'you conſented not to him, neither have you
'been partaker with the adulterers. Nay,
'you have attempted to reform theſe abuſes,
'by arguments, exhortations, and threaten-
'ings; but, ſince theſe means have proved in'effectual, it is time to have recourſe to more 'powerful remedies. You have here, ready
'to aſſiſt you, the reverend father Ethelwold,
'biſhop of Wincheſter, and the venerable
'Oſwald, biſhop of Worceſter. To you three
'I refer the management of this important
'affair. Exert the epiſcopal, in conjunction 'with the regal authority, to expel from the 'church of God the diſorderly clergy, and
'place ſuch as live regularly in their room *.

From this time, the ſeculars durſt not oppoſe Dunſtan's meaſures; and, ſoon after, they were turn'd out of the monaſteries, and the regulars admitted. Ethelwold, biſhop of Wincheſter, leading the way in his dioceſe, was quickly followed by Dunſtan and Oſwald; and all the other biſhops, being monks, readily copied after their example. The antient hiſtorians generally repreſent thoſe days, as the golden age, and the moſt happy that were ever known in England.

Remarks on the invectives againſt the ſeculars.

Perhaps, the reader will think it ſtrange, that the ſecular clergy, ſhould, now, be more inveigh'd againſt, than in the following centuries, when the lives of the prieſts were equally ſcandalous; but it muſt be obſerved, that the popes had, for ſome time, obliged the clergy to celibacy, and treated with great ſeverity, thoſe who would not comply with their decrees. This prohibition from marrying, at this day, a fundamental article in the church of Rome, was, at firſt, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed, eſpecially, in England, which led the popes to try all poſſible methods to bring the Engliſh prieſts to a compliance; and Dunſtan's intereſt, who had brought Edgar into the ſcheme, exceedingly promoted it. We muſt, therefore, carry in our minds this prohibition, if we would come at the reaſon of the outcries the monks and their partiſans made againſt the ſeculars, and form a judgment, how far their complaints are to be regarded. Tho' it is certain, the prieſts, in thoſe days, were very immoral; yet it was their marrying, that drew this ſtorm upon them, which their enemies repreſented to be a more heinous crime than concubinage, or any other they could lay to their charge, as they always call their wives concubines, or by a more opprobrious name. But, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the court of Rome, this pretended abuſe was not reformed, till the XIIth century, when the celibacy of the clergy was eſtabliſhed, after it had been in agitation, above 300 years.

Obſervations on Edgar's character, given him by the monks.

The monkiſh writers, in return for the ſervice Edgar had done the monks, give him the moſt extravagant encomiums, and would fain have him paſs for a true ſaint; but, either from want of attention, or ſome other cauſe, they mention ſome particulars concerning him, entirely inconſiſtent with that ſublime character. Indeed, if we conſider him, in a political view, it muſt be own'd, he was a great prince; but a great king and a great ſaint, are far from being terms of the ſame import or meaning. For example, it is not an eaſy task to juſtify, by the rules of the goſpel, a bloody execution * done by Edgar's order, in the iſle of Thanet, on a very ſlight occaſion, as hiſtorians acknowledge. What might not the ſame writers have ſaid, concerning his luſt, of which I ſhall mention a few inſtances, who related, that the ſoul of his brother Edwy was dragg'd into hell, for having had a ſingle miſtreſs.

It is obvious, that if Edgar had not purchaſed the good opinion of the monks, by his great friendſhip for them, he would have met with no better treatment, than his predeceſſor.

Edgar's amours.

Before I conclude Edgar's reign, which was interrupted neither by foreign nor domeſtick wars, I ſhall take notice of his amours, which have ſomething particular in them, and evidently ſhew his good qualities were not without a mixture of vices. His firſt miſtreſs was a nun †, whom he took, by force, out of a convent, and kept her, in ſpite of Dunſtan's intreaties to the contrary. He had a daughter by her, called Editha, highly celebrated for her ſanctity. It is true, he made atonement for his crime, by not wearing his crown, for ſeven years; a ſevere, penance, indeed, for a fault his confeſſor ſhould have conſidered, as a piece of ſacrilege! But this was not the firſt time, the ſins of princes have been extenuated, and the rigour of their penance exceedingly magnify'd. His ſecond miſtreſs, whom ſome will have to be his wife, was Elfleda, ſirnamed the fair, from her complexion; and, by her, he had a ſon, called Edward, who ſucceeded him. He procured a third miſtreſs, by an extraordinary adventure; for, paſſing by Andover, he lodged at a lord's houſe, who had a very beautiful daughter, with whom he was, at once, enamoured. Being very violent in his love-fits, he reſolved immediately to gratify his paſſion, commanding the young lady to be brought to his bed. The lady's mother, abhorring the thought of her being the king's concubine; and dreading alſo his diſpleaſure, by a denial, prevailed on one of her waiting-women to lie with the king, inſtead of her daughter. At break of day, Edgar, finding that his bedfellow was for riſing, detained her, upon which ſhe was obliged to diſcover the cheat, to his great mortification, at firſt; but the fancy he had taken for the girl, allaying his reſentment, by giving him leiſure to reflect on the diſhonour he deſigned his hoſt, he eaſily forgave the impoſture, keeping this girl, as his miſtreſs, until he married. Malm.

† Wilfrida.

As Edgar's amours, ſo alſo his marriage had ſomething peculiar attending it. He was informed, that Ordang, earl of Devonſhire, had a daughter, the moſt celebrated beauty in England; and he determined to marry her, if ſhe anſwered this character. However, being willing to be ſatisfied, as to the truth of the information he had received, he made earl Ethelwold, his confident in the affair, ordering him, under ſome pretence, to take a journey, with this view. Ethelwold, being arrived at the earl's houſe, no ſooner ſaw Elfrida his daughter, than he paſſionately loved her, and to ſuch a degree, that forgetting all his obligations to the king his maſter, he demanded the lady for himſelf; and, his requeſt being granted, he was married to her, in the moſt private manner, pretending he had weighty reaſons, for not divulging his marriage. Upon his return to court, ſoon after, he told the king, that Elfrida's charms were ſtrangely miſrepreſented, and that, in all probability, the fame of her beauty was principally owing to her father's wealth. This report had the deſired effect, for Edgar laid aſide all thoughts of making her his wife; and Ethelwold, perceiving this, repreſented to the king, on a certain day, that tho' Elfrida's fortune was vaſtly too mean for a prince, yet it would make any ſubject happy, as ſhe was the greateſt heireſs in the kingdom; and, therefore, he humbly begg'd leave that he might make his addreſſes to her. The king, to whom ſhe was now perfectly indifferent, readily conſented, and even appeared extremely well pleaſed at the proſpect of his marrying, to ſuch advantage. Ethelwold, upon this, returned to his wife, and celebrated his nuptials in a publick manner; but, jealous of the influence her beauty might have on the king, he kept her at his country-ſeat, not ſuffering her to come to court, on any occaſion.

Edgar's marriage.

* The Saxon annals tell us, he order'd the whole iſland to be laid waſte. Brompton ſays, it was for inſulting his laws; but M. Weſtminſter affirms, it was for ſeizing and plundering ſome York merchants that touch'd upon it.

Not-

Notwithſtanding Ethelwold's caution, it was impoſſible his perfidiouſneſs ſhould be long a ſecret; for favourites have commonly ſome private enemies, who are glad of an opportunity to ſupplant them. Edgar, at length, received intelligence of the whole matter; but he deferred his reſentment, till he was ſatisfied of the truth of it, with his own eyes. Accordingly, he took a progreſs into thoſe parts, where Ethelwold kept his wife; and, being near the place, he told him, he was diſpoſed to make a viſit to his lady, who was formerly repreſented to him, in ſuch an agreeable light. Ethelwold, being thunder-ſtruck, at theſe words, made uſe of all his skill to divert Edgar from his purpoſe; but his artifices ſerved only to confirm the king in his reſolution. All that he could obtain was leave to go before, under the pretence of making preparations for the king's reception; but no ſooner had he enter'd his houſe, than he fell at his wife's feet, confeſſing what he had done, for her ſake, and conjuring her to conceal her charms from the king, who was but too ſuſceptible of the flames of love. Elfrida promiſed to act, according to his direction, tho' ſhe was reſolved to break her word; for, as ſoon as he departed to meet the king, ſhe ſet off her natural beauty, to the utmoſt advantage. Elfrida ſucceeded in her deſign, Edgar being, at the firſt ſight, deſperately enamour'd with her, and determined to make her his own. The more effectually to accompliſh his ends, he pretended he ſaw nothing extraordinary in Elfrida, at which Ethelwold was tranſported with joy; and he took his leave of her, with a ſeeming indifference, tho' his heart was inflamed with love and revenge, which, of all the paſſions, excite the moſt violent emotions in the ſoul. Soon after, he diſpatched Ethelwold into Northumberland, about ſome urgent affairs, as he pretended; but he never performed his journey, being found dead in a wood, where, at firſt, it was believed he was murdered by robbers. The peoples eyes, however, were quickly opened, when the king, inſtead of making enquiry after the murderers, was married to the widow; tho' ſome tell us, Edgar ſlew Ethelwold, at a hunting-match, with his own hand.

Edgar's real character.

From what has been ſaid, it appears, that the encomiums, attributed to this prince, are vaſtly too laviſh, being given him by the monks, who were prejudiced in his favour. One of theſe writers does not ſcruple to affirm, that Edgar was the ſame to the Engliſh, as Romulus to the Romans, Cyrus to the Perſians, Alexander to the Macedonians, Arſaces to the Parthians, or Charlemain to the French; but it is obvious he never equalled theſe illuſtrious heroes. Accordingly, ſucceeding ages, freer from prejudice, have placed him among more ſuitable company; and very judicious authors were ſo far from taking him to be a ſaint, that they have ranked him among the vileſt princes*. This idea of him receives confirmation from what is related of Canutus the great, who, upon the mention of Editha Edgar's daughter's ſanctity, declared, "He "could never believe it poſſible, that the "daughter of ſuch a wicked father ſhould be "a ſaint." It is, therefore, to be ſuſpected, that the monkiſh hiſtorians have omitted ſeveral of Edgar's actions, on purpoſe to ſet off the character of their heroe, the recital of which would have led us to form very different apprehenſions concerning him.

975. Edgar's death and children.

Edgar reigned 16 years, from the death of Edwy, and died in 975, in the 32d year of his age, leaving behind him two ſons and a daughter. Edward, his eldeſt ſon, he had by a concubine, or, at leaſt, one whoſe marriage was doubtful. Ethelred his youngeſt, was the ſon of the charming Elfrida. Editha, his daughter by his firſt miſtreſs, ſpent her days in a monaſtery, and was ſainted, after her death.

Edgar had too well deſerved of the monks, not to have a place in the kalendar; but as he gave no other proofs of his ſanctity, whilſt he lived, but his friendſhip for the monks, and the founding of monaſteries, they tell us, he exhibited thoſe that were more ſubſtantial after his deceaſe. It is pretended, that when his body was taken out of the coffin, to be put in a ſtately ſhrine, it was as freſh as the moment he departed this life; and that, the ſhrine being made too ſhort, tho' he was of a very ſmall ſtature, ſome perſon preſuming to ſever his head from his body, the blood guſh'd out in great abundance. The ſaintſhip of this prince being, thus, atteſted, his body was placed near the high altar of Glaſſenbury-church, where it is reported to have wrought ſeveral miracles.

Diviſions, on the account of the monks.

UPon Edgar's deceaſe, they who had been impatient, during the exorbitant power of the monks, thought it now a proper time to reduce them to their primitive ſtate. Elfier, duke of Mercia, their avow'd enemy, turn'd them out of all the benefices they were poſſeſs'd of in that province, putting the ſeculars in their places, and ſome other lords followed his example; but the duke of Eaſt-Anglia and ſeveral other great men ſteadily adherred to Dunſtan and his party. This diviſion, on the account of the monks, occaſioned ſuch animoſities among the nobles, that there was like to have been an open rupture; and the breach grew ſtill wider, when they came to fix the ſucceſſion to the crown. Several were of opinion, it, of right, devolv'd to Ethelred, pretending that Edward's mother was never lawfully married to Edgar; but Dunſtan and all the biſhops inſiſted, that Edward was nominated Edgar's ſucceſſor, in his laſt will and teſtament. They had alſo another powerful motive to engage them in his intereſt, as they had no grounds for any hopes under his brother, whoſe mother, Elfrida, ſeem'd averſe to their counſels.

Edward is crown'd by Dunſtan.

In the interim, Ethelred's party, being the moſt numerous, Edward was in danger of being excluded, if Dunſtan did not contrive ſome means to diſconcert their meaſures, who, finding the people had a vaſt veneration for his ſanctity, was reſolved to make their pious ſentiments ſubſervient to his deſigns. In the height of the publick debates, Dunſtan ſtarts up, and, taking prince Edward by the hand, conducts him towards the church, attended by the other biſhops and a great multitude; and, coming there, he anoints the young prince with the royal unction, entirely regardleſs of any oppoſition. The nobles lamented their falling again under the adminiſtration of that imperious prelate, but were obliged to ſubmit.

The conteſt between the prieſts and monks is revived.

Edward was no more than 14 years of age, when he came to the crown, under the guardianſhip of Dunſtan, who engroſs'd all the power in his own hands; and, being fixed in the regency, he exerted all his intereſt to ſecure to the monks the benefices they had been poſſeſs'd of in the late reign, making uſe of the regal authority to that purpoſe; but, as the king was in his minority, the orders iſſued out, in his name, were not ſo readily obeyed. Dunſtan called ſeveral councils, on this occaſion; but, perhaps, all his attempts would have proved abortive, had he not, by ſeveral miracles, never wanting in the like caſes, induced the people, to believe that Heaven interpos'd in this matter.

Miracles, in behalf of the monks.

In one of theſe councils held at Wincheſter, the majority declaring againſt the monks, they would infallibly have have loſt their cauſe, if a crucifix, hanging aloft in the room, had not, on a ſudden, with an audible voice, pronounced theſe words: "It muſt not be, it muſt "not be; ye have decided the affair well hi- "therto, and it would be a fault in you to "change." The moſt obſtinate, aſtoniſh'd at this oracle, voted for the monks.

Eadmer.

At another aſſembly, in the ſame place, Dunſtan uſed all his endeavours, that Elphegus, a monk, might be choſen dean of that church; but the people would have had that dignity conferr'd on a ſecular. The conteſt was carried on, with ſuch warmth, that there was like to be a ſedition of dangerous conſequence; but St. Andrew the apoſtle, inſtantly revealing to St. Dunſtan, before all the people, that the monk ought to be elected, he was immediately inſtalled. Theſe and ſeveral other miracles not being ſufficient to remove all obſtacles againſt the monks, there happen'd one, at laſt, that ſtopp'd the mouths of their moſt virulent oppoſers.

978. An extraordinary accident at the council of Calne.

Dunſtan having call'd a council, at Calne in Wiltſhire, to determine the controverſy about the Monks keeping their benefices, one of thoſe mix'd conventions ſpoken of hereafter, where the king and all the nobility, as well as the biſhops and abbots, were preſent, in all probability, the monks would have been baffled, conſidering the numbers that oppos'd them; but, in the midſt of the diſpute, the floor of the room broke under the company, cruſhing ſeveral to death, the beam on which Dunſtan's chair was placed being the only one that did not give way, ſo that he eſcaped, without any damage, whilſt there was ſcarce a man beſides himſelf, in this numerous aſſembly, that was not either killed or bruiſed. This effectually convinced the people, that the monks were the favourites of Heaven, ſince their protector was ſo wonderfully preſerved; tho' there are ſome, who have inſinuated, that Dunſtan, contrary to cuſtom, prevented the king from being in the council that day. After this lucky accident, the monks remain'd unmoleſted, either becauſe Dunſtan's miraculous preſervation made an impreſſion upon their enemies, or that their moſt ſtrenuous oppoſers periſh'd in the fall. Eadmer.

The horrid murder of king Edward.

There is nothing more remarkable, in the reign of Edward, we ſhall, therefore, finiſh it with an account of his death in 979, four years after he came to the throne. The ſtory is thus related by ſeveral hiſtorians. Edward returning one day from hunting, paſſing near Corf-Caſtle, where Elfrida reſided with her ſon Ethelred, left his company, with an intent to pay her a viſit. Elfrida, being inform'd the king was at the gate, ran to receive him, and urg'd him very earneſtly to come in and refreſh himſelf; but as the king's deſign was only to make his reſpects acceptable to his mother-in-law, he only deſired a glaſs of wine to drink her health. Whether Elfrida had already formed a deſign of deſtroying the king, to make way for her ſon to the crown, or whether that opportunity led her to the thought; the young king had no ſooner put the glaſs to his mouth, than a ruffian ſtabbed him in the back, with a dagger. Finding himſelf wounded, he ſet ſpurs to his horſe, which ſoon carried him out of ſight; but not being able to keep his ſaddle, by reaſon of his loſs of blood, he fell off his horſe. To compleat the misfortune, his foot hung in the ſtirrop, and, by that means, he was dragg'd a great way, before his horſe ſtopp'd, juſt by a poor blind woman's door. At this place they, who had been ſent after him by Elfrida, tracing him by his blood, found him dead, and his body miſerably torn. Elfrida, believing ſhe could conceal this horrid deed, ordered the corpſe to be thrown into a well; but it was found there in a few days, and carried to Warham in Dorſetſhire, from whence it was removto Shaftsbury, and depoſited in a monaſtery founded by king Alfred. They aſcribe many miracles to it, particularly, the reſtoring a blind man to his ſight, and a cripple to his limbs, by only touching the body. The woman, in whoſe houſe it lay one night, it is ſaid, was cured by his interceſſion; and that the well, in which he was thrown, was endued with a virtue of healing many diſtempers. In ſhort, they add, that Elfrida, being willing to know the truth of theſe miracles, reſolved to go to the place herſelf; but her horſe would not move one ſtep forward, in ſpite of all her endeavours; and the hiſtories of thoſe days abound with ſuch prodigies as theſe. It is, however, certain, that Elfrida, deſirous of making atonement for her crime, founded two nunneries, one at Ambresbury*, and another at Whorwhel near Andover. In this laſt, in order to do penance, ſhe retir'd to the time of her death; and, it is ſaid, ſhe often cover'd her body with little croſſes, to preſerve herſelf from the devil, of whom ſhe had but too much reaſon to be afraid.

I cannot imagine, why Edward is repreſented, both as a ſaint and a martyr, unleſs it ſhould be pretended, that he fell a ſacrifice, for his affection to Dunſtan and the monks; which was, then, ſufficient to procure him theſe glorious titles. It muſt be granted, that, at this juncture, all the favourites of the monks paſs'd for ſo many ſaints; and their enemies were look'd upon, as the proper objects of the divine indignation. However, this prince is generally known by the name of Edward the martyr †.

The ſtate of the Church, from the heptarchy to the end of the reign of Edward the martyr.

THE perpetual wars in England, during the 150 years we have mentioned, were no leſs fatal to the church than to the ſtate; for they produced an univerſal corruption of manners, as well as profound ignorance, in the kingdom. The deſtruction of the churches and monaſteries, the plundering their revenues, and the neceſſity of taking up arms, to defend themſelves againſt the Danes, diverted multitudes from the ſtudy of religion, ſo that it is no wonder, if, during this period, we meet with but few particulars, for an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory; beſides, the greateſt part of the monaſteries having been demoliſhed, in which the memoirs, relating both to church and ſtate, were depoſited, the writers of thoſe times were deprived of their aſſiſtance. The reader, then, muſt not expect to find many remarkable events, as to religion, but few councils to give light into the doctrines of the church of England, and a very ſmall number of learned men, to afford us any information; it will, however, be requiſite to relate the principal matters, that are tranſmitted to us, as they will be uſeful, in clearing up the events of future and more happy times.

During Egbert's reign, nothing material was tranſacted in the church; but that of Ethelwulph furniſhes us with a particular, which, tho' it has been already mentioned, it will not be improper to relate more fully, in this place, viz. the grant of tythes. The charter runs thus:

Ethelwulph's charter for the tythes.

"I, Ethelwulph, by the grace of God, king "of the Weſt-Saxons, &c. with the advice of "the biſhops, earls, and all other perſons of "diſtinction in my dominions, have, for the "health of my ſoul, the welfare of my ſubjects, "and the good of my kingdom, reſolved to "grant the tenth part of all the lands in my "dominions, for the uſe of the church and "miniſters of religion, to be enjoy'd by them, "with all the privileges of a free tenure, diſ-"charged from all ſervices, due to the crown, "and the other incumbrances incident to lay-"fees. This grant has been made by us to "the church, in honour of Jeſus Chriſt, the "Bleſſed Virgin, all-ſaints, and the paſchal ſo-"lemnity; and that the Almighty would vouch-"ſafe his bleſſing to us and our poſterity. "Dated at the palace of Wilton, in the year "854, indiction the ſecond, at the feaſt of "Eaſter."

From the ſtile, date, and ſubſcriptions of this charter, ſeveral learned men have judged it to be ſpurious; but I ſhall only obſerve, that, long before this charter, the Engliſh clergy claimed a right to the tythes, if they were not already poſſeſs'd of them. This appears from the XVIIth canon of the council of Calcuith, held in 785, wherein the payment of tythes is urged from the law of Moſes. It is true, king Ethelwulph might be inclined to ratify the rights of the clergy, by granting them a charter for the ſame; but, if this was the caſe, it is ſomewhat ſurprizing, that he ſhould take no notice of the divine right of tythes, on which the clergy chiefly inſiſted. If this charter, therefore, be not a downright forgery, it ſeems, at leaſt, to be extremely ſuſpicious. Beſides, by the tenth part of the lands, muſt neceſſarily be meant the tenth part of the profits; which muſt be owned to be a very forced interpretatoin, eſpecially in a primordial act, like this‡.

Remarks on that charter.

We have nothing, in the reigns of Ethelbald, Ethelbert, and Ethelred I. that relates to the church, but the deſtruction of the monaſteries and a pathetick deſcription of the fury of the Danes againſt the monks. The hiſto-

He is alſo placed in, the Roman martyrology, March 18; and Baronius takes notice of a letter in pope Innocent IV's regiſter, for the celebration of St. Edward's feſtival. Coll. l. 3.

‡ The charter, cited here, is in the Monaſticon, p. 100. being dated at Wilton, in 854; but there is another very different from this, in Ingulphus and Matthew of Weſtminſter, dated at Wincheſter, in 855. It is therefore, ſuppoſed, that the firſt was for the tythes only of his demeſnes, and the latter for thoſe of all England; tho' they both ſeem equally to extend to all his dominions. Ingulphus affirms, the charter of Wincheſter was made, after Ethelwulph's return from Rome; but that is impoſſible, as he was, then, only king of Kent.

rians have principally regarded ſuch things as theſe; and they particularly lament the deſtruction of the famous monaſteries of Croyland, Ely, and Medeſhamſted, whoſe monks were all maſſacred, and the libraries conſumed to aſhes.

Remarks on Edmund's martyrdom.

The pretended martyrdom of Edmund, king of Eaſt-Anglia, has been, above, related; I call it pretended, becauſe it does not appear, that he ſuffered, on a religious account; and, at this rate, we muſt affirm, that all the chriſtians, put to death by the Danes, were martyrs. However, he is ſtiled a martyr, in the kalendar; and it is ſaid, that miracles were often wrought at his tomb, for ſeveral ages.

Tho' I have already given a large account of Alfred's reign, it will be convenient to remind the reader of two particulars, of uſe hereafter. Firſt, the ruin of the monaſteries, which was ſuch, that there was not a monk left in England, being all either ſlain by the Danes, or obliged to abandon the kingdom. Some of them, perhaps, took to other profeſſions; but no ſooner was Alfred rid of the Danes, than he built new monaſteries, ſupplying them with foreign monks. It will, doubtleſs, ſeem ſtrange, that he did not rather repair the old ones, whoſe walls, for the moſt part, were ſtill ſtanding; but it muſt be conſidered, that the ſeculars had taken poſſeſſion of them, living there, in common, under the direction of the archprieſt; and Alfred, it is evident, thought it inconvenient to diſlodge them.

Another particular, obſervable, is the groſs ignorance of the Engliſh, during their wars with the Danes, of which Alfred made ſuch complaints, as we have already ſeen. It was for this reaſon, that prince invited into his dominions ſo many learned foreigners, upon his founding the univerſity of Oxford * and making uſe of other means, to reſtore the ſciences in his kingdom.

Edward the elder, purſuing his father's meaſures, with the ſame view, founded the univerſity of Cambridge, as ſome affirm †; but I ſhall not enter upon the controverſy, about the antiquity of this famous univerſity, as it is an affair attended with great difficulties, and does not immediately relate to the ſtate of the church. There is another event, however, that happened in this reign, wherein religion is more nearly concerned, on account of the conſequences ſaid to follow upon it, which I ſhall take occaſion briefly to mention.

Remarks on the pretended bull of pope Formoſus.

Malmsbury tells us, that, in the reign of Edward the elder, pope Formoſus being informed, there had been a vacancy in the Weſt-Saxon ſees, for ſeven years together, ſent a bull into England, to excommunicate the king and all his ſubjects; that Edward, upon this, held a council, where Plegmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury, having fully laid it before them, it was decreed, that the vacancies ſhould be ſupplied, and alſo that three new ſees ſhould be erected in Weſſex; and that Plegmund, upon this, went to Rome to get the cenſure taken off, who, on his return, conſecrated ſeven biſhops in one day. An antient regiſter of the priory of Canterbury ſpeaks to the ſame purpoſe, adding, that the council made a particular proviſion for the Corniſhmen, to recover them from their errors; for, being ſome of the remains of the antient Britons, they refus'd to acknowledge the papal authority.

Spelm. Counc.

The Roman-catholick writers make a mighty flouriſh upon this bull, advancing it, as a ſtrong argument, to prove the pope's authority over the kings as well as the biſhops of England *; but, upon examination, it will be found inconſiſtent with chronology. Malmsbury dates it in 904; whereas Formoſus died in 896, being dragg'd out of his grave, in 897, by Stephen his ſucceſſor. Baronius, to ſolve this difficulty, ſays, the date in Malmsbury ſhould be written 894, inſtead of 904; but tho' this rectifies the matter, as to Formoſus, it occaſions another anachroniſm, as to Edward, who did not aſcend the throne, till the year 900. Edward, then, muſt be changed into Alfred; but Alfred was never excommunicated. They are, after all, extremely unwilling to give up this pretended bull. Some ſuppoſe two excommunications, one by pope Formoſus, in 894, againſt the biſhops only, and another by pope John IX. againſt the king. To ſtrengthen this conjecture, Malmsbury, who ſpeaks of Formoſus's bull, and Polydore Virgil, who takes notice of Pope John's, are quoted; but Malmsbury is evidently miſtaken, either in the date, or in the name of the pope; and Polydore Virgil does not affirm it was John IX. but John X. that menaced Edward with excommunication, as it muſt neceſſarily be, if the bull was dated in 904.

* The catholick divines anſwer to Sir Edward Coke, p. 136, 137.

As to the conſecration of the ſeven biſhops, mention'd by Malmsbury, it is not ſo ſuſpicious; tho', as to the time, it be ſomewhat perplex'd. It is certain, however, that, in the beginning of the Xth century, there were ſix biſhops in Weſſex, whereas there were no more than three, a little before. Ralph de Diceto ſays, the three new ſees were erected in 909; and, to reconcile him with Malmsbury, who places it in 904, an expedient is propos'd, if not well grounded, at leaſt, not improbable. It is ſuppoſed, that, in the ſynod at Wincheſter, in 904, the erection of the three new biſhopricks was determin'd; but, as theſe

* From a paſſage in Aſſerius, quoted by Cambden, about a diſpute between Grimbald, whom Alfred ſent to Oxford, and the old ſcholars ſettled there before, it is inferr'd, that Alfred was not the founder of that univerſity. But to this it is objected, that it is not in the copy of Aſſerius, publiſhed by archbiſhop Parker; that Uſher is poſitive, as to its being an interpolation, ſince it mentions things that happen'd after Aſſerius's death, &c. And againſt the antiquity of Cambridge, as well as Oxford, it is alledg'd, that neither of them are taken notice of by Bede, Alcuin, or Ingulphus; that, if there had been two ſuch famous univerſities, in the time of Alfred, what occaſion had he to complain of the ignorance of the Engliſh, or to ſend for learned men, from abroad, to inſtruct his ſubjects. It is, therefore, the moſt probable opinion, that Alfred founded the univerſity of Oxford, in 886. Vid. Book of Winch. Higd. l. 6. Harp. Malm.

† There is a manuſcript charter of privileges, in the library of Clare-hall, ſaid to be granted to Cambridge by Edward the elder; but it is evident, there was not any univerſity at all, till the time of Alfred. Vid. Coll. Eccl. Hiſt. p. 299.

new ſees were to be taken out of the dioceſes of Wincheſter and Sherbourn, it was agreed, that this ſhould not be done, till after the death of the preſent biſhops, that their former revenues might be ſtill enjoy'd. Both theſe biſhops dying, in 909, or, perhaps, a little before, and the biſhopricks of Worceſter and Suſſex being alſo then vacant, Plegmund conſecrated ſeven biſhops, at once, viz. Fridſtan biſhop of Wincheſter, Wereſtan of Sherbourn, Kenulph of Worceſter, Beornock of Selſey in Suſſex, Eadulph of Crediton or Kirton, Athelm of Wells, and Athelſtan of Petrockſtow or Padſtow in Cornwall. The three laſt ſees were thoſe newly erected, which Malmsbury and Higden ſay, had the pope's confirmation, tho' it is certain, at this time, and for upwards of 200 years after, there was no ſuch thing requir'd; and, therefore, it is probable, in mentioning the pope's confirmation, they had a view to the cuſtoms of their own times.

Vaſt privileges granted to Glaſſenbury-abbey.

In the reigns of Athelſtan, Edmund, and Edred, there is nothing to be met with, of any conſequence, except ſome councils, mentioned hereafter, the moſt remarkable particular being the charter of privileges granted by Edmund, on Dunſtan's account, to Glaſſenbury-abbey, after it was rebuilt. Theſe privileges were ſuch, that one would have thought he deſign'd to inveſt the abbey with a ſort of ſovereign power, within the precincts of its juriſdiction *.

Turketul rebuilds Croyland.

The abbey of Croyland was alſo rebuilt, in Edmund's reign, by Turketul, the king's couſin and chancellor, who afterwards became a monk himſelf, being made an abbot by Edred, who inveſted him into that office, by the delivery of a paſtoral ſtaff, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times. Turketul obtain'd a very advantageous charter for his abbey, tho' Edred would not grant him the privilege of a ſanctuary, which that abbey enjoy'd, before it was demoliſh'd, being unwilling that malefactors ſhould be protected from juſtice.

This prince was entirely ſway'd by Dunſtan, who exerted himſelf, not only to put the monks in poſſeſſion of the abbies, which the ſeculars had appropriated to themſelves, but the benefices alſo; but, Edred dying, before matters could be thoroughly ſettled, Edwy, who ſucceeded him, deprived the monks of their benefices, and even ſome of their monaſteries. To peruſe the tragical complaints of the monkiſh writers, with their invectives againſt Edwy, one would think he had utterly extirpated the chriſtian religion; whereas, upon a ſtricter enquiry, we ſhall find, that the monks were diſpoſſeſs'd of no more than the two monaſteries of Abbington and Malmſbury *.

* Or perhaps Glaſſenbury.

It is entirely needleſs to repeat, here, what has been ſaid of Dunſtan's intereſt in Edgar, or what that prince did, in favour of the monks. The truth is, there was ſome reaſon for replacing them in the monaſteries, which, tho abandon'd, during the wars, did not belong to the ſecular clergy, being founded purely for the monks; but he is not ſo eaſily excus'd, for his attempting to introduce the monks into the benefices, becauſe the ſeculars were, moſt of them, married. I ſhall not here examine into the reaſons, why the councils and popes prohibited the clergy from marriage, it being treated on, at large, by ſeveral authors, but only obſerve, that, from the converſion of the Engliſh to the time of Dunſtan, the Engliſh clergy had not obliged themſelves to celibacy. I have already remark'd, that Dunſtan, in the reign of Edgar, carried his point ſo far, that, tho' they were not forced to put away their wives, they were expell'd from their benefices, for keeping them; but he could never, notwithſtanding his intereſt at court and his vaſt affection for the monks, get them into the northern provinces, the abbies, in thoſe parts, remaining without inhabitants, for above 200 years, and the name of a monk being ſcarce heard of there.

The removal of the epiſcopal ſees.

I cannot ſay much, about the erecting new epiſcopal ſees, or the removing them from one place to another, when one half of the kingdom was poſſeſs'd by the Danes, as yet pagans; and, Northumberland, Mercia, and Eaſt-Anglia, being continually expos'd to their ravages, it cannot be expected, the affairs of the church ſhould proceed, in a regular courſe. Eaſt-Anglia was without a biſhop, for more than 200 years; and the biſhoprick of Hagulſtad, in Northumberland, was ſo miſerably reduced, that, wanting a biſhop, for a long time, they were obliged, at laſt, to unite it to the ſee of York. During Alfred's reign, the biſhopricks of Leiceſter and Lincoln were united, and the ſee tranſlated to Dorcheſter *, where it remained to the reign of William the conqueror, being then removed to Lincoln again. I have, above, taken notice of the erection of the three new biſhopricks in Weſſex; and it would be too large a digreſſion to mention the names of the biſhops, that ſucceeded in each ſee. Thoſe, who are willing, may conſult Dr. Heylin, who has publiſh'd a book on that ſubject, wherein we have an account of the year, when each biſhop received his inſtallment.

Councils.

The councils, in this interval, were properly mixt aſſemblies, compos'd of the clergy and nobility, in Saxon, Wittena-gemot, i. e. an aſſembly of wiſe men, or rather Mycelſynod, which ſignifies, in the ſame language, the great or general aſſembly, both which names are, in Latin, termed concilium; but, as the laws and ordinances of the church, as well as the ſtate, were enacted in theſe aſſemblies, ſeveral of them are reckon'd among the councils or ſynods. As for ſynods, which conſiſted merely of eccleſiaſticks, it does not appear there was ſo much as one, from Egbert to Edward the martyr.

The ſynod of Graetland. 928.

Next to that of Wincheſter, in which Ethelwulph is ſaid to have given a grant of the tythes, the principal, in reference to religion, was the ſynod of Graetland, in Athelſtan's reign. The canons of this council are, as follows.

* This charter engroſs'd in golden letters, in a book of the four goſpels, the king made a preſent of to the abbey.

The

The Iſt enjoins the payment of tythes *.

The IId commands the magiſtrates to execute the laws againſt ſuch as were convicted, by all the circumſtances of an ordeal-trial †.

The IIId is againſt witchcraft and highwaymen.

The IVth relates to the towns, where the money was to be coined. There were to be ſeven mints at Canterbury; four for the king, two for the archbiſhop, and one for the abbot of St. Auguſtin's. Rocheſter had three; two for the king, and one for the biſhop ‡.

The Vth determines the circumſtances and formalities of the ordeal-trial, to diſcover, whether the perſon accuſed was guilty or not; and there are two remarkable things, relating to this. Firſt, the prieſts are ſpoken of, as ſettled in certain places; from whence it appears, they did not live in common, but had, each of them, their particular church. The ſecond is, the accus'd perſon received the conſecrated bread; which evidently proves, the euchariſt being called bread, after the conſecration, that the church was far from believing tranſubſtantiation.

The VIth prohibits buying or ſelling on Sundays.

The VIIth is againſt perjuries.

The VIIIth orders the biſhop to ſit on the bench with the judges.

The IXth lays a fine upon remiſs and negligent magiſtrate, to be paid to the biſhop.

In another ſynod, in the reign of Edmund, the ceremonies of matrimony, with all its preliminaries, are ſettled.

I have, in another place, mentioned the council, in which Edgar made ſuch a pathetick harangue againſt the ſecular clergy and ſeveral others, that was held, about the controverſy between the monks and the ſeculars.

Odo's conſtitutions. 943. To the eccleſiaſtical laws enacted, at theſe councils, we may ſubjoin certain conſtitutions made in thoſe times. The ten, that follow, are thoſe of Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The Iſt denounces excommunication againſt all, that injure the church in her property.

The IId exhorts princes, and other great men, to obey the directions of the biſhops, becauſe God has entruſted them with the keys of the kingdom of heaven.

The IIId admoniſhes biſhops to diſcharge their office, without any views of intereſt, or reſpect of perſons.

The IVth and Vth give good advice to the clergy; as does the VIth, with regard to the monks.

The VIIth forbids unlawful marriages, within the degrees of conſanguinity, tho' theſe degrees are not recited.

The VIIIth recommends unity and charity among chriſtians.

The IXth enjoins faſting on Wedneſdays, Fridays, and the four ember-weeks.

The Xth preſſes the punctual payment of tythes, from reaſons founded on the old teſtament *; but no notice is taken of Ethelwulph's charter.

* Mal. iii. 10.

There are other conſtitutions, publiſhed in the reign of king Edgar; but the author is not known. The chief of them are theſe. Other conſtitutions.

The Iſt ratifies the civil privileges and immunities of the church, ordering alſo the payment of tythes.

According to the Vth, the ſolemnity of Sunday is to commence from three o'clock on Saturday in the afternoon *.

* And to continue till break of day. Spelman.

There was alſo a body of canons  publiſhed in the ſame reign, of which the following are particularly remarkable.

The Vth orders, that, if a prieſt received any injury, the complaint was to be made to the ſynod, who were obliged to treat the caſe, as if the injury had been offer'd to the whole body of the clergy, and to inſiſt upon ſatisfaction to be made, at the diſcretion of the biſhop of the dioceſe.

The XIth enjoins the prieſts to learn ſome employment, that they might maintain themſelves, under misfortunes.

The XVIIth orders parents to teach their children the Lord's prayer and the apoſtles creed; without the knowledge of which, they were not to be admitted to the euchariſt, nor buried in conſecrated ground.

The XXIXth prohibits, that any ſhould be buried in churches, that were not of approved probity.

The XXXIId forbids the prieſts to officiate, without the ſervice-book before them, leſt they ſhould miſtake, by truſting to their memories.

The XXXVIth orders, that none eat or drink, before they received the communion.

The XXXVIII obliges the prieſt to have the euchariſt * always ready by him; but, if it grew ſtale, it was to be burnt in a clear fire, and the aſhes laid under the altar. It is obvious, what the church thought of the euchariſt, ſince it was burnt in this manner.

* The conſecrated bread.

The LIIId prohibits the eating of blood.

The LXIVth declares hunting and hawking to be improper diverſions for a prieſt who, ſhould be devoted to his ſtudies. Spelm.

After theſe canons, there follows a very particular form of confeſſion, with the penances to be enjoin'd by the confeſſor. We find here that the penitent was order'd to ſay the Lord's prayer 60 times in a day, but not a ſingle Ave Maria; from whence, it appears, that praying to the Virgin Mary was not, as yet, introduced into the church.

I have nothing to add, relating to the church of thoſe times, but a brief account of the persons most eminent for their piety and learning.

Swithin. The first saint, that occurs, is Swithin or Swithun *, who, having been preceptor to king Ethelwulph, was promoted to the see of Wincheſter; and it is said, that, by his advice, Ethelwulph granted a charter to the church for the tythes. This was sufficient to have procured him a saintship; but it is likewise affirmed, that he wrought many miracles, which I think it improper to relate.

Humbert. Humbert, bishop of East-Anglia, massacred, or, if you please, martyred by the Danes, with king Edmund, is also ranked among the saints.

Alfred. Alfred the great, notwithstanding his royal dignity, was one of the most eminent for piety and learning †.

Scotus. Johannes Scotus, sirnamed Erigena, i. e. Irishman, Ireland being then called Erin, lived in those days. He was very famous in France, where Charles the bald entertained him at his court, and convers'd with him with great familiarity ‡, when Alfred invited him over into England. At first he was the king's preceptor in languages and the sciences; afterwards he was a professor at Oxford; and, from thence, in all probability, he was removed to Malmsbury, since, it is said, that, in this monastery, he was stabb'd to death by his scholars. Before he left France, he, by the emperor's order, engag'd in the dispute, concerning the nature of the eucharist. In his treatise  on this subject, he strongly argues against Paschasius's doctrine, who maintain'd that the body of Christ, in the eucharist, was the same with that born of the Virgin Mary. It is evident, then, that the contrary opinion, which Scotus defended, was not looked upon as heretical, seeing Alfred sent for him into England, so highly esteeming him, that he entrusted him with the education of youth; nay, it is certain, he had the veneration of a saint and martyr, after his death. Roger de Hovedon affirms, that Scotus, at first, was buried, in an obscure manner; but that, afterwards, a miraculous light shining over his grave, for several nights together, the monks of St. Laurence removed his corpse into their church, and interr'd it close by the altar. His epitaph also, the antiquity of which, as Malmsbury observes ††, is manifest, from the structure and diction of the verses, assures us he pass'd for a saint, when it was made. All these circumstances concur to prove, that transubstantiation was not the doctrine of the church of England, at this time; for how was it possible, the English should honour him as a saint, who had so openly disputed against their opinion. This inference a little puzzles the Roman-catholicks, tho' one of their historians affirms, "That "the name of Scotus is register'd in the sup- "plement of the Gallican martyrology, being "commemorated among the saints, on the "fourth of the ides of November; adding, "that his name, having been inserted, even "in the Roman martyrology, remained there, "till it was expunged by cardinal Baronius." Cressy in his church-hist. of Engl. p. 772. It must be granted, this author alledges, that Scotus retracted his errors, but without any foundation. He barely asserts, that without a recantation, it is improbable the church would have had such a reverence for his memory; but it must first be made appear, that transubstantiation was, then, the doctrine of the church, to render this argument conclusive.

Grimbald. Grimbald also lived in those days, remarkably distinguish'd for his learning, being invited over into England by Alfred the great, who contracted an acquaintance with him at Rheims, and promoted him to the government of the new abbey at Wincheſter.

Asserius Menevens. Among the English famous for learning, Asserius was one of the principal, who wrote the life of Alfred the great, in 893, and died bishop of St. David's in Wales *†, being a distinct person from Asserius bishop of Wincheſter, whose death happened, in 883.

Werefrid. Werefrid, bishop of Worceſter, lived in the reign of Buthred king of Mercia. The Mercians being subdued by the Danes, he retreated into France, from whence Alfred recalled him. He translated into Saxon the dialogues of Gregory the great; and being highly celebrated, whilst alive, he was regiſter'd, as a saint, after his death.

Plegmund. Plegmund, archbishop of Canterbury, was esteemed to be a very learned prelate, and particularly eminent for his skill in divinity.

Dunulf. Dunulf, formerly an herdsman, is believed, by some, to be the neatherd that shelter'd Alfred; but, whosoever he was, he had the good fortune to be known to this prince, who perceiving him to have a genius, much above his birth and employment, having had him instructed in learning, made him afterwards bishop

* He was brought up a monk, at Wincheſter, of which he was abbot. Malm.

† Alfred was 12 years of age, before he knew his letters; but his mother, perceiving him to be, on a certain day, highly delighted with a little book, beautifully adorned with capital letters in gold and other colours, said, in his and his brother's hearing, "she would bestow it to him, that should first get it by heart. Alfred was indefatigably industrious, till he was able to read and repeat this book to his mother; and, from this time, he applied himself closely to study. He was not only honoured, with the title of saint, after his decease, but his name is in the kalendar of the English martyrology printed in 1608; and in two Saxon kalendars cited by the annotator on the Saxon translation of the New Testament. The day of his death is register'd on the 26th of October.

‡ The emperor, as he, one day, sate opposite to him at table, asked him merrily, "Quid interest inter Scotum & "sotum"? He replied, "Mensa tantum", with which the emperor was not displeased. Hoved.

of Wincheſter. As this city was then the metropolis of Weſſex, where Alfred uſually kept his court, he conſulted this prelate, in affairs of the greateſt importance.

Wulfig. Wulfig, biſhop of London, had alſo no ſmall intereſt in Alfred's eſteem, as is evident from his letter to this prelate, prefixed to his tranſlation of Gregory's paſtoral.

Neots. Neots was an abbot diſtinguiſh'd for his birth, learning, regularity, and zeal, in promoting religion. Some affirm, that he was nearly related to king Alfred; and others, that he was ſprung from the blood-royal of Eaſt-Anglia. He died, in 890, in Cornwall, from whom the town of Neotſtow or St. Neots received its name.

Odo. Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was the ſon of an Eaſt-Anglian Dane; but, tho' his parents were pagans, he had the fortune to know and eſteem the chriſtian religion, being, on that account, expelled from his father's houſe. In this extremity, he went into the ſervice of an Engliſh nobleman, who had him baptized and put him to ſchool. As ſoon as he was qualified, he entered into orders, in the reign of Edward the elder. His zeal, virtue and capacity gained him ſo great a reputation, that Athelſtan advanced him to the ſee of Sherbourn; and ſome attribute his glorious victory over the Danes, at Brunanburgh, to the efficacy of Odo's prayers. This prelate was equally eſteemed by king Edmund, who reſolved to make him archbiſhop of Canterbury; but he modeſtly excuſed himſelf, repreſenting to the king, that he was unfit for ſuch an exalted ſtation. Athelſtan ſtill inſiſting upon it, he farther objected, that tranſlations were contrary to the canons. This ſcruple being removed, by the inſtances of Juſtus and Mellitus, who were tranſlated from Rocheſter and London to Canterbury, he alledged, that the archbiſhops, ſince Auguſtin, were all monks, whereas he had not been educated under any religious rule; but this difficulty was likewiſe obviated, by ſending to the abbot of Fleury in France, intreating him to admit Odo, as a member of his ſociety. Upon this, at length, the biſhop, tho' with great reluctance, accepted of the ſee of Canterbury; and, as he became afterwards a vigorous champion for the monks, no wonder, they aſcribed to him the gift of miracles, placing him among the moſt illuſtrious eccleſiaſticks of his time.

Dunſtan. Dunſtan would alſo make a figure, in this place, had I not, elſewhere, ſufficiently deſcribed his character. There are modern writers, even among the proteſtants, who, byaſs'd by the teſtimonies of the antient hiſtorians, highly extol this pretended ſaint, not conſidering, that they are extremely ſuſpicious; for it is very probable, Dunſtan's ſteady adherence to the monks was the chief occaſion of thoſe extravagant encomiums.

Ethelwald and Oſwald. The ſame may be affirmed of Ethelwold, biſhop of Wincheſter, and Oſwald, firſt, biſhop of Wincheſter, and afterwards archbiſhop of York; their mighty zeal, in the behalf of the monks, doubtleſs, moſt of all contributed to to render them famous.

Turketul. Turketul, king Edmund's couſin and chancellor, became illuſtrious, for preferring a cloyſter to a court, where he lived in great reputation; but his reſtoring to its former ſplendor the abbey of Croyland, demoliſhed by the Danes, is the principal cauſe of the illuſtrious character given him by the hiſtorians.

14. ETHELRED II.

979. Ethelred II. crowned.

UPON the murder of Edward, nothing could be urged againſt his brother Ethelred's ſucceſſion to the crown, as he was the laſt of the royal family and too young to be accuſed of his mother's crime; and, therefore, Dunſtan could not refuſe to crown him, being then about twelve years old, tho' he plainly apprehended it would prove fatal to his party. It is ſaid, that Dunſtan, at his coronation, by the ſpirit of prophecy, foretold the miſeries of England, in this reign; but ſuch predictions are to be ſuſpected, when attributed to ſaints, by authors who wrote after the event. However, the people had quite different apprehenſions of this new reign, entertaining great hopes of a ſtate of tranquillity, under a prince who had given a ſpecimen of his good-nature, by his extreme ſorrow for the king his brother's death, tho' it paved the way for his being placed on the throne. Hiſtorians * tell us, that his tears were ſo unſeaſonable, in the opinion of his mother, that, catching up a wax-taper, in a paſſion, ſhe beat him ſo ſeverely with it, that he could never endure the ſight of a wax-light, to the day of his death.

* Malm. and Brom.

Ethelred, being crowned, removed the body of the late king to Shaftsbury-church; and he had ſcarce performed this office, before he was attacked by the Danes, who continually moleſted him, during the remainder of his life. Had this prince copied after his predeceſſors, perhaps, he might have prevented any new attempts upon England, from this quarter; but his cowardice, indolence, inſatiable avarice, and many other failings ſoon convinced them, they had little to fear from ſuch an enemy. The Danes, for about 60 years, ſeemed to have forgot England, as the Engliſh had the calamities they formerly ſuffered, by their incurſions; but, after ſo long an interval, tho' the Danes, ſettled in England, ſeemed to have the ſame regard for it, as the natives themſelves, the foreign Danes began to renew their invaſions; and the others, reſuming their old inclinations, joined their countrymen, in order to ſhake off the dominion of the Engliſh.

Ethelred II's character.

The Danes renew their invaſions. 981.

Theſe pyratical rovers made their firſt attempt upon Southampton, where they arrived with ſeven ſhips; and, having plundered that town and the country adjacent, they proceeded to ravage Cornwall.

The ſame year, another band landed at Portland, who pillaged the neighbouring country, and then carried on their devaſtations in other places.

Theſe frequent deſcents were the more dangerous, on the account of the many coaſts the Engliſh had to guard, they being at a loſs to know, know, where the enemy would land. If, at any time, they engaged the Danes, they had no other advantage, even in the caſe of victory, but the recovery of the plunder; but, when the Engliſh were defeated, the country was infallibly expoſed to all imaginable barbarities, and before they could be reinforced, nay, very often, whilſt the Engliſh troops were on their march, to oppoſe one band of pyrates, they were obliged to advance againſt another that appeared to be more formidable. There was but one expedient to remove this evil, viz. a powerful fleet to engage the Danes at ſea, before they landed; but it was now ſcarce practicable, becauſe of the king's minority.

This was the miſerable ſtate of affairs, during the firſt ten years of Ethelred's reign; and it would be needleſs to deſcribe, at large, the devaſtations the Danes committed during that time, being continually renewed, after ſome ſhort intermiſſions.

Elfer, duke of Mercia, dies.

In the interim, Elfer, duke of Mercia, one of the beſt ſupports of his country, died, in 983. The little veneration he had for the monks after Edgar's deceaſe, in all likelihood, occaſioned that aſperſion of their votaries, that he was eaten up of lice. Alfrick his ſon ſucceeded him.

984. The death of Ethelwold, biſhop of Wincheſter.

The year enſuing, Ethelwold biſhop of Wincheſter, one of Dunſtan's confidents, and a great benefactor to the monks, departed this life. It is ſaid, he founded 12 monaſteries; and, if that be true, he, doubtleſs, was aſſiſted by the bounty of the two former kings, who had a great eſteem for him.

The intereſt of the monks declines.

The intereſt of the monks entirely vaniſh'd in Ethelred's reign, on the account of the Daniſh invaſions, and becauſe the minds of the people were wholly intent upon their misfortunes; nay, they even began to call in queſtion the ſanctity of the monks, being amazed, that men, who had obtained ſo many miracles, in their own favour, could not, by their merits and prayers, ſecure the kingdom from its preſent calamities. Beſides, as their credit with the precedeing kings had procured them a great reputation; ſo this king's not being their friend was very prejudicial to them. Ethelred put the monks and other eccleſiaſticks, on the ſame footing with his other ſubjects; and he, convincingly, proved, how little he regarded the clergy, in a difference between him and the biſhop of Rocheſter. That prelate having inſolently refuſed to comply with a demand the king made him, he order'd the ſoldiers to lay waſte the lands of the cathedral dedicated to St. Andrew. In vain did the biſhop menace him with vengeance from the apoſtle, or prevail on archbiſhop Dunſtan to interpoſe in the affair; for Ethelred, regardleſs of them both, would not deſiſt, till a ſum of money was offered him. Dunſtan, to the laſt degree mortified, at theſe proceedings, denounced againſt the king and his council the judgments of God, for preſuming ſacrilegiouſly to invade the church's property, but to no purpoſe. He died ſoon after in the year 990, not ſo much of old age, as out of regret, becauſe he was not treated with the ſame deference and reſpect, as formerly.

Dunſtan's death.

990. Oſwald archbiſhop of York dies.

Oſwald, archbiſhop of York, quickly followed him, who was his particular friend, and one of the three prelates that had the management of all eccleſiaſtical affairs, during the reign of Edgar. The death of theſe patrons, a contagious diſtemper which carried off a great number of people, and alſo the continual invaſions of the Danes, entirely put an end to the quarrel between the ſecular and regular clergy.

991. The Danes invade England again. Sax. Ann.

The Danes having plunder'd the coaſts of England, for ten years together, they remain'd quiet, for about two years. This intermiſſion led the Engliſh to hope, that having turn'd their thoughts to ſome other country, they would give them no interruption, for the future; but, in 991, Juſtin and Guthmund, two Daniſh captains, landed a vaſt body of troops at Gipſwick*. Whilſt they were taken up with plundering, Brithnoth, duke of Eaſt-Anglia, advanced towards them, in order to ſurprize them; but he was vanquiſhed, and his defeat expos'd the neighbouring country to more terrible devaſtations. The Danes, upon this victory, penetrated farther into the country, committing horrible ravages. Ethelred, being without an army, and in no condition to ſtop their progreſs, was perſuaded by Syric, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to bribe them with a ſum of money*; but, perhaps it would have been more adviſable for him, if, in imitation of Alfred and Edgar, he had expended it, in fortifying the kingdom againſt their attacks. However, the archbiſhop's advice was, in proceſs of time, look'd upon as extremely fatal to England; for the money, given to this band, proved to be no more than a bait to allure others, who thought they had an equal right to take the advantage of the weakneſs of the Engliſh.

993. Another Daniſh fleet.

Two years after, another of their fleets ſailing up the Humber, the pyrates landed on the north ſide, ravaging all that belonged to the Engliſh, in a mercileſs manner. Ethelred ſent an army againſt them, under the command of the earls Frœna, Frithegiſt, and Goodwin; but the generals, having marched their troops quite up to the enemy, were the firſt that gave way, and, by their ſhameful flight, occaſion'd the loſs of the whole army. The king indiſcreetly confided in theſe three lords, who, being of Daniſh extraction, were ſuſpected of treachery.

994. Sweyn and Olaus invade England.

The miſeries theſe foreigners had, hitherto, brought on England, were nothing in compariſon of what followed. Sweyn, king of Denmark, and Olaus, king of Norway, tempted by the ſucceſs of their ſubjects in England, reſolved alſo to have a ſhare in the booty they, every year, carried off from thence. Accordingly, having equipp'd a numerous fleet, they enter'd the Thames, and landed their troops near London. They often attempted to ſubdue this city; but, meeting with a briſker oppoſition than was expected, they retir'd. To make amends for their loſs of time, before London, they plunder'd Kent, Hampſhire, and Suſſex, threatening to ranſack the whole kingdom. Ethelred, having neither courage nor conduct, conduct, in this extremity, had recourſe to his late expedient, on a like occaſion. He oblig'd himſelf, by a treaty, to pay a certain ſum of 16000 l. money *, within a limited time, on condition they left his ſubjects unmoleſted, and departed the kingdom. Matters being, thus, ſettled, the two foreign kings departed to Southampton; and ſoon after the king of Norway made a viſit to Ethelred, who prevailed on him to be baptiz'd, ſtanding as godfather himſelf. Olaus, at his departure, obliged himſelf, by oath, that he would not infeſt England any more, which he punctually obſerved.

The two kings return home.

Had Sweyn follow'd his example, the Engliſh would have avoided all the miſeries, in which he afterwards involved them; but, when he embarqued for Denmark, he left a fleet at Southampton, to keep them in awe and conſtrain them to perform the articles of the treaty. In his abſence, the admiral inſiſted on the payment of the money with great earneſtneſs; but, as they did not, at once, comply with his demands, he interpreted their delay to be a refuſal, reſolving to renew the war. In the interim, to amuſe the Engliſh, he ſet ſail, as if he deſign'd for Denmark; yet, when they
997. leaſt expected it, he enter'd the Severn; and,
The war is renew'd. having deſtroy'd the country of the Welch, with fire and ſword, he croſs'd the river, penetrating into Dorſetſhire, where he committed the ſame ravages. They ranſack'd whole counties, it being impoſſible to withſtand them; for all the forces, that could be brought againſt them, were no ſooner levy'd than defeated. In a word, having ſufficiently drain'd theſe parts, by their plunder, they put to ſea again and landed at Kent; the oppoſition
The Danes ravage England. made by the inhabitants only inflamed the fury of their enemies, who treated them with the utmoſt barbarity. To compleat the misfortunes of the Engliſh, a fleet, which Ethelred had equipp'd to engage the Danes, was render'd uſeleſs, on account of the diſſentions and unskilfulneſs of the commanders. In this melancholy ſituation of affairs, England would have been entirely ruin'd, if the Danes had not been invited to the aſſiſtance of Richard II. duke of Normandy, whom the king of France was reſolved to diſpoſſeſs of his dominions.

The Danes return into England.

Ethelred's tranquillity was of a ſhort duration; for the Danes, having ſecur'd the young duke's poſſeſſions, return'd to England. Cornwall was firſt expos'd to their fury, and afterwards Weſſex; and the Engliſh were ſo terrify'd, that they made but a weak defence. The king himſelf durſt not appear in the battles, leſt he ſhould fall into the hands of the Danes, who, probably, would have ſhewn him no mercy. At length, the Danes became poſſeſs'd of the iſle of Wight, Hampſhire, and Dorſetſhire, where they placed their magazines; and, from hence, they made continual inroads into the neighbouring counties, without any reſiſtance. The ſtate of England was, at this time, very deplorable, the ſouthern counties being perpetually harraſs'd by the foreign Danes, and the northern parts inhabited by thoſe of the ſame nation, who were alſo enemies to the Engliſh. At this juncture, Ethelred had not the leaſt ſemblance of the reſolution of his anceſtors, who were not diſpirited, even in the like circumſtances; but ſuch was his conſternation, that, to prevent ſtill greater miſeries, he promis'd to pay the Danes 30,000 l. in thoſe days a very conſiderable ſum, which was levied, as a tax, and called Danegeld, i. e. Daniſh money, or, money for the Danes. For the payment of it, every hyde of land was taxed, at the rate of 12 pence per Annum, a hyde of land being ſuch a quantity, as might be ploughed with one plough in a year. This was the original of that famous tax, which was afterwards ſo burdenſome to the nation.

The Danes, conſenting to theſe terms, returned home; tho' ſeveral of them, finding, England to be a better country than Denmark, choſe to ſtay behind and ſettle in it. Their number, indeed, was too ſmall, to render them very formidable to the Engliſh, eſpecially, as they were diſperſed in different parts of the kingdom; but then they were ſeconded by their countrymen in Northumberland and East-Anglia. Beſides, the Engliſh dreaded nothing ſo much as to renew the war; which gave occaſion to the Danes imperiouſly to act, as they pleas'd, without cheque or controul. Thus, whilſt the Danes ſpent their days agreeably, the Engliſh were obliged to toil inceſſantly, to ſatisfy their avarice; and ſuch was their ſubjection to the Danes, that they gave them the appellation of Lord-Danes. It is true, this word, as well as its meaning, was alter'd ſoon after; tho', in ſome parts of England, a rich idle man is, by way of deriſion, ſtiled a Lurdane, to this day.

Ethelred marries Emma, ſiſter to Rich. II. duke of Normandy.

Elgiva, Ethelred's queen dying, whilſt the Danes were, thus, maſters in England, the king demanded in marriage Emma, the ſiſter of Richard II. duke of Normandy. This marriage being conſummated, Ethelred was vaſtly elated, depending on the aſſiſtance of the duke his brother-in-law, whenever he ſhould want it; and the proſpect of this alliance led him to reſolve on the cruel and violent expedient of getting rid of the Danes, by a general maſſacre. To this purpoſe, he iſſued orders ſo privately over the kingdom, that, in one day, all the Danes were ſlain, with ſuch implacable barbarity, that the particulars are not to be read without horror. Sweyn's ſiſter, who was the
The maſſacre of the Danes. wife of an Engliſh lord, having been ſpared, at firſt, Ethelred was ſo cruel, as to order her to be beheaded, after her children had been kill'd before her face; but the cruel treatment of this princeſs, who embraced death with an heroick bravery, was ſoon after ſeverely revenged. Among other inhuman practices in this maſſacre, the Daniſh women were placed in holes of the earth, as deep as their waſtes, and had their breaſts torn off by maſtiff-dogs.

This bloody tragedy, acted on the 13th of November, 1002, very much reſembled the maſſacre of the Romans by the Britons, under Boadicea, and was attended with the ſame fatal conſequences; and the Engliſh, as well as the old Britons, were ſo far from recovering their liberty, by theſe means, that they only made their yoke the more heavy and intolerable. Although the hiſtorians aſſure us, that all the Danes in England were maſſacred at this time; yet it is not eaſy to apprehend, how this could be brought about in Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, where the Danes were the moſt numerous. Can it be imagin'd, that, in thoſe parts, they ſhould tamely ſtand ſtill, to have their throats cut, without any reſiſtance? I, therefore, am of opinion, that, by all the Danes, we muſt underſtand only thoſe lately ſettled in England, who were diſpers'd in Weſſex and Mercia.

Ethelred flatter'd himſelf, that theſe bloody proceedings, by which ſo many thouſands loſt their lives, would procure him peace. He imagin'd the Danes would never invade England again; and he hop'd, that if the deſire of revenge ſhould bring them thither, the Engliſh would think it neceſſary to ſhed the laſt drop of their blood, to prevent falling into the hands of ſuch incenſed enemies. He alſo placed great confidence in the aſſiſtance of his brother-in-law, the duke of Normandy, whoſe intereſt it was to eſpouſe his cauſe; but ſuch a deteſtable piece of policy ſeldom produces the deſired effects, or, rather, generally terminates in the ruin of the projector.

Sweyn reſolves on revenge.

Sweyn received the news of this maſſacre from ſome Danes, who eſcaped on board a veſſel, that lay ready to ſail for Denmark. The account, they gave of it, was abundantly ſufficient to excite him to revenge; but, when he heard the tragical ſtory of his ſiſter's death, in its cruel circumſtances, he was, to the laſt degree, enraged. He took a ſolemn oath, that he would never reſt, till he had revenged ſuch a barbarous outrage. His ſecond expedition into England, therefore, was not made, with a view of plunder, but to deſtroy the whole kingdom, with fire and ſword. In the interim, as he did not queſtion but Ethelred had taken all neceſſary meaſures, for his own ſecurity, he did not judge it convenient to embarque, before he was aſſured of a place, where he might ſafely land his troops. Cornwall was then governed by Hugh, a Norman, whom the queen had fixed in that poſt, as one in whom the king might entirely confide. Sweyn diſpatch'd a faithful meſſenger to this governor, to gain him over to his intereſt, by the propoſal of a great reward; and Hugh fell in with the temptation, promiſing to admit the Daniſh fleet into his ports, and to ſuffer his troops to land, without any moleſtation.

He lands in Cornwall, and reduces Exeter to aſhes.

Sweyn, upon this, fitted out a fleet of 300 ſail; and, landing in Cornwall with a powerful army, without oppoſition, he marched directly towards Exeter. As this city had no apprehenſions of being attacked, he eaſily ſubdued it; and, having put the inhabitants to the ſword, he reduced it to aſhes. This firſt exploit was ſucceeded by ſeveral others, equally fatal to England; for, wherever Sweyn carried his arms, he deſtroyed all before him. Towards the end of ſummer, being told, that Alfric, duke of Mercia, was on his march with a numerous army, to give him battle, he was determined to meet him. Ethelred acted very indiſcreetly, in giving the command of his army to this lord, whom he had formerly baniſhed his dominions, out of mere caprice, and whoſe ſon's eyes had been put out, by his order; for, the ſenſe of this injury being freſh in the duke's mind, he was glad of the preſent opportunity to revenge it. No ſooner was he advanced, within view of the enemy, than he repreſented that he was ſick, on a ſudden, pretending that he was incapable of engaging, and ordered the army to retreat; but, at the ſame time, he took care, that they ſhould do it in ſuch diſorder, that the Danes, without much difficulty, put them to the rout. After this, Sweyn took ſeveral towns, from whence he carried off a prodigious booty; but, having no deſign to keep them, he ſet them on fire, paſſing the winter in Denmark.

Sweyn retires.

Returning he burns Norwich and Thetford.

The quiet England enjoyed, upon Sweyn's departure, was very ſhort; for, in the following ſpring, he landed in Eaſt-Anglia, and, taking Norwich, conſumed the whole town to aſhes. Ulfketel, governor of Eaſt-Anglia, being in no condition to withſtand him, bribed him with a ſum of money; but, upon the receipt of it, Sweyn violates the treaty, taking the town of Thetford, by ſurpriſe, then a place of great note, and treating it as he had done Norwich. Ulfketel, exaſperated at this breach of faith, levied ſome troops, with great expedition, poſting himſelf between the Daniſh army and the fleet. Sweyn, apprehending that he intended to cut off his retreat to his ſhips, reſolved to give him battle, before he ſhould be reinforced; and he found that the Engliſh were incamped in a very advantageous manner, reſolutely determined to exert themſelves, in the defence of their goods and chattels, which their enemies carried off, before their faces. Such, however, was the ill ſucceſs of the Engliſh, that the Danes obtained a ſignal victory, tho' not without a conſiderable loſs; for, according to their own confeſſion, they were never in more danger of being defeated. Ulfketel, tho' of Daniſh extraction, was the moſt loyal as well as valiant of all Ethelred's ſubjects, and did him the greateſt ſervice; but the other lords behaved in a quite different manner. The hiſtorians are agreed, that Ethelred was betrayed by all that were about him; for Sweyn had not only ſpies in his court, but even in his council. The great men were generally bribed; or, at leaſt, there was ſcarce a man who ſerved the king faithfully, by reaſon of the little reſpect they had for him. Whatever councils were called to deliberate on proper methods to oppoſe the Danes, the diſſentions between the nobles, too frequent in the courts of princes, ſo much deſpiſed, prevented them either from coming to any reſolutions, or from putting them in execution. The avarice of the clergy, particulary the monks, exceedingly increaſed this general confuſion, who, notwithſtanding their vaſt riches, refuſed to contribute their quota, for the ſafety of the kingdom, pleading their privileges and immunities; as if they had no concern at all in the danger. It is no wonder, then, the Danes were ſo victorious, in a country ſo meanly defended by thoſe, who were under ſuch obligations to provide for its preſervation. The famine, which happened ſoon after after, would have compleated the misfortunes of England, had it not proved the occaſion of Sweyn's returning to Denmark, for ſubſiſtence.

Sweyn returns to Denmark.

Upon the retreat of the Danes and the ceaſing of the famine, the Engliſh expected to enjoy ſome tranquillity, when another Daniſh fleet arrived at Sandwich in Kent. Ethelred directly muſtered up an army, in order to engage them; but, having committed ſome ravages, they retreated to the iſle of Thanet, where it was not poſſible for him to attack them. They knew the Engliſh army, as it conſiſted only of voluntiers, who ſerved, at their own expence, would ſoon disband themſelves, as it afterwards happened; for, winter approaching, the Engliſh returned to their reſpective homes, it not being in the king's power to keep them any longer together. Upon this, the Danes, ſallying out from their retreat, began to rifle Kent and the neighbouring counties, being confident, they ſhould meet with no reſiſtance; and Ethelred had no other way left, to put a ſtop to their progreſs and the entire deſtruction of the whole kingdom, than to buy them off with the ſum of 30,000 l. with which they were, for the preſent, ſatisfied.

The king gives his daughter in marriage to Edrick, who proves a traytor.

Being thus at liberty from the Danes, the king celebrated the nuptials of one of his daughters, with Edrick ſirnamed Streon*, a very potent lord, whom he had lately made duke of Mercia. Ethelred's paſt fears and troubles, in which he was continually perplex'd, were exceedingly enhanced, by this fatal marriage; as he had imprudently taken into his family a traytor ſold to the Danes, who, on all occaſions, betrayed the king and kingdom to foreigners.

1008. Ethelred equips a fleet,

Scarce was a year elapſed, before the Danes demanded the ſame ſum again, pretending it was an annual tribute which Ethelred was obliged to pay, by vertue of the treaty; and they threatened to deſtroy the whole kingdom, with fire and ſword, if the money was not inſtantly paid. Theſe proceedings of the Danes convincing the king and council, that it was impoſſible to gratify their inſatiable avarice, it was concluded on, that the moſt effectual method would be to expend the money, in equipping a good fleet, to defend the kingdom from their invaſions. Neceſſity compell'd them to execute this reſolution, with ſuch expedition, that, in a very ſhort time, a fleet, well mann'd and victualled, was in readineſs, the command of which was given by the king to Brithrick, brother to Edrick Streon, duke of Mercia. Theſe meaſures forced the Danes to come to a naval engagement, for which their ſhips were not ſo fit, as thoſe of the Engliſh †.

The firſt thing Brithrick did, upon his being made admiral, was, to exert himſelf to ruin Ulnoth, a lord of diſtinction, but his enemy. He accuſed him of ſeveral crimes; but Ulnoth thought it improper to purge himſelf by a publick trial, being very well aſſured, that a party was formed to get him condemned. He reſolved, therefore, upon a voluntary exile, to be protected from the perſecution of his enemy; and he perſuaded nine captains to follow him with their ſhips. Upon this, he infeſted the Engliſh coaſts, doing as much miſchief as the Danes themſelves, to the great mortification of Brithrick, who put to ſea with 80 ſail, to give him chace, being determined to ſeize him alive or dead. However, the moſt of his ſhips, through a violent ſtorm, were either loſt, or fell into the hands of Ulnoth; and, thus, this large fleet, fitted out at a prodigious expence, was rendered uſeleſs, by the private quarrel of the admiral, which loſs became the more irretrievable, by the diſſentions among the officers, ſeveral of whom went over to Ulnoth.

1009. The Danes land in Kent. S. Dunel.

In the interim, the Danes made the beſt uſe of theſe inteſtine diviſions; for, the following ſpring, two of their fleets arrived in England, one in Eaſt-Anglia, under Turkil, and another in the iſle of Thanet, under Heming and Anlaf, who, joining their forces in Kent, after they had plundered the country, beſieged Canterbury; and that city would have been ſubdued by the Danes, if the inhabitants had not purchaſed a peace with a conſiderable ſum *.

* 3000 l. Sax. Ann. 1009. Ethelred levies an army, but lets the Danes paſs unmoleſted.

Whilſt the Danes were intent on their ravages in Kent, Ethelred levied an army to oppoſe them; and no ſooner was it in readineſs, than he poſted himſelf between them and their ſhips, to prevent their retreat with their booty. In all probability, he would have been ſucceſsful, and, perhaps, have defeated the Danes, being ſuperior to them in number, if Edrick had not found the means to bring them off, at this juncture; but the traytor, apprehending their danger, repreſented to the king, that it would be more adviſable to let them retire, than run the riſque of a battle, which might prove fatal to him. Ethelred was ſo wrought upon, by this deſtructive advice, that he permitted them to paſs, with all their plunder, unmoleſted; whereas, inſtead of ſailing for Denmark, they only retired into the iſle of Thanet; from whence, during the whole winter, they made inroads into the neighbouring counties, and even often attempted to take London, tho' they were always repulſed. In the mean time, Ulfketel duke of Eaſt-Anglia, inclined to hazard a battle, once more, in defence of the government, had the misfortune to be vanquiſhed, and, by that means, to leave the Danes in poſſeſſion of the country.

Ulfketel's defeat.

The Danes mounting ſome of their forces, ſubdue all Weſſex.

The Danes had, hitherto, wanted cavalry, on account of its being ſo difficult to tranſport horſes from Denmark; but, becoming maſters of Eaſt-Anglia, a country plentifully ſtock'd with horſes, they mounted part of their troops and extended their conqueſts. They ſoon ſubdued Eſſex, Middleſex, Hertfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Oxfordſhire ‡, Bedfordſhire, Cam-

They alſo inform us, that the ſeveral ſums paid to the Danes, as well as this tax for equipping a fleet, were all levied, with the joint conſent of the king and Wittenagemot.

London and Canterbury were the only places, in all the counties above-mentioned, that were not poſſeſſed by the Danes; but, at length, they ſo vigorouſly attack'd the laſt of theſe, that they took, plunder'd, and reduc'd it to aſhes. Elphegus the archbiſhop, being taken priſoner, was murder'd by theſe barbarians, who treated with the ſame inhumanity the monks of St. Auguſtin's, putting them under a decimation, i. e. deſtroying nine parts in ten †.

1012. They reduce Canterbury to aſhes.

England being reduced to this miſerable condition, all the great men of the kingdom aſſembled at London, with the king, to conſult what was moſt expedient to be done, in the preſent extremity; and the only method, they could think of, was to bribe them, with a ſum of money, to depart; and the Danes, upon the receipt of the ſum, which amounted to 48,000 l. went off with their booty.

1013. Sweyn's return into England.

Tho' this retreat of the Danes was very expenſive to England, the Engliſh were extremely well pleas'd to be, thus, rid of their enemies, hoping to repair, by a peace, the loſſes they had ſuſtained, by the war; but their miſery was, as yet, far from being compleated. Scarce had they taſted any of the fruits of tranquillity, before they were alarmed with the news of Sweyn's having enter'd the Humber, with a formidable fleet, threatening the entire ruin and deſtruction of the kingdom. As the country was in no capacity to defend itſelf, he ſpeedily ſubdued Northumberland, East-Anglia, and, in a word, all the counties, north of Watling-ſtreet. Not ſatisfied with this, he demands hoſtages of the principal towns; and, leaving his ſon Canute, to ſecure his conqueſts, he marched, ſouthward, and beſieged London. Tho' he was not in a condition to lay ſiege, in form, to a place of that importance, he imagined the citizens would be ſo terrified, by his menaces, as to ſurrender; but, when he found himſelf miſtaken, he deſiſted from his enterprize, chuſing rather to ravage the ſouth parts of Weſſex, where there were none to oppoſe him. However, as he could not reſt contented, until he became maſter of London, he was reſolved to attack it, once more; but, whilſt he was making preparations, he received information, that Ethelred had retreated from that city. This unhappy prince, dreading to lie at the mercy of an enemy, whom he had ſo highly injured, and, believing that he was not ſafe in London, retired into Normandy with all his family. The Londoners, being, thus, abandon'd by their prince, came to a reſolution of ſubmitting to the king of Denmark, who had already ſubdued the reſt of the kingdom; and, upon this, Sweyn was proclaimed king of England, without the leaſt oppoſition.

He ſubdues ſeveral counties.

15. SWEYN, king of Denmark.

SWEYN.

SWEYN, being now acknowledged as a ſovereign, in the firſt place, laid an immenſe tax on the kingdom, for the payment of the Daniſh troops, that aſſiſted him in his conqueſts. The coronation of this prince is not taken notice of by any of the hiſtorians; and, perhaps, he omitted this ſolemnity, judging it to be a ceremony of no conſequence, or elſe was wholly intent on affairs of greater moment, during his reign, which laſted not quite a year. Some affirm, he died a natural death, being choak'd by a rheum, and others, that he was poiſon'd; but, whatever was the cauſe, it is certain he died ſuddenly, which led the legend-writers to pretend, that he was killed with a club or lance by St. Edmund, formerly king of East-Anglia. It is ſaid, this ſaint took away his life, to ſave the town, where he lay interr'd *, from being plunder'd, for refuſing to pay the tax impoſed by the new king. The ſhortneſs of his reign and his not being crown'd, probably, are the reaſons, why hiſtorians, for the moſt part, have not placed this prince among the kings of England.

ETHELRED II. reſtored.

ETHELRED II.

UPON Sweyn's deceaſe, the Danes proclaimed Canute, his ſon, king of England; but the Engliſh recalled Ethelred, promiſing to ſupport him on the throne, againſt all the attempts of the Danes, being weary of the Daniſh yoke. Ethelred, at firſt, could not depend on their promiſes, as he ſuſpected their having a deſign to deliver him up to his enemies; but the reception his ſons met with, whom he had ſent before, to ſound the people's inclinations, encouraged him to accept of their invitation. Upon his return, he was received with great demonſtrations of joy; and his ſubjects ſwore allegiance to him a-new, as if he had but juſt enter'd on his reign, as they look'd upon his flight to be a ſort of abdication

abdication of the crown. As for Ethelred, he promis'd to reform what was amiſs in the adminiſtration of the government, before his departure. So deſirous were the Engliſh of ſhaking off their ſubjection to the Danes, that they flock'd to him with the greateſt zeal and expedition, and he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a numerous army; but his firſt expedition evidently proved, that, notwithſtanding his misfortunes, he was ſtill the ſame man. Inſtead of advancing againſt the Danes, he led his forces againſt the men of Lindſey *, who had given him ſome cauſe of diſguſt; and, after he gratified his revenge, he marched againſt the Danes, who little expected ſuch a ſudden revolution. Tho' Canute had all the Danes, on his ſide, and the ſame army which aſſiſted his father Sweyn, in the conqueſt of England; yet he did not think it convenient to hazard a battle. Accordingly, before Ethelred had approach'd near enough, to force him to come to an engagement, marching his troops to the ſea ſide, he ſet ſail for Denmark; but, before he embarqued, he ordered the hands and feet of the hoſtages, he had in his power, to be cut off, leaving them, thus mangled on the ſhore.

Canute returns to Denmark.

The reaſon of it.

The retreat of this prince cannot but ſurprize the reader, ſeeing he never was defeated, and, beſides, was poſſeſs'd of many fortified places; nor is it leſs a wonder, that the Engliſh hiſtorians ſhould be ſilent, as to the occaſion of his ſudden departure. This event, however, is accounted for by Daniſh authors, who tells, that Canute had a younger brother, named Harold, who, being regent in the abſence of his father Sweyn, had ſeized upon the kingdom for himſelf. This was the reaſon of Canute's leaving England in ſuch an abrupt manner, tho' it ſeem'd rather to proceed from his fears, than to be founded, as it was, on principles of ſound policy. He could not think it adviſable, to abandon the kingdom of his anceſtors, for the ſake of a country newly conquer'd and diſpos'd to a general revolt. The truth is, had the revolt of the Engliſh engaged him in a long war, what grounds had he to expect ſupplies from Denmark, whilſt his brother was on the throne. He afterwards ſufficiently demonſtrated, when, having ſettled his affairs in the north, he returned with his victorious troops to England, that he was incapable of thoſe fears that were laid to his charge.

Ethelred's avarice and cruelty.

Ethelred, being freed from the Danes, was entirely regardleſs of the promiſes he had made to his ſubjects; and, relapſing into his old courſes, he impos'd, on various pretences, exceſſive taxes, which occaſion'd great complaints, both among the nobility and the people.

To theſe publick irregularities, he added others of a more private nature, which diſappointed all the hopes his ſubjects had entertained of his amendment. Morkard and Sifferth, lords of Daniſh extraction, who had, all along, inviolably adher'd to the intereſt of the king and their new country, were made a ſacrifice to his avarice. To draw them into the ſnare laid for them, the king held a great council at Oxford, where he cauſed them to be murder'd; and, upon this, he ſeized on their eſtates, as if they had been legally condemned. Algitha, Sifferth's widow, was ſhut up in a monaſtery, which was the occaſion of her future greatneſs; for Edmund, the king's eldeſt ſon, paſſing that way, ſome time after, was deſirous of ſeeing a lady, ſo much celebrated, for her beauty; and, being deſperately enamoured with her, he married her, even againſt his father's conſent.

His ſon Edmund's marriage.

1016. The quiet England enjoyed, upon the departure of the Danes, laſted but one year; for Canute, being poſſeſſed of the throne of Denmark, ſet out directly for England; and, when he was leaſt expected, landed a powerful army at Sandwich. Edmund, Ethelred's ſon, and Streon duke of Mercia, his ſon-in-law, had the command of the army againſt the Danes, by reaſon of his indiſpoſition; but Edmund ſoon diſcover'd, that Streon was a friend to Canute. Upon this, on ſome pretence, he divided the army into two bodies, that he might be ſeperated from him, not daring to puniſh the traytor, leſt he ſhould excite a revolt in Mercia, where his power was exceeding great; and he dreaded alſo his father's diſpleaſure, who would never be perſuaded, that his ſon-in-law held treacherous correſpondence with the Danes. Canute, making the beſt uſe of this diviſion of the army, made large conqueſts immediately; and Edrick, who had joined Edmund, with no other view, but to betray him, perceiving that he was diſappointed in his deſign, openly declared for Canute. This would rather have been advantageous than prejudicial to the king's affairs, if the traytor had not carried off with him a conſiderable body of troops, with 40 ſhips of war. This deſertion, of great importance to Canute, was fatal to Ethelred; for the people, in ſwarms, went over to the Danes, and even Weſſex itſelf was in danger.

Canute returns to England.

Canute's hopes being daily raiſed, by theſe ſucceſſes, he marched againſt the Mercians, who continued in their allegiance to the king; and, having, with Streon's aſſiſtance, entirely ſubdued them, he reſolved upon attacking Ethelred in Weſſex. He had the more reaſon to expect, that this enterprize would prove ſucceſsful, as Edrick had artfully inſtilled a notion into the minds of the Mercians in the Engliſh army, that it was a ſin to reſiſt a prince, who was poſſeſſed of their country. All that Edmund could bring them to was, that they would follow the king, when he ſhould command them, in perſon, refuſing to fight under any other general. In this extremity, Edmund did all that was poſſible, to prevail on his father, who pretended to be ſick at London, to take upon him the command of the army; but the more he was preſs'd, on this head, the ſtronger were his ſuſpicions, that the Engliſh deſigned to deliver him up to the Danes, believing they could, on no other terms, make a treaty with them. As he durſt not leave London, where he thought himſelf ſafe, he would not go to the army; and Edmund had the mortification to ſee his troops deſert him, not being able to oblige them to ſtand a battle. In the interim, Canute, taking the advantage of theſe confuſions, extended his conqueſts, with great rapidity.

* The inhabitants of Lindſey, one of the three diviſions of Lincolnſhire, who, as the Saxon annals relate, ſupplied the Danes with horſes, deſigning to join them in their ravages. Ann. 1014.

He, at laſt, promiſes to head the army.

In theſe miſerable circumſtances, Edmund found it neceſſary to repair to London himſelf, if poſſible, to perſuade the king to appear at the head of his army. He, at laſt, prevailed; and, by his uncommon activity and care, he muſter'd up another army more numerous than the former. His view was to give Canute battle, being confident that one fortunate blow would retrieve the affairs of the Engliſh. Ethelred joined his army, according to his promiſe; but he was no ſooner there, than he was ſeized with his former apprehenſions. Whether there was any foundation for his ſuſpicion, or whether it was inſtilled into him, by the traytors about him, he returned to London, with all imaginable expedition. After his departure, the ſtrength of the army being exceedingly impaired, by the retreat of the Mercians, who obſtinately refus'd to fight, unleſs the king commanded them, Edmund was forced to keep at a diſtance from the Danes; and Canute, upon this, ſubdued ſeveral counties in Weſſex, without any oppoſition, and was ſoon in a condition to make a conqueſt of the whole kingdom.

Edmund going into the north joins Uthred.

Edmund, perceiving that he could not put a ſtop to the progreſs of the enemy, joined Uthred earl of Northumberland, who had raiſed ſome troops in the north; and they riſled thoſe parts of the country that ſided with the Danes, whilſt Canute and the duke of Mercia ranſacked the ſouthern counties, that ſtill adhered to Ethelred. Canute, however, ſoon interpoſed, in behalf of his friends in the north; for, marching thither with all expedition, he forced Edmund and Uthred to retreat into Lancaſhire, where they were far from being very ſecure. Uthred, finding, from his own experience, that he was not a match for the Daniſh king, ſubmitted to him, who continued him in his government, tho' but for a little ſpace of time; for, as he was ſenſible, that the earl came over to his party, merely by compulſion, and, therefore, had reaſon to ſuſpect, that he would not long continue faithful, he ordered him to be put to death, and placed Erick, a Daniſh lord in his room.

Canute purſues him.

Uthred ſubmits to Canute, and is put to death, by his order.

Edmund, at this juncture, retired to his father at London; and he vehemently preſs'd him to exert himſelf, on this occaſion, but to no purpoſe. Ethelred, who had, hitherto feigned himſelf ſick, fell dangerouſly ill, in good earneſt, dying ſoon after in the 50th year of his age and the 37th of his reign.

1016. Ethelred's death.

He had, by his firſt wife Elgiva, Edmund, who was his ſucceſſor, Atheliſtan, who died in his infancy, and Edwy, beſides three daughters. Edgiva the eldeſt was married to an Engliſh earl, who was ſlain in battle. Edgith, his ſecond, was the wife of the traytor Edrick, duke of Mercia. Edgina, the youngeſt, was eſpouſed to Uthred earl of Northumberland. By Emma of Normandy, his ſecond wife, he had Alfred and Edward, and a daughter called Goda, who was firſt married to Walter earl of Mantes, and afterwards to Euſtachius earl of Bulloign.

His iſſue.

Ethelred was ſirnamed the Unready, either becauſe he was often ſurprized by the Danes, or becauſe he was never in readineſs to engage them. When he received the crown, the kingdom was in flouriſhing circumſtances, but he left it, at his death, in an extremely poor and deſolate condition.

16. EDMUND II. ſirnamed Ironſide.

Edmund is proclaimed by the Engliſh, tho' the Danes declare for Canute.

UPON Ethelred's deceaſe, the city of London, and all the lords there preſent, proclaimed Edmund his ſon king of England, who had already ſignally demonſtrated his courage and conduct; but the Danes, with all the counties in their poſſeſſion, declared for Canute. However, as the Engliſh obeyed him, with reluctance, great numbers of them came over to Edmund, whom they regarded, as their lawful prince; tho' they had ſworn allegiance to his rival. On this account, the two kings were more on a level; which occaſioned many engagements, with various ſucceſs, that only prolonged the war, but did not decide the quarrel. London being a mighty ſupport to Edmund, Canute imagined, if he could diſpoſſeſs him of it, he ſhould ſoon put an end to the war. With this view, whilſt Edmund was employed in another place, he advanced towards London, and vigorouſly beſieged it; but the brave defence of the Engliſh, giving Edmund an opportunity of reinforcing them with recruits, from the other ſide of the Thames, Canute was obliged to raiſe the ſiege; and being thus diſappointed, he made uſe of ſeveral ſtratagems to ſurprize the enemy, or draw Edmund off from London. This laſt project ſucceeding, he laid ſiege to the city, a ſecond time; but was as briskly oppoſed as before, the citizens ſo reſolutely defending themſelves, that Edmund had time to come to their aſſiſtance.

London is twice beſieged, but in vain.

Canute, incenſed to find his meaſures diſconcerted, ſuddenly deſiſted from his enterprize, in order to give Edmund battle, who was equally deſirous of an engagement, to decide the quarrel; and, inſtead, of retreating, he marched towards him. In this battle, which was very bloody and deſperate, they both gave remarkable proofs of their valour, neither of them being able to gain the victory. After a long and obſtinate fight, the two armies were obliged to part, with equal loſs; tho' the

A battle in which neither party proved victorious.

Engliſh

Engliſh army was in danger of being defeated, by the treachery of Edrick, who was in the intereſt of the Danes. This lord, obſerving that the Engliſh troops, contrary to his expectation, fought ſo courageouſly, as to render the victory dubious, beheaded one Oſmer a ſoldier, whoſe complexion very much reſembled that of Edmund; and, fixing his head on the top of his lance, he advanced to the ranks in the front, expoſing it to the view of the Engliſh, and crying out aloud, "Fly, fly, you "ſcoundrels, behold the head of your king, "in whom you confide." The Engliſh were thunder-ſtruck at this ſpectacle, and would have been defeated, had not the king revived their drooping ſpirits, by ſhewing himſelf, without an helmet, to his troops, that were, thus, aſtoniſh'd. The battle, having laſted till night, without any apparent advantage, on either ſide, Edmund made preparations to renew the fight in the morning; but Canute, having other deſigns in view, marched off in the night-time *. He retired to his fleet; and, having embarqued his men, row'd along the coaſt, for a while, to amuſe the enemy, who were at a loſs about his intentions; but, when he thought he had put Edmund upon a wrong ſcent, landing his forces, he beſieged London again, tho', meeting with no better ſucceſs than formerly, he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

Edrick's artifice to diſpirit the Engliſh.

The particulars of this war would afford ſufficient entertainment to the curious, were it poſſible to give a diſtinct relation of them; but this part of the hiſtory of England is entirely confuſed. All that we can learn from the hiſtorians, with any certainty, is, that the two contending princes fought five pitched battles, within the compaſs of a year; and that one of them would have infalliibly proved fatal to Canute, were it not for the deſtructive advice of Edrick, who, continually ſhifting ſides, was then in the Engliſh army. Edmund was ſo generous, as to grant him a pardon, and ſo credulous as to give credit to the oath he had taken, as to his fidelity, for the future; tho', being a creature of the king of Denmark, he embraced every opportunity of promoting his intereſt. He, finding that the Danes were cloſely preſs'd by the Engliſh, adviſ'd Edmund not to purſue them, leſt their deſpair ſhould make them rally again, and the victory, by ſome unexpected accident, ſhould be ſnatched from him. This artifice, by which he had formerly impoſed upon Ethelred, had the ſame effect upon Edmund; and it is not eaſy to determine, whether Edmund's imprudence, in giving into the councils of a perſon, with whoſe perfidiouſneſs he ought to be ſo well acquainted, or the traytor's boldneſs and confidence, be the moſt ſurprizing. Edrick, tir'd at length, with his own diſſimulation, threw off his mask, in the laſt battle at Aſſundun †; for, whilſt both armies were engaged, he deſerted his poſt, joining the Danes, who gave him a friendly reception. This inſtance of treachery occaſion'd ſuch a conſternation among the Engliſh, that throwing down their arms, they made the beſt of their way, to ſave their lives. Edmund's loſs, at this time, was irretrievable, as the flower of the Engliſh nobility were cut off in the battle; and the earls Alfrick, Goodwin, Ulfketel, and Ethelward, who were all diſtinguiſh'd, for their valour and loyalty, fell that day, with their ſwords in their hands, in the ſervice of their king and country.

Edrick's fatal advice to the king.

The battle of Aſſandun.

Upon this memorable victory, Canute looked upon himſelf, as irreſiſtable; but the Engliſh exerted themſelves in this extremity of danger. Edmund was aſſured of the hearts of his ſubjects, eſpecially the Londoners; and, therefore, he was ſo far from being dejected at this unfortunate turn of affairs, that he rallied his ſcatter'd troops; and, having muſtered together a more numerous army than the former, he advanced in purſuit of the enemy, who were on their march towards Glouceſter. Canute, on the other hand, unwilling to give him leiſure to augment his forces, went to meet him, deſigning to engage him. Both kings ſtood in view of each other, for ſome time, neither of them daring to give the ſignal of battle, the dread of the event keeping them equally in ſuſpence. Edmund foreſaw he ſhould be utterly ruin'd, if he loſt the day; and Canute was ſenſible, that a general revolt of the Engliſh would be the conſequence of his being defeated. Thus, in all probability, the fate of a great kingdom depended on the fortune of this important day. At laſt, Edmund, who was ſtrong and robuſt of body, being, on that account, ſirnamed Ironſide, acquainted Canute, that, to prevent the effuſion of ſo much blood, as was likely to be ſpilt, in their quarrel, he judg'd it moſt expedient for them, to decide it, by ſingle combat. Canute return'd the following anſwer to this challenge: That tho' he was not inferior to his antagoniſt, in courage, yet, by reaſon of the weakneſs of his conſtitution and the ſmallneſs of his ſtature, he would decline ſuch an unequal combat; but that, to prevent any farther effuſion of blood, he was willing to refer the deciſion of the affair to the principal officers of both armies. This propoſal was joyfully received by Edmund's nobles, who were paſſionately deſirous of finding out ſome expedient for putting an end to ſuch a deſtructive war. Edmund, on the other hand, would rather have decided the matter, by arms; but he durſt not oppoſe the nobility, leſt it ſhould provoke them to abandon him. Plenipotentiaries were, therefore, nominated on both ſides, who were to meet at Alney, a little iſland in the Severn, oppoſite to Glouceſter, to conſult about the regulation of the pretenſions of the contending princes. After a ſhort conference, the peace was concluded on, by the partition of the kingdom. Weſſex, viz. all the country ſouth of the Thames, with the city of London, and part of the antient kingdom of Eſſex, was allotted to Edmund; and Canute had for his ſhare the kingdom of Mercia, including Northumber-

Remarks on the pretended duel between Edmund and Canute.

The challenge which Edmund ſent to Canute, has led ſome hiſtorians to aſſert, that the two kings actually fought a duel in the iſle of Alney; and, to render it the more credible, they are very particular in their accounts of this mighty combat. They inform us, that having laſted a conſiderable time, without any advantage on either ſide, Canute perceiving that his ſtrength failed him, liſting up the vizor of his helmet, propos'd the diviſion of the kingdom, which Edmund conſented to on the ſpot. It is farther added, that at the ſame inſtant, they ran to embrace one another, to the aſtoniſhment of the two armies, who were ſpectators; but as the beſt authors are ſilent on this head, it is not to be imagined, they would have omitted to embelliſh their hiſtories, with the relation of it, were it genuine *.

1017. Edmund's death.

Edmund did not long enjoy the peace, which coſt him ſo much pains; for Edrick, his brother-in-law, fearing the union of the two kings might prove fatal to him, bribed two of the king's chamberlains to aſſaſſinate him, tho' ſome ſay he employ'd his own ſon in this execrable treaſon. Thus died that valiant prince, who deſerved a better fate †, before he had ſat on the throne a whole year; but, in ſo ſhort a reign, he had often given demonſtrations of an undaunted bravery, conſummate prudence, and generoſity.

He left behind him Edmund and Edward, whom he had by his wife Algitha; and he had alſo a natural ſon named Edwy, who was put to death by Canute, ſome time after.

Canute's promiſe to Edrick.

The duke of Mercia, who was tranſported with joy, for having done Canute ſuch a notable piece of ſervice, went with all expedition to carry him the firſt news of it; but Canute deteſted this barbarous fact. However, he diſguis'd his ſentiments of the matter, becauſe he thought he might have farther occaſion for the traytor, promiſing to advance him above all the peers of the realm; and, accordingly, he punctually performed his promiſe, tho' in a manner very contrary to the villain's expectations.

1017. CANUTE.

UPON Edmund's deceaſe, Canute was reſolved to become maſter of Weſſex, the lawful heirs being in no condition to diſpute his pretenſions; but it was not ſo much by force of arms, as by extorting the conſent of his nobles, that he gain'd his point. Notwithſtanding the averſion of the Engliſh to the government of the Danes, he was in hopes that the dread of involving the kingdom in new calamities would conſtrain them to comply with his demands. With this view, he laid his claim before an aſſembly-general, which he called together in Weſſex, believing it to be time enough to make uſe of violent methods, upon his meeting with great oppoſition. Edmund, having left behind him two ſons and two brothers, it did not appear, that Canute had any right to the crown; but he inſiſted upon it, that, purſuant to the treaty of the iſle of Alney, the ſurvivor of the two kings ſhould ſucceed the other, giving them alſo to underſtand, by evident intimations, that he would not agree to their deciſion of it, if it was not made in his favour. Edmund's two ſons were in their minority, and his brothers in Normandy, where they did not entertain the leaſt thoughts of ſucceeding to the crown of Weſſex; whilſt Canute, on the contrary, was a very powerful prince, and denounced ſevere threatenings. He was not only poſſeſs'd of half the kingdom, but had a great number of friends among the Weſt-Saxons themſelves, beſides thoſe who were of the opinion, that any expedient was to be preferred to a war; ſo that it was ſcarce poſſible for the abettors of the Engliſh princes to ſurmount theſe mighty obſtacles. Had they been reſolutely determin'd to continue the ſucceſſion in Edmund's family, in all likelihood, they would have renewed a deſtructive war; and, therefore, in this perplexity, they agreed, that Canute ſhould be declared the protector of Edmund's children, till the eldeſt of them ſhould be of age to ſway the ſceptre himſelf. By this means, tho' they did not place theſe princes on the throne, they, at leaſt, preſerved their right entire; but Canute was not contented with a borrowed power. He was deſirous of being Edmund's ſucceſſor, in his own right, by virtue of the treaty of Alney; which, tho' it was not univerſally acknowledg'd, none durſt openly diſpute or call in queſtion. Tho' the treaty did not expreſly declare what Canute aſſerted, yet he maintained, that it could not be interpreted in any other ſenſe, without violence; and, to prove that this was the intention of the parties concerned in the treaty, he appealed to thoſe who were preſent at the concluſion of the peace, whether there was any ſtipulation, in favour of Edmund's ſons? Upon their anſwer, that there was not any mention made of the princes, he inferr'd that, therefore, they had no right to ſucceed their father. This reaſoning, tho' very inconcluſive, being ſeconded by the votes of his party, and by the fears of the Engliſh, in general, was ſufficient to bring over the aſſembly to his meaſures. They either thought, or ſeem'd to think, that his arguments were ſolid and ſubſtantial; and, without a ſtrict ſcrutiny into affairs, they acknowledged and proclaimed him king of England, all the lords, both Engliſh and Daniſh, ſwearing allegiance to him. Upon this, he was crowned, and divided the kingdom into four parts, Mercia, Northumberland, East-Anglia, and Weſſex. The government of the firſt he gave to Edrick Streon, the ſecond to Eric, and the third to Turkil, reſerving Weſſex for himſelf.

Being crown'd, he divides England into four parts. Malm. l. 2. c. 21. Hunt.

His project to get rid of his enemies, and gain the affection of his ſubjects.

Canute had ſagacity enough to ſound the motive, that induced the Engliſh to own him for their ſovereign; for, tho' all about him were ſollicitous to conceal their ſentiments, he was ſenſible, an animoſity, that had ſubſiſted, for near 200 years, fomented by continual wars, could not be extinguiſhed in a moment. He, therefore, reſolved to uſe all poſſible caution, to prevent the defection of the Engliſh; and, to this purpoſe, the gaining the affections of his new ſubjects and the getting rid of thoſe, that gave him any diſturbance, were equally neceſſary. Tho' theſe projects ſeem'd altogether incompatible, not deſpairing of ſucceſs, he ſpent the firſt part of his reign, in effecting them. As he well knew, the beſt means of rendering him popular was to have juſtice adminiſter'd, with the utmoſt impartiality, he declared, that, for the future, he would make no diſtinction between the Engliſh and Danes. After this, he publiſhed an edict, ordering that every county ſhould be governed by the ſame laws, as in the time of the Saxon kings, tho' the northern counties were excepted, becauſe they were, for the moſt part, inhabited by Danes, who had introduced particular laws of their own, that did not ſtand in need of any alteration. The ſame edict denounced the ſevereſt puniſhments, againſt the malefactors of every nation, it being the king's deſign to convince the Engliſh, that they had no occaſion to fear any partiality or reſpect of perſons; and theſe prudent regulations produced the deſired effect. The people were indefatigable in the moſt publick demonſtrations of joy and ſatisfaction, as they were under the government of a wiſe and juſt prince, who ſeemed to have no other end in view, but the happineſs of his ſubjects.

Canute attempts to get rid of the Engliſh princes.

Canute, finding he had gained the hearts of the Engliſh, thought he might, now, ſafely venture on the ſecond branch of his ſcheme, the getting rid of thoſe that gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs, eſpecially the Saxon princes. Alfred and Edward, brothers to the late king, were retir'd into Normandy, with their mother. Emma, plainly foreſeeing the Weſt-Saxons would not be in a condition to do juſtice to the royal family. As for Edmund's two ſons, who continued in England, notwithſtanding their minority, they made the king ſomewhat uneaſy, becauſe of their intereſt in the people's affections; and he would not have ſcrupled to take away their lives, were it not for the odium, he apprehended, it would bring upon him from his Engliſh ſubjects. However, he committed them to the care of one of his domeſticks, to carry them into Denmark, pretending that he ſent them abroad on their travels, for their improvement; but his real intent was, that he might have an opportunity of diſpatching them, at once, as ſoon as their abſence ſhould abate the love of the people. The perſon entruſted with theſe princes, being conſcious of the king's deſign, was touch'd with ſo much compaſſion for their innocence, that, inſtead of conducting them to Denmark, he brought them to the king of Sweden, diſcovering, at the ſame time, his maſter's intentions. The king of Sweden aforded theſe princes a very gracious reception; but, to prevent a rupture with Canute, he ſent them to Solomon, king of Hungary, his relation, who took care of their education. In proceſs of time, Solomon gave one of his daughters in marriage to Edmund; and Edward was eſpouſed to Agatha his ſiſter-in-law, the daughter of the emperor Henry II. Edmund departed this life, ſoon after his marriage; but Edward had five children, two of which died in Hungary, Edgar Atheling, Margaret, and Chriſtian being thoſe that ſurvived.

He ſends Edmund's two ſons into Denmark, but they are carried to Sweden; and, from thence to Hungary, where Edmund dies.

Two ſons of Ethelred II. who had both of them the name of Edwy, were ſtill in England; one of them was born in wedlock, but the other a baſtard, who was called, tho' on what account is not known, the king of the clowns. Canute was as jealous of theſe as the other princes, every thing concurring to heighten the ſuſpicions of a prince, who, not having a lawful title, does not think himſelf to be firmly ſeated on the throne; and, therefore, he baniſh'd them from his dominions. However, ſome time after, he recalled the firſt, under the pretence of a reconciliation, but, in reality, to diſpatch him; and the other *, having been expoſed to great hardſhips, during his exile, return'd privately into England, where he concealed himſelf in a place of retirement, being ſecretly ſupplied, by his friends, with neceſſaries for his ſubſiſtence †.

He baniſhes the two Edwy's.

He recalls one of them, and puts him to death.

Canute would have been as well pleas'd to be rid of Alfred and Edward, Edmund's brothers, who had retreated into Normandy with their mother; but he was at a loſs, how to get them from duke Richard II. their uncle into his own hands, being likewiſe apprehenſive, that this prince, whoſe forces were conſiderable, would eſpouſe their cauſe. Canute, therefore, to gain him over to his intereſt, demanded his ſiſter Emma in marriage, the widow of Ethelred II. making an offer to him, at the ſame time, of Eſtrith, one of his own ſiſters. Theſe propoſals being accepted, the nuptial ſolemnities were celebrated, in a magnificent manner. If Emma was pleas'd in being, once more, queen of England, the caſe was otherwiſe, with reſpect to Alfred and Edward her ſons, who publickly ſhewed their diſlike of the matter. Edward, in particular, could never forgive her, for ſcandalouſly eſpouſing Canute, her firſt husband's mortal enemy; and both of them were, to the laſt degree, incenſed againſt her, for conſenting that the ſucceſſion to the crown ſhould, purſuant to the articles of marriage, be ſettled on the heirs of his body, which excluded Ethelred's family from all hopes of ever aſcending the throne.

Canute diſpatches ſome Engliſh lords, whom he ſuſpected.

Canute, having, thus, got rid of the Saxon princes, thought it convenient to ſecure himſelf from ſome lords, whoſe fidelity he ſuſpected, or whoſe power gave him uneaſineſs. The dukes of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia, with the earl of Northumberland, were the principal, who had done him ſignal ſervices; but he was, for this very reaſon, the more jealous of them. He knew, that Edrick Streon was a villain, ſince he had ſo often been perfidious to the two preceding kings, to whom he was under the greateſt obligations; and, therefore, he was reſolved to begin with him. He ſoon found an opportunity to put his deſign in execution, by an act of juſtice highly acceptable to the Engliſh nation; for this lord, having openly reproach'd him, in an inſolent manner, for overlooking his paſt ſervices, eſpecially, the diſpatching of Edmund, his formidable rival, he made uſe of it, as a fit occaſion, for his purpoſe.

Edrick Streon is beheaded. Brompt.

Edrick had but juſt utter'd thoſe expreſſions, when the king anſwer'd in a paſſion, that, as he had the impudence publickly to avow ſo black a treaſon, he ſhould be treated according to his deſerts; and, without giving him time to reply, he order'd him to be beheaded on the ſpot, and that his body ſhould be thrown into the Thames. It is ſaid, Edrick's head was, by the king's order, fix'd on the higheſt part of the tower of London, to accompliſh the promiſe he had made to the traytor, "That he would exalt him above all the "peers of the realm." Eric, earl of Northumberland, under ſome pretence, was baniſhed the kingdom ſoon after; and Turkil, duke of Eaſt-Anglia, terrified by theſe examples, and, perhaps, by the king's emiſſaries, voluntarily went into exile, to prevent a worſe fate. Several other inferior lords fell a ſacrifice to the king's jealouſy or ſuſpicions, whoſe poſts were fill'd with perſons, in whom he could ſafely confide; and, from this time, the Engliſh enjoy'd a ſtate of tranquillity, which was ſo much the more agreeable, as they had wanted it for many years, and it was entirely unexpected.

1018. However, they were obliged to pay a tax of 80,000 l. * to defray the arrears due to the Daniſh army, a conſiderable part of which were ſent back to Denmark.

1019. Canute's voyage to Denmark, to wage war againſt the Vandals.

Canute, the affairs of the kingdom being peaceably ſettled, determined upon a voyage to Denmark, where his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary, on account of the war between the Danes and Vandals. He took along with him ſuch Engliſh lords, as he was jealous of, leſt his abſence ſhould give them an opportunity of exciting commotions in England. For the ſame reaſon, he carried with him the flower of the Engliſh army, under the command of earl Goodwin, the ſon of Ulnoth, mentioned in the reign of Ethelred II. Goodwin, who was a man of approved courage and conduct, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in this war, by a very bold, tho' ſucceſsful, exploit. The two armies of the Danes and Vandals being within view of each other, Canute reſolved to engage the enemy, by break of day the next morning; but, whilſt he waited in expectation of the battle, Goodwin, privately withdrawing from the camp, with a body of troops, fell upon the Vandals, in the night, and, putting them in diſorder, by this ſudden attack, and making a great ſlaughter, routed their whole army. As ſoon as day appear'd, Canute prepared for an engagement; but, the Engliſh not being at their ſtation, he concluded they had revolted to the enemy. In the interim, the Engliſh general arrived, who came on purpoſe to bring him the news of his victory; and, tho' this daring action was of dangerous conſequence, the king was very willing on this occaſion, to diſpenſe with the diſcipline of war, which required, that Goodwin ſhould be puniſhed, for preſuming to fight without orders. He received him, with the greateſt reſpect, and, as a reward for his ſignal valour and reſolution, created him earl of Kent; but I ſhall, hereafter, have occaſion frequently to take notice of this earl, who became, at length, the greateſt peer in the kingdom.

Earl Goodwin's bold and reſolute action.

Three ſorts of laws in England.

This war being happily compleated, Canute returned into England; and, upon his arrival, he convened the great council, in order to enforce the Daniſh laws, which had, for ſome time, been obſerved in part of the kingdom, eſpecially in Northumberland. There were, then, in England the Weſt-Saxon, Mercian, and Daniſh laws †; but the laſt of theſe had not the ſanction of publick authority, till Canute, on this occaſion, put them on a level with the antient laws of England.

1025. Canute's expedition againſt the Swedes.

Canute, from his return into England, lived in a profound and uninterrupted tranquillity, making it his whole ſtudy and buſineſs, to promote juſtice, peace; and happineſs among his ſubjects; but, in proceſs of time, he was obliged to take a ſecond voyage into Denmark, then invaded by the Swedes, in which he was very unfortunate, having had the mortification to meet with more rugged treatment, than formerly, and the Engliſh troops, he carried with him, ſuffered exceedingly.

1027. He ſubdues Norway.

Two years after, forgetting his ill ſucceſs againſt the Swedes, he entered into another war, which amply repaired all his former loſſes. He reſolved upon the revival of ſome old pretenſions to Norway, which had not, hitherto, been fully ſtated and examined. Olaus, now on the throne of Norway, was an eaſy and weak prince; and Canute, therefore, thought he ſhould never have a fairer opportunity, than the preſent, for aſſerting his claim. He began his deſign, with privately forming a powerful faction, among the Norwegian lords; and, matters being brought to maturity, embarquing for Denmark, with a conſiderable number of Engliſh troops, he, on a ſudden, landed them in Norway. Olaus, who had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of his ſecret practices, was ſurprized at this unexpected attack, and ſo much the more, when he found, that the greateſt part of his ſubjects had eſpouſed the cauſe of the enemy; and, in this extremity, he abandoned the kingdom, to ſave himſelf by flight. Upon his departure, Canute was crowned king of Norway, giving himſelf no diſturbance, about the right, whilſt he had the power in his hands. Two years after, the depoſed prince, attempting to recover the crown, was ſlain by his own ſubjects; and Canute continued in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the kingdom. Olaus, however, was ſainted, after his deceaſe, and dignified with the glorious title of martyr.

Canute applies himſelf to devotion.

The conqueſt of Norway fully ſatiated Canute's ambition. Laying aſide all thoughts of martial affairs, for the future, he entirely applied himſelf to acts of devotion, i. e. he made it his principal employment to enrich the churches and monaſteries; as if the uſurpation of two kingdoms, and all the conſequent evils, were to be compounded for, by ſo ſlight a penance. Among other things, he gave particular proofs of his veneration for the memory of St. Edmund, formerly king of Eaſt-Anglia, who was ſlain by the Danes. Perhaps, he gave into the belief of the report, that his father Sweyn was killed by that ſaint, or, rather, he propoſed to ſtifle, by this means, the clamour that was raiſed about it. However, it is certain, he built a magnificent church over the grave of this prince, and exceedingly enlarged the town, where his body lay interred. The monaſtery, in the ſame place, named Breadicſworth, was endowed by Edward the elder; but Canute having enlarged it, and augmented its revenues, it became one of the moſt ſtately, as well as wealthy, religious houſes in the kingdom *.

1031. He goes to Rome.

Having, as he imagin'd, given publick proofs of his devotion, he reſolv'd upon a journey to Rome, which he perform'd in 1031. Whilſt he remained there, he made many valuable preſents to the churches, confirming all the donations his predeceſſors had granted to the church of Rome and the Engliſh college; and he likewiſe obtained new privileges for the Engliſh churches, with ſome advantages for thoſe who came to viſit the tombs of the apoſtles, the moſt material of which was an exemption from paying any toll, in their paſſage through Italy. The emperor Conradus I. who was then at Rome, and with whom he contracted an intimate friendſhip, allowed him the ſame privilege, as did alſo the king of France in his dominions. On theſe accounts, the Engliſh pilgrims and other travellers were eas'd of a great expence, and freed from a thouſand inſults and oppreſſions, they were, before, expos'd to, in Italy, Germany, and France, This whole affair is repreſented, at large, in a letter this monarch wrote, from Rome, to the aſſembly-general of the Engliſh nation; in which are contained great profeſſions of his piety and ſteady reſolution to govern the kingdom, after the ſtricteſt rules of juſtice, deſiring alſo his nobles to aſſiſt him in this laudable deſign.

His letter to the Engliſh. Malmſ.

No ſooner did he return to England, than he ſet about the dedication of the church of St. Edmund, which he had founded, before he went to Rome; and, having, at length, ſpent ſome years in continual acts of devotion *, he died in 1036, in the 19th year of his reign †.

His return to England.

Hiſtorians have not ſcrupled to attribute to this prince the ſirname of great, a title affected by conquerors, as if true grandeur conſiſted in invading the rights and properties of others; but, not to confine the ſenſe of that word, within ſuch narrow limits, Canute may juſtly be ſaid to merit this glorious epithet, if we conſider only the latter part of his reign. The end of his life was ſo very different from the beginning, that, one would have thought, he was not the ſame perſon with him, who, to ſubdue kingdoms, to which he had no equitable claim, had occaſion'd the effuſion of ſo much blood, and even trampled upon religion and juſtice. If we can credit what the writers of his hiſtory have recorded concerning him, from the time of his being eſtabliſhed on the throne of England, he gave daily marks of piety, juſtice, and moderation, which gained him the love of his ſubjects, as well as an univerſal eſteem among foreigners. The following ſtory demonſtrates, at once, his good ſenſe, and the extravagant flatteries of thoſe that were about him. As he was, on a certain day, walking by the ſea-ſide *, his courtiers extolled him to the skies, preſuming even to compare him with the Almighty. Canute, diſpleaſed with theſe encomiums, and willing alſo to convince them of their folly and impiety, ordered a chair to be brought him; and, ſeating himſelf in a place, where the tide was about to flow, he addreſſed the ocean, as follows: "O ſea, "thou art ſubject to my dominion, and the "land I ſit on belongs to me; I charge thee "not to make any farther advances, nor even "to wet the feet of thy ſovereign". Upon this, he ſat ſtill for a while, as if he believed the ſea would obey his commands; but, the tide rolling on, in its uſual courſe, he took occaſion, from thence, to remind his flatterers, that the titles of lord and maſter were peculiar to God, who commands both the land and the ſea. It is reported, that, from this time, he would never wear his crown, ordering it to be placed on the head of a crucifix at Wincheſter.

way for his ſhare, tho' ſome relate, he was no more than a ſhoemaker's ſon, which Egiva, being barren, impos'd upon him, as his own. To Harold his ſecond ſon, by the ſame woman, tho' it is ſaid, he was only the ſon of a prieſt, which ſhe feigned to be her own, by the king, he gave the crown of England. To Canute or Hardicanute, whom he had by Emma of Normandy, he left the kingdom of Denmark; and Gunilda, his daughter by the ſame princeſs, was married to the emperor Henry IV.

As I ſhall have occaſion to intermix the affairs of Normandy with thoſe of England, it will be convenient to give ſome previous account of what was tranſacted among the Normans.

The affairs of Normandy.

Richard II. duke of Normandy, dying in 1026, Richard III. his ſon, who ſucceeded him, reigned but one year, leaving the dukedom, at his death, to Robert his brother; who was no ſooner inveſted in it, than he expreſs'd an inclination to eſpouſe the cauſe of Alfred and Edward, his couſins, being the ſons of his aunt Emma and Ethelred II. who were both at his court. As he pitied their unfortunate condition, upon the firſt news of the death of Edmund's ſon, he diſpatched ambaſſadors to Canute, to intreat him to ſurrender, to the two princes, ſome part of the kingdom of their anceſtors. This ambaſſy arrived in England, when Canute was ſo firmly ſettled on the throne, that he judged it unneceſſary to regard the ſollicitations of the duke of Normandy. Robert was ſo highly incenſed at his refuſal, that he reſolved to force him to do juſtice to thoſe injured princes; and, accordingly, he equipped an able fleet, on board of which he embarqued, with a powerful army, being fully determined to invade England, not doubting but the Engliſh would readily join him. The fleet meeting with a violent ſtorm, the greateſt part of it was deſtroy'd, a loſs not eaſily to be repaired; yet Canute finding, from theſe preparations, that the duke of Normandy deſigned to eſpouſe the intereſt of his couſins, in good earneſt, attempted to divert him, by making an offer of part of the kingdom of Weſſex. Robert, however, would not have been amuſed with this propoſal, had not his misfortune, at ſea, obliged him to ſuſpend the execution of his intentions, as it induced Canute alſo to recede from his word. In proceſs of time, Robert undertook a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, deferring his intended invaſion of England, till his return; but he died on his way home, leaving behind him only a natural ſon, named William, on whom he had entailed the ſucceſſion. This is that William, ſirnamed the Conqueror, who makes ſo great a figure, hereafter, in the hiſtory of England.

Robert, duke of Normandy, takes Edmund's two brothers under his protection.

His fleet is deſtroy'd by a ſtorm.

18. HAROLD I. ſirnamed Harefoot

Harold I. 1039.

WHEN Canute eſpouſed Emma of Normandy, according to the articles of marriage, his children by that princeſs were entitled to the ſucceſſion; but this prince, contrary to that agreement, left England to his ſon Harold, born in Denmark, tho' he gave Denmark to Hardicanute, whom he had by Emma of Normandy *. In all probability, he thought the Engliſh had not been long enough inured to the Daniſh yoke, to ſubmit to the government of his youngeſt ſon, a prince of no genius, who was not above 15 or 16 years of age. However, that article in his will was warmly oppoſed by the Engliſh, as they look'd upon Hardicanute, a native of England, whom he had by a lawful wife, the widow of one of their kings, to be the only rightful heir to the crown, regarding Harold as a foreigner and a baſtard; but the Danes, on the other hand, were firmly reſolved to adhere to Canute's laſt will and teſtament. This diſſenſion might have proved fatal, if Harold had not ſeized on the treaſure, his father Canute had laid up at Wincheſter; which enabled him to ſecure a majority of voices, in a general aſſembly held in Mercia †, and to get himſelf proclaimed king of England. The Danes were for him, to a man, and, of courſe, the Engliſh Mercians, i. e. they who inhabited the north-ſide of the Thames, who, conſidering the Danes as their maſters durſt not directly oppoſe their proceedings.

† At Oxford. An. Sax. 1036.

In the interim, the Weſt-Saxons, upon their return home, conven'd an aſſembly of the ſtates of Weſſex; and, by the management of earl Goodwin, Hardicanute was elected and proclaimed king of Weſſex, tho' the Mercians were left at liberty to acknowledge Harold for their ſovereign. To ſet this matter in a clear light, it muſt be remember'd, that, tho' the Danes, or thoſe of Daniſh extraction, were diſperſed all over England, their chief ſettlements were in Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland; and, for this reaſon, in all the country, north of the Thames, included then under the name of Mercia, the Danes were more numerous than the Engliſh. On the contrary, in Weſſex, i. e. ſouth of the Thames, there were more Engliſh than Danes, having admitted among them thoſe of their countrymen, who abandon'd the north, to avoid the dominion of the Danes; and, by this means, Weſſex became very powerful, being in a condition to bring into the field as great an army, as all the reſt of England. Thus, the kingdom of Judah, in antient time, grew ſtrong, at the expence of Iſrael. The forces of the Weſt-Saxons and Mercians, being at this time pretty much upon a level, it is no wonder they were jealous of one another, each of them uſing their efforts to have a king of their own, that, they imagin'd, would ſhew them the greateſt favour. This diviſion was like to have occaſioned a war between the two nations; but Harold is proclaim'd in Mercia, and Hardicanute in Weſſex.

* She is called Elgiva by the Saxon Annals, &c.

Harold,

Harold, who wanted his father's qualities, believed he had not a force ſufficient to undertake the conqueſt of Weſſex.

Earl Goodwin is regent of Weſſex.

Hardicanute, now in Denmark, was not very expeditious, in coming to take poſſeſſion of the crown of Weſſex; either becauſe he was detained by other affairs, or on the account of his natural ſloth and indolence. In his abſence, earl Goodwin held the reins of government, in an abſolute manner, independent of Emma, the queen-mother, who had no intereſt in the affections of the Weſt-Saxons.

He delivers up the kingdom to Harold.

In the mean time, Harold was ſollicitous to obtain a kingdom, by artifice, which he found he could not ſubdue, by force of arms; and, as he was deprived of it, merely by the management of earl Goodwin, he judg'd it moſt adviſable for him, to bring over the earl to his ſide. Whilſt his brother remained in Denmark, he attempted to gain Goodwin's friendſhip, by ſuch ways and means, as we may eaſily gueſs at *, tho' they are not particularly related by the hiſtorians. Goodwin, whoſe conſcience was not too nice or ſqueamiſh, Harold's propoſals being advantageous, promiſed to fix him on the throne of Weſſex; and he managed this affair, with ſo much dexterity, that, on a ſudden, under the pretence, that Hardicanute neglected to come over into England, he procured him to be acknowledged king of Weſſex. This revolution, however, was not brought about, with the unanimous conſent of the Weſt-Saxons, but by the contrivance of Goodwin and ſome other lords, who were ſo hearty in the matter, that it was effected, before it was in the power of any to prevent it. Thus, a new king was placed on the throne of Weſſex, without allowing the Weſt-Saxons time to deliberate about it; and the like intrigues have often been attended with the ſame ſucceſs.

* It is ſaid, he promiſed the earl his daughter in marriage.

Emma forms a project of placing one of her ſons, by Ethelred, on the throne.

Emma, the mother of Hardicanute, was aſtoniſh'd at this ſudden turn of affairs, which not only deprived her ſon of the crown of Weſſex, but herſelf alſo of the proſpect of having any ſhare in the government; and, therefore, ſhe enter'd upon a project, to advance one of her ſons, by Ethelred, to the throne, hoping that the Engliſh would gladly exert themſelves, in favour of a prince ſprung from the race of their antient kings. Perhaps, the deſire of degrading Goodwin, from his exalted ſtation, was as powerful a motive to this undertaking, as the view of her ſon's advancement; but, to accompliſh her ends, there was occaſion for great art and diſſimulation, and, eſpecially to feign ſome pretence, without exciting the king's jealouſy, to ſend for the two princes, her ſons, who were in Normandy, that they might procure a party to eſpouſe their cauſe. Accordingly, ſhe diſſembled her concern for the depoſing of Hardicanute, confining herſelf to Wincheſter, where ſhe daily frequented the churches, being, in all appearance, wholly intent about the care of her ſalvation. No ſooner did ſhe imagine, that the king had no ſuſpicion of her real deſign, than ſhe begg'd leave to ſend for the two princes, her ſons, to Wincheſter, whom ſhe had not ſeen, ſince her ſecond marriage. Her requeſt being granted, Alfred and Edward arrived ſoon after in England, under the pretence of making a viſit to their mother; and they were careſs'd by vaſt numbers, who, having Engliſh hearts, on all occaſions, inviolably adhered to the antient royal family.

Alfred and Edward arrive in England.

Goodwin informs the king of Emma's deſign.

Goodwin had ſagacity enough quickly to penetrate into the queen's intentions, it being very difficult to impoſe upon ſo refin'd a politician; and, from the moment he firſt ſuſpected her, he employ'd ſo many ſpies, that he diſcovered, at length, his ſuſpicions had ſome foundation. Harold being ſtartled at the news, the earl, who was not ſo eaſily alarmed, repreſented to him, that this conſpiracy was, as yet, in the embryo; that it was not ſo material, at this juncture, to avoid the preſent, as to provide againſt future dangers; and that, the moſt effectual way, to ſecure himſelf from the like attempts, was to diſpatch the two Saxon princes, for which he had now ſo fair an opportunity. Harold falling in with his propoſals, Goodwin adviſed him to put on a ſeeming ſecurity, that he might, with the greater eaſe, draw them into the ſnare; and, upon this, Harold appeared to be altogether inſenſible of the queen's deſigns, permitting the two princes to continue, ſome time, at Wincheſter, without expreſſing the leaſt ſigns of uneaſineſs. At laſt, however, he invited them to paſs a few days at his court, before they return'd to Normandy, which furniſhed him with an occaſion for putting his project in execution. Emma was at a loſs how to act, on this emergency. She very well knew the appearance of her ſons at court was neceſſary, to gain a powerful party among the nobility; but, on the contrary, ſhe could not think of delivering them into the hands of a prince, whoſe intereſt it was to deſtroy them. In this perplexity, ſhe apprehended a middle courſe to be the moſt expedient, viz. to ſend Alfred, her eldeſt ſon to the king, and to detain Edward. She was perſuaded, that, if Harold had any evil intentions, he would defer the execution of them, till both the brothers were in his power, it being in vain to diſpatch one, whilſt the other was alive. Goodwin, pleas'd that his advice had been, hitherto, ſucceſsful, contrived the matter ſo, that he was ſent to meet Alfred, in all appearance, to do him honour; but, the truth is, he was not willing to entruſt another with the execution of his deſigns. Alfred's ſmall retinue, conſiſting of Normans, were charm'd with the reſpect Goodwin not only ſhewed to the prince himſelf, but likewiſe cauſed to be paid by others. They were, however, ſurprized, even to conſternation, when Alfred and all his attendants were obliged to enter into Guilford-caſtle, under the pretence of a refreſhment. The prince was, from hence, directly conducted to Ely, where, having had his eyes put out, he was confined in a monaſtery; tho' he ſcarce had time to be ſenſible of his misfortunes, as he died, within a few days, either by reaſon of grief, or by ſome more violent means, Goodwin being afterwards charged with his murder. Edward no

He adviſes him to diſpatch the two princes.

Edward returns to Normandy.

ſooner heard of his brother's fate, than he embarqued for Normandy, to prevent his own. Emma, ſoon after, having received orders to depart the kingdom, retreated to Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who aſſigned her the city of Bruges, for the place of her reſidence. One would wonder, ſhe ſhould not repair to William her nephew, duke of Normandy; but, in all likelihood, thoſe, who had the management of affairs, during the duke's minority, thought it inconvenient to receive her, as it was, indeed, to be feared, this intriguing princeſs might enhance the troubles of the dukedom, in which, William was not, as yet, firmly eſtabliſhed.

1039. Harold's death.

In the mean time, Hardicanute, being rouzed, at length, from his lethargy, enter'd into a reſolution to recover, by arms, the kingdom of Weſſex, which was uſurped by his brother; and, with this view, he went to Bruges, to conſult with the queen his mother. In all probability, he would have found it difficult to accompliſh his deſign, were it not for Harold's death, which happened at this juncture. This prince died at Oxford, without iſſue, in 1039, after a reign of four years, which was not attended with any memorable event, and was buried at Wincheſter *. He had the ſirname of Harefoot, becauſe his feet were, all over hairy, or, according to others, on the account of his being ſwift of foot *. The winter, in which he died, was one of the hardeſt, that had ever been known in England †.

19. CANUTE II. or, HARDICANUTE.

1039. Hardicanute is made king of all England.

UPON Harold's deceaſe, the great men of both nations unanimouſly made an offer of the crown to Canute, who was ſirnamed the Hardy, not from his courage, but the ſtrength of his conſtitution ‡. He was at Bruges, with the queen his mother, conſulting about the recovery of Weſſex, by the means of the auxiliary troops he had reaſon to expect from the earl of Flanders; but, being informed of Harold's death, he immediately ſet out for England, with forty ſhips he had brought with him from Denmark. The Danes, as well as Engliſh, received him with great demonſtrations of joy; and even Goodwin himſelf, who had been ſo active againſt him, was among the firſt to do him homage.

He digs up the corpſe of his brother. Malm. l. 2. c. 12.

Hardicanute began his reign, with an act of barbarity very extraordinary and uncommon; for he was no ſooner crowned, than, impatient to be revenged on his brother, tho' deceaſed, he ordered his corpſe to be dug up and thrown into the Thames; but all his care, to hinder the body from being interred again, proved ineffectual. Some fiſhermen, diſcovering the corpſe, as it floated on the water, delivered it to the Danes, who interred it in a burying-place at London, that belonged to their nation . It is ſaid, that the king, informed of this, commanded it to be thrown, once more, into the river; but, being found a ſecond time, it was privately buried at Weſtminſter.

Hardicanute impoſes an exorbitant tax, which occaſions a ſedition in Worceſter. Camb. in Worceſt.

Hardicanute, ſoon after, impoſed an exorbitant tax on the kingdom, for the payment of the fleet he ſent back to Denmark; and tho' the Engliſh had often paid the like tax, ſtiled Danegeld, they were diſpleas'd, that it ſhould be renewed at a time, when there ſeemed to be no occaſion for it. The inhabitants of Worceſter were ſo incenſed at it, that they killed two of the collectors. The news of this reaching the king, he gave orders immediately to Goodwin duke of Weſſex, Leofric duke of Mercia, and Siward earl of Northumberland, to muſter their forces together, march to Worceſter, and deſtroy it with fire and ſword. Theſe lords executed a part of their orders, tho' with great reluctance. The city was burnt after it had been plundered, for four days together; but the inhabitants were permitted to retire into a ſmall iſland in the Severn, called Bevercy, till the king was appeaſed.

Prince Edward appears at court.

Shortly after this, prince Edward, the ſon of Ethelred II. and brother to the king, by the ſame mother, made his appearance at court, who met with a very civil reception; and, upon his firſt coming, he demanded juſtice againſt Goodwin, whom he charged with the murder of his brother Alfred *†. The king was not unwilling to embrace this opportunity of puniſhing the earl, not ſo much, perhaps, on the account of Alfred's death, as for what he had acted, in favour of the late king. He was ſummoned, therefore, to appear and give an anſwer to the accuſation againſt him; but Goodwin, who was no ſtranger to the king's covetous diſpoſition, had the art to extricate himſelf out of this difficulty, by a magnificent preſent before his trial. This preſent was a galley, with a gilt ſtern, manned with 80 choice ſoldiers, who had, all of them, upon each arm, a golden bracelet, weighing 16 ounces, with helmets and ſwords gilded, a Daniſh battle-ax, adorned with gold and ſilver, hanging on the left ſhoulder, and a lance of the ſame in the right-hand. 1041. Hardicanute's death.

Hardicanute did not long enjoy a crown, of which he was unworthy, dying ſuddenly, at the nuptial-feaſt of a Daniſh lord, at Lambeth. Perhaps, his death was occaſioned by poiſon; but, to ſuch a monſtrous height, did he carry his cruelty and gluttony, that he departed this life, lamented by none, nor was any enquiry made into the manner of his death. It is univerſally acknowledged by the hiſtorians, that he ſpent entire days and nights, in feaſting and carouſing. A certain author, however, extols him exceedingly, for keeping an open table, four times a day, exclaiming againſt the kings his ſucceſſors, who aboliſhed ſo laudable a cuſtom. Hunting.

20. EDWARD III. the Confeſſor.

EDW. III.

HArdicanute dying, without iſſue, Edward the ſon of Ethelred II. and Emma of Normandy was the only prince in England, that had any pretenſions to the crown. It was reaſonable, that the race of the Saxon kings ſhould be reſtored to the throne, of which they had been unjuſtly deprived; but then it was equally juſt to recall from Hungary prince Edward, the ſon of Edmund Ironſide, who had a right to the crown, before his uncle, who was, one degree, farther removed. On the contrary, the uninterrupted ſucceſſion of four Daniſh kings, who reigned for the ſpace of 42 years *, with the conſent of the Engliſh, ſtarted another difficulty, Sweyn, the ſon of Canute the great being ſtill alive. It is certain, that ſome look'd upon him, as a baſtard; but the king his father did not conſider him, as ſuch, in his will; and he, doubtleſs, had an equitable claim to the ſame privilege with his brother Harold, who, tho' he was born of the ſame mother, aſcended the throne. On theſe accounts, it was not an eaſy matter to ſettle the ſucceſſion, to the ſatisfaction of all parties; and the old animoſities between the two nations were likely to be revived, which were formerly ſo fatal to the kingdom. Edward, the ſon of Ethelred II. having ſpent the greateſt part of his life abroad, was but little known in England; and, beſides, his merit was not very conſpicuous, nor was he capable of ſetting off his right. However, a lucky expedient, which he was obliged to make uſe of, procured him a ſupport, by which alone he was put into a condition to maintain his pretenſions, viz. earl Goodwin. Tho', a few months ago, Edward had proſecuted this lord, as the murderer of his brother, he was adviſed to court his protection, which he obtained more eaſily, than he could have expected. Such was Goodwin's power and genius, above the reſt of the nobility, that it was almoſt impoſſible for Edward to have ſucceeded, if he had not gained him over to his party. He was diſtinguiſhed by his merit, as well as his birth, when Canute the great made him commander of the Engliſh troops, in the war againſt the Vandals; and, on the account of his valour, in that expedition, Canute created him earl of Kent, Suſſex, and Surrey, giving him in marriage Thyre, ſiſter to earl Ulphon, to whom Canute had beſtowed his own ſiſter Eſtrith, widow of the duke of Normandy. Goodwin had a ſon, by this wife, who was drowned in the Thames, by the means of an unruly horſe. His ſecond wife was Gith, ſiſter to Sweyn, who was ſucceſſor to Hardicanute, on the throne of Denmark; by whom he had ſeven ſons, Harold, Toſton, Swane, Ulnoth, Gurth, Elfgar, Lewin, and a daughter named Editha. His great intereſt with Canute the great, the ſuperiority of his genius, his noble alliances, and honourable titles, being duke of Weſſex, earl of Kent, and high-treaſurer, to which poſt he was promoted by Harold; and, laſtly, the government of the counties of Oxford and Hereford, in the hands of his eldeſt ſon, had advanced him to almoſt the ſummit of honour. His credit was ſomewhat eclipſed, in the reign of Hardicanute; but he had the addreſs and policy to retrieve it. Whatever ſecret diſguſt the late king might harbour againſt him, he was ſuch an enemy to buſineſs, that he ſolely entruſted him with the adminiſtration of affairs, as being the moſt able politician in his dominions. Goodwin was ſo dextrous in making the beſt uſe of theſe favourable opportunities, to ingratiate himſelf with the nobility and people, that his power, at length, was ſuperior to that of all the Engliſh lords. This proves, how neceſſary Goodwin's aſſiſtance was, to place Edward on the throne; tho', in promoting the intereſt of others, he had always a view to his own. Accordingly, before he eſpouſed Edward's cauſe, he obliged him, by an oath, to marry his daughter Editha; which terms, for reaſons of ſtate, he agreed to, tho' with an inward reluctance, on the account of his brother's murder.

* It could be only 27 or 28 years at moſt.

Difficulties about the ſucceſſion.

Edward falls in with Goodwin.

Eward obliges himſelf, by oath, to marry Goodwin's daughter.

Theſe preliminaries being ſettled, Goodwin convened a general aſſembly, in which Edward was acknowledged and proclaimed king, with the conſent of the whole body. If Sweyn, king of Norway, had been in England, at this juncture, in all probability, his pretenſions would either have occaſioned a civil war, or the kingdom would have been, once more, divided into two; for the Danes would never have ſuffer'd the rights of the royal family of Denmark to be violated, in this manner. On the contrary, the Engliſh had ſuch an averſion to the Daniſh yoke, that they joyfully fell in with the preſent juncture, in fixing on the throne a native of England.

He is proclaimed king of England.

Goodwin's riſe.

In the aſſembly above-mentioned, to which, in all likelihood, the Danes, being then without a leader, were not ſummoned, Goodwin made made a pathetick harangue, to the following purpoſe: "That they had, now, an oppor- "tunity of being freed from the oppreſſions, "under which they had groaned, for many "years; and, in the moſt eloquent language, "which was natural to him, he painted the "calamities of England, whilſt in ſubjection "to foreigners. He diſplay'd the ſupercilious "pride of the Danes, who treated the Eng- "liſh as ſo many ſlaves, reminding them of "thoſe miſerable times, when, an Engliſhman "and a Dane meeting on a bridge, the for- "mer durſt not ſtir a foot, till the latter had "paſs'd over; that, if an Engliſhman did not "pay his reſpects to a Dane, in the humbleſt "manner, he might depend upon being ſound- "ly cudgelled. To all theſe miſeries, he ſub- "joined that of the exorbitant taxes, they had "been obliged to pay, particularly Dane-geit *, "which was impoſed with no other view, "than to gratify the avarice of their imperi- "ous maſters." In a word, he omitted no- thing, that could inflame the reſentment of the Engliſh; and this harangue had ſuch an influ- ence on the audience, that it was reſolved, no Dane, for the future, ſhould ever ſucceed to the throne of England. Some relate, that this ſpeech made ſuch an impreſſion on their minds, that the Engliſh unanimouſly enter'd into a reſolution of expelling the Danes; and alſo, that they immediately put it in execution.

They expel the Danes.

The difficulties, about this paſſage of the Engliſh hiſtory.

This is one of the moſt difficult paſſages in the Engliſh hiſtory; for, in whatever light we view it, it is not to be accounted for. Firſt, it is not eaſy to apprehend, how the Engliſh, in a general aſſembly of the kingdom, could come to a reſolution of expelling the Danes; much leſs, that they ſhould have power to put it in execution. The Danes were, in a man- ner, ſole maſters of all the eaſtern and nor- thern counties; and in Mercia, the very heart of the kingdom, they were as numerous as the Engliſh. Four kings of their own nation had reign'd ſucceſſively in England, who, doubtleſs, gave them the preference, in their favours; and yet, without any extraordinary event, except the death of Hardicanute, a prince of no merit or reputation, it is affirm- ed, that the Engliſh, on a ſudden, became ſu- perior to the Danes, and that, to ſuch a de- gree, as to be in a condition to force them out of the kingdom. Can it be imagin'd, that the Danes ſhould tamely ſubmit to ſuch treat- ment, without the leaſt reſiſtance? The Da- niſh hiſtorians render this affair ſtill more in- tricate and perplexed, who aſſure us, that all the Danes in England were maſſacred, in one night, by the treachery of Harold, the ſon of Goodwin, who order'd all the Daniſh ſol- diers to march out of their garriſons, under the pretence of obſerving the ſolemnity of the late king's funeral *; but this account is altogether incredible, as Harold, then very young, was incapable of having any hand in the government, and, therefore, could give no ſuch orders to the Daniſh officers. Beſides, what reaſon can be aſſigned, why all the Engliſh hi- ſtorians, except Brompton, who himſelf but juſt touches upon the matter, ſhould agree in overlooking ſuch a remarkable occurrence? Was it poſſible for them to write their hiſtories, without the leaſt alluſion to it? If it ſhould be objected, that they were ſilent, on this head, becauſe they were aſhamed, that their coun- trymen had been guilty of ſuch a barbarous action, why did they not paſs over in ſilence the maſſacre, in the reign of Ethelred. Theſe are almoſt inſuperable difficulties. One would think, at firſt view, that they might be, plau- ſibly, accounted for, by charging the hiſtorians, as well Engliſh as Danes, with either not relat- ing the whole truth, or aggravating what they relate; but, at this rate, we ſhould only run into ſtill greater perplexities. It is very certain, that, from the beginning of the reign of Ed- ward the Confeſſor, the Danes are no more taken notice of, in hiſtory, than if they had never been known in England, tho', juſt be- fore, they were poſſeſſed of the whole king- dom; but what could occaſion ſuch a ſudden fall, or, rather, how ſhould they all vaniſh, in an inſtant, unleſs they were either expelled or maſſacred? Hiſtory does not inform us, that they were engaged in a war, that their for- treſſes were taken from them, or that they were compelled to ſubmit to new laws; but, all at once, theſe mighty and formidable Danes are reduced to nothing, in the reign of a prince, the moſt unfit for making of conqueſts, of any that ever ſate on the throne. The ſolution of theſe hiſtorical difficulties I am obliged to leave to others. But to return to my ſubject.

Edward's character.

Edward was a prince of weak a conſtitution and a ſlender genius, every way unequal to the government of ſo large a kingdom. His want of ſteadineſs and reſolution, on important oc- caſions, his incapacity for publick affairs, and his being entirely engroſſed by trifles, fur- niſh'd the nobles with an opportunity for aſ- ſuming a power, little inferior to the ſupreme. As ſoon as they ſaw into Edward's weakneſs, they obeyed his orders, no farther than was conſiſtent with their intereſt. Earl Goodwin, in particular, gradually uſurped ſuch an arbi- trary ſway, that he had almoſt as much homage paid him, as the prince on the throne. Per- haps, the eaſineſs of the king's temper was the chief motive, why that lord was ſo active in obtaining for him the crown, that he might rule in his name; but, how fair a correſpondence ſoever the king maintained with Goodwin, he utterly abhorred him and his whole family. On this account, he deferred his marriage with Editha, as long as he could; but he was obli- ged to eſpouſe her, at laſt, purſuant to his pro- miſe, to avoid her father's reſentment. How- ever, he did not conſummate this marriage, ſuch was his averſion to the very race of Good- win. The queen, who was a perſon of the ſtricteſt virtue, being likewiſe endowed with a greatneſs of ſoul, ſubmitted to this uſage, with a wonderful patience; for, inſtead of venting complaints,

complaints, about her treatment, finding it was impoſſible for her to gain the affections of the king her husband, ſhe ſpent her time in acts of devotion and the reading of books*. The author of Edward's life pretends, that he had made a vow of chaſtity, long before his marriage, and that he prevailed on the queen to follow his example; but Malmsbury, who is at a loſs, what judgment he ſhould paſs on this proceeding, ſeems to intimate, that Edward's abhorrence of Goodwin was the true cauſe of his averſion to the daughter. He durſt not, however, divorce her, leſt the earl ſhould occaſion his being depoſed, or, at leaſt, involve his affairs; and, therefore, he continued to heap favours on this potent lord, till he ſhould meet with a proper opportunity for expreſſing his reſentment, not conſidering, that, by theſe means, the people were more firmly attached to Goodwin's intereſt, as they imagined, that he was the king's particular favourite. The earl, on this account, became, every day, more formidable to Edward; and, in all likelihood, his power, in proceſs of time, would have been equal to that of the mayors of the palace formerly in France, were it not for Siward earl of Northumberland and Leofric duke of Mercia, who prevented his attaining to that degree of power, ſo fatal to the regal authority. Siward was look'd upon to be the braveſt and moſt deſerving peer in the kingdom; and his excellent qualities gain'd him great reſpect at court, and among the Northumbrians, who were under his government. Leofric was univerſally eſteemed, for his merit; and his power, in Mercia, was ſuperior to that of Edward himſelf. Theſe two lords, being reſolved jointly to exert themſelves to reſtrain Goodwin's authority within bounds, ſteadily adhered to the perſon of the king, doing all that was poſſible, to ſupport him on the throne; and Edward, without their aſſiſtance, would have found it extremely difficult, to defend himſelf againſt the artifices of Goodwin.

The ſtate of the court.

Edward, who is honour'd with the glorious titles of ſaint and confeſſor, aſcended the throne with a temper of mind, not altogether conſiſtent with real ſanctity; for he not only abhorred Goodwin and his own wife, but alſo was deſirous of being revenged on his mother, in direct oppoſition to the rules of the goſpel. It muſt be confeſſed, his mother, who never had any great affection for him, highly diſobliged him, in eſpouſing Canute the great, the avowed enemy of her firſt husband; and alſo in conſenting, that her children, by this ſecond marriage, ſhould ſucceed to the crown of England, to the prejudice of thoſe by the firſt. Theſe things were ſo deeply impreſs'd on Edward's mind, that all her attempts afterwards, to fix him on the throne, were not able to efface them; and he no ſooner had it in his power, than he determin'd, that ſhe ſhould feel the effects of his reſentment. On a ſudden, when ſhe leaſt expected it, he came to Wincheſter, where ſhe had laid up her treaſures, and ſtripp'd her of all, except a moderate penſion, which he allowed for her ſubſiſtence. Thus Emma, the widow of two kings, mother of as many, and daughter of a duke of Normandy, little inferior to a king, was, in the latter part of her life, reduced to poverty. Sax. Ann. 1042.

Edward ſeizes on the eſtate of the queen his mother.

Edward, however, did not think this act of violence ſufficient to ſhew the contempt and averſion he had for his mother; for, ſeveral hiſtorians affirm, that he likewiſe accuſed her of incontinence with Alwin biſhop of Wincheſter, and, regardleſs of her quality, even obliged her to endure the ordeal trial. They tell us, ſhe walk'd, barefoot and hoodwink'd, over nine red-hot plough-ſhares, as the nature of that ſort of trial required; and that, eſcaping without any damage, ſhe, in memory of this deliverance, beſtowed nine manors to the monaſtery of Wincheſter, tho', from what has been ſaid, it appears ſhe had none to give. However, ſhe lived ten years, in the condition to which the king had reduced her, confined to Wincheſter, as to a priſon, where ſhe remained, till ſhe was releaſed by death, in 1052†. He obliges her to endure the ordeal-tryal. Brompt. Knighton.

In the mean time, Edward received certain intelligence, that a great ſtorm was beginning to gather in the north. Sweyn king of Norway, the ſon of Canute the great, being reſolved to aſſert his claim to the crown of England, made preparations for an invaſion, with all expedition, which terrify'd the Engliſh; and Edward was no leſs alarmed than his ſubjects, who endeavour'd to put himſelf in a condition to receive them. Gunilda, niece to Canute the great, was, by his order, obliged to abandon the kingdom, with her family, to prevent her contriving ſome project, in favour of the Danes; but it fortunately happen'd, that a war, which ſuddenly broke out between the kings of Denmark and Norway, diſconcerted Sweyn's meaſures, as to his deſcent upon England. In proceſs of time, Sweyn was depos'd by Magnus, the ſon of Olaus the Martyr, whom Canute the great had deprived of the kingdom of Norway. Magnus was no ſooner on that throne, than he carried the war into Denmark; upon which, the king, who was alſo called Sweyn, demanded the aſſiſtance of England. Goodwin, to keep up this war in the north, propos'd it, as his opinion, that it would be expedient to ſupply him with a fleet of 50 ſail; but Siward and Leofric, for private reaſons, prevailed on the council to reject this propoſal. However, for want of this ſupply, Sweyn was dethroned; tho' he was reſtor'd to the crown, after the death of his enemy. Sweyn, king of Denmark, makes preparations to invade England. Gunilda is baniſhed. 1043. A war between Denmark and Norway.

rived at Sandwich, from whence they carried off a conſiderable booty; and then, ſailing for Eſſex, they took away with them, for ſlaves, great numbers of both ſexes, and of all ranks and conditions. The Engliſh were ſtruck with the moſt extreme dread and conſternation; but Goodwin, Siward, and Leofric enter'd into ſuch meaſures, that the Danes, alarm'd in their turn, ſpeedily retir'd, to carry on their ravages in other places.

Swane, earl Goodwin's ſon, is baniſh'd.

The retreat, however, of the Daniſh pyrates did not reſtore tranquillity to the kingdom, the ſea-coaſts being, that very year, infeſted by another enemy. Swane, the ſon of Goodwin, having deflower'd an abbeſs, whom he paſſionately loved, not daring to remain in England, on the account of this infamous fact, retreated into Denmark, where he had, in vain, expected a pardon, by the mediation of the earl his father; but, whether Goodwin was willing his ſon ſhould be puniſh'd, or that the king was inexorable, Swane did not obtain a pardon, ſo ſoon as he imagin'd. Upon this, he was ſo incenſed, that he fitted out eight ſhips, declaring war againſt the Engliſh, and committed ſuch horrible ravages on the ſea-coaſts, as exceeded thoſe of the moſt barbarous enemies. Swane's inſolence gave Goodwin's enemies an opportunity of inflaming the king's reſentment againſt the earl and his family; and, as for himſelf, he was, at a loſs, what ſteps he ſhould take, being unwilling openly to eſpouſe his ſon's cauſe, leſt he ſhould be accuſed of being an abettor of his rebellion. On the contrary, as he was extremely concerned at Swane's being declared a traytor, in this perplexity, he intreated earl Beorn, the ſon of Ulphon and Eſtrith, ſiſter to Canute the great, to employ his intereſt with the king, in the behalf of his ſon. Tho' Beorn had very warmly declaimed againſt Swane, he was prevailed upon by Goodwin to make application to the king, who complied with his requeſt, upon certain conditions. Matters being, thus, in a fair way of being compromiſed, Beorn went to Swane, with a view of perſuading him to ſubmit to the king's mercy; but Swane, ſuſpecting that the earl came to betray him, ſlew him, with his own hand, ordering his body to be thrown into the ſea. This brutal and ungrateful action, for the preſent, obſtructed a reconciliation; but the king granted him a pardon afterwards, notwithſtanding his many complicated crimes, ſo much was he afraid of the effect of Goodwin's diſpleaſure, if he had continued inflexible. Thus, Goodwin, tho' the king abhorred him, received as many favours, as if he had, in reality, the chief place in his affections; but theſe obliging offices, inſtead of producing mutual love, only fomented their averſion to one another. The earl thought himſelf under no obligations to the king, for favours that proceeded from fear; and the king's abhorrence of the earl was increaſed, in proportion as he found himſelf conſtrained to conceal it.

He plunders the Engliſh coaſts.

1048. The Normans great intereſt at court.

Beſides the king's private reſentment, Goodwin had likewiſe other enemies, who, on all occaſions, excited prejudices in the king againſt him, viz. the Normans, whoſe number and intereſt, at court, were vaſtly conſiderable. They regarded the earl, as their avowed enemy, becauſe he loudly complained of the king's friendſhip for them, making no ſcruple to affirm, that they would ſoon become as troubleſome, as the Danes; and theſe complaints were not, altogether, groundleſs. Edward, who was educated among the Normans, gave into all their manners, expreſſing ſuch an affection for them, as occaſion'd the envy and jealouſy of the Engliſh; and the Norman language was more in faſhion at court, than the Saxon. This being the caſe, the Normans grew haughty and imperious, expecting that all the world ſhould do them homage; and they, who did not obſequiouſly cringe to theſe ſpecial favourites of the king, might depend upon feeling the effects of their reſentment. Goodwin was one of thoſe, that could not ſtoop to the Normans; and ſo far was he from courting their protection, that he affected, by his continual railleries, to give them to underſtand, that he did not believe it was in their power to hurt him. Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, of all the Normans, had the greateſt intereſt with the king, who had removed him from a monaſtery in Normandy, to make him biſhop of London; and he afterwards advanced him to be archbiſhop of Canterbury, to the great regret of ſeveral Engliſh biſhops, who aſpired to that exalted ſtation. This prelate, being naturally of an inſolent diſpoſition, and whom the king's favours rendered till more arrogant and imperious, kept no meaſures with Goodwin, who, on the other hand, expreſs'd the utmoſt contempt for the archbiſhop; but Robert, exaſperated at this treatment, made it his buſineſs to put the worſt conſtruction on all the earl's actions, to prejudice the king ſtill more againſt him.

Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, is Goodwin's enemy.

At length, an unexpected accident brought earl Goodwin to the brink of ruin, as it furniſhed the king with an occaſion of being revenged on him. Euſtace earl of Bulloign, who was father to the famous Godfrey of Bulloign, who won Jeruſalem from the Saracens, making a viſit to the king his brother-in-law, was honourably received, as he had a particular affection for him. In proceſs of time, as he was on the road for France, one of his retinue, whom he ſent before, to provide him lodgings at Dover, picking a quarrel with a townſman, killed him on the ſpot. Upon this, the inhabitants, being alarmed, took up arms, in order to ſeize the murderer, who defended himſelf, by the aſſiſtance of ſome of the earl's domeſticks in his company. In the midſt of this tumult, Euſtace entered the town; and, finding his ſervants were attacked, he was obliged to eſpouſe their cauſe, without having time to be informed of the occaſion of the quarrel; but, being overpowered by numbers, twenty of his retinue were ſlain, and the earl himſelf very narrowly eſcaped with life.

Euſtace, earl of Bulloign, comes into England. Sax. Ann.

A quarrel betweeu him and the inhabitants of Dover.

Incenſed at this inſult, he returned to the king at Glouceſter, where he then kept his court, and very urgently inſiſted on ſatisfaction. Edward, complying with his demand, gave orders to Goodwin to march directly, with with ſome troops, to chaſtiſe the rioters that were under his government; but the earl boldly replied, that it was contrary to the Engliſh cuſtom to puniſh people, unheard, and that the rights and privileges of the ſubjects ſhould be inviolably preſerved; that the party accuſed ſhould be ſummoned to a trial, and, if guilty, make ſatisfaction with their bodies and eſtates, but, if innocent, be diſcharged. He added, in a very inſolent tone, that, as he was earl of Kent, it was his province to protect thoſe, over whom he governed, from the inſults of foreigners; and, ſome ſay, he even charged the king to deliver up to him the earl of Bulloign, that, if found guilty of the tumult, he might be puniſhed upon the place. Edward was exceedingly diſpleaſed with this haughty anſwer; as it was not only a downright refuſal to obey the king's orders, but alſo a cutting reproach for his partiality to foreigners. The archbiſhop and the other Normans greedily catched at this opportunity to inflame the king's reſentment, which already was but too much kindled againſt him.

The king is reſolved to puniſh Goodwin.

But, notwithſtanding Edward's indignation, he was conſtrained to ſmother it, as he was not, as yet, in a condition to puniſh, on the ſpot, a lord, whoſe power was equal to his own; for, Siward and Leofric being abſent, he durſt not attempt any thing againſt Goowin, until he ſhould be aſſured of their concurrence. In the interim, being extremely impatient of revenge, he diſpatched truſty meſſengers to them, to acquaint them with his reſolution of chaſtiſing Goodwin, and to command, or, rather, intreat them to repair to him, with all expedition.

Goodwin makes preparations, for his own defence.

How ſecretly ſoever this affair was tranſacted, Goodwin, receiving intelligence of it, took his meaſures accordingly. As he very well knew, his ruin was unavoidable, if he did not prevent the deſigns of his enemies, he muſter'd together ſome troops, which ſoon joined with others, from his ſon's government, an incurſion of the Welch, at the ſame juncture, into Herefordſhire, giving him a ſpecious pretence to levy this army; and he repreſented, that he raiſed theſe forces to expel the enemy, tho' he had received no orders, concerning the matter. In the mean time, the king, having ſummoned him to appear before a general aſſembly held at Glouceſter, he made his appearance with his ſons, tho' with ſo ſtrong a guard, that he had nothing to fear. This being the caſe, the wiſeſt of the council, being ſenſible of the danger of puſhing things to extremity, adviſed the king to conceal his reſentment. They told him, that if the earl was reſolved to inſiſt on his own defence, which was highly probable, he would gain over to his intereſt the majority of the people, who regarded him as their friend; and that, for this reaſon, the furniſhing him with a handle, for carrying his inſolence to a ſtill greater height, muſt, of courſe, be of dangerous conſequence. Purſuant to this advice, ſuch a peace was patch'd up, as was agreeable to Goodwin's deſire, i. e, he came off, by advancing ſome excuſes, that related more to his manner of acting, than the principal point in diſpute.

He is reconciled to the king.

This reconciliation was but of a ſhort duration. Edward, who could not ſit eaſy under the affronts he had received, entered upon new meaſures againſt Goodwin, by bringing over ſome of his chief friends, by preſents and promiſes. As ſoon as he had prepared matters, he convened a general aſſembly, and ſummoned Goodwin and his ſons to appear before them; but, being given to underſtand, that a deſign was formed to have them apprehended, they refuſed to make their appearance, without a paſs and hoſtages, for their ſecurity. Upon this, they were baniſhed the kingdom; and being, on a ſudden, deſerted by their principal adherents, they were obliged to ſubmit to the ſentence paſſed againſt them. Edward, not ſatisfied with being, thus, rid of Goodwin, confined the queen in the nunnery of Warwel, deſigning, in all probability, never to take her again. Goodwin retreated to the earl of Flanders, father-in-law to his ſon Toſton; but Harold embarqued for Ireland, where he expected to meet with aſſiſtance.

Being proſecuted again, he is baniſh'd.

Edward ſends away the queen.

In the interim, Goodwin, who imagin'd he was treated unjuſtly, form'd a reſolution of doing himſelf juſtice, by force, the only ſtep he could take, in his preſent condition. The earl of Flanders having ſupplied him with ſome ſhips, he infeſted the eaſtern coaſts of England, whilſt Harold did the ſame to thoſe of of the weſt; but, theſe feint attempts being ineffectual, Goodwin return'd to Flanders, where, for two years ſucceſſively, he did all that was poſſible to perſuade the earl, to grant him a powerful aſſiſtance. Baldwin, at length, furniſh'd him with a formidable fleet; and Harold fitted out a conſiderable number of ſhips from Ireland. Edward, being informed of theſe proceedings, equipp'd a fleet, with all expedition, under the command of Radulph of Mantes, his nephew, and the lord Odda. Theſe admirals receiving intelligence, that Goodwin had been ſeen off Romney-point, reſolved to purſue him; but, he had time to make his eſcape. Goodwin's deſign being, thus, baffled, by the king's vigilance, he embarqued again for Flanders, ſending Harold into Ireland. His view was to amuſe the king with a notion, that he had entirely laid aſide his project; and he kept his fleet always in readineſs to ſail, that he might embrace the firſt opportunity that offer'd. Soon after, he met with a favourable juncture, which he improved to his advantage. Whether the two admirals were deficient in fidelity or conduct, or whether by the intrigues of ſome courtiers, for the hiſtorians give us no light into this affair, Edward, on a ſudden, removed theſe two lords from the command of the fleet; and this alteration, with the breaking of ſome of the inferior officers, occaſioned ſuch diſcontents among the ſailors, that they deſerted in ſhoals. Thus, the king's ſhips, for want of hands, not being in a condition to keep the ſea, were brought up the Thames, in order to be mann'd again. Goodwin, being inform'd of this, makes a deſcent on the iſle of Wight, where he extorted great ſums of money from the inhabitants, whilſt he waited for his ſon Harold; and, upon his joining ing him, they both ſailed up the Thames, advancing towards London, the ſtation of the king's fleet. Edward, giving way to his paſſion, was deſirous of engaging them, himſelf, with the ſhips that were ready; but his council oppoſed it. They told him, that, inſtead of venturing his perſon, in an action, that might prove to be of very fatal conſequence, it was much more adviſable for him, as it was more for his own and the kingdom's intereſt, to make uſe of milder methods, to reclaim Goodwin. Notwithſtanding the wholſomeneſs of this advice, it would have been a difficult task to perſuade the king to fall in with it, had not Goodwin, who was no ſtranger to the tranſactions at court, paved the way, by making the firſt advances himſelf. He ſent the king word, that he did not come, in this manner, to fight againſt his ſovereign, but moſt humbly to intreat him, to hear what he had to offer, in his own vindication; that he appear'd in arms, only to guard himſelf againſt the inſults of his enemies; and that it ſhould always be the very height of his ambition to be the moſt loyal of his ſubjects. Edward, however, taking this meſſage to be a ſort of inſulting banter, flatly refuſed to liſten to any terms of accommodation, declaring, that he could never conſent to pardon his brother's murderer; and his obſtinate refuſal had like to have produced a very fatal effect. Goodwin's army, entirely conſiſting of foreigners, in expectation of making their fortunes, by the plunder of London, were for attacking the king's fleet, without any farther delay; but the earl, who was thoroughly acquainted with the ſentiments of the council, checqued the ardour of his ſoldiers, and his ſubmiſſive carriage, at length, had its effect upon the king. The principal lords, and eſpecially Stigand biſhop of Wincheſter, a ſteady friend to Goodwin, prevailed upon Edward to reſtore him into his favour, at leaſt, as to outward appearance; and the king even gave his conſent, that he ſhould be acquitted, by the general aſſembly of the nation, of the murder of Alfred, which was charged upon him a-new, provided he would give hoſtages for his good behaviour hereafter. Goodwin, complying with theſe terms, delivered up his ſon Ulnoth and his grandſon Hacune to the king, who ſent them into Normandy, where, he thought, he could more effectually ſecure them, than in England. Upon this, the earl and his ſons were reſtored to their eſtates and honours; and the king honourably took again the queen his wife, whom he had abandon'd, for life.

Goodwin, at length, enters into a treaty with the king, and gives him hoſtages.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury is baniſhed.

No ſooner were matters accommodated between the king and the earl, than the archbiſhop of Canterbury retired to the monaſtery of Jumiege in Normandy; but, in a little time after his retreat, he was baniſhed the kingdom, by an aſſembly-general, as an incendiary between the king and his ſubjects. Stigand was promoted to that ſee, in his room, on ſuppoſition that it became vacant, by his baniſhment, which, would not, at any rate, be admitted by the church of Rome. This was the reſult of Goodwin's affair. The earl, in all likelihood, was entirely ruin'd; and yet, to the mortification of his enemies, his diſgrace proved only the occaſion of his being rendered more potent and formidable. This very year, his third ſon Swane, having undertaken a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, died on the road, in ſome part of Syria, where he fell into the hands of robbers *.

Stigand is made archbiſhop in his room.

The court of England enjoying, from this time, a profound tranquillity, William the Baſtard, duke of Normandy, took occaſion to make a viſit to Edward; though, ſome affirm, that the king informed him, by archbiſhop Robert, that he deſigned to make him his heir, and that the duke's view, in this viſit, was to procure a confirmation of his promiſe, which is no more than a conjecture. However, during William's reſidence in England, the king gave demonſtrative proofs of his gratitude, for all the civilities he had received from him and the duke his father; and it is farther ſaid, that he alſo diſcovered to him, in private, a more ſubſtantial mark of his affection, by nominating him, in his will, for his heir and ſucceſſor. If Edward did make this will, which, it does not appear, was ever ſeen by any, it is moſt probable, he made it now, than when he lived in Normandy. Whilſt the Danes were on the throne of England, his brother Alfred and the children of Edmund Ironſide alive, how could Edward foreſee, he ſhould ever attain to the crown of England? but, when William the Baſtard was in England, Edward, being ſtill a mortal enemy to Goodwin, in his heart, notwithſtanding their ſeeming reconciliation, might have a ſuſpicion of his aſpiring to the crown, and propoſe, by this ſettlement, to diſconcert all his meaſures. After all, it is much more probable, he made no will; and that he gave the duke of Normandy no other than a verbal promiſe. However, it was this will, real or feigned, or this verbal promiſe, that furniſhed the duke with a pretence for undertaking the conqueſt of England, after Edward's deceaſe. That Goodwin knew nothing of this will is plain, from his taking no ſteps to prevent a Norman prince from aſcending the throne, tho' he was an avowed enemy to the Norman nation; and, by the way, as things ſtood, at this time, Goodwin, being almoſt equal to the king himſelf, in power, it is altogether incredible what ſome have had the front to aſſert, that Edward's will, in favour of William, was ratified by a general aſſembly.

The duke of Normandy makes a viſit to Edward.

His pretended will, in favour of the duke.

All Edward's attempts, to put a ſtop to Goodwin's growing greatneſs, were ineffectual; for the earl's power was advanced ſo high, as to render it of fatal conſequence, had not death delivered the king from this deteſted ſubject, even when he was moſt formidable. Some hiſtorians tell us, Goodwin's death was attended with extraordinary circumſtances, extremely remarkable, were they better atteſted. They affirm, that, as the king, on a certain day, ſate at table with the earl, he dropped ſome expreſſions, which evidently ſhew'd, that he had not entirely forgot the murder of his brother; and that Goodwin, taking it for granted, they were pointed at him, riſing up, addreſs'd the king in the following words, which he pronounced, with great vehemence and emotion. "I apprehend, my lord, that you ſtill "think me guilty of the death of the prince "your brother, tho' I have been publickly ac-"quitted of it; but, to give you a freſh proof of "my innocence, I pray God, this morſel, I am "about to put into my mouth, may choak me, "this inſtant, if I had any concern in the "death of that prince". They pretend, that he had no ſooner uttered theſe words, than, attempting to ſwallow the fatal morſel, it immediately choaked him, to the inexpreſſible aſtoniſhment of the ſpectators; but, if this particular had been genuine, it would not have been omitted by the moſt authentick hiſtorians; who, tho' they acknowledge, that he died ſuddenly, as he ſate at table with the king, take no notice at all of the abovementioned circumſtances; and they were invented, in all probability, to tarniſh the reputation of the earl and his family. Harold, his eldeſt ſon, was his ſucceſſor, in all his poſts; and thoſe he enjoyed before his father's deceaſe, were given to Alfgar, the ſon of Leofric duke of Mercia.

Harold is his father's ſucceſſor.

Goodwin's death did not introduce any remarkable revolution in affairs; for Harold had the ſame friends, creatures, and intereſt with the earl his father. The only difference between them was, that the ſon was naturally more courteous and condeſcending, and treated the king with more reſpect and ſubmiſſion. Edward, perhaps, did not ſo much abhor him, as his father; but he had the ſame reaſon to be afraid of him, as Harold was not only equal to his father, as to genius and abilities, but had a ſtricter regard to honour and conſcience, and, by his obliging carriage, brought over to his party both the nobility and commons, whereasGoodwin loſt a great number of friends, by his pride and arrogance. In the mean time, the king was conſtrained to maintain a fair correſpondence with the ſon, as he had done with the father; and, tho' he had no affection for him, he durſt not declare it, leſt it ſhould occaſion a rupture, which muſt, of courſe, be of dangerous conſequence, on the account of Harold's reputation at court and among the people.

1650. Edward eſpouſes Malcolm's cauſe, againſt Macbeth.

If the exorbitant power of the Goodwin family gave the king uneaſineſs, it was, in ſome degree, balanced, by the ſatisfaction he enjoyed, from the kingdom's being free from war, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne; but this tranquillity, ſo very agreeable to a prince of ſo pacifick a temper, was ſomewhat interrupted by a quarrel with Macbeth, king of Scotland, who had made a conqueſt of Cumberland. This little kingdom, which had, for a long time, been under the protection of the crown of England, was in diſpute between Macbeth and Malcom, a lord of the royal family of Cumberland. Edward, eſpouſing Malcolm's cauſe, commiſſioned Syward to reſtore him to his kingdom, who, by one deciſive battle, compelled Macbeth to abandon Cumberland; and he had ſcarce compleated this affair, before he was ſeized with a mortal diſtemper. As ſoon as he apprehended that he was near his end, he got upon his legs; and, ordering his armour to be put on him, he expired in that poſture, declaring it was an ignominious thing for a valiant man to die in his bed.

1055. Syward's death.

Upon the death of this earl, the government of Northumberland was given to Toſton, Harold's brother, Edward wanting reſolution to refuſe him that honour, tho' he dreaded nothing more, than the advancement of that family. Some tell us, this was done, out of policy, pretending, that the king, by ſeeming to gratify Harold, only promoted the moſt proper perſon to checque his ambition, on the account of the mutual jealouſy between the two brothers; but it does not appear, that they were at variance now, tho' they afterwards, quarrelled. it was imprudent, therefore, for Edward to entruſt any ſingle family with two ſuch important poſts, as duke of Weſſex and earl of Northumberland, which put one moiety of the kingdom in the hands of the two brothers; and, by this means, the king, tho' he, above all things, dreaded the Goodwin family, either out of weakneſs, or falſe politicks, did all that was poſſible to increaſe their power.

Toſton, Harold's brother, is made earl of Northumberland.

But beſides Edward's favours, Harold's merit and generoſity gained him daily ſuch friends, as were able to ſupport him againſt the attempts of the king himſelf. Tho' he was married to the duke of Mercia's daughter, Alfgar, his brother-in-law, behaved very coldly towards him, merely, becauſe he envied his greatneſs. This lord, being of a turbulent ſpirit, entered into a dangerous conſpiracy, and held a ſecret correſpondence with Griffin, king of Wales, to the prejudice of the publick. Edward having intelligence concerning it, cauſed him to be accuſed of treaſon, and condemned to baniſhment. Alfgar retreated into Wales, and joined his friend Griffin, who received him with open arms; and, ſome time after, making an inroad into Herefordſhire, they defeated Radulph, earl of that county, who attempted to expel them. Animated by this victory, they made farther advances, when they met earl Harold, who put a ſtop to their progreſs. Having levied an army in his governments, he boldly advanced towards them, in order to give them battle; but they quickly perceived the difference between him and Radulph; for Harold, who was ſuperior to the other, both in valour and conduct, routed them, forcing them to retire intoWales, from whence they durſt not make any incurſions, for the future. A peace being the reſult of this defeat, Harold obtained a pardon for Alfgar; and he was, by his means, at length, reſtored to his eſtate and honours. This uncommon act of generoſity procured him Alfgar's friendſhip, and added a luſtre to his reputation.

Harold's reputation daily increaſes.

1057. The people talk of Harold's being Edward's ſucceſſor.

The glory Harold acquired by his late expedition, his generous treatment of Alfgar, his affability and obliging temper, entirely gained him the hearts of the people; inſomuch that they began to talk openly, that, as the king had no heirs, Harold was the moſt worthy perſon to be his ſucceſſor. Such was the affection of the Engliſh for the earl, that it gave the king the utmoſt uneaſineſs, who deſired nothing more, than his utter ruin. It is probable, that, till now, Edward deſigned to leave his crown to the duke of Normandy; for, tho' he had a nephew in Hungary, it does not appear, he had any thoughts of recalling him, or ſecuring him the ſucceſſion. However, when he found, that earl Harold aſpired to the crown, or, at leaſt, that the people had their eyes upon him, with that view, he concluded it to be in vain to ſet up a foreign prince, againſt an Engliſh earl, whoſe power and intereſt were ſo very conſiderable. This, in all appearance, was the motive, that induced him, at laſt, to ſend for Edward his nephew, the ſon of Edmund Ironſide, from Hungary. This would, doubtleſs, have been done ſooner, were it not for his intention of making the duke of Normandy his heir. Prince Edward arrived in England, in 1057, accompanied by his young ſon Edgar, with Margaret and Chriſtina his daughters, who were all born in Hungary. The arrival of the ſon of a king of England, for whoſe memory the nation had the greateſt veneration, muſt, of courſe, be very acceptable to the Engliſh; and, therefore, they, at once, regarded him, as the heir apparent to the crown, their reſpect for Harold giving way to their affection for the royal family. Indeed, this young prince's right was unqueſtionable; and, had he been on the ſpot, when it was debated, who ſhould be the ſucceſſor of Hardicanute, he, doubtleſs, would have had the preference to Edward himſelf. This was, in all likelihood, the reaſon, why the king, his uncle, left him ſo long in Hungary; but this prince, who ſeemed to be deſigned for the crown, died, ſoon after his arrival into England, leaving his juſt, tho' empty, title to Edgar his ſon, ſirnamed Atheling *.

* i. e. truly noble.

The death alſo of Leofric, duke of Mercia, happened the ſame year, who is highly applauded by the hiſtorians; and Godiva, his wife, is extolled by them, above all the women of her time. It is ſaid, that this lady, to free the inhabitants of Coventry from a heavy tax, impoſed on them by her husband, chearfully conſented to engage in a very extraordinary undertaking. The earl, upon her interceſſion, aſſured her, he would relieve them from this oppreſſive burthen, provided ſhe would ride, on horſe-back, naked, from one end of the town to the other, which the burghers apprehended to be an impracticable condition; but Godiva undertook the affair, covering her body with her hair, and ſtrictly commanding all perſons to keep within doors, and from their windows, on pain of death. Notwithſtanding the rigour of the penalty, there was a man, who could not forbear taking one view of her, out of curioſity, tho' it coſt him his life; and, in memory of him, there is the ſtatue of man, looking out of a window, continually fixed in a certain houſe at Coventry †. Alfgar ſucceeded to his father's earldom, by Harold's interceſſion.

The death of prince Edward gave new life and vigour to Harold's ambition. It is certain, he left a ſon behind him, but ſo young, that it appeared to be an eaſy matter to ſuperſede him; and, beſides, it was poſſible the king might ſurvive him. Harold, therefore, was reſolved to make the beſt uſe of the preſent juncture of affairs; yet, before he openly diſcovered his intentions, he thought it convenient to procure the liberty of Ulnoth his brother and Hacune his nephew, whom his father had delivered up, as hoſtages, to the king, who were, now, in the hands of the duke of Normandy. Tho' he very preſſingly demanded them, alledging, that, Goodwin being deceaſed, there was no occaſion for their being detained any longer, and, that it was extremely unjuſt to deprive them of the benefit of an Engliſh education, it was to no purpoſe; for the king always inſiſted, that they were not in his, but the duke of Normandy's, power, and that, for this reaſon, he was the moſt proper perſon to be applied to, on the head. Harold, finding, at length, that this was Edward's final anſwer, begged leave to go into Normandy, to ſollicite the duke for their deliverance, which was very readily granted, as the king did not doubt, but the duke would ſecure him there; at leaſt, he was in hopes, that duke William would take ſuch meaſures, as would free him from all the difficulties, into which the earl might involve him.

1062. Harold aſpires to the crown.

Harold embarqued for Roan, without the leaſt ſuſpicion of danger; being ignorant of the king's intention, about the ſucceſſion; and he was no ſooner at ſea, than a ſtorm aroſe, which drove him on the coaſt of Picardy, forcing him to put in at one of the ports of the earl of Ponthieu, where he was inſtantly ſeized. When they perceived, who he was, they carried him to Gwido earl of Ponthieu, who, proud of ſuch a valuable prize, determined to ſet a round price on his head. It would have been difficult for Harold to have eſcaped, had he not, whilſt he was treating about his ranſom, found an opportunity of informing the duke of Normandy of the ſtate of his caſe. The duke, upon the receipt of the news, demanded the priſoner of the earl, giving him to underſtand, that he had no pretence for detaining a ſtranger, that was on his way to Roan, and, by a tempeſt, caſt on his coaſts. The earl of Ponthieu, upon this, enlarged his priſoner, who, directly, proceeded on his journey. Duke William, who was not ignorant of Harold's deſign on the crown of England, was at a loſs, what ſteps he ſhould take, on this occaſion. He was ſenſible, that he muſt either detain Harold, by force, or attempt to gain him, by milder methods. If he did the firſt, he apprehended, that he ſhould declare his ſentiments too ſoon, ſince it might be prejudicial to his intereſt, if the Engliſh, as Harold embarques for Normandy.

He is ſeized by the earl of Ponthieu.

Duke William is at a loſs, how to act.

† Whether this account be genuine or not, there is a proceſſion or cavalcade made at Coventry, every year, to this day, in memory of Godiva, with a figure repreſenting a naked woman, riding through the city. The pictures of Leofric and Godiva were, likewiſe, ſet up in the windows of Trinity-Church, with this inſcription;

"I Luric, for the love of thee,
"Do ſet Coventry toll-free."

yet,

yet, ſhould come to the knowledge of his intentions of ſucceeding to the crown. Beſides, as Harold had ſo many friends in England, he was afraid, the detaining him would occaſion a rupture between that kingdom and Normandy, which would diſconcert all Edward's meaſures, in his favour; and, indeed, if Edward ſhould die, during the war, is it to be imagined, he could leave the crown to a prince, that was actually in arms againſt the Engliſh nation? Moreover, Harold being duke of Weſſex and earl of Kent, all the fortreſſes, in the ſouthern parts, were poſſeſs'd by his creatures, which would exceedingly perplex the duke's affairs. In a word, the duke was not thoroughly inform'd of Harold's proceedings, to obtain the crown; as, on the contrary, Harold was a ſtranger to the deſigns of the king and the duke. The duke alſo conſider'd, that, in impriſoning Harold, he ſhould violate the moſt ſacred rights of hoſpitality, which a great ſoul is incapable of, without offering the greateſt violence to its own dictates. Theſe conſiderations prevailed on him to take the other courſe, which was equally dangerous; for, by diſcovering his intentions to Harold, he put it in his power to prevent the execution of them. However, believing that he ſhould bring him over to his intereſt, by placing ſuch a confidence in him, he diſclos'd to him the hopes he entertained of the crown of England, founded on Edward's affection for him; and this diſcovery was attended with the aſſurance of a proportionable reward, provided he would ſupport his pretenſions. He likewiſe told him, that his aſpiring to the crown, tho' he was not of the blood-royal, was no ſecret to him; and he repreſented to him all the obſtacles he muſt expect to meet with, as well from Edgar as the other Engliſh lords, who would be jealous of his ambition. To theſe arguments he ſubjoined one that was very material, in ſo many words, declaring, that, tho' he ſhould ſurmount all other difficulties, he ſhould ſtill find him his enemy, who wanted neither money, arms, nor friends to maintain a right, he was reſolved to defend, to the laſt drop of his blood; and that, if he obſtinately purſued his firſt deſign, inſtead of ſecuring a power and grandeur, ſecond to none, but the ſupreme, he would endanger the loſs of a certain good, for the bare proſpect of that which was very uncertain.

He attempts to gain Harold, by diſcloſing to him his intentions.

Harold did not want ſagacity to diſcern, that his only method, as the caſe ſtood, was to ſeem convinced by the duke's reaſons. He, therefore, made the following reply, that, indeed, before prince Edward's arrival, he was of opinion, that, if the king died without iſſue, he was as worthy to ſucceed him, as any other lord of the kingdom; that, tho' he had formerly taken ſome promiſing meaſures, he had now laid aſide his intentions, as there were princes of the royal family in England; and, laſtly, he added, that, ſince he had acquainted him with his pretenſions and the king's ſentiments, hitherto, unknown to him, it would be much more agreeable to him, that the kingdom ſhould have, for their ſovereign, ſo great a prince as the duke, than Edgar Atheling, who ſcarce knew, in what manner to govern himſelf. The more effectually to convince him, that he was, in reality, in his intereſt, coming to terms with him, he demanded, among other things, one of his daughters in marriage. The duke took a pleaſure in complying immediately with all his requeſts; but, as the princeſs, he deſigned for him, was too young, the marriage was deferred to a time convenient. In the mean time, duke William obliged him to ſwear on the goſpels, that he would punctually perform his promiſes; eſpecially, that he would quit all pretenſions to the crown of England. Upon this, they parted, being both of them extremely well pleaſed, as to outward appearance; and Harold returned into England.

Harold pretends to be in the duke's intereſt.

He was no ſooner at liberty, than he conſider'd his oath, as extorted from him, and, conſequently, null and void. He could not apprehend, that the duke had any equitable claim to the crown, or that it was in Edward's power to transfer it to a foreigner; and, on this account, he was ſo far from having any thoughts of obſerving his engagements to the duke, that he was reſolved to exert himſelf, to render all his deſigns abortive. From this time, he made it his buſineſs to ſtrengthen his party in ſuch a manner, as effectually to prevent all the obſtacles either the king or the duke might lay in his way; and if, hitherto, he had any ſcruples in his mind, with reſpect to prince Edgar, they entirely vaniſhed now, as he conceived, by his aſcending the throne, he ſhould not, in the leaſt, injure that prince, the crown being otherwiſe diſpoſed of by his uncle the king. He was very active in ſecuring an intereſt among the principal lords of the kingdom, the duke of Normandy being abſent, and but little known in England, where the Normans were extremely deteſted. Prince Edgar, becauſe of his youth, was in no condition to oppoſe his proceedings; and, as for the king, he was ſo unreſolved, about the ſucceſſion, that he neither promoted his nephew's intereſt, nor that of the duke. Edward, being at a loſs, how to reconcile the oppoſite ſteps he had taken, viz. his promiſe to the duke of Normandy and the recalling his nephew from Hungary, ſeem'd to have nothing more in view than to paſs his days in tranquillity, without any anxiety, as to what ſhould happen, after his death. Thus, every circumſtance concurring, in favour of Harold's intentions, he did all that was poſſible to confirm the good opinion the Engliſh had of him; and, to this purpoſe, two very favourable opportunities offer'd ſoon after.

Harold takes new meaſures, to ſecure his ſucceſſion to the crown.

1063. Harold ſubdues the Welch; Sim. Duneln. Flor.

The Welch having renewed their incurſions, under Griffin their king, Harold and Toſton his brother joined their forces, to repulſe them; and ſuch was their ſucceſs, that they compelled them, at length, to dethrone Griffin and become tributary to England. Griffin, who was afterwards reſtored, renewing the war with the Engliſh, Harold, marching to the frontiers of Wales, ſo terrified the Welch, that they ſent him the head of their king; and this memorable event effectually convinced his countrymen, men, that he deſerved to wear a crown, who knew ſo well, how to defend it.

The Northumbrians expel Toſton.

Another occurrence, alſo, added a new luſtre to Harold's reputation, as it furniſhed him with an opportunity of demonſtrating his moderation and equity, as he had already given proofs of his valour and conduct. Toſton his brother, earl of Northumberland, treated the Northumbrians with ſo much cruelty and injuſtice, that, taking up arms againſt him, they expelled him from Northumberland; and, this action being of dangerous conſequence, Harold received orders, to go and chaſtiſe them, and reſtore his brother. As ſoon as he advanced near them, the Northumbrians ſent deputies to acquaint him with the occaſion of their riſing. They aſſured him, it was not their intent to withdraw their obedience from the king, but only from an unjuſt and cruel governor, who had exerciſed a tyrannical power over them, to which neither they nor their fathers had been ever accuſtomed; and that they were determined to hazard their lives, rather than ſubmit to ſuch uſage, for the future. However, they made the moſt ſolemn declarations, that, provided the king would allow them a governor, that would make the laws and cuſtoms of their country the rule of his behaviour, nothing ſhould be able to ſhake their fidelity; and to theſe remonſtrances they ſubjoined a large catalogue of grievances, intreating Harold to prefer the peace of the publick, before the private intereſt of his family. Harold, perceiving that this affair related chiefly to Toſton, ſent an impartial account of it to the king. At the ſame time, he made interceſſion for the Northumbrians; and he not only obtained their pardon, but alſo, that Morkard, the ſon of Alfgar, duke of Mercia, ſhould be their governor. Thus, Harold, at once, gained the affections of the Northumbrians, and riveted the friendſhip between him and Alfgar, which was abſolutely neceſſary, in order to bring about his deſigns.

Harold is ſent to reſtore him, but he approves of his expulſion.

Toſton's barbarity to his brother's domeſticks.

But if theſe actions recommended him to the reſpect and love of the people, they likewiſe exaſperated his brother Toſton, to ſuch a degree, as to render him his mortal enemy. However, as he wanted an opportunity of venting his fury on Harold's perſon, he turn'd the edge of it upon ſome of his domeſticks, whom he ordered to be cut in pieces, barrell'd up, and ſent to his brother, for a preſent; and, upon this, not daring to continue any longer in England, he retreated into Flanders.

1065. Edward makes preparations, for the dedication of the church of Weſtminſter.

In the interim, Edward was altogether unconcerned about the ſucceſſion, which he had exceedingly embroiled, by his engagements with the duke of Normandy. His thoughts were entirely engroſs'd, about the church and monaſtery of Weſtminſter, in building which he laid out the money he ſhould have expended in a journey he had vowed to take to Rome, this vow being diſpenſed with, by the pope, upon that condition. On this very ſpot, called Thorney by the Saxons, ſtood formerly a famous temple, ſacred to Apollo, which Sabert, king of Eſſex, after he had embraced the goſpel, converted into a chriſtian church, that was deſtroyed by the Danes. This church, having lain, for a long time, in ruins, Edward undertook to rebuild, with an adjacent monaſtery, which on the account of its ſituation, being weſt of London, was named Weſtminſter *. In proceſs of time, a city was built, in the ſame place, by degrees, which almoſt rivalled London itſelf; and theſe two cities, ſeparated only by a gate, have diſtinct magiſtrates and privileges, tho' they have often been confounded under the common name of London. The church and monaſtery being compleated, about the latter end of the year 1065, Edward was deſirous, that the dedication ſhould be celebrated, with the utmoſt ſolemnity; and, therefore, he convened at London a general aſſembly, at which were preſent all the biſhops and great men of the kingdom, to be witneſſes of this ceremony. At this very time, the king was ſeized with a ſudden illneſs, which carried him off, in a few days. When he perceived, that he was nearer his end, his chief care was to have the ceremony finiſhed, on the account of which he had convened the aſſembly †. As for the ſucceſſion, which was ſurrounded with ſo many difficulties, he did not concern himſelf about it. His inclination was for the duke of Normandy, tho' prince Edgar, his nephew, was the rightful heir to the crown; but Harold was poſſeſſed of the hearts and hands of the Engliſh. On the account of theſe difficulties, that were inſuperable, in his preſent condition, he reſolved to refer the deciſion of the matter to God alone.

In the mean while, Harold made the beſt uſe of his time. Almoſt all the lords of the kingdom, both ſpiritual and temporal, being aſſembled at London, he found the means to bring them to a reſolution of ſending deputies to the dying king, to deſire him to nominate him for his ſucceſſor; and they had alſo orders to intimate to him, that if he named any other, but Harold, he would infallibly involve the kingdom in endleſs perplexities, which was inconſiſtent with his wiſdom and the affection he had always expreſs'd for his ſubjects. Edward, who was, then, incapable of examining a propoſal of this nature, replied, that, as they were met, in a body, he left them at their liberty to chooſe whom they judged moſt worthy, to be their king; and he died, a few moments after, leaving the ſucceſſion as unſettled, at his death, as it had been during his life.

Edward dies in December, 1065.

This prince, who was born at Giſlip *, near Oxford, ſate on the throne 24 years, without any diſturbance from foreign enemies; tho' it cannot be ſaid, his reign was happy, becauſe he lived in continual fears, occaſioned by the exorbitant power of earl Goodwin and his family. His peaceable diſpoſition, however, procured him ſome tranquillity; for, had he attempted to humble Goodwin's pride, or leſſen Harold's greatneſs, he muſt, of courſe, have plunged himſelf into difficulties. By conniving at their ſecret practices, he hinder'd them from acting in a more publick manner, obliging them to lay their ſchemes at a greater diſtance, and ſo gained time to arrive at the end of his days. He was not remarkable, either for his virtues or vices, and his natural abilities were mean; and, tho' he was highly celebrated, for his piety, and even honour'd with the title of Confeſſor, it does not appear, that he ſuffer'd on the account of religion, unleſs we ſhould conſider the mortifications he privately inflicted on himſelf, from a religious motive, as a ſort of martyrdom. It is certain, he expended, in works of charity, the ſums other princes have profuſely ſquander'd upon their pleaſures; and this, with his munificent diſpoſition, of which he, from time to time, gave extraordinary ſpecimens, procured him the reputation of a ſaint, and eſpecially among the monks, who received great advantages by his bounty. They have not only magnified his virtues, but canonized, if I may be allowed the uſe of this expreſſion, his very faults, by attempting to repreſent them, as ſo many proofs of his holineſs. Accordingly, his own hiſtorian, or rather panegyriſt, attributes his voluntary chaſtity, to a vow he made, before his marriage; and he even affirms, that Edward eſpouſed Editha, Goodwin's daughter, merely to exerciſe his virtue, under a continual temptation; but it is obvious, he acted from a contrary motive, ſince he no ſooner imagined, that it could be done with ſafety, than he abandon'd his queen. However, the notion of his ſanctity, having, by degrees, been deeply impreſs'd on the minds of the people, he was canoniz'd by pope Alexander III. by the name of Edward the Confeſſor *.

The abbots exceedingly enlarged it, on the weſt ſide; and Henry VII. added a chapel, to the eaſt, which Leland calls, the miracle of the world.

Ailred.

* About 200 years after his deceaſe.

Edward was not only eſteemed to have all the virtues neceſſary to gain his admiſſion into heaven, but he had a place alſo aſſigned him mong the ſaints of the firſt claſs. It is ſaid, that he was favoured with ſeveral revelations from God, the gift of prophecy, and many other miraculous powers; for the proof of which, ſuch frivolous inſtances are alledged, as are not worthy to be related. However, I cannot omit one ſpecial privilege, he is reported to have received from heaven, viz. that of curing the king's evil; which, it is pretended, the kings of England, enjoyed by virtue of their lineal deſcent from him †. This was the occaſion of the king's touching for the evil, at a certain time of the year; but the late king William III. of glorious memory, being perſuaded that, by the diſuſe of this cuſtom, he ſhould do no injury to thoſe that were troubled with this diſtemper, never touched any for the evil, during his whole reign. The kings of France have claimed the ſame privilege, from the time of Clovis, the firſt chriſtian king of that kingdom ‡.

King Edward's good nature has been, moſt of all, applauded; and endeavours have been made uſe of to ſet it off, from ſeveral particulars. I ſhall only take notice of two of them, as a ſpecimen of the reſt. As he one day lay down upon the bed, a domeſtick of his, not knowing that he was in the room, ſtole ſome money out of a cheſt that was open, which the king permitted him to carry off, without ſaying ſo much as a word. Soon after, the boy returning, to make another attempt, the king ſpoke to him, without paſſion, as follows: "Sirrah, it would be beſt for you to reſt con-" tented with what you have got; for, if my " chamberlain catches you, he will not only " oblige you to reſtore all you have ſtolen, but " alſo whip you ſeverely." At another time, as he was hunting, a countryman maliciouſly ſpoiling his ſport, he gallopp'd up to him, ſaying to him in anger: "By our lady, I would " have my revenge on thee, were it in my " power." Theſe are the infallible proofs of his good nature, which, according to his panegyriſts, highly exalted him above all other men.

Edward was the laſt king of Ecbert's line, tho' not the laſt Saxon king; for Harold, his ſucceſſor, was of that nation. Had not this weak prince prepoſterouſly declined familiarity with his queen, who was a chaſte as well as beautiful lady, he might, perhaps, have had iſſue by her, and ſo prevented a revolution, that enſlaved the kingdom.

Before Edward's reign, the Weſt-Saxon, Mercian, and Daniſh laws were obſerved in England, viz. the firſt, in Weſſex, the ſecond in Mercia, and the laſt in Denmark; but this prince reduced them all into one body; and, from his time, they became common to all England, being entitled, the laws of Edward, to diſtinguiſh them from the Norman laws, that were, afterwards, introduced.

† Mr. Collier has ſuch an opinion of the truth of this, which he ſtiles an hereditary miracle, that to diſpute it, he affirms, is to run into the exceſſes of ſcepticiſm. This point, however, is called in queſtion by ſome, for the following reaſons. 1. This power is commonly fixed to the lineal ſucceſſion; but this was often interrupted in thoſe days, nor was Edward himſelf the next heir. 2. According to Ailred, Edward obtained this privilege, as a ſaint, not as a king; and therefore his ſucceſſors, who were certainly no ſaints, were not entitled to it. 3. Ailred, who takes notice of many other of Edward's miracles, ſays nothing of his power of curing the king's evil being hereditary, any more than that of reſtoring ſight to the blind, or removing barrenneſs, tho' he tells us, both theſe miraculous actions were performed by the ſame touch. Laſtly, why ſhould the kings of England enjoy this privilege, above any other chriſtian princes? Beſides, if, in fact, they did, it muſt have been viſible to all, the cure immediately following the touch; whereas great numbers are never cured, and thoſe that are pretended to be ſo, not till a conſiderable time after they have been touched.

‡ Laurentius, phyſician to Henry IV. appropriates this miraculous power to the crown of France; but Dr. Tucker affirms, that the kings of France obtained this privilege, by virtue of their alliance to the royal family of England; and Mr. Collier ſays, that Lewis the Godly was the firſt that touched for the evil, 200 years after Edward III. of England.

21. HAROLD II.

Harold II. is elected by the general aſſembly.

HAD the great men, aſſembled about the choice of a ſucceſſor to Edward, nothing in their view, but to obſerve juſtice, equity, and the antient cuſtom of England, they might eaſily have known, to whom the crown was devolved. Edgar Atheling was the only prince of the blood-royal that ſurvived, and, conſequently, had the ſole right to ſit on the Engliſh throne; but Harold had taken ſuch politick meaſures, that he was unanimouſly elected, to the prejudice of the lawful heir. As for the duke of Normandy, we do not find, that his pretenſions, founded on the late king's promiſe, were at all conſider'd. It is true, the duke had never openly declared his deſign upon the crown of England, and, therefore, the Engliſh lords might be ſtrangers to it, or, at leaſt, pretend to be ſo; but had they, in reality, been acquainted with his intentions, it would only have been an additional motive to prevail on them to make choice of a king, that was better qualified, than Edgar Atheling, to defend the kingdom againſt the attacks of a foreigner.

Hiſtorians are not agreed, as to the manner of Harold's ſucceeding to the crown. Several aſſert, that he was unanimouſly elected by the Wittena-gemot, then aſſembled; and that, the day after his election, he was crowned by the archbiſhop of York *. Others tell us, he made uſe of compulſive methods, to oblige the the great council to chuſe him, after he had extorted his nomination from the late king, a few moments before his death. Some writers affirm, that Harold, regardleſs about the conſent of the nobility or commons, aſſumed the crown without any formality. This diverſity among the hiſtorians was occaſioned by their eſpouſing either Harold's, or the duke of Normandy's, pretenſions, Edgar Atheling's right being entirely diſregarded; but as there is more danger, on the account of this variety of opinions, of being miſ-led by the paſſions and prejudices of the hiſtorians, than determined by the juſtice and reaſon of the thing, I ſhall endeavour to ſet this whole affair in a clear light, by repreſenting to my reader, what may be advanced, in behalf of each of the three competitors.

Edgar's title.

As for Edgar, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that he was the only rightful heir to the crown. It may be objected, indeed, that he was born in a foreign country; but, as Edward his father was not legally baniſhed, his being forced by Canute to live in exile did not, in the leaſt, invalidate the right of his ſon.

The duke of Normandy's right.

As for the duke of Normandy, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that he aſpired to the crown of England, without ſome grounds, tho' it is not eaſy to apprehend what they were, ſo great is the diverſity of opinions about them. Some relate, that the Engliſh invited him over, to deliver them from Harold's tyranny. Others affirm, that Edward, when in Normandy, promis'd him, that, upon his acceſſion to the throne, he would make him his heir. Several authors ſay, that Edward nominated him for his ſucceſſor, in his laſt will and teſtament, which, ſome venture to aſſert, was ratified, whilſt Edward was alive, by the general aſſembly of the nation. However, it does not appear, that this will was ever produced, or that the duke had it in his hands. In all likelihood, he had no other foundation for his proceedings, than a bare verbal promiſe Edward had made him, when he was in England; and it was, doubtleſs, with a view to this promiſe, that he required Harold to drop his pretenſions. Had Edgar been placed on the throne, it is extremely improbable, that duke William would ever have attempted, on ſuch ſlender grounds, to ſnatch the crown from his head; but he was concerned with Harold, who, being no more than a private perſon, had obtained the crown, by unjuſt and indirect practices. Accordingly, he put his right in the balance with Harold's, excluſive of that of Edgar; and he concluded, that Edward's promiſe was equivalent to an election, that excluded the lawful heir. Beſides, he thought it next to impoſſible, that he ſhould miſcarry in his deſign, eſpecially as he had obliged Harold by an oath; and, therefore, indignation, revenge, and his ambition, inſpired him with a reſolution to make an attempt upon the crown of England, in ſpite of all oppoſition.

Harold's title to the crown is examined.

Harold's pretenſions, alſo, muſt be conſidered in a double view, with regard to prince Edgar, as well as the duke of Normandy. As to his election, in oppoſition to the duke, it was, in all reſpects, regular, and even the duke himſelf could have no ſolid reaſons to object againſt it; for, admitting that Edward had named him, for his ſucceſſor, either by will or otherwiſe, the nomination would not have been valid, unleſs it was confirmed by the Wittena-gemot. Some, indeed, affirm that this was done, being ſenſible of the inſufficiency of the duke's title, without it; but can it poſſibly be imagin'd, that a nation, without downright force, would ſuffer their king, by his own bare nomination, to ſubject them to a foreigner, to the excluſion of the princes of the blood-royal, or even of the moſt worthy lords of the kingdom. If this was ever the caſe, in any country, it muſt have been brought about by ſurprize, before the people had time to oppoſe it. Harold's election, then, was very lawful, at leaſt, as to the duke of Normandy, being made by the general aſſembly, whoſe power the duke could not have any right to diſpute.

But, if we compare Harold's with Edgar's title, it will give a very different turn to this whole affair. Harold's election, indeed, may be defended by those, who assert, that, during the Saxon government, the crown was elective, the nobility and people having a power to bestow it, as they pleased; but, besides the difficulties that attend this opinion, it will not justify Harold's election, even supposing it to be fact. How extensive soever some would represent the privileges of the assembly-general to be, in this respect; yet none, I believe, will affirm, they had a power to give the crown to a private person, to the prejudice of the princes of the royal family; at least, they would find it extremely difficult to produce any instances to their purpose, from the history of the Anglo-Saxons. The question, then, turns upon these two points, whether the nation had a right to elect Harold, to the exclusion of Edgar, or, whether, on this occasion, they did not stretch their power beyond its natural bounds. As I design to discuss this point, in another place *, I shall not enter upon it, at present, but only remark, that, if the nation had such a power, it was certainly abus'd at this juncture, and Edgar was treated very unjustly; but this election, however, gave Harold an incomparably better title to the crown, than it was possible for the bare nomination of Edward to give unto duke William, even on the supposition, that the above-mentioned will was as real, as it appears to be imaginary. But to return to the history.

Harold being crowned, the people, all over the kingdom, acknowledged him for their sovereign, and submitted to his authority; but, tho' his affairs, at home, were in such a situation, the case was otherwise abroad. Besides the duke of Normandy, who, before he discover'd his designs, was in a condition to put them in execution, earl Toston was making preparations to disturb his brother Harold, in the possession of the regal dignity. He could not forgive his impartial proceedings, when, to relieve the Northumbrians, he had him removed from his government; and tho' Harold's accession to the throne, one would have thought, might have render'd him more formidable, it only inflamed his resentment, being resolved to try all possible methods, in order to dethrone him. As he was no stranger to the duke of Normandy's intentions, with whom he contracted a strict friendship, being both of them married to two sisters, the daughters of the earl of Flanders, he had recourse to him, that they might consult about proper measures, against the king his brother. Doubtless, the duke spirited him up to his resolution; but we do not find, that he supplied him with troops, ships, or money, which he wanted so much himself, for his intended invasion. In all probability, it was the earl of Flanders, that furnish'd Toston with the ships, with which he infested the English coasts, especially the isle of Wight. From thence, he went and landed some troops at Sandwich; but, being told, that the king was on his march towards him, he embarqued for the north; and, entering the Humber with his little fleet, he invaded Yorkshire, making depredations, as if he had been in an enemy's country. Harold, not thinking it convenient to leave the southern parts, order'd earl Morcard to go against Toston; who, being made governor of Northumberland, in his room, was more immediately concerned to put a stop to his incursions. As for the king, he continued at London, that he might have a vigilant eye over Edgar's party, to prevent their rising, in that prince's favour. This was what he apprehended to be of the utmost consequence, being very sensible, that Edgar's usage gave great uneasiness to those, that were well affected to the antient royal family; and, therefore he highly caress'd both Edgar and his abettors. He even insinuated, that he accepted the crown, merely, because of that prince's minority, giving them to understand, that he designed nothing less than to restore it to him, as soon as he should arrive at years of maturity; and, with this view, he created him earl of Oxford, seeming to be extremely sollicitous about his education, as if it was, in reality, his intent to qualify him for the government of the kingdom.

Harold's behaviour to Edgar and his party.

In the interim, Morcard, accompanied by his brother Edwin, earl of Chester, marched with all expedition against Toston, who was, now, on the south side of the Humber; and, surprizing him in Lincolnshire, forced him, with his little army, to retreat to his ships. Toston, not being able to attempt any considerable enterprize, with such a handful of men; steer'd his course to Scotland, in hopes of a reinforcement; but, being disappointed, he set sail again, in order to make another descent upon England. He was prevented, however, by contrary winds, being driven on the coast of Norway, where he accidentally stumbled upon what he had, hitherto, sought with so much industry.

Morcard obliges Toston to retreat to his ships.

He is driven on the coast of Norway.

Harold Harfager, king of Norway, having, a little before, subdued some of the Orcades *, which belonged to Scotland, was fitting out a more powerful fleet, that he might pursue his conquests; and Toston being informed of it, waited on him directly, pretending that he came, on purpose, to recommend to him a more noble undertaking. He assured him, that he had, now, a fair opportunity of making a conquest of England, if he would only set about it; and, that there were two potent factions in the kingdom, one for Edgar, and the other for the duke of Normandy, both enemies to the king, which would facilitate the execution of this design; that he himself had a very good interest in Northumberland; and, lastly, that Harold was exceedingly abhorred by his subjects, who would certainly abandon him, as soon as a foreign army should appear in England, able to support them against him. Harfager, desirous of glory, and already anticipating, in his imagination, such a valuable prize, was easily prevail'd on to comply with this proposal; and he resolved to employ all his forces, in so important an expedition.

The king of Norway falls in with Toston's proposal.

* Now called, the isles of Orkney.

Whilst the king of Norway was active in making preparations, the duke of Normandy was equally sollicitous, about the means of seizing on the crown of England, on which his his eyes had been intently fixed, for a conſiderable time, being extremely mortified to find his rival was poſſeſs'd of that dignity; and, tho' Harold ſeem'd to be firmly ſettled on the throne, he flatter'd himſelf, that it was in his power to dethrone him, ſince the way of arms was ſtill open, when all other methods proved abortive. However, he firſt ſent ambaſſadors to the king, to require him to ſurrender his crown; and, upon his refuſal, not only to charge him with the violation of his oath, but even declare war againſt him. Harold made the following reply to the ambaſſadors: "That "their maſter had no pretenſions at all to the "crown; that tho' the late king had diſpoſed "of it in his favour, a thing altogether un- "known to the Engliſh, it was contrary to "their laws, which do not allow the king to "beſtow the crown at his pleaſure, much leſs "to a foreigner; that, for his part, he was e- "lected by the general aſſembly of the nation, "and, conſequently, could not reſign their "gift, without the breach of that confidence "they had repoſed in him. As for the oath, "the violation of which was charged upon "him, as it was extorted from him, he de- "clared it was null and void, by the laws of "all the nations in the world; and, in the "concluſion, he ſaid, that he knew how to de- "fend his title, againſt all that ſhould dare to "call it in queſtion." Upon this, as the quarrel could not be decided, without blows, each party took ſuch meaſures, as were moſt likely to prove ſucceſsful.

The duke continues his preparations, whilſt Harold gains the affections of his ſubjects.

The duke's indignation, at being, thus, impoſed upon, the deſire of revenge, the ſhame of receding from his reſolution, and the pleaſing proſpect of becoming maſter of England, excited him to do all that was poſſible, to accompliſh his deſigns. Harold, on the other hand, finding that he was like to be engaged againſt ſuch a formidable enemy, thought, nothing could more effectually eſtabliſh him on the throne, than to gain over the hearts of his ſubjects to his intereſt. With this view, he leſſen'd the taxes, and order'd juſtice to be adminiſter'd with ſtrictneſs and impartiality, omitting nothing that could confirm his ſubjects in the reſpect and affection, they had already entertain'd for him; and, by theſe means, he render'd himſelf more popular than ever. The Engliſh, charm'd with his conduct, reſolved to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes, to ſupport him on the throne, to which they had advanced him; ſo that the duke perceived, he had no other way left, to bring about his ends, but to muſter up an army equal to that of the king.

The duke endeavours to raiſe money. The ſtates refuſe their concurrence. Cambd. Brit. Nor.

The duke was chiefly at a loſs, how to raiſe a ſum of money, ſufficient to bear the expence of ſuch an undertaking. To this purpoſe, he firſt convened an aſſembly of the ſtates of Normandy, in order to obtain their concurrence; but they were far from being very forward to come into his meaſures. They repreſented to him, "That the late wars had drain'd Nor- "mandy both of men and money; and that, "inſtead of being in a condition to make new "conqueſts, it would be very difficult for them "to defend their own territories againſt the "attacks of a powerful invader. Beſides, how "equitable ſoever his claim was to the crown "of England, they could not apprehend, that "Normandy would reap any advantage from "this expedition; or, in a word, that their "allegiance obliged them to ſerve in foreign "wars, in which the intereſt of their ſtate was "no way concerned." This cutting anſwer, leading him to deſpair of raiſing money, in a publick manner, he projected another, and more ſucceſsful, expedient, viz. to borrow money from private perſons; and, having prevailed upon ſome of the principal of them to contribute, on this occaſion, the reſt were inſpired with an emulation to follow their example. William Fitz-Osbern propoſed to equip 40 ſhips, at his own charge; and each of them, according to their ability, ſubſcribed very conſiderable ſums. The duke, by this method, raiſed more money, than he could have done by a publick tax; but, as he wanted more, he contracted with ſeveral of the neighbouring princes, to furniſh him with troops and tranſports, on the condition of their being entitled to lands in England, after the conqueſt of it. He, likewiſe, applied to France for aſſiſtance, tho' it was not the intereſt of that crown, that the duke of Normandy's power ſhould be augmented; yet, fortunately for the duke, king Philip, then a minor, under the guardianſhip of the earl of Flanders, did not hinder his proceedings, which a prince of greater experience would certainly have obſtructed. The court of France, indeed, diſſuaded the duke from his enterprize, but to no purpoſe.

France does not obſtruct his proceedings.

The pope approves of the duke's deſign.

In the interim, the duke, who very well knew the weakneſs of his title, attempted to varniſh it over with the colour of juſtice. With this view, he exerted himſelf to obtain the pope's approbation, promiſing, as it is reported, to hold the kingdom of England of the apoſtolick ſee. However, the biſhop of Rome very heartily eſpouſed his cauſe, ſending him a conſecrated banner*; and he ſolemnly excommunicated all that durſt oppoſe him, in the execution of his deſigns. This was extremely ſerviceable to the duke, as it not only gave him an opportunity of juſtifying his expedition, but removed the ſcruples of thoſe he attempted to engage in his favour; but it was not ſo effectual in England. Whether the Engliſh had received no account of the pope's excommunication, or whether they regarded it, as an inſtance of great partiality, it did not prevent Harold from being ſupplied with a powerful fleet and army, being in a poſture of readineſs to receive the enemy.

* With a golden Agnus Dei and one of St. Peter's hairs.

Harold diſbands his army, on a falſe information.

The charge of ſuch an army being very burthenſome to his ſubjects, after he had waited ſome months, for the duke's coming, winter approaching, he fancied, purſuant to ſome falſe informations, that he had deferred his expedition, till the ſpring; and, therefore, he concluded, he might ſafely lay up his ſhips, for the winter, and diſband his troops.

The king of Norway ranſacks Northumberland.

But, as he was on the road to London, from Kent, where he had given orders for diſbanding the army, he was told, that the king of Norway, accompanied by earl Toſton, had enter'd the Tyne, with a fleet of 500 ſail. Being ſurprized at this unexpected invaſion, he drew up his army together again, in a hurry; but, before he could do it, the Norwegians had made a great progreſs. Having ranſacked the counties, on both ſides the Tyne, putting to ſea again, they landed their forces, on the north ſide of the Humber, and made horrible devaſtations. Morcard and Edwin attempted to put a ſtop to their career, with ſome troops levied in haſte; but their whole army was deſtroyed. The Norwegians, fluſh'd with this ſucceſs, beſieged York, which they quickly ſubdued; for the citizens, being in no condition to defend themſelves, thought it more adviſable to ſurrender, upon terms, than to be expoſed to remedileſs ruin. In the interim, Harold marched towards the Norwegians, with all expedition, in order to give them battle; who, having left their fleet in the Humber, advanced, northward, to compleat the conqueſt of Northumberland, before they went any farther, to the ſouth. He came up with them, at Stanford-bridge *, on the river Derwent; and, upon this, the Norwegians intrenched themſelves ſo cloſely, that there was no way of attacking them, but by the bridge, of which they were maſters. However, Harold, who very well knew, of what importance it was to come to an engagement, order'd that the bridge ſhould be attacked immediately. The Norwegians made a brave defence, tho' they were not able to withſtand the efforts of the Engliſh, notwithſtanding the ſurprizing valour of one of their own men, who, alone, defended the bridge, for a conſiderable time. At length, this courageous Norwegian being ſlain *, Harold, taking poſſeſſion of the bridge, paſſed his army over it; and, then, furiouſly falling on the enemy, after an obſtinate fight, entirely routed them. There never had been an engagement in England, between two ſuch numerous armies, each of them conſiſting of no leſs than 60,000 men; and the battle, which was a very bloody one, laſted from ſeven in the morning till three in the afternoon. Harold obtained a compleat victory, Harfager and Toſton being ſlain, on the ſpot. Of the whole army, that came from Norway in 500 ſhips, the remains were carried off in 20 veſſels, with the conqueror's leave. The booty, taken on this occaſion, was vaſtly great, as they found in the camp, not only what the Norwegians brought from Norway, but all that they had plunder'd in England. A certain author affirms, there was ſo much gold among the ſpoil, that 12 young fellows could hardly bear it on their ſhoulders; but Harold, by retaining the plunder, for his own uſe, occaſion'd diſorders in the army, that were, afterwards, very prejudicial to his affairs †. One would have thought, this prince, who was naturally generous, ſhould have ſecured the hearts of his ſoldiers, by a liberality that would not have been chargeable to him, eſpecially, at this critical juncture; but he conſidered, that, by laying out the booty on the war againſt the duke of Normandy, he ſhould, in a great meaſure, eaſe his ſubjects, whoſe affections he was deſirous of ſecuring, at all adventures. However, it was, doubtleſs, equally neceſſary to oblige his ſoldiers, nay, in the preſent caſe, the moſt expedient ſtep he could poſſibly take; for, tho' it has been often obſerved, that ſoldiers are never leſs regarded, than when, by their bravery, they have obtained, for their maſters, ſome ſignal advantages, as their own victories render them uſeleſs; yet it is as certain, that, ſooner or later, a diſcontented army will give their prince, or general, occaſion to repent of their ungrateful uſage of them.

Whilſt Harold was employed in the north, in regulating theſe diſorders, the duke of Normandy, who had long waited for a fair wind, at St. Valery, embarqued towards the end of September, and had a ſpeedy paſſage to Pevenſey * in Suſſex. It is related, that, leaping a-ſhore, he fell proſtrate on his face; at which, one of the ſoldiers merrily ſaid, "See, "our duke is taking poſſeſſion of England." The duke interpreted this ſaying to be a favourable omen; and, as there were none to oppoſe his landing, he, firſt of all, order'd a fort to be made, for a place of retreat, in caſe of neceſſity. Some, indeed, affirm, that he ſent his ſhips back to Normandy, to ſhew his army, that they had nothing to truſt to, but their valour; and, according to Cambden, the ſhips were burnt by the duke's order. Having continued a few days at Pevenſey, he marched along the ſhore to Haſtings ‡, where he built a ſtronger fort than the former, reſolving to wait there for the reception of the enemy, of whom he had no intelligence. Here he publiſh'd a manifeſto, containing the reaſons of his coming into England. The firſt was, to revenge the death of prince Alfred, brother to king Edward. This was a trifling pretence, if it was made uſe of; ſince earl Goodwin, the contriver of that murder, was dead, and it had never been charged upon Harold. His ſecond reaſon was, to reſtore Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury to his ſee. This was as frivolous as the former; becauſe this prelate was baniſh'd by the general aſſembly, in the reign of Edward, and, conſequently, the preſent king was not accountable for it; and it is highly probable, this article was inſerted, to give a ſpecious gloſs to the pope's partiality, in favour of the duke. Thirdly, which was his principal reaſon, he declar'd, that he came to aſſiſt the Engliſh in bringing Harold to condign puniſhment, for preſuming to uſurp the crown, not only without any title to it, but by a direct violation of his oath. It is obſervable, he does not take notice at all of Edward's will, or even of any verbal promiſe made him by that prince; which renders this third motive of his very ſlight and trivial. Some writers tell us, the duke founded his right, on his kinſhip to Edward; but he was, no way, related, to the late king, but by Emma of Normandy, who never had any right to the crown; and, beſides, the duke was a baſtard. He did not, therefore, found his hopes ſo much on his manifeſto, as on the ſtrength of his army, being very ſenſible, that if he prov'd victorious, he could eaſily enforce his reaſons. In the interim, to ingratiate himſelf with the Engliſh, he gave orders that his army ſhould injure none, that were not actually in arms againſt him; but neither this charge, nor his manifeſto gained any of the Engliſh over to his party, as they could not apprehend, he had any juſt occaſion to enter the kingdom, in this hoſtile manner, or that it would promote their advantage to eſpouſe his cauſe.

Harold returns to London.

Harold was ſurprized at the news of the Norman invaſion; but no ſooner was he informed of it, than he advanced, to give the Normans battle, whom he did not imagine to be more formidable than the Norwegians. When he arrived at London, upon the review of his army, he perceived that it was exceedingly diminiſhed, not only by his loſſes at Stanford, but the vaſt number of deſerters; but, however, all the nobles in the kingdom offer'd him their aſſiſtance, in this extremity, it being no leſs their intereſt than the king's, to repulſe theſe foreigners. Whilſt he remained at London, in expectation of being reinforced by ſome troops that were behind, the duke ſent ambaſſadors to him to require him to ſurrender the crown, and to charge him with the violation of his oath; but the king was ſo incenſed at their arrogance, that he could ſcarce refrain from uſing them with ſeverity. However, tho' he reſtrained his paſſion, he, in return, ſent the duke a menacing and inſulting anſwer; who patiently heard the whole of Harold's meſſage, diſmiſſing the ambaſſadors, without any reply.

The nobles offer him their aſſiſtance.

Harold encamps near the Normans.

In the mean time, Harold, having muſter'd all his forces together, encamped within ſeven miles of the Norman army, reſolving to engage them. Whilſt the armies lay ſo near each other, ſpies were continually diſpatched from both parties, to enquire into the ſtrength and poſture of the enemy; but the Engliſh ſpies ſo magnified the numbers and diſcipline of the Normans, that the principal officers began to doubt of the ſucceſs of the war. Gurth, Harold's brother, on the account of theſe reports, attempted to perſuade the king to defer the battle. He told him, "That, by this delay, "he would find that his army would become "daily more numerous, whereas the enemy's "forces would continually decreaſe; that no- "thing could be more prejudicial to the Nor- "mans, than to have their winter quarters, in "an enemy's country, where they had not ſo "much as one fortreſs to ſecure their retreat, "and from whence, in all likelihood, the want "of proviſions would oblige them to retire; "that, if he was guilty of the violation of his "oath, of which he was accuſed, he had no "reaſon to expect, that Heaven would proſ- "per his arms; that, if after all, he was ab- "ſolutely determin'd to come to an engage- "ment immediately, it would be moſt adviſa- "ble for him, not to be preſent, in perſon, at "the battle, that he might intimidate the "Normans with the dread of having a freſh "army to encounter, if they ſhould prove victo- "rious; and laſtly, that if he would entruſt "him with the command of his forces, he "would promiſe him, not, indeed, the victory, "which was entirely at the diſpoſal of Provi- "dence, but, however, to ſacrifice his life in "the ſervice of his country." The king, who was deaf to all his brother's arguments, made the following reply: "That, as he had, by his "former actions, gained the affections of the "Engliſh, he could not think of loſing them by "a diſhonourable retreat; that he rather choſe "to run the hazard of a battle, the reſult of "which was, as yet, uncertain, than tarniſh his "reputation; that, after all, the Normans were "not more formidable than the Norwegians, "and that, as he was obliged to fight, he "could never have a fairer opportunity, than "whilſt his army was fluſh'd with their late "ſucceſs; and, in fine, that he was reſolved to "demonſtrate to his ſubjects, that he was not "unworthy of the crown he wore." The duke of Normandy, perceiving, by all Harold's motions, that he was reſolved to give him battle, advanced a little forward, for the ſake of an advantageous ſpot of ground, for the drawing up of his army.

Gurth's ſpeech to Harold.

Harold's anſwer.

Whilſt they were making preparations, duke William's haughtineſs, ſeem'd, in ſome meaſure, to abate; and, perhaps, the apprehenſion of a deciſive battle, in an enemy's country, where his loſs would be irretrievable, inſpired him with ſome dread of the event. Beſides, he could not well avoid ſome previous reflections, on the blood that ſhould be ſpilt in a cauſe, that he could not be thoroughly ſatisfied was juſt, notwithſtanding his ſpecious pretences. However, before the engagement, he ſent a monk to the king, with four propoſals, which were left to his choice. The firſt was, to reſign the crown, purſuant to his oath. By the ſecond, he propoſed to return into Normandy, provided Harold would do him homage, and become his tributary. By the third, he was willing to ſubmit the whole affair to the pope's determination. Laſtly, he offer'd to decide their quarrel by ſingle combat. It is no wonder, that Harold rejected all theſe propoſals; for as to the two firſt, it is obvious they were very prejudicial to Harold. The third ſeemed at firſt view, more plauſible; but the pope having already eſpouſed the duke's cauſe, what grounds had Harold to expect, that he would be impartial in his deciſion. As for the fourth, it evidently inclined to the duke's ſide of the queſtion; ſince, in a ſingle combat, he only ventured his life, whereas Harold hazarded, beſides his perſon, the loſs of his crown. If the duke ſhould prove victorious, he would have gained a flouriſhing kingdom, as the fruit of his victory, whilſt Harold could have obtained no more than the bare glory of the conqueſt. Moreover, Harold was of opinion, that an affair of ſuch conſequence to the nation, ought not to depend on the ſtrength and dexterity of a ſingle arm; and, therefore, his anſwer was, "That God "ſhould determine on the morrow."

The duke ſends four propoſals to Harold.

The

The battle of Haſtings.

The Engliſh ſpent the night in ſinging and carouſing, as if they had been aſſured of the victory; but the Normans prepared themſelves for the battle, by devout prayers to the Almighty, for his bleſſing on their arms. At length, on the 14th of October, Harold's birth-day, but much more remarkable for one of the moſt important events, that ever happen'd in England, both armies came to an engagement. The Kentiſh men ſtood in the front of the Engliſh, which privilege they had enjoy'd from the time of the heptarchy; and the king placed himſelf in the center, reſolving to fight on foot, the more effectually to invigorate the ſpirits of the ſoldiers. The Normans being drawn up in three bodies, Montgomery and Fitz-Osbern commanded the firſt, Geoffrey Martel the ſecond, and the duke headed the third, that was reſerved for the relief of thoſe that moſt wanted aſſiſtance. The Normans began the fight with a volley of arrows, which, being ſhot upwards, appeared like a thick cloud over the heads of thoſe that were in the front of the Engliſh army; and, as their ranks were very cloſe, they made a very great ſlaughter. The Engliſh, being unacquainted with this method of fighting, were, at firſt, diſorder'd, upon which the Normans vigorouſly attack'd them; but the Engliſh immediately recovering themſelves, gave them ſo warm a reception, that they were forced to give way, in order to take breath. Soon after, the Normans renewed their attack; but they met with a brave reſiſtance, nor was it in their power to break their ranks. The Engliſh being determined to die, rather than retreat, and the Normans aſhamed of drawing back, there was no viſible advantage on either ſide, for a conſiderable ſpace; for the preſence of the commanders animating the ſoldiers, they every where fought with equal bravery, from ſeven o' clock in the morning till night.

The victory, for a long while is doubtful.

I cannot pretend to give a complete deſcription of this bloody battle, as the accounts of the hiſtorians concerning it are very confuſed; but I ſhall only take notice of two circumſtances, which they all acknowledge, got the Normans the victory. The fight had laſted all day, without any one being able to diſtinguiſh who had the advantage; when the duke projected an expedient, which turned the balance, in his favour. This prince, finding that he could not break the ranks of the Engliſh, ordered his troops to retreat, as if they were diſpirited, but, at the ſame time, to take ſpecial care to do it in good order. This being put in execution, the Engliſh, believing it to be an introduction to their victory, with reiterated acclamations, preſs'd upon the retiring enemy, and with ſo much eagerneſs, that they broke their ranks. The Normans, perceiving the ſucceſs of their ſtratagem, by a diſcipline to which they had been long accuſtom'd, cloſ'd their ranks again, ſtanding their ground; and, after this, they attacked the Engliſh, who were in great diſorder, and made a terrible ſlaughter. Harold diſtracted even to madneſs, to ſee the victory, in a moment ſnatched out of his hands, exerted himſelf to rally his troops; and he drew up on a riſing ground, near the field of battle, a conſiderable body of foot, which was augmented by the acceſſion of the flying troops. The duke, ſenſible that his victory was far from being compleat, whilſt ſuch a powerful body of the enemy kept together, ordered the Normans to fall upon them with freſh vigour; but ſo brave was their defence, and the loſs of the Normans ſo great, that the fortune of the day ſeem'd to be ſtill uncertain. Night approaching, the duke, at laſt, deſpairing of penetrating into the ranks of the Engliſh, began to conſider himſelf, as vanquiſhed, ſince he was not intirely victorious; and, in all probability, the Engliſh army might have made a ſafe retreat, by the favour of the night, if Harold had left the enemy in poſſeſſion of the field of battle. But the king, apprehending that his retiring might be prejudicial to his affairs, and ſully his reputation, was reſolved to ſtand his ground, eſpecially, as he had the proſpect of rallying the whole army, during the night, in order to renew the fight the next morning.

Harold rallies his troops.

Harold cannot thing of retreating.

The duke's ſtratagem.

In the interim, the duke, perceiving that in the night he was in danger of loſing the glory of an entire victory, made another attempt to force the Engliſh from their ſtation. In this attack, Harold was ſlain, by an arrow ſhot into his brains; which fatal accident ſo diſpirited his troops, that they betook themſelves to flight. Thus Harold's death was a ſecond reaſon of the entire defeat of the Engliſh, as it compleated the victory of the Normans. The Normans purſued the Engliſh, during the day, putting all in their way to the ſword, to prevent the trouble of guarding the priſoners; tho' the darkneſs of the night ſaved a conſiderable part of the Engliſh army, who retreated under the conduct of Morcard and Edwin. Theſe lords, having, all along, faithfully adhered to Harold, upon his deceaſe, as well as Gurth and Lewin his brothers, at length ſubmitted to Providence, after they had given, all the day, viſible proofs of their valour. In this battle the duke of Normandy loſt 6000 men, and the Engliſh a much greater number *.

Harold ſlain.

The duke of Normandy, upon this victory, which equalled the very height of his wiſhes, order'd his whole army to return thanks unto God, on their knees; and then having cauſed his tent to be pitched in the field of battle, he ſpent the reſidue of the night among the ſlain. The next day he gave orders for the burial of his dead, permitting the Engliſh peaſants to perform the ſame office to the others. The bodies of Harold and his brothers being found, he ſent them to Gith, their mother, who allowed them as honourable a burial, as the preſent circumſtances would admit, in Waltham-abbey, which was founded by Harold.

Harold's character.

Thus Harold, died with his ſword in his hand, in the defence of his own and his country's cauſe, againſt the duke of Normandy's ambition. The hiſtorians, who wrote

* The field of battle was near Heathfield in Suſſex, where the town of Battel now ſtands, ſo named from this engagement; in which, according to modern hiſtorians, upwards of 60,000 Engliſhmen were ſlain.

in

in the ſucceeding reigns, have been very ſollicitous, in beſpattering Harold's memory, to give a gloſs to the duke's pretences; but the violation of his oath was the only thing they could lay to his charge, and I have already ſhewn what he advanced, in his own vindication. They might, with more reaſon, have cenſured him, for his ſecret practices againſt Edgar, who, alone, had a right to the crown; but they have been ſo cautious, as to be ſilent, on this point, ſince all their allegations againſt Harold, on that account, might, with equal juſtice, be retorted upon the duke. However, it may be affirmed, that Harold would have been more worthy of the crown, had he not been ſo forward in aſpiring after it. He attracted the affections of the Engliſh, whilſt he was only a private man, and did every thing that could ſecure them, whilſt a king, during a ſhort reign of nine months and ſix days. He fought, within the ſpace of a few days, two memorable battles, with very various ſucceſs. In the firſt, he procured a ſignal victory over the king of Norway, by his conduct and bravery; and his defeat, in the laſt, was entirely owing to his ill-fortune. As for his other perſonal qualities, he was naturally honeſt, generous, affable, and obliging; and, in a word, adorned with every virtue, neceſſary to compleat the character of a great prince.

His iſſue.

Harold had two wives. By his firſt, whoſe name is not recorded, he had three ſons, Edmund, Goodwin, and Magnus, who retreated into Ireland, after the death of their father. By his ſecond wife, Algitha, ſiſter to Morcard and Edwin, he had a ſon, named Wolf, who was but a child, at the time of the battle of Haſtings, and was afterwards knighted by William Rufus. He had alſo two daughters. Gunilda the eldeſt, falling blind, ſpent her days in a nunnery; and the other was eſpouſed to Waldemar king of Ruſſia, by whom ſhe had a daughter, who was married to Waldemar king of Denmark.

Thus, ended the monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, which commenced, above 600 years before, in the perſon of Hengiſt, the firſt king of Kent; and the following book will inform us, how England became ſubject to the Normans.

The State of the Church, from Ethelred II. to the Norman conqueſt.

FROM the preceding account of the tranſactions, from the reign of Ethelred II. to the end of the monarchy of the Saxons, it appears, that this period does not afford much matter for an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory. As this may be called the age of ignorance, with reſpect to Europe in general, ſo, more eſpecially, with regard to England; and, if there was occaſion, it would be eaſy to aſſign the cauſes of this univerſal ignorance, in all the chriſtian ſtates. It will be ſufficient to my preſent purpoſe, to mention one, peculiar to England, viz. the wars; for the arms of the pagans carrying all before them, ſcarce permitted to the Engliſh the profeſſion of their religion; and, conſequently, the affairs of the church, in thoſe days, muſt be in the greateſt confuſion. I ſhall, therefore, only relate a few particulars, concerning the doctrines, councils, ſees, and ſuch as were moſt eminently diſtinguiſhed among the clergy.

The opinion of the church of England, as to the euchariſt.

Tho' attempts have been often made, to prove the antiquity of tranſubſtantiation, it could never be ſhewn, that it was the doctrine of the church of England, before the time I am, now, ſpeaking of. On the other hand, it is evident, from the homilies or ſermons, which were publickly read in the churches, that the church, in thoſe very days, did not acknowledge this doctrine. There is ſtill extant a tranſlation of theſe homilies *, aſcribed to Elfric, who lived in the reign of Ethelred II. which convincingly demonſtrates, that the church of England was of a quite contrary opinion; but, that my readers may judge for themſelves, I ſhall preſent them with an extract of one of theſe homilies.

Extract of an homily, to this purpoſe.

" There is a great difference, between the " inviſible virtue of this ſacrament and the " viſible ſign. As to the latter, it is corrup- " tible bread and wine; tho', by virtue of " the divine inſtitution, it is really the body " and blood of our Saviour, after conſecration, " not in a corporeal but ſpiritual manner. The " body, in which Chriſt ſuffered, is far from " being the ſame with the euchariſtical body. " The firſt was born of the bleſſed virgin, con- " ſiſting of blood, bones, nerves, and limbs, " animated with a rational ſoul; but the eu- " chariſtical body is compoſed of ſeveral grains " of wheat. As it has neither blood, bone, " nerve, limb, nor ſoul, we are to take it alto- " gether in a ſpiritual ſenſe. In the euchariſt, " whatſoever repairs our nature, or diſpoſes " us to a better life, entirely proceeds from a " myſtick and ſpiritual operation; and this is " the reaſon of its being ſtiled a ſacrament. " That, which is the object of ſight, is corpo- " real; but the repreſentation, made to our " underſtanding, has a ſpiritual efficacy. Be- " ſides, the body of Chriſt, which ſuffer'd and " roſe from the dead, is eternal and impaſſi- " ble; whereas the euchariſt is of a corrupti- " ble nature, being ſubject to decay, through " the violence of time, and diviſible into " many parts. It is ground with the teeth,

* The tranſlation of theſe homilies, in Latin, called ſermones Catholici, into old Engliſh, is preſerved not only in the Bodleian library, but in that of Bennet-college in Cambridge.

" and

" and paſſes through the common channels " of the body; but the ſpiritual virtue of " it continues in every part. Great num- " bers receive this euchariſtical body, and yet " the virtue of the operation is not, in the " leaſt, impaired; becauſe it does not operate, " in proportion to the corporeal magnitude, " but by the means of the divine inſtitution.

" The ſacrament is only a type, the body " of our Saviour being the ſubſtance; and God " has vouchſafed to give it us, as a pledge or " earneſt, till we come at the truth itſelf, for " the holy euchariſt is the body of Jeſus Chriſt, " not corporeally but ſpiritually. St. Paul, " ſpeaking of the Iſraelites, ſaith*, I would * 1 Cor. x. " not that you ſhould be ignorant, that all our " fathers were under the cloud, and paſſed " through the ſea; and were all baptized unto " Moſes in the cloud and in the ſea; and did all " eat the ſame ſpiritual meat; and did all drink " the ſame ſpiritual drink: for they drank of the " ſpiritual rock that followed them, and that " rock was Chriſt." That rock, from whence the " water flowed, was only a type of Jeſus Chriſt, " who made this gracious promiſe to all the " faithful: If any man thirſt, let him come to " me and drink; and out of his belly ſhall " flow rivers of living water*. By which is * Joh. vii. " meant the Holy Ghoſt, which thoſe that be- 38. " lieved on him ſhould receive. The apoſtle " declares, that the children of Iſrael, who " were in the wilderneſs, eat the ſame ſpiri- " tual meat, and drank the ſame ſpiritual " drink; becauſe the manna, with which they " were ſupported, for forty years together, " and the water, flowing from the rock, were " types of the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt, " that are daily offer'd in the church. The " manna and water were the ſame with that " we now offer, not corporeally but ſpiritual- " ly; and, to apprehend this, obſerve, that " our Lord, before his paſſion, conſecrated the " bread and wine into the ſacrament of the " euchariſt, ſaying, This is my body; this is " my blood. Though his paſſion was not, as " yet, compleated, by a myſtick operation, he " changed the bread into his body, and the " wine into his blood, juſt as, before his in- " carnation, he turned the manna into his " fleſh, and the water, flowing from the rock, " into his own blood."

Anglia ſacra, p. 125. As this homily clearly proves, that the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation was not, then, believed by the church of England; ſo it is no leſs evident, that Elfric, who tranſlated it into Latin, was of the ſame opinion with the author. There is, indeed, a diſpute about the tranſlator; whom ſome take to be Elfric archbiſhop of Canterbury, whilſt others ſay it was Elfric the grammarian, ſirnamed Putta, who was archbiſhop of York. However, it is certain, they both lived in the reign of Ethelred II. and neither of them was ever accuſed of heterodoxy; but, if it ſhould be objected, that Elfric was not of the ſame opinion with the author, the contrary appears from the following paſſage, in one of the ſaid Elfric's letters to the clergy. " The ſacrifice of the eu- " chariſt is not the body, in which our Saviour " ſuffer'd for us, nor the blood he ſhed for our " ſakes; but it is the ſame body and blood " ſpiritually, like the manna which fell from " heaven, and the water that flowed from the " rock." It is, therefore, manifeſt, from the teſtimony of a prelate of the church of England, that tranſubſtantiation was not introduced into that church, in the time of Ethelred II. who aſcended the throne, in 979. The only poſſible way of evading the force of this argument is, by alledging, that the homily, above-mention'd, is fictitious; but it is much eaſier to advance than prove this aſſertion.

Invocation of the Virgin Mary, &c. Spelman. Concil. vol. 1. The caſe is otherwiſe, as to the invocation of the Bleſſed Virgin and the ſaints in glory, ſince it was practis'd in England, in this very century. This appears from Canute the great's charter to the abbey of Glaſſenbury, which takes notice of the Virgin Mary and all the other ſaints; but, as the authority of the charters of thoſe times is not univerſally acknowledged, it may be alſo proved from a litany, that was, then, publickly read in the church. In this litany, after the invocation of the holy Trinity, the following words were thrice repeated, " O holy Mary, pray for us;" and, afterwards, the ſaints were invoked, by name. When this practice was, firſt, introduced, it is obſervable, that the addreſs to the Bleſſed Virgin and the other ſaints was rather a wiſh for their interceſſion, than a direct invocation, " May the holy Virgin, the mother of God, " and all the ſaints intercede for us;" which are the words in the publick office of canonical hours, made uſe of by the Anglo-Saxons*. This office gives occaſion alſo for this remark, that tho' the leſſons, prayers, pſalms, Lord's prayer, and creed are in Latin; yet, at the end of each article or verſe, there is a paraphraſtical tranſlation, in the Saxon language, that the people might underſtand the whole ſervice.

Elfric's Canons. Among Elfric's canons, whom I have already mentioned, the XXXIIId obliges prieſts to keep by them two ſorts of conſecrated oyl; one for children, and the other for the ſick; it likewiſe enjoins that the ſick ſhould always be anointed upon their beds, having, firſt, made a confeſſion of their ſins, and that no prieſt ſhould preſume to anoint any ſick perſon, unleſs it was deſired by them. From hence, it appears, that the prieſts did not ſtay, till the ſick were in their dying agonies, before they adminiſter'd the ceremony of extreme unction.

Extreme unction.

The XXXIVth puts the authority of the four firſt general councils* on a level with that of the four goſpels; but thoſe of later ages are not treated with the ſame reſpect and veneration. From whence, it may be fairly inferr'd, that the author of theſe canons did not believe,

* Of Nice, Conſtantinople, Epheſus, and Chalcedon.

* Sancta Dei genetrix Virgo Maria & omnes ſancti Dei intercedant pro nobis peccatoribus ad Dominum, ut mereamur ab eo adjuvari & ſalvari, qui vivis & regnas Deus. Direct invocation of the ſaints, in all probability, did not prevail in England, till the tenth century; when there was, in the homily of the aſſumption of the Bleſſed Virgin, an immediate addreſs or prayer to the Bleſſed Virgin to intercede for them. Coll. Eccl. Hiſt. p. 214.

that all the general councils were infallible; as he attributes a greater authority to the four firſt, than to the other councils †.

The eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England mentions no more than two councils, from the time of Ethelred II. to the Norman conqueſt. In all probability, the wars with the Danes prevented ſuch conventions, or, rather, occaſion'd the loſs of their acts and decrees. One of theſe councils ‡, was held at Engſham, and the other at Haba, whilſt Elphegus was archbiſhop. The following canons are the moſt remarkable.

The council of Engſham. Spel. Con. vol. 1.

The IId canon of the council of Engſham enjoins the celibacy of the clergy.

The VIIIth prohibits all perſons to do any wrong to the church, or to eject a clergyman out of his benefice, without the biſhop's conſent.

The XVIIth ordains, that every Friday ſhould be obſerved, as a faſt, unleſs it was a holiday.

The XXth obliges the people to make frequent confeſſions, and to receive the ſacrament, at leaſt, three times in the year.

The council of Haba.

The IId canon of the council of Haba orders every chriſtian to faſt three days, with bread and water, before the feaſt of St. Michael, and to give to the poor what ſhould, otherwiſe, have been eaten, in that time.

There is nothing elſe in theſe ſynods, that is worthy to be related; but I ſhall take notice of ſome of the eccleſiaſtical laws of Canute the great and Edward the Confeſſor, to ſhew the veneration theſe princes had for the clergy. The following are Canute's.

Canute's eccleſiaſtical laws.

The IVth enjoins all chriſtians to pay great reſpect to the clergy, on the account of their ſacerdotal functions.

The Vth permitted a prieſt, accuſed of any crime, to purge himſelf, by ſaying maſs and receiving the euchariſt.

The XIIth recommends celibacy to the clergy, and ranges them among the thanes of the ſecond claſs, i. e. among the gentry.

The XXth ordains, that, at funerals, the church-dues ſhould be paid, upon the breaking up of the ground; and to the pariſh, to which the deceaſed belonged, tho' he was buried in another.

By the XXIId, Sunday is to be obſerved from three o'clock in the afternoon of Saturday, till break of day on Monday.

The XXXIIId determines the times of faſting, and places, among the faſts, the vigils of the feſtivals of the Bleſſed Virgin and the apoſtles.

There are ſeveral others, about the payment of tythes and peter-pence, againſt the violation of the privileges of the clergy, and the like, in favour of the church.

Every chriſtian was likewiſe obliged, by theſe laws, to learn the Lord's prayer and the creed; and, upon their neglect, they were not allowed to ſtand godfather, receive the communion, or even to have chriſtian burial.

Edward's eccleſiaſtical laws. Spelm. p. 165.

The eccleſiaſtical laws of Edward the Confeſſor principally relate to the protection of the church and clergy.

The Iſt forbids the moleſting a clergyman, in contradiction to the privileges of the church.

The IId appoints certain days, on which all proceedings in the courts of juſtice were to ceaſe.

By the IIId, the cauſes of the church were to be tried, firſt; and the IVth ratifies the immunities of thoſe that depend on the church, and, purſuant to it, they were not obliged to anſwer any plea, &c. except in the eccleſiaſtical court.

The Vth confirms the privilege of ſanctuary to churches, extending it even to prieſts houſes.

By the VIth, whoſoever invaded the privileges of the church, was ordered to ſubmit to the ſentence of the biſhop.

The VIIth enjoins the punctual payment of tythes, and ſhews, alſo, what is to be paid; and the IXth determines the circumſtances of the trial-ordeal.

The XIIth ſettles the fine of manbote, the ſum paid to the lord, for killing any of his vaſſals; and the king's manbote is no more than that of an archbiſhop.

By the XIIIth, all treaſure, that was found, belonged to the king, unleſs found in a church or church-yard; and, in this caſe, the king had the gold, but the church the ſilver.

It is obvious, from the ſtrain of theſe laws, that the clergy took care of their own intereſt, when they were under devout and eaſy princes, or ſuch as wanted their aſſiſtance.

The clergy, at length, loſe the privilege of electing biſhops and abbots.

But tho' the Saxon kings beſtowed ſo many favours upon the clergy, they would not allow them the privilege of electing their biſhops and abbots. Whilſt the prelates acted, within the bounds of their paſtoral functions, this power was inveſted in the chapters; but, when they became wealthy and popular, and preſumed to interpoſe in civil affairs, on the account of the fiefs they were poſſeſs'd of, the kings found it to be a matter of vaſt importance, to have the ſees and abbies filled with ſuch as were attached to them, or, at leaſt, under obligations to them, for their preferments. The kings, therefore, began to concern themſelves about elections, by canvaſing or recommendation, and very frequently by refuſing to admit ſuch biſhops or abbots, as were not agreeable to them; ſo that, in the time of Ethelred II. the monks had entirely loſt their antient privilege of chuſing their abbots, as appears from Ingulphus. Ingulph. p. 63.

"In thoſe times, the monks and abbots ſeldom went to court; but, ever ſince the kings have taken the diſpoſal of the abbies into their own hands, the monks have been obliged to make intereſt with the courtiers, and ſometimes at a very great expence." This hiſtorian ſharply inveighs againſt this abuſe, tho' he was, himſelf, inſtalled, in the abbey of Croyland, by the ſole

Tranſlation of ſees. Dunelm.

There were only two removals of epiſcopal ſees, in all this period. That of Kirton, in Weſſex, was tranſlated to Exeter, and the biſhoprick of Lindisfarn, in Northumberland, to Durham. Aldhun biſhop of Lindisfarn, to ſecure himſelf from the Danes, went to reſide at Durham, taking with him the reliques of St. Cuthbert; and, having built a cathedral he fixed his ſee there, where it remains to this day.

The biſhops of Landaff are conſecrated by the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

In 981, the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury obtained a new juriſdiction in Wales; for Gucan, a Welch prieſt, being elected biſhop of Landaff, was conſecrated by Dunſtan; and all his ſucceſſors owned the archbiſhop of Canterbury, for their metropolitan. Some, on this account, affirm, that all the Britiſh biſhops, from that time, acknowledged the ſupremacy of the church of Rome; but it is evident, that the biſhops of St. David's, all along, exerciſed the archiepiſcopal functions in Wales, till the reign of Henry I. and that without the pall, the badge of ſubmiſſion to the papal authority.

As the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York were moſt conſiderable, among the Engliſh prelates, during the Saxon monarchy, I ſhall briefly trace the ſucceſſion of both theſe ſees; which will give great light into the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England.

The ſucceſſion of the archbiſhops of Canterbury.

Ethelgar, Dunſtan's ſucceſſor, being archbiſhop of Canterbury, but one year and three months, was ſucceeded by Siricius, who is cenſured by hiſtorians, for adviſing Ethelred to purchaſe a peace of the Danes; but, perhaps, thoſe, who are moſt ſevere in their invectives againſt him, would, in his circumſtances, have given the ſame advice. Elfric, who tranſlated the Saxon homilies, already mentioned, was his ſucceſſor, in 995; and he was ſucceeded, in 1006, by Elphegus, who was murdered by the Danes. Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the time of William the Conqueror, very much queſtioned, whether Elphegus was properly a martyr, as he did not loſe his life, on the account of religion, but becauſe he would not conſent, his people ſhould be taxed, to pay his ranſom; but Anſelm, abbot of Bec, whom he conſulted, on this occaſion, aſſured him, that he, who choſe to die, rather than commit an act of injuſtice, received, by his death, the crown of martyrdom. Livingus ſucceeded Elphegus, in 1013, who was, for ſome time, kept priſoner by the Danes; and, being, at length, ſet at liberty, he retired into France, till the ſtorm was appeaſed; and afterwards he returned to his ſee, dying in 1020, having Egelnoth the good, for his ſucceſſor. In the time of both theſe prelates, St. Auſtin's monaſtery was exceedingly corrupted, by the licentious lives of the monks. The maſſacre of all the monks, except four, when Canterbury was taken by the Danes, was the occaſion of this corruption; for the ſeculars, who were admitted into their places, were willing to enjoy the revenues and privileges of the monaſtery, but without any regard to its antient rules. Their lives were not ſo regular, as thoſe of the old monks; and they gave the name of Dane to their ſuperior, inſtead of abbot, which was retained, until archbiſhop Lanfranc changed it into that of prior. But to return to Egelnoth: he raiſed the ſee of Canterbury to its former luſtre, being ſupported by Canute the great; and he was ſucceeded by Edſius, who had been king Harold's chaplain *. He govern'd the church, till 1050, either alone, whilſt his health permitted, or by a chorepiſcopus, when he was diſabled by ſickneſs, The chorepiſcopus, who performed all the functions of an archbiſhop, reſided at St. Martin's in the Fields †. Robert a Norman monk, whom Edward the Confeſſor had promoted to the ſee of London, was, by the ſame prince, appointed to ſucceed Edſius, in that of Canterbury; but, being expelled thence, as has been related, and baniſhed the kingdom by the Wittena-gemot, Stigand, biſhop of Wincheſter, was fixed, in his room. Robert appealed to the pope, againſt theſe proceedings; but Stigand, who did not wait for the pope's determination, obtained conſecration; and, notwithſtanding his ſuſpenſion, without applying to Rome for the pall, he continued to exerciſe his metropolitical functions, till he was depoſed, in the time of William the Conqueror. It is highly probable, that the Engliſh, in thoſe days, did not believe, the archbiſhops elect were debarred from the exerciſe of their functions, till they received a power from the pope, or that the bare ſuſpenſion of the pope could put a ſtop to their archiepiſcopal proceedings.

Stigand, tho' ſuſpended, and without the pall, acts as an archbiſhop.

The ſucceſſion of the archbiſhops of York is, as follows. Aldulph, who ſucceeded Oſwald, in 993, ſate in that ſee, till his death, in 1002, and had, for his ſucceſſor, Wulſtan II. who, in 1023, was ſucceeded by Elfric Putta, ſirnamed the grammarian, taken, by ſome, to be the tranſlator of the Saxon homilies. Kinſius ſucceeded him, in 1050, whoſe ſucceſſor was Aldred, who was alive at the conqueſt.

The ſucceſſion of the archbiſhops of York.

Among the famous prelates of thoſe times, Wulſtan, biſhop of Worceſter, in the opinion of ſome, was look'd upon to be a perſon of an extraordinary character, tho' Lanfranc thought him incapable of the epiſcopal office, on the account of his ignorance and ſtupidity. This, however, is not the firſt time, that weak men have been palmed upon us for ſaints. This biſhop, having been conſecrated by Aldred, archbiſhop of York, profeſſed canonical obedience to Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, though he was ſuſpended by the pope. To account for this, it is pretended, that this ſubmiſſion was made to the ſee of Canterbury, and not to the perſon of Stigand; but ſuch aſſertions, as theſe, ſhould be confirmed by ſubſtantial authorities, whereas this has none at all, to ſupport it.

The chapter, being met to elect a biſhop, could not agree in their choice; and, upon this, Edmund, a prieſt of that church, ſaid, jocoſely, "That as they were at ſuch a "loſs, they might chuſe him to be their biſhop." Miracles being in great repute, in thoſe days, the chapter, regarding this motion, as a divine impulſe, unanimouſly elected him; and he was famous for his courage and reſolution, in reproving vice, even in perſons of the firſt rank and quality.

Engliſh miſſionaries ſent to Sweden. Jo. Magn.

We may, alſo, rank, among the illuſtrious men of that age, certain Engliſh eccleſiaſticks, who flouriſhed in Sweden and Norway. Olaus Scot-Kunung, king of Sweden, who entertained ſome thoughts of embracing chriſtianity, deſired Ethelred to ſend him miſſionaries, to inſtruct him in the faith. Sigefrid archdeacon of York, and not archbiſhop, as a Swediſh author affirms, Eskil, Gunichild, Rudolf, and Bernard, or David, undertook this miſſion. Sigefrid, who was made biſhop of Wexia, a city in the province of Smaland, baptized Olaus, tho' ſome ſay, he received baptiſm from Bernard; but the greateſt part of theſe miſſionaries were martyred by the idolatrous pagans.

Sax. Gr. l. 10.

I have, in another place, tho' in a general way, treated on the diviſion of England into pariſhes; but, as I am now arrived at the end of the Saxon monarchy, I ſhall give a more particular account of this matter, and ſo conclude my hiſtory of the church of the Anglo-Saxons.

The diviſion of pariſhes.

Auguſtin, the firſt biſhop of the Saxons, to whom the king of Kent had given ſome lands, for the ſupport of himſelf and the monks he brought with him, diſpos'd of the profits of them, as well as the offerings of chriſtians, at his pleaſure; but, becauſe he wanted inſtructions, about this affair, he conſulted Gregory I. who informed him, that, in the church of Rome, the offerings were divided into four parts, one of which was diſtributed, for the maintenance of the inferior clergy; and that, in the interim, as Auſtin and his companions were monks of the ſame order, they ſhould live together, as brethren. This was, likewiſe, the manner of living, practiſed by Aidan and Finan, biſhops of the Northumbrians, who were monks as well as Auguſtin, tho' of a different order; but it does not follow, from hence, that, in all the churches, the biſhops and clergy lived in common, as ſome authors affirm. The biſhops being obliged to diſtribute a fourth part of the church's revenue, among the clergy, ſeems rather to prove the contrary. However, it is certain, the biſhops and clergy were maintained, by the profits of the church-lands and the offerings of the people.

Coll. Eccl. Hiſt.

As there was, at firſt, but one church in a dioceſe, which contained a whole kingdom, the chriſtians becoming daily more numerous, it was neceſſary, that others ſhould be built, and prieſts ſent to ſupply them. Theſe prieſts were not ſettled in any particular church, but lived with the biſhop, who ſent ſometimes one and ſometimes another, at his diſcretion, to miniſter, in the remote churches, who afterwards returned to him. Theſe churches were no more than chapels of eaſe to the principal church; and the prieſts, upon their return, delivered the offerings, they had received, into the biſhop's hands. The prieſts, in thoſe days, had no other title, but that of belonging to a particular dioceſe; for theſe rural churches were not diſtinct pariſhes, but only chapels of eaſe belonging to the cathedral.

Stillingfleet.

Theſe churches were not, at firſt, very numerous; for as the lords, who had great eſtates, were the only founders of them, ſo, for the moſt part, they built no more than a ſingle church, for the uſe of their vaſſals. However, in proceſs of time, it became neceſſary to provide for the ſtated reſidence of a prieſt in each of theſe churches; and this gave occaſion to the firſt riſe and commencement of pariſh-churches. But, leſt the prieſts, thus, fixed to one cure, ſhould be regardleſs of their dependence on the cathedral church, the biſhops ſtill reſerved in their own hands the revenues and oblations of theſe churches; which was very diſpleaſing to the founders, who were uneaſy to find, that the prieſts, who did all the duty, had ſo ſmall a ſhare of their donations. On this account, the zeal of erecting new churches began to abate, at a time that they were moſt wanted; and the biſhops, perceiving this, at length, thought it convenient to compound with thoſe that were diſpoſed to build churches, reſerving no more to the cathedral, than a third or fourth part of the revenues, with the rights of baptiſm and burial. Upon this, the number of theſe private oratories increaſed exceedingly; for there was ſcarce a great man, but built one, for the conveniency of himſelf and his vaſſals. Beſides, if a lord alienated any part of his eſtate, the purchaſers uſually built a church upon it; and the biſhops themſelves, who became very wealthy, by reaſon of the grants made to their churches, founded churches on their lands, as well for the uſe of their tenants, as to imitate the nobility, among whom they began to be ranked. Thus, rural churches abounded in all parts of the kingdom, each of which had a particular prieſt; and, by degrees, the parochial diviſion was ſettled. However, the biſhops were, for many years, poſſeſs'd of the tythes and oblations; till, at laſt, to animate the zeal of chriſtians, in building and endowing churches, they not only left to the pariſh prieſts the donations of the founders, at leaſt, the moſt conſiderable part, but allowed them to adminiſter the ſacraments in their reſpective churches. This was the occaſion of the riſe and progreſs of the parochial diviſion, which was almoſt entirely ſettled in the reign of Edgar, or, perhaps, of Canute the great. In the interval between that time and the reign of Edward the Confeſſor, there were ſome farther ſubdiviſions; but, in all probability, there were very few alterations, after the Norman conqueſt. At leaſt, it appears from ſeveral charters of the latter Saxon kings, that the pariſhes of Cambridgeſhire, Huntingtonſhire, and Lincolnſhire were the ſame, as at this day; and it is to be preſumed, the pariſhes of the others counties very nearly agreed with the modern diviſion.

A DISSERTATION ON THE Laws, Manners, Cuſtoms, and Language, OF THE ANGLO-SAXONS.

Moſt of the laws of Europe came from the north.

THE revolution that happen'd in Europe, about the beginning of the fifth century, is one of the moſt remarkable events in hiſtory. The Roman empire, which was almoſt as large as the known world, was then divided into two parts, one including the eaſtern and the other the weſtern provinces. The weſtern empire was, at length, reduced to nothing, by the continual incurſions of the northern nations; and the very title of emperor of the weſt vaniſhed, with his dominions. This grand revolution gave a new turn to the affairs of all Europe; as it introduced new inhabitants, who, raiſing new kingdoms out of the ruins of the Roman empire, eſtabliſhed new laws and cuſtoms. Spain was peopled with colonies of Wiſigoths, Catti, Alans, and Suevi. The Gauls were over-run with ſwarms of Wiſigoths, Burgundians, and Francs. Italy was ſo often invaded by the Heruli, Oſtrogoths, and Lombards, that the natives made no figure at all; and the Saxons, Suevi, and Batavi, being diſperſed over all Germany, ſubdued that vaſt tract of land. In fine, Britain was ſo overwhelmed with a deluge of Saxons, Angles, and Juttes, that it is extremely difficult to trace any remains of the antient Britons. It was very natural, for theſe victorious foreigners, to introduce their own laws and cuſtoms into the kingdoms they founded; and it may be taken for granted, that the laws, now in force, over the greateſt part of Europe, were derived from thoſe, theſe antient conquerors brought with them from the north. I ſhall particularly prove this to be the caſe, with reſpect to England; and what I have to offer, on this head, will be ſufficient to convince all, that are, in the leaſt, acquainted with the Engliſh conſtitution, that the preſent cuſtoms of that kingdom are generally the ſame with thoſe, that were introduced by the Anglo-Saxons.

The laws of England are derived from the Saxons.

In the ſecond book, I ſhewed, that the Saxons were no ſooner arrived in Great-Britain, than they formed a deſign of ſettling there; there; and how, at laſt, they compleated it, after a war of 150 years. This tedious war occaſion'd ſuch an animoſity between both nations, that it is not to be ſuppoſed, the Saxons derived their form of government from the Britons, whom they conquered; ſo that, in order to diſcover the origin of the laws and cuſtoms of the Anglo-Saxons, we muſt have recourſe to Germany and the northern countries, rather than the antient Britons. Indeed, there is ſuch a reſemblance between the laws of the Saxons, Francs, Suevi, Lombards, and the other northern nations, that, it evidently appears, they had, all of them, the ſame original, and were of a more antient date, than the ſeparation of theſe people. There is ſtill a greater likeneſs between the laws of the Anglo-Saxons in Britain, and of the Saxons in Germany; and an Engliſh hiſtorian, by comparing the German laws with thoſe of the Engliſh, has convincingly proved, that the Engliſh introduced into Great-Britain the laws of their own country. He even ventures to aſſert, that, before the Norman conqueſt, there was not a ſingle law in England, that was not, for ſubſtance, the ſame with thoſe of the Germans. It is certain, as the Anglo-Saxons conſiſted of three diſtinct nations, and inhabited different parts of England, there might, poſſibly, be ſome variation, in this reſpect, in the ſeven kingdoms of the heptarchy; but this variation could not be very material, becauſe theſe three nations were united in Germany, under the general name of Saxons, before they came into England. Nothing more can be concluded from hence, but that the laws, the Anglo-Saxons eſtabliſhed in England, were a mixture of thoſe of the Angles, Saxons, and Juttes; but to enquire after the origin of the Engliſh conſtitution, among the antient Britons, would be as prepoſterous, as to build without a foundation, tho' it is not impoſſible, but there might be ſome conformity in their forms of government. The laws and cuſtoms, then, brought by the Anglo-Saxons into England, are to be conſidered, as compoſed of thoſe their anceſtors introduced into Germany, as well as thoſe they found in force among the antient Germans; and what Tacitus relates, about the German cuſtoms, ſo exactly agrees with ſeveral of the Saxons, that, it is plain, the Saxons derived many things from the Germans, unleſs we ſhould rather chuſe to ſay, that the cuſtoms of both nations had the ſame original. But, as it would be an endleſs task, to trace theſe affairs to their common ſource, I ſhall content myſelf, with preſenting, to the reader, a plan of the government the Anglo-Saxons eſtabliſhed in England.

The Saxons had no kings in Germany, when they ſent over their firſt troops, under Hengiſt, to aſſiſt the Britons. Their territories were divided into twelve provinces, each of which had a governor, who was elected by the general aſſembly of the nation, in whom the ſupreme power was veſted. This aſſembly was ſtiled the Wittena-gemot, i. e. the aſſembly of the wiſe men *; and alſo the Mycel-ſynod or great aſſembly. Beſides the heads of provinces, they had likewiſe others that governed the cities and boroughs; and, in time of war, the aſſembly elected a general out of the twelve governors, to command the army, who was veſted with very great prerogatives, tho' we have not a full account of their number or extent. The continual jars and animoſities, between the princes entruſted with this high dignity and the other kings, ſufficiently prove, that theſe prerogatives had no certain or fixed limits.

The title of king was not uſed among the Saxons in Germany.

Hengiſt aſſumes the regal title.

Hengiſt, however, was ſooner maſter of Kent than he aſſumed the regal title; and, indeed, he could not eaſily have found any other ſo proper, as he was ſovereign over that province. It muſt be confeſs'd, the titles of duke and earl, or, what is equivalent, Heretogh and Ealdorman were then received; tho' it was long after this, before they were made uſe of to ſignify the ſupreme authority. The other Saxon leaders, upon their ſettlement in Great-Britain, aſſumed the title of king, in imitation of Hengiſt; and as the Saxon territories, in Germany, were divided into twelve governments, ſo their dominions, in England, were canton'd out into ſeven kingdoms. In Germany, indeed, each governor depended on the aſſembly-general of the nation, whereas, in England, each king was ſovereign in his petty kingdom; but yet he had ſtill ſome dependence on the Wittena-gemot of his own ſtate; and there was alſo a general aſſembly of all the ſeven kingdoms, eſtabliſhed by mutual conſent, to determine the affairs of the whole body, which was termed the heptarchy.

The form of government the Saxons eſtabliſhed in England.

A Wittena-gemot in each kingdom.

Theſe firſt kings, the moſt of their ſubjects being Saxons, durſt not claim a deſpotick power, which was contrary to the cuſtoms of their own country; and, therefore, they eſtabliſh'd, or, rather continued a Wittena-gemot, in each of their kingdoms. As for what related to the common intereſt of the ſeven kingdoms, it was debated in a general aſſembly of the nation, at which all the kings and great men of the nation were preſent. The rights and privileges of this aſſembly-general are not particularly known; tho', in all probability, they very much reſembled thoſe of the ſtates-general of the united provinces. Each king was ſovereign; but yet he put in execution the reſolutions made, in common, to which he had conſented, either in his own perſon, or by his deputies.

The nature of the Saxon government.

From what has been ſaid, we may form a judgment of the government of the Anglo-Saxons. It was ſo far monarchical, as each kingdom had a particular king; and it was likewiſe ariſtocratical, as no laws were made, without the conſent of the aſſembly-general. Several authors aſſert, that it was, in ſome reſpects, democratical too; but this opinion ſhall be fully examined, in the ſequel. In the interim, to give us a more clear and diſtinct light, into the nature of their government, it will be requiſite to take a view of the various orders and degrees of men, among the Anglo-Saxons.

The ſeveral orders of men among the Saxons.

The king.

As for the king, I ſhall, hereafter, have occaſion to ſpeak of his power and prerogatives.

The queen.

The queen was the ſecond perſon in the ſtate, tho' ſhe had no concern in the government; and, if the queens ſometimes ſign'd charters, with the kings their husbands, it was rather a compliment to their rank, than a thing of any conſequence or neceſſity. Saxburga, queen of Weſſex, was the only one, that was poſſeſſed of the ſovereignty, during the whole period of the Saxon government; and yet, we are aſſured by ſome hiſtorians, that ſhe was depoſed, purely on the account of her ſex. We have already ſeen, how, becauſe of Brithrick's death, the ſame Weſt-Saxons deprived the queens of Weſſex of their antient prerogatives. The title of queen, in its original meaning, ſignifies, a companion, in Latin Comes; tho' it was afterwards applied to thoſe who were neareſt the king's perſon, and, at length, in a more general ſenſe to the great lords. Accordingly, in the old French romances and poets, we meet with Li queen de Flandre, Li queen de Leiceſter, for the earls of Flanders and Leiceſter; but, in proceſs of time, the term count or earl being ſubſtituted in its room, it was appropriated to the women. At laſt, it obtained a more reſtrained ſignification, denoting only the companion of the king, or the queen; and this appellation is common to all queens, whether they hold their dignity, by virtue of their husband's right, or their own.

Remarks on the meaning of that term.

The princes.

The king's ſons and the princes of the blood royal were the next, in precedency, who were named Clyto, from a Greek word, ſignifying illuſtrious. It is not eaſy to apprehend, why the Saxon princes affected a Greek title; one would have rather imagined, it was derived from ſome old Saxon term, if Edgar's title of Totius Angliæ Baſileus did not evidently ſhew, that they had a view to the Greek. By degrees, Clyto was made uſe of, alone, to ſignify a prince of the royal family; and the antient Engliſh hiſtorians very commonly call the king's ſons Clytones or Clytonculi, tho' afterwards Atheling, a Saxon term, from Athel, i. e. noble, was uſed in its place. As for the termination

Ing,

Selden's titles of honour.

Ing, it ſignifies deſcent according to Malmsbury. "The ſons of the kings of England, he tells "us, uſually aſſumed names, that expreſſed "their extraction. Thus Edgar's ſon took "the name of Edgaring, Edmund's ſon, Ed-"munding, &c. but they had all of them the "ſame common title, viz. that of Atheling." As the French, which ſettled in Gaul, came from Germany, it is highly probable, the termination Ing in the words, Merovingians and Carlovingians, i. e. the poſterity of Merovius and Charles, is derived from the ſame original.

Ealdorman.

Ealdorman was the name of the fourth degree. In its primary meaning, it ſignifies an aged man, tho', at length, it was applied to perſons of the greateſt diſtinction; probably, becauſe ſuch were inveſted in the higheſt offices, who were moſt qualified for them, by long experience. Accordingly, in the old teſtament, the elders of Iſrael, Moab, and Midian are the chief men of their reſpective nations; and Senator, Senor, Signor, Seigneur, in Latin, Spaniſh, Italian and French, are terms of the ſame import and meaning. The ealdormans, then, in England, were the principal nobles, who diſcharged the higheſt offices, and, conſequently, had the largeſt eſtates. As they were generally honoured with the government of the counties, the term ealdorman, in proceſs of time, was made uſe of to ſignify the governor of a county or city. Whilſt the heptarchy continued, they only held theſe offices, during the king's pleaſure, tho' afterwards they had them, during life, at leaſt, for the general; but this did not prevent the ealdormans being removed, on ſeveral occaſions, as we have already ſeen, in the reigns of Canute the great and Edward the Confeſſor. Upon the Danes being ſettled in England, this title of ealdorman was changed into that of earl; and that of earl was alter'd into count by the Normans; but, for reaſons too prolix to be here inſerted, the Daniſh term earl is ſtill in uſe in England, in the ſame ſenſe as that of count in other countries.

Several ſorts of ealdormans.

Some of theſe ealdormans were only governors of a province or county; but others held their province, as an eſtate of inheritance, and as a fee of the crown, it being always conſidered, as a parcel of the ſtate. In the reign of Alfred, we had an inſtance of the laſt ſort of ealdormans, who were extremely rare in England. This prince beſtowed unto earl Ethelred the inheritance of Mercia; and Elfleda, his widow, was poſſeſs'd of it, in the reign of Edward the elder. Edward, indeed, diſpoſſeſs'd his niece Alfwina, upon Elfleda's death; but this was brought about, by compulſive methods. Malmsbury tells us, "That Edward "the elder united the kingdoms of Mercia "and Weſſex; tho' he was only titular king "of the former, becauſe it had been given to "Ethelred." The ſame hiſtorian alſo ſhews us the nature of this lord's title to Mercia, when he relates, "That Alfred the great gave Lon-"don, the metropolis of Mercia, to Ethelred, "who had married his daughter Elfleda, to "hold it of him, by fealty and homage." From hence it appears, that Ethelred held Mercia, as a fee, as Octa and Ebuſa formerly held Northumberland of the crown of Weſſex, as the ſame writer informs us. In like manner, the dukedoms and earldoms, in France, which were, originally, no more than bare governments, were made hereditary, on the condition of doing homage for them. Theſe ealdormans were, likewiſe, called Reguli, ſubreguli, principes, patricii, and even ſometimes reges*. But, as for thoſe who were only governors, they derived their title from the county which they governed, which was alſo ſometimes expreſſed by the Latin word, Conſul. The firſt adminiſter'd juſtice, in their own name, applying, to their own uſe, all the revenues of their reſpective counties; whilſt the laſt acted in the king's name, and had only a certain part of the profits, ariſing from their government. Earl Goodwin, notwithſtanding his grandeur, in other reſpects, was an ealdorman of the latter rank. To theſe we might add a third ſort of ealdormans, who received the title, without ſo much as a government, on the account of the nobility of their extraction, out of which number their governors were, for the moſt part, elected; and hence it came to paſs, that the title of ealdorman was ſometimes made uſe of to ſignify no more than a perſon of quality.

*Dufreſne.

As for the ealdormans of cities and boroughs they were only inferior magiſtrates, who acted in the king's name, and depended on the ſuperior ealdormans or earls; and the name of ealdorman, or alderman, is ſtill applied to theſe ſubordinate officers, whilſt the others enjoy the the title of earl or count.

Dukes or Heretoghan.

The office of an ealdorman was entirely civil, having no relation at all to military affairs; tho' there was in every province a duke, who commanded the militia. The title of duke is modern, being derived from the Latin term, Dux; for this officer was called Heretogh* by the Saxons, and he had no concern with civil matters. His employment alſo was very different from that of an earl, of whom he was independent. The Saxon Annals ſtile Hengiſt and Horſa Heretoghan, or dukes, becauſe they were ſent over into Great-Britain, to be commanders in the war; whereas they always attribute, to Octa and Ebuſa, the title of ealdorman, on the account of their being governors of Northumberland, under the kingdom of Kent, tho' they might alſo be termed dukes, as they had the command of the army. Accordingly, the hiſtorians ſometimes call the very ſame perſon, by both theſe names, when he was both a duke and an earl, which was often the caſe, towards the end of the heptarchy. Thus, the governors of Weſſex, Mercia, and Eaſt-Anglia, are indifferently ſtiled dukes or earls; tho' I cannot imagine, why the title of duke is never given by the hiſtorians to the governor of Northumberland, ſince it is evident, from the example of Syward, whom Edward the Confeſſor commiſſioned to manage the war with Cumberland, that ſome of them had the command of the armies.

*i.e. Public leader or captain.

There

Ealdorman of all England.

There were, likewiſe, among the Saxons, three very important offices, or dignities, two of them of a civil, and the third of a military nature. The firſt was that of ealdorman of all England, the ſame with the chief juſticiary, viceroy, or guardian of the realm, which very few ſubjects were inveſted with; for this officer was ſo great, that he was even honoured with the title of Half-kyning or demi-king. We find only two lords, in the hiſtory of the Anglo-Saxons, who were advanced to this dignity, viz. Athelſtan earl of Eaſt-Anglia and Ailwin his ſon, to whom the title of Totius Angliæ Aldermanus was aſcribed.

Chancellor.

The next high office was that of chancellor, a term derived from the barbarous Latin word cancellare, becauſe he cancelled what he pleaſed in grants or petitions. He finally determined all cauſes, that were brought into the king's court, and drew up, as well as ſigned, all his charters. The firſt chancellor, taken notice of in the Saxon hiſtory, was Turketul, couſin to Edward the elder, who was afterwards abbot of Croyland; tho' I am apt to think, this office is of more modern inſtitution.

Selden's titles of Honour, p. 505.

Kyning's-hold, or, Generaliſſimo.

The third great officer was the general of the army, in Saxon Kyning's-hold, i. e. the king's general, who was the chief duke or generaliſſimo, like the high-conſtable of France. This office laſted no longer than during the war; for, in times of peace, the holds or dukes of each province were entruſted with the care of the militia.

High-ſheriffs, or Viſcounts.

The high-ſheriffs of counties were the next to the earls and dukes, who were placed over ſuch counties, as had no earls, and adminiſtred juſtice in the king's name. They were termed, in Latin, ſummi præpoſiti, cuſtodes provinciarum, and at length, vicecomites, whence the title of viſcounts is derived, not that they were under the earls or counts, but becauſe they performed the office of one. Indeed, in ſome counties, there were both earls and high-ſheriffs; but Selden is of opinion, that ſuch counties were, on the account of ſome peculiar privilege, under the immediate juriſdiction of the king. As for the name of ſheriffs, it was applied to thoſe inferior officers, who diſcharged the duty of the antient viſcounts, who have been, for a long time, ranked among the peers of the realm.

Thanes.

Next to the high-ſheriffs were the Thanes, which, in the Saxon language, ſignifies a miniſter or ſervant. There were two ſorts of thanes, maſs thanes, i. e. eccleſiaſtical thanes, and werold thanes, i. e. lay-thanes. The thanes, in general, were ranged into three claſſes. The firſt were the king's thanes, who did homage to the king only, being immediate tenants of the crown; and of theſe was the body of the greater nobility compoſed, who were afterwards called the peers of the realm. The dukes, ealdormans, and viſcounts were thanes of the firſt claſs, as were alſo all the immediate tenants of the crown, tho' they were not inveſted in any offices; but the Normans changed the term thane into baron, calling thoſe lands baronies, which the Saxons ſtiled thane-lands, and it has been the cuſtom in England, for a long time, to attribute to all the chief nobility the general title of barons, becauſe the great men were thanes. The middle thanes were of the ſecond claſs, who were ſo named, becauſe they held the middle rank, who, for the general, held their lands of the earls or barons; and the Normans termed them vavaſors, and their lands vavaſories. The third ſort of thanes held their lands of the middle-thanes, and were, no more than gentlemen, being diſtinguiſhed from the common people, as they lived upon their own eſtates, and were of no particular profeſſion. I am not inſenſible that ſeveral authors take the title of gentleman to be equivalent to that of the nobilis; and, therefore, ſuppoſe they were a part of the nobility, and the affinity between the words gentleman and gentilhomme ſeems to countenance this opinion. But, without engaging in this diſpute, I ſhall only remark, that there is a material difference between a gentilhomme of France and a gentleman of England. In France, as there is no more than one body of the nobility, every gentilhomme is a member of that body, and no leſs noble than a duke, whereas a gentleman in England, can, at beſt, be ranked no higher, than among the ſecond degree of nobles, or gentry. Beſides, many perſons of mean extraction are ſtiled gentlemen in England, who, doubtleſs, could have no pretenſions to the title of gentilshommes in France.

Ceorles.

The loweſt rank among the Saxons, viz. the freemen, was that of the ceorles, i. e. merchants, artificers, countrymen, &c. from whence the word churl or carle, an opprobrious name given to people of mean condition, is derived. The ceorls were equally free, as to their perſons, with the thanes of the third claſs, but not as to their lands; for the thanes held ſuch eſtates as were ſtiled bock-land or free-land, conveyable by deed or otherwiſe, whereas the ceorles had only ſoc-land or lands of the plow, which they could not alienate, as they were no more than farmers. Thoſe were the principal ceorles, and were called ſoc-men, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe who were not wealthy enough, to attain that honour, or procured their ſubſiſtance by ſome trade. All, that were inferior to thanes, except ſlaves, enjoyed the title of ceorles, who were as free, with reſpect to their perſons, as the ealdormans and thanes themſelves; and it was poſſible for them to obtain the dignity of a thane of the third claſs, if they had the good fortune to be able to purchaſe five hydes of land, a houſe with an encloſed court, a kitchen, a hall, and a bell to call their domeſticks together.

Two ſorts of ſlaves.

The loweſt order among the people, were the ſlaves or bond-men, ſome of whom were in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, ſlaves, becauſe they had no eſtates, and their lords had the ſole profit of their labours, who, on that account, maintained them; but there were other ſlaves, who might properly be called ſervants, as they held ſmall holdings, at the pleaſure of their lords, in conſideration of their doing ſuch ſervile country works, as were preſcribed them. As to the original original of these slaves, some think, they were the posterity of the meaner sort of Britons, who submitted to slavery, to save their lives, during the furious proceedings of the first Saxons in England. Others think, they were the descendents of those the Saxons brought with them, as slaves into England. However, these prædial bond-men, not altogether so much enslaved, as the others, had the management of their lord's lands; which was somewhat advantageous to them, tho' they could not leave the place of their residence, to settle in another, without the consent of their lord. They were afterwards termed villains, i. e. villagers, from the villages in which they resided; and there are, in several parts of Germany, such peasants, who are subject to great drudgery, and, for the most part, treated severely by their lords. When a slave was admitted to his freedom, he was, at once, consider'd as a Ceorle, and not ranked among a new order of men, as some have imagined. they were, indeed stiled Freolætan, i. e. freedmen; but this was only to distinguish them from those that were born free, who had not, however, any peculiar privileges. The lords, among the Anglo-Saxons, had not the power of life and death over their slaves; and, if they crippled or maimed them, they incurred a penalty, the legislators in this case, in some degree, imitating the law of God tho' it was unknown to them *.

Freeholders.

All, that were not slaves and villains, were freemen and freeholders; tho' this term, freeholder, commonly denotes the thanes of the second and third class, and the ceorles.

Burghers and aldermen.

The burghwitan or burghers were the inhabitants of towns, who were governed by magistrates, called aldermen, chosen out of their own body, and had also the privilege of forming themselves into corporations, for the encouragement of arts, and especially, trade and commerce; and, with this view, it pass'd into a law, that the merchant, who had cross'd the wide-sea three times, should be admitted to the honour and privileges of a thane. I cannot apprehend, what is meant by the wide-sea, unless it be the German ocean; since America was not, as yet, discovered. Ever since these times, merchants have been highly esteemed in England; and very often those, who are remarkable, on the account of their commerce, have the honour of knighthood conferred upon them by the king.

I shall, now, proceed to consider the government of the Anglo-Saxons, and particularly the manner of their administration of justice; and, to this purpose, it will be requisite to treat of the different courts of justice, they erected in England, from whence we shall be enabled to come at the original of those, now established in that kingdom.

The COURTS of JUSTICE.

I Have already shewn, that Alfred the great divided England into shires, the shires into trythings, laths, or wapentakes, these into hundreds, and the hundreds into tythings; i, e. he settled the limits of the former divisions, making some alterations. That he only regulated the division of the kingdom into shires is evident, because there were earls of Somersetshire and Devonshire, in the reign of Ethelwulph, according to Asser, who lived, about that time; but Alfred, who united the seven kingdoms into a monarchy, divided his dominions into more parts, and with greater proportion. The shires contained a whole province, subject to an earl or count, and were, therefore, termed counties. Some of these shires being divided into tythings, laths, or wapentakes, which are different names for the same thing, each of these divisions consisted of three or four hundreds of families, and each hundred was subdivided into tythings. The courts of justice were adapted to these several divisions, i. e. there was a court for each tything, hundred, &c. that justice might be administer'd at an easier charge, as well as with greater dispatch and punctuality.

The tything-court.

The tything-court, which consisted of ten heads of families, who were sureties for one another, as each of them was for all that were under him, was the lowest of all the courts. Every person in the kingdom was register'd in one of these tythings; and none, except those of the first rank, had the privilege, of having their single family made a tything, for which they were responsible. Each tything had a president, called a tything-man or burgh-holder, who held a court, as occasion offer'd; the proceedings in which were, as follows.

If any person accused of a crime absconded, the other nine sureties were bound for his appearance; and, if the guilty party ran away, he could not be received into any other town, burgh, or village, without a testimonial from his tything, for if they admitted him, without one, they were liable to punishment. By the laws of king Edward, the tything was allowed 31 days, to search after the criminal; and, if he could not be found, the tything-man, with two of his own tything, and nine of the three next tythings, viz. of each the chief tything-man, and two others, purged themselves, by oath, of the offence and flight of the malefactor; and, if they refused to swear, the offender's tything was obliged to make satisfaction, in his stead.

This court was often held, not only to determine differences among the members of the tythings, but also to guard against such, whose behaviour was suspicious, on whose account, the rest were in danger of incurring the penalty. The person, thus suspected, was

* There were two sorts of villains in England, a villain in gross, being immediately bound to the person of the lord and his heirs, and a villain regardant to a manour, i. e. annexed to a manour; but there are not any villains now, tho' the law concerning them stands unrepealed, to this day. The copy-holders are the successors of these villains, who, tho' they enjoy several privileges, in other respects, still retain one mark of their original servitude, as they are not entitled, by their copyholds, to vote at elections.

under obligations to find ſecurity for his good behaviour, and if he could not do it he was confin'd. This court terrified the people of mean condition, as it was not poſſible for them to eſcape the puniſhment due to their offences. Indeed, before it was erected, they might ſhift their quarters, by reaſon of their obſcurity; but the caſe was otherwiſe, now, as they were obliged to bring a teſtimonial from their own tything, in order to be regiſter'd in any other.

Theſe ten heads of families, of whom the tything-court was compoſed, had the name of free-burghs, i. e. free pledges, burgh ſignifying a ſurety or pledge. Thus, the word neighbour in its original meaning, is a near pledge; and burman, in all probability, which ſignifies a neighbour, among the Dutch, is derived from the ſame original, viz. the ſame German cuſtom, which was, as it were, a model to king Alfred. Gonzalez de Mendoza, an Auguſtin monk, in his hiſtory of the cuſtoms of China, written in Spaniſh, aſſures us, that the like cuſtom, is in uſe, at this day, in that empire. So remarkable is the conformity between the practice of the Chineſe and the Anglo-Saxons, with reſpect to theſe tythings or reciprocal pledges, that it is ſurprizing, how two nations, ſo remote from each other, and who never had the leaſt communication, ſhould agree ſo exactly, in this point.

Hiſt. de los ritos y coſtumbres de la China. l. 3. c. 10.

The next court was that of the hundred, which was held once a month, having, for its preſident, one of the principal aldermen of the hundred. The biſhop, or archdeacon, was obliged to ſit with him to determine, in conjunction with the other judges, all the eccleſiaſtical and civil affairs of the hundred.

The hundred-court

The third court, was that of the trythings, in which were decided the cauſes between private perſons of different hundreds of the ſame trything; and, beſides this court, every thane of the firſt rank, or baron, held one that reſembled it, to determine the controverſies between his vaſſals, from whence our preſent court-baron derives its original.

The trything-court. Lambard. Dugdale.

But when a ſuit depended between men of different trythings, it was tranſmitted to the county court, ſtiled, in Saxon, ſhire-gemot, or folcmote, which was called twice a year, or oftener, if occaſion required. The biſhop and the earl or ealdorman preſided in this court; but, in the earl's abſence, the high-ſheriff or viſcount ſupplied his place. In it were regiſter'd all the tythings of the county, with the names of the members. Eccleſiaſtical cauſes were commonly tried, in the firſt place; thoſe in which the king was concerned, next, and, laſt of all, ſuch as related to private perſons. William the Conqueror diſpenſed with the biſhops being obliged to ſit in this court, allowing them to hold courts of their own, for eccleſiaſtical matters. Appeals were made from the tything-courts to the ſhire-gemot; and, in this court, all perſons, of what degree ſoever, took the oath of allegiance to the king.

The ſhire-gemot, or folcmote.

Notwithſtanding the power of this court, it was inferior to that of the king; becauſe the king himſelf preſided in it, either in perſon, or by his high-chancellor. In the king's court, the falſe decrees of the other courts were examined; and it was, probably, in this, that Alfred condemned to death 44 judges, as has been already related. From this court, the common-pleas and king's bench derived their original.

The king's court.

I proceed, now, to the Wittena-gemot or general aſſembly of the nation; but, as there have been warm diſputes, about the exiſtence, origin, nature, and authority of this great court, it will be convenient to take notice of the ſeveral opinions about it. For my part, as I am entirely unconcerned in all the controverſies, relating to this ſubject, I ſhall fairly and impartially ſtate the reaſons advanced, on both ſides of the queſtion; and, that I may ſet this affair in the cleareſt light, I ſhall diſtinctly conſider, 1ſt, the origin of this aſſembly; 2dly, who were the members of it; 3dly, its authority; and 4thly, its power, with reſpect to eccleſiaſtical affairs.

I. The Origin of the WITTENA-GEMOT.

Some affirm, that the Wittena-gemot owes its riſe ſo the conceſſions of kings.

SOME believe the Wittena-gemot or parliament in England to be of a later date, than the regal power; and that it owes its firſt riſe to the condeſcention of the kings. They affirm, that as the ſovereigns were graciouſly pleaſed, from time to time, to ſummon the principal men of the nation, to conſult with them, about affairs of importance, it, at length, became a cuſtom; and that, in proceſs of time, the people, making the beſt uſe of a favourable opportunity, claimed a right to this privilege of having a parliament, tho', at firſt, it entirely depended on the king's pleaſure. The chief reaſon they aſſign, as the foundation of this aſſertion, is, becauſe, till the time of Edward the Confeſſor, England was ſcarce ever, or but a very little while together, united into one ſtate, being, during the heptarchy, divided into ſeven kingdoms, which were ſo many diſtinct ſtates. Egbert united no more than four of theſe kingdoms; and the Danes afterwards ſubdued Northumberland, Mercia, and Eaſt-Anglia, ſharing the lands among them; ſo that, from the Saxon conqueſt to the ſecond Daniſh invaſion, it does not appear, that England was united into one body, except in the ſhort reigns of Edwy, Edgar, and Edward the Martyr, and the government did not continue long in that poſture. When the Danes renewed their ravages in the reign of Ethelred II. the kingdom was ſoon divided into two parts, between the Danes and the Engliſh. Indeed, upon the death of Edmund Ironſide, the kingdom was re-united by Canute the great; but this union expired with his reign, the kingdom being, once more, divided among his ſons. In a word, they aſſert, that England was never entirely united into one kingdom, till the time of Edward the Confeſſor; and they, alſo, prove, from the ſeveral ſorts of laws, viz. the Weſt-Saxon, Mercian, and Daniſh, that the Saxon heptarchy is altogether chimerical; and that, therefore, therefore, the preſent parliament cannot poſſibly be derived from an aſſembly-general of England, which had no exiſtence, at all, during the dominion of the Saxon kings.

The adverſaries to this opinion reply, that they confound the Wittena-gemot or parliament of each of the ſeven kingdoms, and that of the whole heptarchy, conſidered as one body and ſtate, which ought to be carefully diſtinguiſhed; and that, tho' the laſt never had a being, the preſent parliament might take its riſe from the other. They farther add, that, if each kingdom had its own Wittena-gemot, thoſe of Suſſex and Weſſex became one, when theſe two kingdoms were united under Ina; and that when Ecbert annexed Kent and Eſſex to his dominions, the four kingdoms of Weſſex, Suſſex, Kent, and Eſſex made but one ſtate, and, conſequently, had but one parliament. In proceſs of time, as this kingdom was enlarged, by the conqueſts of Alfred the great, Edward, and Athelſtan, the Wittena-gemot proportionably increaſed, in its members, till, at length, it included all England, in the reigns of Edwy, Edgar, and Edward the Martyr. The wars with the Danes, in the time of Ethelred II. did, doubtleſs, affect this regulation, England being, again, divided into two parts; but Canute the great re-united the kingdom, and, of courſe, there was, upon this, no more than one Wittena-gemot, which was again divided into two, tho' but for a very ſhort ſpace, under Harold and Hardicanute. In fine, after Harold, by the intereſt of earl Goodwin, was placed on the throne of Weſſex, there was but one Wittena-gemot, in all England, till the Norman conqueſt.

To prove, then, that the preſent parliament is not derived from the Wittena-gemot of the Saxons, it is neceſſary, either to aſſign the time, when parliaments commenced, after the conqueſt, or to deny, that there ever was a Wittena-gemot, in each of the kingdoms of the heptarchy. The former of theſe is next to impoſſible, unleſs we depend upon mere conjectures, inſtead of ſubſtantial arguments; and as for the latter, the aſſertors of the antiquity of parliaments advance ſeveral proofs, for the exiſtence of a Saxon Wittena-gemot, which they apprehend to carry along with them demonſtrative evidence. The firſt is founded on the title of the laws of Ina, king of Weſſex, which begins, thus: "I Ina, by the grace of "God, king of the Weſt-Saxons, with the "advice of Cenred my father, Hedda my "biſhop, with all my ealdormans, ſeniors, and "wiſe men of my nation, willing to eſtabliſh "good order in the ſtate, have ordained, &c." From whence it appears, that Ina, in making his laws, conſulted with the general aſſembly of Weſſex. That the ſame was eſtabliſhed in Mercia is evident from Bertulph's charter to the abbey of Croyland, in which are theſe words, "With the unanimous conſent of the preſent "council, aſſembled at Kingsbury, to debate "the affairs of the nation." The king ſubſcribed this charter, after the biſhops and lords, in the following manner: "I Bertulph, in the "preſence of all the biſhops and great men of "my kingdom;" which, convincingly, proves, that it was granted in the Wittena-gemot of Mercia. The ſame evidence might be produced, with reſpect to each of the other kingdoms; but, they ſay, the caſe will not admit of any diſpute.

The proofs for a Wittena-gemot in each kingdom.

They farther undertake to make it appear, that there was a general Wittena-gemot of the ſeven kingdoms, from the very name of heptarchy, which implies, that all the kingdoms had ſomething in common; and, conſequently, that there was an aſſembly-general, to determine all their common affairs. For example, how could they elect their monarchs or generals, without ſuch an aſſembly? but they advance more direct proofs of this matter. Several authors affirm, there was a general aſſembly, held in Gloceſterſhire, in which Ina, king of the Weſt-Saxons, was elected monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, by the intereſt of Sebba, king of Eſſex, who was preſent at it, with all the other kings. They alſo produce, from Ingulphus theſe words, in Witglaph king of Mercia's charter, "In the pre-"ſence of Ecbert, king of the Weſt-Saxons, E-"thelwulph his ſon, and the biſhops and great "lords of England, aſſembled at London;" which plainly ſhews, that this aſſembly was a general Wittena-gemot of the nation.

The proofs of a general Wittena-gemot of the whole heptarchy.

As to the objection, about the diverſity of the laws, during that period, they anſwer, that as Mercia and Weſſex were ſeparate ſtates, it is no wonder they ſhould have different laws, much leſs, that the Danes ſhould introduce their own laws into their conqueſts; but that it does not follow, from hence, that there was not a particular Wittena-gemot for each kingdom, or an aſſembly-general for all the ſeven. This inference is no leſs abſurd, than it would be to conclude, from the diverſity of laws and cuſtoms in the united provinces of the low-countries, that there was not a convention of the ſtates in each province, nor an aſſembly of the ſtates-general.

The anſwer to the objection, from the diverſity of the laws.

Beſides, they argue for the confirmation of theſe proofs, from the conformity, in this particular, between England and the other kingdoms of Europe. The Saxons had ſuch aſſemblies in Germany, as well as the Oſtrogoths, and after them, the Lombards in Italy; and the Francs had their field of Mars or May, ſanes, or parliaments, and the Spaniards their cortez, there being no other form of government, at that time, in Europe.

They farther add, that, in order to prove, that theſe aſſemblies are of a later date, than kingly power, it muſt be ſhewn, who were the ſovereigns, that, firſt, eſtabliſhed them in each kingdom; but what reaſon can be aſſigned, why all the European kings ſhould, at the ſame time, become ſo very condeſcending to their ſubjects? ſince it is, doubtleſs, much more reaſonable to imagine, they would rather have all agreed in aboliſhing, than in granting a privilege of this nature.

II. The

II. The Members of the WITTENA-GEMOT.

IT is univerſally owned, that the greater nobility, viz, the Ealdormans and thanes of the firſt rank, who were afterwards called earls and barons, were members of the Wittena-gemot; but the chief point in diſpute is, whether the thanes of the ſecond and third rank, and the ceorles, of whom the houſe of commons is compoſed, had a right to ſit in that aſſembly, by their repreſentatives, or not. Tho' the ſolution of this queſtion ſeems to be entirely unneceſſary, as the commons, now, inconteſtably enjoy this privilege; yet it is certainly of ſome conſequence to enquire, whether they uſurped this privilege, or received it, by the gracious conceſſions of the kings, or whether it be of the ſame antiquity with the royal power. Some are of opinion, that it would be dangerous to acknowledge, they derived this privilege, from the favourable indulgence of their ſovereigns; leſt the ſame power, which granted it, ſhould be led to revoke it, when occaſion offer'd, which was actually the caſe, in the reign of king James I. * and, indeed, it is evident, the principal and genuine motive of all the attempts, againſt the commons, in the preſent argument, and even of ſtarting this queſtion, was, to gratify ſuch of the kings, as have endeavour'd to enlarge the bounds of the royal prerogative.

The 1ſt argument againſt the commons.

However, they who aſſert, that the commons had no right to ſit in the Wittena-gemot, during the time of the Saxon kings, alledge, in defence of their opinion, firſt, that the under thanes or ceorles were not proprietors of land; and, therefore, they could have no concern in the regulation of the affairs of a country, which properly belonged to the king and the nobility. They add, that as nobles of the firſt rank might diſtribute their lands, on their own terms, it is not to be imagined, that they would place their tenants, on a level with themſelves, or agree to make their vaſſals their companions. Beſides, they affirm, that people, in theſe days, were not in the ſame condition, as at preſent; that, notwithſtanding their freedom, it was confined within narrow limits; that they were under greater ſubjection to the nobles, than at this day; that they ſerv'd in the wars, as foot-ſoldiers who were conſidered, as ſervants, and ſtiled knechter i. e. ſervants in the Saxon language.

The anſwer to it.

To this argument, the advocates for the commons reply, that ſince the nobles, who held their lands of the king, had a right to ſit in the Wittena-gemot, the commons, who held their lands of the nobles, were entitled to the ſame privilege alſo. They add, that the principal buſineſs of the aſſembly-general was to enact laws, as well for the people as the nobles, viz. to ſettle the rights of the ſubjects, to preſerve the publick tranquillity, and to levy taxes, of which the people paid the moſt conſiderable part; and, conſequently, it was very reaſonable in itſelf, as well as agreeable to the cuſtom of the Saxons, that people ſhould give their conſent to all the reſolutions made, on theſe occaſions. They farther alledge, that if the people had no concern in the debates of the great council, it is not to be imagined, that it ſhould expreſs ſuch a tender regard for their rights and privileges, and be ſo ſollicitous in preventing their being oppreſs'd by the grandees; ſince it is notorious, that mankind, in general, eſpecially the great, uſually exert themſelves to increaſe, but never to diminiſh their own power and authority.

Another argument againſt the commons.

But, as this diſpute turns upon matter of fact, which cannot be determined by bare reaſonings, both parties attempt to eſtabliſh their reſpective opinions, by authorities; and, with this view, they inſiſt on certain terms, to be found in the charters of the Anglo-Saxon kings, and in the hiſtorians who ſpeak of the government of the Anglo-Saxons. I ſhall begin with the teſtimonies that are produced to prove, that neither the commons, nor their repreſentatives, were members of the general aſſembly.

Firſt of all, it is affirmed, that the very name of Wittena-gemot evidently declares, that the great council conſiſted only of ſuch as were ſtiled Wittan, which, in its preciſe meaning, is the ſame with majores natu, ſeniores, or ealdormen, i.e. the earls and barons, or, in the language of the Saxons, the ealdormen and king's thanes, eccleſiaſticks and laicks; and, to this purpoſe, they cite a paſſage out of Bede's Eccleſiaſtaical Hiſtory, as tranſlated by Alfred. Bede tells us, that king Oſwald made application to the majores natu of Scotland, for a biſhop; and Alfred renders theſe majores natu, by Ealdormen. The ſame hiſtorian, in the ſame place, ſays, that Oſwald made uſe of ſuis ducibus & miniſtris, for interpreters, which Alfred tranſlates by his Ealdormans and thanes. From hence, they conclude, that the term Wittan ſignifies no more than ealdormen and barons, or in general, the chief men of the nation; and that, therefore, the Wittena-gemot was entirely compoſed of ſuch perſons. For the farther confirmation of this point, they alledge, that the hiſtorians render the word Wittan, in Latin, by principes, optimates, proceres, magnates, duces, comites, præpoſiti, miniſtri regis, nobiles & milites, which can, at no rate, be applied to the people or their repreſentatives.

The anſwer to it.

Their adverſaries, in anſwer to this objection, advance the ſame authorities to prove, that the greater nobility were not the ſole conſtituent parts of the Wittena-gemot; and they aſſert alſo, that the very expreſſions, quoted by the contrary party, ought not to be ſo reſtrained to the nobility, as to exclude the magiſtrates and chief men among the people. To confirm their aſſertion, they quote innumerable paſſages from the Latin authors, in which the words principes, nobiles, &c. are to be taken in their ſenſe and meaning.

* This prince often intimated to the commons, that he believed it to be in his power to revoke their privileges, which he apprehended to have no other foundation, than the royal conceſſions of his predeceſſors.

The

The others again reply, that the term, people, is capable of two different ſenſes; firſt, as it ſignifies a nation, in general, and then, by magnates, proceres, &c. they own, may be underſtood the chief men of the people, or the whole nation; but the other meaning of the word, people, is reſtrained to a part of the people, as diſtinguiſhed from the nobility. This is the ſenſe to which the cited paſſages muſt be applied; whereas, according to them, there are no ſuch expreſſions to be met with in Latin authors, as optimates plebis, but always populi, i.e of the people in general. Moreover, they affirm, that their adverſaries are obliged to prove, that the word, people, muſt be taken in that ſenſe, in the cited paſſages, unleſs they would take for granted the very point in queſtion.

The advocates for the commons, on the contrary, freely acknowledge, that theſe expreſſions principally mean noble perſons; but yet they aſſert, their meaning is not to be limited to nobles of the firſt rank. In England, indeed, they grant, the greater nobility, or peers of the realm, are a diſtinct order from the leſſer nobility, who are ranked among the commons; tho' they will not allow it to be a conſequence, that the Latin expreſſions are to be explained, by this diſtinction, which is not made uſe of, in any other country. For example, in France, the meaneſt gentilhomme is as much a nobleman, as the higheſt lord; ſince there is but one body of the nobility in that kingdom.

It were to be wiſhed, that this enquiry had not been reduced to a grammatical diſpute; but, as I have undertaken to give an impartial ſtate of the caſe, I thought my ſelf obliged to take notice of the arguments, on both ſides of the queſtion, tho' drawn from the meaning of certain expreſſions. However, from what has been ſaid, by one party, it plainly appears, that the great lords had a right to ſit in the Wittena-gemot, which is univerſally acknowledged; tho' it does not ſeem to be a neceſſary conſequence, that the commons were excluded, the very point in diſpute. On the contrary, the arguments, advanced by the other party, rather prove, that the reaſons, for the excluſion of the commons, are not ſatisfactory, than that they actually were members of the Wittena-gemot. I ſhall proceed, therefore, to another ſort of arguments, in favour of the commons.

Another argument, in behalf of the commons.

The firſt is founded on the words of Henry of Huntingdon, who ſays: "King Sigebert growing incorrigible, the great men and people of "Weſſex, aſſembled together, in the beginning "of the ſecond year of his reign, unanimouſly "conſented to depoſe him." They infer, from this paſſage, that, as the people are placed, in oppoſition to the great men, the commons muſt be underſtood; and, conſequently, that they gave their votes in the aſſembly-general.

To confirm this matter, they cite a paſſage in another hiſtorian, who affirms, "That, in the "reign of Edward the elder, were aſſembled "the biſhops, abbots, the faithful ſubjects or "vaſſals, the great men and the people, in the "kingdom of Weſſex." They aſſert, that, by the fideles or faithful ſubjects, which may be explained by vaſſals or liege-men, muſt be meant the people, as diſtinct from the nobles, as the fideles and the people are actually diſtinguiſhed from the great men.

They alſo quote another, in Ethelwulph's charter of tythes, viz. "Theſe things were "granted by the king, barons, and people."

Theſe proofs are confirmed by two charters, the firſt of which is that of king Ethelred, in behalf of the abbey of Wolverhampton, which concludes, thus: "Theſe are the decrees of Sigeric "archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the court held "before king Ethelred, the archbiſhop of York, "the biſhops, abbots, ſenators, the chiefs, and "people of the whole country."

In the other, granted by Edward the Confeſſor, to the abbey of Weſtminſter, are theſe words: "I have ordered, therefore, this char-"ter of my donation to be read, on the day of "the dedication of the ſaid church, in the pre-"ſence of the biſhops, abbots, earls, and great "men of England, and before all the people."

Anſwer againſt the commons.

To invalidate theſe proofs, the oppoſers of the commons ſay, firſt, that the moſt of theſe hiſtorians lived, when the commons ſate in parliament; and, therefore, they repreſent the affairs of the Anglo-Saxons, according to the practice of their own times. Secondly, they obſerve, as to the charters, that they were originally writ, in Saxon, and, conſequently, theſe Latin quotations are no more than tranſlations; which muſt be compared with their originals, in order to form a judgment of their faithfulneſs, whereas they are all loſt. For example, the word, baron, occurs in thoſe charters, which was never in uſe among the Saxons, being introduced by the Normans. Thirdly, they farther alledge, that ſome of the cited paſſages only prove, that the decrees of the Wittena-gemot were made, in the ſight of the people, who, perhaps, expreſs'd their being pleaſed with what was tranſacted, by ſhouts and acclamations. This evidently appears, they tell us, from the charter of Ethelwulph, above-mentioned, which runs, thus: "There were preſent the "archbiſhops and biſhops of England, Buthred "king of Mercia, Edmund king of Eaſt-Anglia, "and a great number of abbots, abbeſſes, "dukes, earls, and great men, of the whole "kingdom, and, of other faithful ſubjects, a "great multitude, who all approved of this "royal act, to which the dignified perſons ſub-"ſcribed their names." As the great men, alone, ſigned the charter, they argue, that their approbation, alone, was neceſſary. Beſides, what can be the meaning of a great multitude of faithful ſubjects? Was it the whole body of the people? This will not be ſaid by thoſe who aſſert, that the commons ſate in the Wittena-gemot, by their repreſentatives, as at this day; and, indeed, this great multitude cannot well bear that conſtruction, being much more capable of being applied to crowds of people, met together to ſhout and make acclamations. Finally, they remark, that, in all the foreſaid paſſages, the term, fideles, is ſtrangely miſapplied, when it is made to ſignify the repreſentatives of the commons; ſince it extends to all ſubjects, in general, as well to the body of the nobility, as of the people.

Another more direct argument for the commons.

The advocates for the commons, that they may, more directly, prove their aſſertion, quote other paſſages, in which the meaning of theſe expreſſions is limited to the repreſentatives of the people, by the term procuratores; for, in a charter, dated 811, it is affirmed, that Cenulph, king of Mercia, convened, in order to dedicate the monaſtery of Winchelchomb, "the great men of the kingdom, the biſhops, procuratores, &c."

The anſwer to it.

To this, it is replied, that the occaſion of this aſſembly was only the dedication of a church and monaſtery, on which account, he called together a great number of people, and, particularly, ſuch as were diſtinguiſhed by their birth or employments; but, admitting it to be a real Wittena-gemot, the term, procuratores, is too general to denote the repreſentatives of the people, unleſs it be joined with ſome other word to reſtrain its ſignification.

The reply to that anſwer.

In order to do this, the other party cite a paſſage, in a charter granted by king Athelſtan to the abbey of Abingdon, in 931, which concludes, thus: "Granted at the royal vill Ætwelope, in "the preſence of the biſhops, abbots, dukes, "earls, and patriæ procuratoribus." Now, they ſay, theſe patriæ procuratores muſt, of courſe, be the repreſentatives of the people; but their adverſaries affirm, this is no more than a conjecture, unleſs they could prove it to be an expreſſion commonly made uſe of, in that time.

The laſt argument in favour of the commons.

Laſtly it is advanced, in behalf of the commons, that there are, at this day, ſeveral hamlets *, which ſend repreſentatives to parliament; becauſe, if they had not a right to this privilege, when they were cities or boroughs, it is highly improbable, they ſhould have received it, ſince they were become ſo mean and inconſiderable.

The anſwer.

To enervate the force of this argument, it is replied, that it is altogether inconcluſive, unleſs it could be prov'd, that theſe boroughs, now hamlets, were reduced to their deſpicable condition, before the conqueſt; and, even in this caſe, it would not be ſufficient, ſeeing they might be rebuilt and deſtroyed again, during the civil wars, with which England was ſo often infeſted, after the commons were admitted to the right of ſending repreſentatives to parliament.

The advocates for the commons, to all their other arguments, ſubjoin, that, in all the other European ſtates, the people made a part of the general aſſemblies. Tho' I have, hitherto, only preſented to the reader's view the reaſons, on both ſides of the queſtion; yet I cannot paſs over this laſt argument, tho' I have no view of invalidating the reſt, without this remark, that it has not the leaſt foundation. This I ſhall prove, at leaſt, with reſpect to France, by the authority of three writers, who had the reputation of being thoroughly acquainted with the cuſtoms of that kingdom.

Mezeray's Abſtract, &c. of the Cuſtoms of the VIIIth Century.

The firſt is that of Mezeray, who, treating on this ſubject, expreſſes himſelf, thus: "I find "there were three ſorts of aſſemblies, in thoſe "days; the general courts of the provinces, the "champs de mai, at which were preſent the "ſeniores and majores natu of the people, "where military affairs were chiefly debated; "and the conventus, colloquia, parliaments, "where the biſhops, abbots, and other great "men met, to make laws and regulate the af-"fairs, relating to the adminiſtration of juſtice, "the civil government, and the publick reve-"nues, &c. Theſe two laſt aſſemblies were "confounded together." From hence, it appears, that none, except the great men, were members of the parliaments; but, as it may be objected, that, by the ſeniores and majores natu at the champs de mai, are meant the repreſentatives of the people, I ſhall relate what preſident Fauchet obſerves, on the ſame occaſion.

Fauchet's Antiquities of France, l. 6.

This learned author takes notice of a ſpeech that was ſhewn him, under the name of Boniface, archbiſhop of Mayence, in which that prelate repreſented to Pepin, that the Gauls omnium ordinum, of all orders and degrees, had placed him on the throne. "This ha-"rangue, that hiſtorian aſſures us, is, doubt-"leſs, a forgery. Firſt, becauſe the Francs "never ſtiled themſelves Gauls. Secondly and "chiefly, by reaſon of the terms, omnium or-"dinum, which were not uſed, in thoſe days; "for none but biſhops, abbots, earls, and no-"bles ſate in the general courts or parlia-"ments; and the earls, commiſſioners, or de-"legates, laid before the aſſembly the com-"plaints of the people, in their reſpective ter-"ritories.

Paſquier Recherches, &c. l. 2. c. 7.

Paſquier is ſtill more expreſs and particular on this ſubject, who ſays: "Altho' ſome, who "pretend to be well vers'd in the hiſtory of "France, think, that the aſſembly of the ſtates-"general is of a very long duration, and fix the "liberties of the people on this foundation; "yet both theſe aſſertions are groundleſs. I "freely own, that formerly in Gaul, before "the conqueſt of Julius Cæſar, there were ge-"neral aſſemblies, which he continued, under "a pretence, very familiar to the Romans, of "leaving us in the poſſeſſion of our antient "rights and privileges; but the common peo-"ple, who were regarded, as ſo many cyphers, "had not a place in any of theſe aſſemblies. "We may, alſo, meet with, under the firſt and "ſecond families of our kings, ſolemn conven-"tions, called parliaments, the principal ſinews "of our monarchy; but to theſe none, except "the princes, great lords, nobles, and dignified "churchmen were ſummoned. Now, in our "aſſemblies of the three eſtates, not only the "the common people have a right to ſit with "the clergy and nobility, but are the beſt and "moſt numerous part. How, then, was it "brought about, that, within ſome centuries "of years, the commons have been admitted "to a place in our conventions, in which the "affairs of the kingdom, in general, are de-"bated. This I ſhall endeavour to account "for." Upon this, he proceeds to aſſign the reaſons, why the common people were called to parliaments, the original of which he dates, from the reign of Philip le Bel, which commenced, in 1286. So far, then, is the former practice, in France, from countenancing the opinion of the advocates for the commons of England, that, on the contrary, it directly confutes it.

Having,

Remarks on this diſpute.

Having, thus, taken a view of the ſtate of this controverſy, the reader will, I doubt not, be ſurprized, that the arguments, on both ſides, ſhould be founded on bare conjectures; ſince he might naturally have expected, they would have had a more ſolid foundation. However, from what has been ſaid, he may form a judgment of this affair; as I have not omitted any thing material, of what has been alledged, pro and con, tho' I have have done it, in a very compendious manner.

Seeing moſt of the arguments, in the preſent diſpute, are drawn from the charters of the Anglo-Saxon kings, I ſhall offer one remark, which deſerves to be conſidered, before we paſs ſentence, viz. that the authority of all theſe charters is called in queſtion by the beſt Engliſh hiſtorians; becauſe the uſe of charters, in England, was unknown, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons. When the king made a grant of any thing to the church, or to a private perſon, he put them in poſſeſſion, by delivering to them a green turf, bough, or the like. Ingulphus tells us: "Formerly, the poſſeſſion of lands was "given by bare words, without any charters or "other writings; as they only delivered to the "donee or purchaſer a helmet, ſword, horn, or "cup and ſometimes a ſpur, bow arrow, &c." From this cuſtom, it is inferr'd, that the charters, under the name of the Anglo-Saxon kings, were all forged, in later times; but, to account for the many charters that bear date, before there were any made uſe of, they alledge a matter of fact, which, if genuine, ſufficiently, anſwers their purpoſe. They aſſure us, that William the Conqueror, perceiving that many of the crown-lands were alienated, particularly to the monaſteries, ſummon'd the abbots to appear before him, to produce their titles to their eſtates. Some of them, who had nothing to plead, but a long poſſeſſion, being ejected, becauſe the king would allow no title valid, except it was in form, a great number of monks began to forge charters, giving them all the plauſible gloſſes in their power. Theſe that were produced, in Latin, king William rejected, it being vaſtly improbable, that the Saxon kings ſhould grant their charters in a language, very little underſtood and ſtill leſs uſed, in their days; but, whether this be fact, or not, it is evident, that ſeveral of theſe charters, repreſented by ſome to be authentick, were forged, long after the date they bear; at leaſt, it would be very difficult to prove, that thoſe, from whence the arguments, to decide the preſent controverſy, are taken, were made, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons.

Hiſtory of Croyland.

From the whole, it appears, that this is a very intricate point, and that there is not the leaſt probability of its being ever ſet in a clearer light; ſince almoſt all the antient monuments were buried in the ruins of the monaſteries, either before or after the Norman conqueſt.

III. The Authority of the WITTENA-GEMOT, and the Affairs therein debated.

THis ſubject cannot be treated on, to purpoſe, unleſs we conſider the three following queſtions, which are as warmly diſputed, as any of the preceding.

I. In whom the legiſlative power was veſted?

II. Whether the king could levy taxes, without the conſent of the Wittena-gemot?

III. Whether the aſſembly-general had a right to elect and depoſe their kings?

1. In whom the legiſlative power was veſted?

The higheſt aſſertors of the royal prerogative affirm, that the legiſlative power entirely reſided in the king; and, to prove this, they appeal to the terms made uſe of by the Saxon kings, which ſeem to declare, that they were the ſole enactors. To this it is replied, that, tho' there is no mention made of the conſent of the Wittena-gemot, it does not, therefore, follow, that it was not neceſſary; any more than it would be reaſonable to infer, at this day, from thoſe expreſſions, the ſtatutes of king Charles I. or II. that theſe ſtatutes were enacted, without the conſent or authority of parliament; and to prove, more directly, that the conſent of the Wittena-gemot was neceſſary, in enacting laws, they quote ſeveral authorities to ſhew, that the king acted nothing, in this reſpect, without the conſent of the eſtates.

The firſt is taken from the title of the Weſt-Saxon laws of king Ina, which declares, that they were enacted, "with the advice and con-"ſent of the biſhops, great men, earls, wiſe-"men, ſeniors, and people of the whole king-"dom."

Ecbert ſays, in one of his charters, "I Ec-"bert, king of the Weſt-Saxons, cum licentia "and conſenſu, with the permiſſion and con-"ſent of our whole nation, and the unanimous "advice of all the great men, &c."

But, if it be objected, that this is a charter, not a law, the teſtimony of king Alfred is produced, who, in the title of his laws, ſpeaking as if he acted, by his ſole authority, concludes, thus: "I Alfred, king of the Weſt-Saxons, "ſhewed theſe laws to my wiſe-men, who "ſaid, they all liked or were well pleaſed, that "they ſhould be obſerved."

At the end of king Athelſtan's laws, we are told: "All theſe things were confirmed and "decreed by a general aſſembly, held at Graet-"ly, at which was preſent archbiſhop Elfin, "with all the great men king Athelſtan could "aſſemble together."

The title of ſeveral of his other laws runs, thus: "Theſe are the laws, that were inſtitut-"ed by the wiſe-men at Exeter;" and thoſe prefixed to the laws of Edgar and Ethelred II. are delivered in almoſt the very ſame terms.

In a charter of Canute the great, granted to the abbey of St. Edmunds-bury, are theſe words: "I Canute, king of the whole iſland of Al-"bion and many other nations, by the advice "and decree of the archbiſhops, biſhops, ab-"bots, earls, and all my other faithful ſubjects, "have " have ordained, &c." This authority is the more valid, as Canute ſucceeded to the crown, by the right of conqueſt, and, conſequently, would not have ſought the concurrence of the eſtates, if it had not been agreeable to the antient cuſtoms of the kingdom.

In a word, it is affirmed, that, if the expreſſions of ſome of the kings ſeem to intimate, that they acted, by their ſole authority, they are not to be taken in a literal ſenſe, being explained by thoſe of other kings, who acknowledge, they acted in conjunction with the Wittena-gemot; ſince it is highly improbable, that ſovereign princes would ever own their power to be limited, if it was not, in reality, reſtrained within certain bounds. If it be a fair conſequence, from ſuch words as theſe, that the kings made laws, without the conſent of the Wittena-gemot, it will follow, by parity of reaſon, that the king is inveſted with abſolute power, in this reſpect, at this very day; becauſe, in ſome particular acts, he declares, that he wills and requires, altho' it is notorious, his will would be of no force, without the conſent of both houſes of parliament.

The ſame reaſonings are applied to the ſecond queſtion, or the impoſition of taxes; for tho' ſome paſſages, at firſt view, ſeem to imply, that the Saxon kings raiſed money, by their own authority, we are not to imagine, that this was done, without the conſent of the Wittena-gemot, which, we have ſeen, was neceſſary, on other occaſions. 2. The levying of taxes.

I ſhall not enter upon the third queſtion, about the electing and depoſing of the kings, in this place, becauſe I ſhall have an opportunity of treating on theſe points, under the article of the ſucceſſion.

IV. The Authority of the WITTENA-GEMOT, in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs.

BEfore the Anglo-Saxons embraced chriſtianity, it was one of their fundamental conſtitutions, which Tacitus aſcribes alſo to the antient Germans, that all the important affairs of the nation were determined, by the conſent of the aſſembly-general; and, therefore, it is no wonder, that in religious matters were ſettled in their Wittena-gemots, as I have, above, obſerved, ſince they are of the greateſt importance to mankind, in general. Accordingly, Edwin, king of Northumberland, before he eſtabliſhed the chriſtian religion in his dominions, conſulted his wiſe-men, i.e. his Wittena-gemot; and the maxim, that no laws are of any force, without the conſent of the whole nation, has been, all along, conſider'd by the Engliſh, as the foundation of their liberty and government. Bede.

The eccleſiaſtical affairs, that related to the clergy alone, as a diſtinct body from the laity, were left to the ſole management of the eccleſiaſticks, in their councils or ſynods; but thoſe which concerned the body of people, as chriſtians, were regulated in the mixed conventions, conſiſting of the chief men of the clergy and nobility. Thus, they acted in conformity to the rules of equity. They thought it unjuſt to enact civil laws, that obliged the clergy, as members of the ſtate, without their approbation; as they likewiſe believed it to be unreaſonable, that the clergy ſhould make eccleſiaſtical laws, to bind the laity, as chriſtians, without the conſent of the Wittena-gemot or the repreſentatives of the nation. They proceeded, in both theſe inſtances, on the ſame principle of juſtice; and, accordingly, the Wittena-gemots were, for the moſt part, mixed aſſemblies, which determined all affairs of importance, as well eccleſiaſtical as civil. The Wittena-gemot was a mixed aſſembly.

I ſhall produce a few inſtances, from the laws of the Anglo-Saxons, to prove this point, the caſe being too plain, to require a copious enlargement. In 673, a council was held, in which Theodore, archbiſhop of Canterbury, preſided; and ten canons of the antient general councils were ratified, as has been already related. Now, this aſſembly was not, merely, an eccleſiaſtical ſynod; becauſe, beſides the biſhops, " all the kings and great men of Eng- " land were preſent," as an hiſtorian informs us; and, therefore, it was a mixed council, a Mycel-ſynod, a real Wittena-gemot. The terms council and ſynod, at preſent, are appropriated to eccleſiaſtical aſſemblies; but, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, they were applied to all ſorts of great aſſemblies. Thus, in the reign of Edward the elder, an aſſembly was held, which ſettled the articles of a treaty between that prince and Guthurn, to whom Alfred had given Eaſt-Angla, which was evidently an affair ſtate; and yet this very aſſembly enacted ſeveral eccleſiaſtical laws, which, in the preamble, are termed ſenatus-conſulta, being made by the Witan, i. e. the great men of Weſſex and Eaſt-Anglia. Among theſe laws, beſides ſeveral that were entirely political, there are ſome that have the following titles, " Of apo- " ſtates, of the puniſhment of perſons in holy " orders, of inceſt, of faſts, &c." which plainly ſhew, that theſe political aſſemblies enacted laws, about religious affairs. An hiſtorian tells us, that king Athelſtan called a council, which enacted many laws, both eccleſiaſtical and civil; and, conſequently, it was not an aſſembly of eccleſiaſticks, ſince it has never been pretended, that the clergy were inveſted with a power to make ſecular laws. Proofs of it. M. Weſt.

It is alſo made apparent, from ſeveral particulars, that the biſhops were both elected and deprived by the Wittena-gemot. Wilfred, biſhop of York, was choſen by the two kings of Northumberland and the general council of that kingdom, according to Heddius, the author of his life; and Wulſtan was made biſhop of Worceſtor in curia, i. e. the great aſſembly, which was ſtiled the court or the king's court. Ingulphus, abbot of Croyland, ſays: " For many " years, there has not been an election abſo- " lutely free and canonical; but all eccleſia- " ſtical dignities were conferr'd by the king's " court, according to their pleaſure." The Wittena-gemot often elected biſhops,

As the biſhops were elected, ſo they were likewiſe degraded by the Wittena-gemot. Brithelm, biſhop of Dorcheſter, being made archbiſhop and deprived them.

biſhop of Canterbury, was deprived of that ſee, by king Edgar, to make way for Dunſtan; and Osbern, the monk, gives the following account of this tranſaction: "Within a few days, after Brithelm had been promoted to the ſee of Canterbury, not thinking himſelf qualified for this great dignity, he departed to his former church, by the command of the king and the people." Another author tells us: "Edgar obliged Brithelm to deſcend, the ſame way he aſcended; for, having called a council, on this very occaſion, he objected ſeveral articles againſt him, and, by the order and conſent of his barons, ſent him back to the church of Dorcheſter." In the reign of Edward the Confeſſor, Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was ejected, by a decree of the Wittena-gemot; and the papal power could not procure the election of Stigand, who was choſen in his room, to be made null and void, nor prevent the Engliſh from owning his archiepiſcopal authority, tho' he was ſuſpended by the pope, during the government of the Saxons.

Jo. Wallingford.

From theſe inſtances, it appears, that the Wittena-gemot was an eccleſiaſtico-political aſſembly, in which all affairs, both of church and ſtate, were debated; tho' ſoon after, under the Norman kings, the clergy aſſumed the privilege of ſettling, a-part from the laity, in eccleſiaſtical aſſemblies or ſynods, all matters relating to religion.

I now proceed to treat of the king, in particular, viz. his prerogatives, revenues, and ſucceſſion to the crown.

Of the KING.

The power of the kings was limited.

I Have, already, ſhewn, that the Saxon government, in Germany, was ariſtocratical; and that they had only a general to command their armies, in time of war. The Saxon leaders, upon their conqueſts in Great-Britain, aſſumed the title of king; tho' they were conſider'd by their ſubjects, at firſt, as on a level with their governors in Germany, whoſe power was far from being abſolute or deſpotical. Some, indeed, aſſert, that theſe firſt kings had an unlimited power, by the right of conqueſt; from whence, they conclude, that the privileges of the Engliſh ſubjects are either conceſſions of the kings, or uſurpations of the people. This argument would have had ſome force, if the privileges of the Britons, who were conquered, had been the point in diſpute; but the queſtion relates to the privileges of the Saxons or Engliſh, who were themſelves the conquerors, ſince there remained, in the country they ſubdued, a very ſmall number of Britons, who were regarded, as ſo many ſlaves. Now, as it cannot be ſaid, the Anglo-Saxons loſt any of their antient rights, by their own conqueſts, it follows, they continued in the ſame ſtate they were in before, in Germany, i. e. a free people, under the conduct of their head or chief, whoſe power was limited by law.

Doubtleſs the regal authority, by degrees, exceeded its original bounds in England, as well as in other kingdoms; but, the hiſtory of the Anglo-Saxons being extremely imperfect, I ſhall only take notice of ſome of the chief prerogatives enjoyed by their kings, during the Saxon government.

One of the principal prerogatives of the Saxon kings was the power of appointing the earls, viſcounts, judges, and other officers, as well civil as military; tho' ſome affirm, that the dukes or holds of each province were elected by the Shire-gemot or aſſembly of the county. It is highly probable, the king might remove theſe officers, at his pleaſure, of which there are ſeveral inſtances in hiſtory; but yet it is not abſolutely certain, becauſe, tho' ſuch officers were turned out by the king, it is not a neceſſary conſequence, that he did this, without the the conſent or previous ſentence of the Wittena-gemot.

Another conſiderable prerogative of the crown was, that no laws could be made in the Wittena-gemot, without the royal aſſent, the executive power being committed to the king.

The king had likewiſe a power to pardon malefactors, with reſpect to ſuch offences as related to the publick; but, as to thoſe which concerned private perſons, the king's pardon did not prevent the offended party, from inſiſting on ſatisfaction for the injuries he had received. This ſatisfaction was termed Wiregeld, i. e. a compenſation made to the perſon injured, or his friends and relations. From hence, was derived the cuſtom in England, at this day, of appeals, in the caſe of murder; and for the ſame reaſon, the following clauſe is uſually inſerted, in all pardons, "ita tamen ut ſtet rectus in curia "noſtra, ſi quis adverſus eum loqui voluerit."

The coining of money was alſo one of the royal prerogatives, which he could grant, by charter, to whom he pleaſed, as ſeveral of the Saxon kings did to the two archbiſhops and others; but the king could neither enhance nor debaſe the coin. The Mirror of Juſtices recites it, as an antient law, that the king could not change the money, nor coin any other than ſilver, "without the conſent of all the counties."

It does not appear, whether it was abſolutely in the power of the Saxon kings, "to make war or peace," without the conſent of the Wittena-gemot. Indeed, the power of making war, as at preſent, was not of any importance, ſince the king could not raiſe money, to carry it on, without the conſent of the eſtates; but the caſe is otherwiſe, as to the making of peace, becauſe the ſafety of a whole kingdom depends upon a good or bad treaty, as has been too often verified by experience. Theſe two prerogatives, tho' commonly joined together, are very different, as to their effects; for the people may, by refuſing their conſent, as to the raiſing of of money, hinder the fatal conſequences of an unjuſt or unneceſſary war; but how is it poſſible for them to prevent the effects of a pernicious peace, that is made, without their knowledge?

The king's revenues.

The king's revenues were divided into three branches. The firſt conſiſted in certain things, the ſtate ſupplied him with, for the ſupport of his houſhold, viz. corn, hay, cattle, and the like, which were uſually paid in kind. The ſecond branch was the produce of the demeſnes, or lands annexed to the crown, for publick uſes; and the king could not alienate any part of them, not even to the church, without the conſent of the eſtates. Accordingly, the antient charters of the Saxon kings, to the churches or monaſteries, were confirmed by the principal members of the Wittena-gemot, who ſigned them in this manner: "I. N. have ſubſcribed, "confirmed, approved, corroborated, &c." That this branch of the king's revenue was applied to publick uſes will appear, if we conſider, that, ſo lately, as the reign of Richard II. about the end of the XIVth century, the parliament ordered, that, for the future, the revenues of the king's demeſnes ſhould be employed in defraying the charge of his wars. The third branch, as at this day, conſiſted in certain taxes, laid on the people, upon preſſing occaſions, by the Wittena-gemot.

The kings, during the heptarchy, were not ſo fond of pompous titles, as their ſucceſſors, being all of them ſatisfied with that of king of their reſpective kingdoms; and the prince, who was elected monarch, did not, therefore, imagine, that he had a right to diſtinguiſh himſelf. Egbert, even upon his obtaining the ſovereignty over the ſeven kingdoms, never altered his former title of king of the Weſt-Saxons; Athelſtan was the firſt that ſtiled himſelf, Imperator; and Edmund was contented with, Rector and Gubernator Angliæ. Edgar aſſumed the title of king of the whole iſland of Albion; Canute the great took upon him that of king of Albion and many other nations; and ſome affected a Greek title, as Edgar, who ſtiles himſelf, Totius Angliæ Baſileus.

The coronation of the kings.

As for the coronation of the Anglo-Saxon kings, there was not any fixed time for that ceremony, either during the heptarchy, or after its diſſolution, it being performed, when they apprehended it to be moſt convenient. Before Egbert, the kings of Kent were crowned by the archbiſhops of Canterbury, thoſe of Northumberland by the archbiſhops of York, and the reſt by the biſhop of their capital; but, after he had united the heptarchy, at leaſt, four of the kingdoms, the archbiſhop of Canterbury laid a claim to this privilege, which, tho' cuſtomary, was, far from being neceſſary. Accordingly, even after this union, ſeveral kings were crowned by the archbiſhop of York and other biſhops; and, ſome affirm, Harold placed the crown on his own head. Sweyn, the firſt Daniſh king, was not crowned at all, tho' his authority was owned; and Edgar reigned, ſeveral years, in Weſſex, before his coronation. Edward the Confeſſor did not receive this ceremony, till ſix months after his proclamation, which is an evident proof, that it was not, in thoſe days, believed to be abſolutely neceſſary; and, conſequently, they who date the beginning of the reigns, from coronation-days, only occaſion great confuſion in chronology. This method of computation is ſo much the more uncertain, becauſe ſeveral kings repeated the ceremony of their coronation, at different times, as, particularly, Cerdick, the firſt king of Weſſex. The kings, at firſt, were crowned in the open air*, not in a church; and the hiſtorians expreſly tell us, that Athelſtan, Edmund, and Edred received the crown, in this manner.

* In the market-place of Kingſton upon Thames.

The form of the crown.

As for the form of their crowns, it was not extremely curious, at leaſt, not uniform; which appears from ſeveral impreſſions of the heads of the kings, taken from old Saxon coins, given us by Cambden and Spelman; for ſome have only a diadem of pearls, others a coronet with ſix rays or points, having flower-de-luces between, or pearls upon them, and Edward the Confeſſor has an imperial crown. This variety plainly proves, that, in England, as well as other kingdoms, there was not, in thoſe days, a ſtanding form for the crowns, but that each of the princes pleaſed his fancy.

The Succeſſion to the crown, in the time of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

Three opinions about the ſucceſſion.

THere are three different opinions, as to this article. The firſt is, that the crown was, all along, hereditary; the ſecond, that it was always elective; and the third, that it was neither hereditary nor elective, but that the kings might leave it, by will, to any of their ſons or relations, at their pleaſure. Tho' each of theſe opinions is ſtifly maintained, by its advocates, it is much more difficult to eſtabliſh any one of them, than to confute the others; on account of the imperfection of the hiſtory of the Anglo-Saxons, and, perhaps, their irregular proceedings, in this very particular. The arguments of the reſpective parties are, as follows.

The proofs of the crown's being hereditary.

The firſt aſſert, it is ſufficient to take a curſory view of the hiſtory of the Saxon heptarchy to be convinced, that the crown continued in the family of the firſt kings, whilſt there were any any male-heirs in being; and that, afterwards, there was no variation, in this reſpect, as the race of Egbert ſate on the throne, to the time of Edward the Confeſſor. Indeed, the Daniſh kings are to be excepted; but, as they uſurped the crown by force of arms, they ſay, no conſequence can be drawn from it, againſt their opinion.

The proofs for its being elective.

The ſecond attempt to prove, that the crown was elective, from the ſame hiſtory, as the lineal ſucceſſion was often interrupted; and, indeed, they produce inconteſtable proofs, that the king's brother frequently ſucceeded, before his ſons, and that remote branches of the royal family were preferred to the neareſt, inferring, from hence, that the people were veſted with the right of election. They add, that tho' the father was ſucceeded by the ſon, and ſometimes even for ſeveral generations, it is not a neceſſary conſequence, that the crown was hereditary; any more than that the imperial crown of Germany is ſo, becauſe it has remained, in the houſe of Auſtria, 250 years. To ſupport the right of election, they cite ſeveral paſſages in the hiſtorians, who ſay, "electus eſt in regem, he he was elected king," when they ſpeak of the kings that ſucceeded their fathers.

The anſwer.

To this, it is replied, that, indeed, the lineal ſucceſſion was ſometimes interrupted, by the means of fraud and violence; but that it ſtill preſerved its rights, ſince, in a little time, it was reſtored to its former condition. I take it to be needleſs to mention the particular inſtances, on which both parties found their aſſertions, as they have been already related in the hiſtory; and, beſides, the reader may, at his leiſure, ſee the ſucceſſions, in one view, in the genealogical tables of the Anglo-Saxon kings. As for that expreſſion, "he was elected," it is only made uſe of by authors, who wrote, long after the time of the Saxons, without conſidering the conſequences, as they only occaſionally touched on this head; and beſides, they affirm, that they have not faithfully tranſlated the original words in the Saxon Annals, ſeng to rice, which properly ſignify, regnum capeſſit, he took upon him the kingdom.

That the crown was at the king's diſpoſal.

They, who maintain the third opinion, object againſt the firſt, that the crown was not, therefore, hereditary, becauſe of its long continuance in one family; which they prove, from the foreſaid inſtance of the houſe of Auſtria. To the ſecond they alledge, that it does not follow, from the crown's not being hereditary, that it was elective; ſince there is another way, excluſive of both theſe, viz. that the kings nominated, whom they pleaſed, for their ſucceſſors. In confirmation of this, they inſiſt, on the practice of France, where, they ſay, the kings, ſo low as ſome of the ſecond royal family, have, thus, diſpoſed of their dominions, which was the real occaſion of ſo many diviſions in that kingdom; for, according to them, if it had been the right of the eldeſt ſon always to ſucceed his father, it is not to be imagined, that younger brothers would ſo often have appeared in arms, to force the elder to ſhare their fathers dominions with them. They alſo obſerve, that, had the crown of France been elective, it is improbable, that the French would have always elected as many ſovereigns, as the former king had left ſons; and, from the whole, they conclude, that the frequent partitions, during the firſt and ſecond royal families, were entirely made, by this diſpoſing power of the kings. Accordingly, Mezeray, ſpeaking of Aribert, king Dagobert's brother, expreſſeth himſelf, thus: "But as Aribert was young, and the "king his father had, perhaps, left him no part "of his dominions, in his will, Bernulph, his "mother's brother, in vain, attempted to pre-"vail on the Neuſtrians, to riſe in his favour." This cuſtom, as antient as the French monarchy itſelf, which, they pretend, has been made appear, is, doubtleſs, an argument, that the Anglo-Saxons had the like; ſince they lived at the ſame time, and came, as well as the Francs, from Germany, in the ſame century. If it be objected, that there were not any ſuch partitions made in the kingdoms of the heptarchy, they anſwer, there were ſome, tho' not very many. The kings of the heptarchy, being no more than petty princes, in compariſon of thoſe of France, took particular care not to divide their dominions, leſt there ſhould have been as many kingdoms as cities; tho' ſome of them, notwithſtanding, did make partitions of them. Penda, king of Mercia, before his death, placed Peda, his ſon, on the throne of Leiceſter, having erected that city and the adjacent country into a kingdom; and Ethelred, his ſon and ſucceſſor, gave Merowald, his brother, a part of his dominions, with the title of king of Hereford, which little kingdom Merowald left to his brother Mercelm. Oſwy, king of Northumberland, gave the kingdom of Deira to Alfred his natural ſon, as Ethelwulph did the kingdom of Kent, in his life-time, to Athelſtan; and, to the ſame purpoſe, they produce Ethelwulph's will, by which he ſo abſolutely diſpoſed of his dominions to his four ſons, that they were to ſucceed each other, without any regard to their iſſue, which was, accordingly, put in execution.

To this it is ſaid, that the princes, who were crowned, in their fathers life-time, were no more than ſo many viceroys; and that they who ſucceeded, by virtue of a will, in oppoſition to the eſtabliſhed order, were not admitted to the crown, without the authority, or, at leaſt, the conſent of the eſtates, which ſuppoſes a right of election in the ſubjects.

However, it is not ſo eaſy a matter to anſwer the argument, drawn from the proceedings of Canute the great, who, in the latter part of his reign, made uſe of all poſſible methods to convince the Engliſh, that he did not deſign any innovations in the government; and yet it is notorious, that he diſannulled his marriage-articles with Emma of Normandy, by appointing Harold to ſucceed him, in his will, whereas, according to the foreſaid contract, Hardicanute was the heir apparent to the crown. This inſtance ſeems to ſhew, that it was entirely in the king's power to make choice of his ſucceſſors; and tho' ſome diſputes aroſe, about this affair, after his deceaſe, it, at leaſt, proves that this prince believed, he had a power to diſpoſe of the crown, by will. The ſame inference may be drawn, with reſpect to Edward the Confeſſor; for whether he actually made a will, in behalf of the duke of Normandy, or only deſigned it, or gave him no more than a verbal promiſe, it is evident, he thought he had a right to ſettle the ſucceſſion, in that manner.

Theſe are the reaſons, for the three ſeveral opinions, in this important enquiry, which I call ſo, with a view to thoſe, who take it to be an affair of importance; for, as to myſelf, I cannot apprehend, that there is any neceſſity of having recourſe to the cuſtoms of the Anglo-Saxons, as a ſtandard for thoſe, that are to be obſerved, at this day.

The three opinions may be united.

It would not, perhaps, be impoſſible to form an idea of the Anglo-Saxon government, as to the ſucceſſion, by uniting the three opinions concerning it. It ſeems to me a very juſt inference, in favour of the firſt, that the crown was hereditary, from the reaſons, above, recited; and, with reſpect to the ſecond, it may be granted, that, upon extraordinary occaſions, the Wittena-gemot, conſidering itſelf, as the ſupreme legiſlator, aſſumed an abſolute authority. As to the third, it may be affirmed, that the kings had had a power of nominating their ſucceſſors, provided their choice was confirmed by the great council of the kingdom; and, accordingly, the kings, that were not the next in blood, always made the beſt uſe of the conſent of the eſtates, to make amends for the irregularity, in their acceſſion to the throne. This is alſo evident from Alfred's will, at the end of his Life publiſhed by Spelman *. By reconciling theſe three different opinions, the rules, for fixing the ſucceſſion, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, will be found to be much the ſame with thoſe, at this day. It is confeſſed, that the crown is hereditary; but the parliament in extraordinary caſes, claims a power of interrupting the ſucceſſion, and ſettling it on a more diſtant, to the prejudice of a nearer branch of the royal family. The hiſtory of England, ſince the conqueſt, affords us many inſtances, to this purpoſe, without inſiſting on thoſe of our own times. If it be objected, that the right of the king and parliament to ſuch a power is not univerſally granted, it may be replied, that, till the contrary is determined by a lawful authority, it is reaſonable to believe, that this power is lawfully veſted in the nation. They then, who attempt, to prove that the crown was elective, in the time of the Anglo-Saxons do very little, in favour of the parliament, which does not pretend to a power of interrupting the ſucceſſion, except on extraordinary occaſions; as, on the other hand, they who labour to ſhew, that the crown was hereditary, at that time, do not exceedingly prejudice the authority aſſumed by this auguſt body, in particular caſes. As for thoſe, who endeavour to make it appear, that the Saxon kings had an abſolute power to diſpoſe of the crown, as, in all probability, they do not pretend, that the preſent kings of England are veſted with it, they, in my opinion, debate a queſtion, that has more of curioſity in it than importance.

Of the Laws of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

Several ſorts of Saxon laws.

THere were not any laws common to the ſeven kingdoms, during the heptarchy, each of them having its own in particular; tho' it is highly probable, there was a great reſemblance among them all, as the inhabitants of the ſeven kingdoms were derived from the ſame German original. The firſt laws taken notice of, in hiſtory, are thoſe of Ethelbert, king of Kent, enacted about the time of the converſion of the Saxons; and we have likewiſe an account of thoſe of Ina, king of Weſſex and Offa king of Mercia; but doubtleſs, ſome of the other kings made laws, tho' they are not tranſmitted to us by the hiſtorians.

Bede, l. 2. c. 3.

The laws of Alfred and Edgar.

Upon the diſſolution of the heptarchy, Egbert's ſucceſſors either explained or extended thoſe already eſtabliſhed, or made new laws; the moſt famous of which are thoſe of Alfred the great, collected, according to his own confeſſion, from the beſt he could find, and eſpecially the laws of Ina and Offa. Edgar very ſtrictly put the laws of Alfred in execution, with his own additions and amendments; tho' it muſt be obſerved, that, when England was divided into two kingdoms, viz. Weſſex and Mercia, each of them having diſtinct laws, Canute the great obtained the conſent of the Wittena-gemot to thoſe, introduced, by the Danes into Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, There were, then, in England three ſorts of laws, the Weſt-Saxon, Mercian, and Daniſh, till Edward the Confeſſor united them all into one body †. As I propoſed only to give a general view of the government of the Anglo-Saxons, it will be ſufficient to mention ſome circumſtances, relating to their laws, which, in my opinion, merit the curioſity of thoſe who are ſtrangers to the Engliſh conſtitution.

The Saxon laws were either civil or criminal. The firſt of theſe concerned the lands or eſtates, which were of two ſorts, viz. Bocland and Socland. Bocland reſembled the lands, which we term Allodial, as it was free and hereditary, and alſo capable of being diſpoſed of by the proprietor, tho' he held it by a feudal tenure or in fee of a ſuperior lord, being properly what was, in other places, ſtiled Feudum honoratum; and this ſort of land was poſſeſſed by the nobility and the moſt conſiderable among the commons. Socland was in the hands of the ceorles, which they held of the lord, by the payment of a certain annual rent, or the performance of certain perſonal ſervices, being the ſame with a rural fief. I do not conceive it to be neceſſary, to enquire into the original of fees; becauſe it would carry me too far, and there is nothing, in this reſpect, peculiar to England. I ſhall only obſerve, that, according to Selden, they take their riſe from the North, being introduced into Germany, Italy, France, Spain, and England, by the Northern nations who ſettled in thoſe countries. It would likewiſe be too tedious a digreſſion, to enumerate all the laws, concerning the Bocland and Socland, eſpecially, as they are affairs, which are very abſtruſe and myſterious, to the generality of readers; and I ſhall, therefore, proceed to what is much more intelligible, and, conſequently, entertaining, namely, the criminal laws of the Anglo-Saxons.

The criminal laws. Juries.

Purſuant to the regulations of Alfred the great, all perſons, accuſed of any crime, enjoyed the privilege of being tried by their peers, which the Engliſh have preſerved, to this day, being one of the moſt valuable a nation can be poſſeſs'd of; for it protects the ſmall from the

* Ego Ælfredus-----totius Weſt-Saxoniæ, nobilitatis conſenſu pariter ac aſſenſu, Occidentalium Saxonum rex, &c. which plainly ſhews, that, tho' the king had the power of diſpoſing the crown, by will; yet it could not be done, without the aſſent and conſent of the eſtates.

† Theſe ſeveral ſorts of laws, eſtabliſhed in different parts of England, were the ſame in ſubſtance, differing rather in their mulcts, than in their canon, i. e. in the quantity of fines and amerciaments, than in the courſe and frame of juſtice. Reliq. Spelm. p. 49.

oppreſſions

oppreſſions of the great, and even from the caprice or paſſion of the king himſelf, of which there are ſeveral inſtances in the hiſtory of England. To form a right notion of the term, peer, it muſt be conſider'd, that there are, in England, only two degrees or orders of men, viz. the peers of the realm and commons. The dukes, marqueſſes, earls, viſcounts, barons, archbiſhops, and biſhops are peers of the realm, as well as peers among themſelves; ſo that the loweſt baron is the peer of the higheſt duke. All the reſt of the people are placed among the commons; inſomuch, that the meaneſt artificer is the peer of all below the rank of a baron. To be tried by one's peers, therefore, means, that the peers of the realm are judged by thoſe of their own order, i. e. the other lords; and that the commons are tried by the members of their own body, who, in this reſpect, are his peers or equals, how much ſoever they may differ, as to their birth or fortune. Indeed, every peer of the realm had a right to give his vote, at the trial of another peer; but the commons are tried by no more than twelve perſons of their own rank, whoſe verdict extends no farther than the matter of fact; upon which, the judge condemns or acquits the party accuſed, according to law. This privilege has been continually enjoyed by the Engliſh, from the time of Alfred the great; and, perhaps, that king only revived a cuſtom that had been, time out of mind, eſtabliſhed by the Saxons *.

Means of finding out the truth.

When the crime was not fully proved, or there was not ſufficient evidence to condemn or acquit the perſon accuſed, they had recourſe to ſeveral other means, to diſcover the truth. Firſt, they made uſe of an oath, which was adminiſter'd to the ſuſpected party, in order to prove his innocence; and he was not only obliged to take an oath himſelf, but to bring with him a certain number of perſons, to this day, called compurgators, who alſo, upon oath, atteſted his innocence.

Ordeal trials.

The ſecond means was the trial-ordeal †, i. e. by fire or water; and the fire-ordeal was of two ſorts. The perſon accuſed either held in his hand a red-hot piece of iron, from one to three pounds weight, according to the nature of his crime, or the evidence againſt him; or elſe he walked, barefoot and blindfold, over nine red-hot plough-ſhares, placed at certain diſtances. If he eſcaped, unhurt, he was declared innocent; but, if burnt, he was pronounced guilty. Perſons of quality were tried by the fire-ordeal; as is evident from the caſe of Emma, mother to Edward the Confeſſor. The trial, by water-ordeal, upon which were put peaſants and ſlaves, was made either by cold or ſcalding water. In that, by cold water, the party ſuſpected, having his hands and feet tied together, was thrown into a pond or river. If he ſunk, he was deemed guilty; whereas, if he floated on the ſurface of the water, he was declared innocent ‡. When ſcalding water was the teſt, the perſon accuſed plunged his arm into it, as far as the wriſt, and ſometimes up to the elbow. The trial, by cold water, was introduced by Lewis le Debonnaire and pope Eugenius II. inſtead of an oath, which was often the occaſion of perjury; and the Engliſh copied after their example.

Single combate.

Single combate was the third means of trial. When the evidence, againſt the perſon accuſed, was not ſufficient to convict him, he was allowed to vindicate his innocence, by challenging his accuſer to a ſingle combat; and, if the party was a woman, ſhe might ſubſtitute one, in her room, who was ſtiled her champion. This cuſtom did not prevail, in England, till the latter end of the Saxon monarchy, tho' it continued a long time in that kingdom.

Corſned.

The fourth method of trial was to give the perſon ſuſpected a bit of bread and cheeſe, conſecrated wirh a great number of ceremonies, who was obliged to take an ounce of each, faſting; and it was believed, if he was guilty, it would choke him, but, if innocent, he would ſwallow it with eaſe. The imprecation, pronounced, upon the delivery of the bread, after he had received the communion, runs thus: "May this bread, or this cheeſe, ſtick in his "throat; may his face turn pale, his limbs be "convulſed, and a dreadful alteration appear "in all the parts of his body, if he is guilty; "but, if innocent, may he eaſily ſwallow this "bread, or this cheeſe, conſecrated in thy "name, that all may know, &c." This method of trial was evidently taken from the waters of jealouſy among the Jews; and they, who forged the circumſtances of earl Goodwin's death, already related, in the reign of king Edward, had, doubtleſs, a view to this cuſtom. The bread, or cheeſe, being conſecrated, was ſtiled corſned, from the word ſnide or ſnidan, to cut a bit off, and corſe, to curſe, becauſe they believed, it entailed a curſe upon the guilty perſon. The church not only approved of all theſe means of trial, but preſcribed the ceremonies and forms of prayer; and the biſhops and prieſts officiated on theſe occaſions. There is a law of Canute the great, to the following purpoſe: "If a man be accuſed of murder, or "of having any concern in it, let him prove "his innocence to the relations and friends of "the perſon deceaſed; and, if there be occa-

Numb. vi.

* Sir William Temple tells us, that there are not wanting traces of this cuſtom, from the very inſtitutions of Odin, the firſt leader of the Aſiatick Goths or Getæ into Europe, as well as founder of that mighty kingdom round the Baltick ſea, from whence all the Gothick governments, in theſe north-weſt parts of the world, were derived. Accordingly, it is known to be as antient in Sweden, as any records or traditions of that kingdom, and ſtill remains in ſome provinces. The Normans introduced the terms jury and verdict, with many other law-terms; but the trials, by twelve men, are expreſly mentioned, in the firſt laws of Alfred and Ethelred.

† Somner derives this word, from Or a privative particle and Dal diſtinction or difference; ſo that it denotes an impartial judgment.

‡ Or, rather, on the contrary, which was really the caſe, ſinking was a ſign of innocence, and ſwimming of guilt. All theſe trials, which were carried on with great ſolemnity, and always under the management of the clergy, continued in practice, long after the conqueſt, being never publickly diſcountenanced, till the third year of the reign of Henry III.

" ſion, let him be put on the trial of the corſ-
" ned." It is, indeed, matter of amazement, that the Saxons and other nations, among whom theſe ridiculous cuſtoms prevailed, could, for ſo many ages, fancy, thoſe means of trial to be infallible; ſince one would naturally have imagined, that the numberleſs experiments of their uncertainty ſhould have convinced them of their error.

When the charge was clearly proved, the law ordained ſeveral ſorts of puniſhment, according to the nature of the offence; which principally conſiſted in fines, payable to the injured party, the earl, or the lord. Some crimes, however, were capital, viz. treaſon againſt the king or lord, wilful murder, and theft; but, tho' treaſon was death by the law, the perſon, convicted of it, might redeem his life, by paying the valuation of the king's or lord's head. Coining of money was not, at firſt, a capital crime, tho' the penalty, on the account of its pernicious conſequences, was very conſiderable; but Ethelred II. made it death, leaving it, at the ſame time, in the king's power to commute the puniſhment, for a fine. As for murder, the laws diſtinguiſh between that which was wilful and man-ſlaughter; the former of which, being the effect of premeditated malice, was puniſhed with death, and the puniſhment of the latter was only pecuniary. Theft or robbery was, in proceſs of time, made capital, tho' the firſt laws, to this purpoſe, permitted the thief to redeem his head, by a ſum of money.

Treaſon.

Coining.

Murder, and man-ſlaughter.

Theft.

All other offences were only fined, till the reign of Canute the great, who enacted that, in the caſe of adultery, the woman's noſe and ears ſhould be cut off; and that the adulterer ſhould be baniſh'd the realm. The fines were ſettled by law, according to the quality of the injured party, from the king to the peaſant; and, with reſpect to the malefactors, from an ealdorman to a ſlave. On ſome extraordinary occaſions, perſons, convicted of capital crimes, might redeem their lives, by giving to the king a part of their eſtates; but this was ſeldom the caſe, unleſs the quality or power of the criminal render'd it difficult or dangerous to put the laws in execution, of which the trial of earl Goodwin is a remarkable inſtance. This lord, as we have already ſeen, in the reign of king Edward, having enter'd the Thames, with a fleet, the king was obliged to reſtore him to his honours; but, as he had been baniſh'd by the aſſembly-general, it was neceſſary, that he ſhould be recalled alſo by their authority. Some formalities, therefore, were requiſite, in order to prevent his being called to an account hereafter; and this was the method of their proceedings. The earl being arrived at London, where the Wittena-gemot was aſſembled, the king himſelf, as his accuſer, ſaid: " Thou tray-
" tor, Goodwin, I charge thee with the death
" of my brother Alfred, whom thou haſt moſt
" traiterouſly murdered." The earl replied: My " lord, with all due reverence, I have neither
" murder'd nor betrayed your brother, and I am " willing to refer my caſe to the judgment of " your court." Upon this, the witneſſes being produced and examined, Leofrick, duke of Mercia, ſpoke, as follows: " It appears evident " to me, that prince loſt his life, by the advice
" of earl Goodwin; but, as he is one of the " moſt powerful lords in the kingdom, in my " opinion, 12 of us earls, who are his friends
" and relations, ſhould preſent as much gold,
" as we can carry in our hands, to the king,
" and ſupplicate for his pardon and reſtoration
" to his honours, upon his taking the oath of " allegiance." This propoſal being agreed to, 12 of the lords preſented a ſum of money to the king, which being accepted by him, he granted the earl a pardon; but the whole of this proceſs was a mere farce, becauſe Goodwin previouſly knew, what would be the reſult of it, or he would never have ſubmitted to their ſentence.

Other crimes were only fined.

Before I conclude this article of the laws of the Anglo-Saxons, it will be convenient to remark, that ſeveral falſely imagine, upon the peruſal of them, that the murder of the king, as well as of any other ſubject, was only puniſhable by a fine; but this error proceeds from confounding wilful murder and man-ſlaughter together, which ought to be careſully diſtinguiſhed, as they are in the laws of England, to this day; for Athelſtan's law *, which ſettles the fines for taking away the life of any man, from the king to the ſlave, relates to man-ſlaughter only, wilful murder being always conſider'd, as a capital crime.

The Cuſtoms and Manners of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

THE Anglo-Saxons introduced into England the virtues and vices of their country, tranſmitting them to their poſterity. Their valour, by which they obtained their conqueſts, both at home and abroad, was their diſtinguiſhing quality; for they were inured to arms, from their infancy, and it may be affirmed, that war was their only profeſſion. They even came to their Wittena-gemots, in an armed poſture; and they expreſs'd their approbation of what was there propoſed, by ſtriking their javelins, one againſt another. The ſword, club, battle-ax,

* In this law, the heads of all orders and degrees of men were valued, this valuation being termed, Wiregild, in the Saxon language. The king's head was valued at 30,000 thrimſa's, i.e. 360 l. each thrimſa, the ſame with peninga or ſceat, being ſuppoſed to be equivalent to 3 d. of our money; one half of this fine was paid to his relations, and the other to the ſtate. A prince's head was valued at 15000 thrimſa's; a biſhop's and ealdorman's at 8000; a general's at 4000; a ſpiritual and temporal thane's at 2000; which ſhews, that a thane was vaſtly inferior to a baron, whoſe valuation was, at leaſt, as high as that of a biſhop; and a ceorle's head was valued at 267 thrimſa's, unleſs he was poſſeſſed of five hides of land, and then his valuation was equal to that of a thane. Mr. Cambden's calculation of the Saxon money ſtands, thus: a peninga is three of our pence; a ſhilling 3 peninga's or 15 d; a pound 48 ſhillings, or three of our pounds; a manca, mancuſa, or marca 12 pence; and a manca of gold 30 peninga's or 7 s. 6 d.

or bill, and javelin were their uſual military weapons; and, as they did not uſe bows and arrows, their battles were more deſperate and bloody. Having darted their javelins, they immediately came to a cloſe engagement; and their dexterity, in handling their arms, gave them a ſignal advantage. It is certain that, towards the end of their monarchy, they were often defeated by the Danes, and, at length, by the Normans; but is there any nation, how valiant ſoever, that has not met with the like viciſſitudes and revolutions? A coward was looked upon to be the moſt ignominious character, of all others, among the Saxons; and their exalted opinion of martial valour was the reaſon, why it was ſo extremely difficult to bring about a reconciliation, after a quarrel. As each party dreaded the name of a coward, ſhould he make the firſt overtures of peace, the quarrel was continued, from father to ſon, and very ſeldom ended, but with the utter extinction of one of the families *. It is no wonder, then, that the Saxons, who were of ſuch a warlike temper, being alſo accuſtomed, from their childhood, to fear neither blows nor wounds, and, on all occaſions, animated by the examples of their relations and friends, ſhould encounter dangers, and even ſtare death in the face, with all imaginable intrepidity and reſolution. Accordingly, there never was a nation more remarkable for bravery than the Saxons; and all the world knows, that this is the diſtinguiſhing character of the Engliſh, at this very day.

The Saxons were extremely devoted to religion, even before their converſion to chriſtianity, being the moſt zealous, in the ſervice of their gods, of all the other pagan idolaters, as they ſacrificed their priſoners of war on their altars; and, no ſooner had they embraced the goſpel, than they diſcover'd the ſame devout ſpirit and temper, in a ready compliance with the dictates of the monks, their firſt teachers. It was their misfortune, that they did not attain to the knowledge of the chriſtian faith, before it was corrupted and disfigured by the monkiſh ſuperſtitions; for, as the Saxons were illiterate, and, conſequently, incompetent judges of the inſtructions they received, they implicitly ſurrender'd themſelves up to the management of their ſpiritual guides; which was the occaſion of their mighty zeal in founding and endowing monaſteries. They were taught, that the eſſence of religion conſiſted in enriching the monks, or, at leaſt, that it was an effectual means to ſupply all other defects; and, therefore, it is, that, in the two firſt centuries after their converſion, there were ſo many ſaints of diſtinguiſhed birth and fortune. Indeed, ſince ſanctity might be purchaſed, at ſuch an eaſy rate, it is no wonder, the rich and great put in their claim for it; but, all the while, notwithſtanding their giving into ſuch miſtaken notions, there is a remarkable ſtrain of piety and devotion in all their proceedings. This natural byas to religion was, doubtleſs, the reaſon, why ſo many kings embraced a monaſtick life; and they, who are acquainted with the Engliſh, at this day, will freely acknowledge, that no nation can produce more inſtances of fervent and ſubſtantial piety. As I reſided, for a long time, in England, I can venture to aſſert this, with the greater boldneſs and aſſurance. It muſt be owned, that, of late, libertiniſm in religious affairs has prevailed in that kingdom; but it is unreaſonable to paſs a judgment on the whole nation, from a few that are infected by it; eſpecially, ſince we know, that one man makes more noiſe in the world, by his dangerous maxims, than many thouſands of holy and upright chriſtians.

Common ſwearing was not practiſed among the Saxons.

The Anglo-Saxons were ſo little addicted to ſwearing and blaſphemy, the common vices of the preſent age, that they had not ſo much as a law, againſt this profane cuſtom; whereas we find, among their laws, ſevere penalties, againſt ſuch as broke the ſabbath, or did not even obſerve a religious faſt.

They were given to drunkenneſs. Edgar's law, about it.

Drunkenneſs was the reigning vice of the Anglo-Saxons, who uſually drank out of large cups, and took exceſſive draughts, till Edgar order'd particular marks to be made in their cups, at a certain height; and, if they filled them above it, they incurred a penalty; but this law did not continue in force, for any conſiderable time.

The ſciences.

The Engliſh, in general, before the Norman conqueſt, were not very famous, for their learning; but this muſt rather be aſcribed to their education, which was entirely martial, than to the want of genius or capacity. Beſides, it muſt be conſidered, that the ſciences did not greatly flouriſh, during the monarchy of the Saxons, at leaſt, after the union of the ſeven kingdoms.

They reckon'd time by nights.

I ſhall conclude my diſcourſe, on this ſubject, with the two following obſervations. Firſt, the Anglo-Saxons reckoned time, by nights, a cuſtom ſtill retained by the Engliſh, in ſome particular expreſſions. Thus, inſtead of two weeks, they ſay a fortnight or 14 nights; and Mezeray makes the ſame remark, with reſpect to the antient Francs. This, with ſeveral other uſages common to both nations, is a ſtrong preſumption, that the Francs and Saxons were derived from the ſame original; and it is, in ſo many words, aſſerted by Sir William Temple, in his Introduction to the Hiſtory of England.

The Saxon dikes.

Secondly, the Anglo-Saxons uſually divided their lands, by large and deep ditches; and even the kings commonly raiſed ramparts, with large ditches, to ſeparate their dominions from thoſe of the neighbouring ſtates, when there were no mountains or rivers, to ſerve for boundaries. Offa's dike, which parted Mercia from Wales, was 24 miles long; and that, between the Thames and the Severn, divided Mercia from Weſſex, being ſtiled Woden's-dike, tho'

* Theſe quarrels are what we term, deadly feuds, i. e. ſuch as end in death. The 38th law of Alfred, about theſe deadly feuds, allows men to take ſatisfaction on their enemies, even without the preſence of an officer; nay, if one man killed another, his kindred revenged his death upon any of the murderer's relations, which is the preſent practice of the Indians, till king Edmund made a law, that the murderer, alone, ſhould bear the deadly feud, i. e. the reſentment of the relations of the party ſlain.

it is now contracted into Wandsditch, Mercia and East-Anglia had the same sort of boundaries; and the East-Anglians made another ditch, seven miles farther into the country, to inclose their conquests over the Mercians. The first was termed Devil's-dike, tho' on what account, I cannot apprehend; and the other was called the Seven-mile-dike. This custom was derived from the antient Saxons; and we are informed by some historians, that the Saxons of Sleswick threw up a rampart, from sea to sea, to defend themselves from the Danes, who were possess'd of the Cimbrick Chersonesus or Jutland. Pepin, king of France, was, for a long time, prevented from entering into Saxony, by one of these ramparts; tho', he, at length, conquered this difficulty, that was almost insuperable.

The Language of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

The several dialects of the Anglo-Saxon language.

THE English tongue was, originally, very like the Danish, since the antients indifferently call them Cimbrick, Scandinavian, and Gothick; but this language was not the same with the Saxon. They spoke, at first, in the parts, north of the Thames, pure English or Danish, but, in the southern, pure Saxon; tho' both these nations could understand one another. In process of time, especially, after the union of the seven kingdoms, Saxon prevailed over all the kingdom, as the kings were Saxons; and, by degrees, English or the language of the Angles was disused, particularly, in common conversation. The Danes, indeed, afterwards, brought their language, with them; but this was a modern Danish, being a mixture of the language of the neighbouring nations, and it was chiefly used in Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia, which were subdued by the Danes. It is true, Canute the great, to please the English, published his laws in Saxon; tho' the Danish tongue was still retained in the north, where most of the inhabitants were of that nation. As it was spoke at court, during the reigns of Canute and his two sons, it became necessary for the West-Saxons, who adopted several words and idioms of it into their own language; but in the time of Edward the Confessor, Saxon was in reputation again at court, and the people of the north were under a necessity of learning it, as the Gascoigns, in France, are obliged to learn French.

In Edward's reign, the Norman language was also introduced into England; for, as his mother was a Norman, and he had resided many years, at the court of Normandy, he had a high esteem for that language; and the vast numbers of Normans, that flock'd into England spread it among persons of distinction, who were ambitious of speaking it correctly. The Norman tongue was, then, a mixture of Danish and French; and as the latter, at length, prevailed, the former, viz. the antient Danish, daily lost ground. William the Conqueror was no sooner seated on the throne, than he exerted himself to propagate his native tongue over the kingdom; and, by publishing his laws in Norman, and settling multitudes of Norman families in England, he made it as common as the Saxon.

The language, then, of the Anglo-Saxons, before the conquest, was a mixture of 1. British or Celtick; 2. of Latin, which was common in Great-Britain, when the Saxons arrived; 3. of the antient English or Danish; 4. of the modern Danish 5. of pure Saxon; and 6. of Norman mixed with Danish or French. They, who have nicely examined into this affair, distinguish three principal dialects, in the Anglo-Saxon language. The first was compounded of British, Latin, and Saxon, but chiefly of the last; and the only remains of this dialect, tho' in use, above 300 years, is a fragment of the writings of Cedmon the monk, inserted in Alfred the great's translation of Bede's Ecclesiastical History. The second dialect, which may be stiled Dano-Saxon, was used in the North, from the first invasions of the Danes to the Norman conquest; and there are still, in some libraries, two manuscript versions of the gospel, in this language. The third dialect consisted of the other two and the Norman, which was chiefly introduced, in the reigns of Edward the Confessor and William the Conqueror; and a vast number of French words was added to it, particularly, after Henry II's accession to the throne. They, who are strangers to the English tongue, will be apt to imagine, that, as it is compounded of so many languages, it is incapable of any extraordinary beauties; but the English affirm, that their language, for this very reason, must be the more beautiful and expressive, as they have only adopted the most polite and refined part of other tongues. However, they have a very great value for their own language; and, if a foreigner may be allowed to give his opinion, I think on a very just foundation.

Sterling-money.

I shall conclude this article, with just touching on the word, Sterling, which is applied to English money. Some will have it to be deed from the town Striveling or Sterling in Scotland; where they say, but without any grounds the best and purest money was formerly coined. Others, with far greater probability, think, it comes from the Saxon term, steore, i. e. rule or standard; so that, according to them, Sterling-money means no more, than money made in conformity to a settled standard. Cambden and some others take this name to be of a more modern date, as they derive it from certain Flemish workmen, who, in the reign of king John, were called into England, to reduce the money to its due fineness, being more expert, in this, than the English; and as they were termed Easterlings, because their country lay eastward of England, it is alledged, that the money they coined was stiled Easterling or Sterling, i.e. made by the Easterlings or Flemish, and consequently finer than what had been, hitherto, coined. WILLIAM I. ſirnamed the Baſtard, or Conqueror.

Reflections upon the duke of Normandy's expedition againſt England.

WHoſoever takes an impartial view of the duke of Normandy's expedition, againſt England, will be at a loſs to paſs a judgment, whether the grounds, boldneſs, or ſucceſs of it, do moſt deſerve his admiration. As to the firſt of theſe, it muſt, of courſe, be matter of aſtoniſhment, that he ſhould build his pretenſions on ſo ſhallow a foundation, as the bare will of king Edward; ſince he never attempted to produce any evidence, in proof of this point. It is no leſs difficult, to apprehend, how a prince, ſo famous for his ſkill in politicks, ſhould determine to maintain his right, by the force of arms, in ſpite of a train of difficulties that lay in his way; for, in all appearance, no deſign was ever more raſhly projected, or with a leſs probability of being ſucceſsful. The forces, in Normandy, were vaſtly inferior to thoſe of England; nor had the duke any fortreſſes or friends in that kingdom, to encourage his enterprize. After he had landed a numerous army, there was not ſo much as a ſingle lord, that declared for him; nay, he had all imaginable reaſon to believe, that they inviolably adhered to the intereſt of Harold. Perhaps, ſome of them might be diſpleaſed, on the account of his uſurping the crown, which properly belonged to prince Edgar; but none of them blamed him, for ſupplanting the duke of Normandy, as they were entirely ſtrangers to his pretenſions, ſo far were they from having any thoughts of depoſing their king, that they had lately convinced him of their loyalty, for his perſon and government, by their zeal and alacrity, in his defence againſt the king of Norway; and the oppoſition, the duke might have reaſonably expected from the neighbouring princes, was abundantly ſufficient to divert him from his reſolution. It was evidently the moſt adviſable ſtep they could take, to checque his ambition; and the French, in particular, could not, without counter-acting the moſt obvious political maxims, avoid exerting themſelves, to blaſt an attempt, ſo very prejudicial to them, if it ſhould meet with ſucceſs. Beſides, were he aſſur'd, that all the princes, his neighbours, would have ſtood neuter, his project was, after all, embarraſs'd, as the ſtates of Normandy refuſed to aſſiſt him, in an expedition, which they apprehended to be unjuſt and unreaſonable. Laſtly, is it not extremely ſurprizing, that all theſe difficulties ſhould, unexpectedly, vaniſh, in an inſtant; and that the greateſt obſtacles, in his way, ſhould contribute to the accompliſhment of his intentions. Tho' the ſtates of Normandy would not ſupply him with money, private perſons voluntarily furniſhed him with larger ſums, than he could have expected from the ſtates; and the court of France not only permitted him to proceed, without any moleſtation, but even aſſiſted him, in obtaining a crown, which might hereafter put him on a level with his ſovereign, or, at leaſt, in a condition to diſpute his ſupremacy. All the other neighbouring princes ſeemed to have an emulation who ſhould be the moſt active, in promoting a project, that muſt, of conſequence, prove fatal to them; and the earls of Bretaign and Anjou, a very little before, his avowed enemies, interpoſe in his favour. In a word, in a few months, he had a numerous army, 1000 tranſport-ſhips, and money in abundance; and Harold's late victory over the king of Norway, which, one would have thought, ſhould have defeated all his hopes, was as ſubſervient as any one event, to the duke's purpoſe. Harold, in that action, loſt his beſt troops, and diſobliged the reſt, by refuſing them part of the ſpoils; and the ſame victory inſpired him with a contempt for the Normans, which was the occaſion of his ruin. Were it not for this, he would have declined an engagement with the duke, purſuant to his brother's advice; and then the Norman army muſt have daily decreaſed, in an enemy's country, where there was no poſſibility of having reinforcements; and, if the duke, compelled to fight, on unequal terms, had been entirely vanquiſh'd, what could he have advanced, to vindicate his raſh and unjuſt expedition? but the ſucceſs of this deſign has led the hiſtorians to repreſent it in another light, which otherwiſe they would have infallibly cenſur'd. The duke of Normandy, by a ſingle battle, conquer'd a country, which neither the Danes, Saxons, nor even the Romans could ſubdue, without numberleſs engagements, and after ſeveral ages; which ſhews, that he was under the immediate direction of the Almighty, the only giver of victory, who exalts or deſtroys kingdoms, at his pleaſure. The Divine Being, doubtleſs, employ'd this conqueror, as his inſtrument, to render the Engliſh nation more glorious than ever; and, indeed, it was the firſt ſtep, by which England, hitherto, almoſt unknown to the reſt of the world, arrived to its preſent grandeur and glory, as the ſequel will inform us. I ſhall, therefore, before I enter upon his reign, conſider, by what degrees Providence advanced him to the throne of England, who was 42 years of age at the battle of Haſtings, and had been 33 years duke of Normandy.

The affairs of Normandy, from Rollo to William the baſtard

Normandy, one of the largeſt and moſt flouriſhing provinces in France, was poſſeſs'd by the Normans, ever ſince Charles the ſimple reſigned it to Rollo the Dane, the firſt duke. This prince and his immediate ſucceſſors were not ſo ſollicitous of enlarging the dukedom, as ſecuring it to their poſterity; and, by the means of numerous colonies of their own country, who, by reciprocal marriages, incorporated with the natives, the two nations became one people, under the common name of Normans, a name the French gave to the foreigners ſettled in Neuſtria, which, from them, was alſo called Normandy. The firſt dukes made it their principal ſtudy to gain the affections of their ſubjects; and, by their wiſdom, juſtice, and moderation, not only ſtifled the ſeeds of rebellion, that might lurk in the breaſts of the antient inhabitants, but made proviſion againſt the ſecret practices of the kings of France, who were not a little diſpleaſed to find ſuch a noble province torn from their monarchy; and, accordingly, the attempts of the French to recover it, always proved abortive, as the dukes of Normandy, by reaſon of their intereſt in the hearts of their ſubjects, were in a capacity to defend themſelves.

There were ſeven dukes, from Rollo to William the Baſtard; but Richard II. who was the fourth, is one of the moſt illuſtrious. By his firſt wife, Judith of Bretaign, he had three ſons Richard, Robert, and William; and, after her deceaſe, he enter'd into a double alliance with Canute the great, by giving him in marriage Emma, widow to Ethelred II. king of England, and taking himſelf Eſtrith, ſiſter to that prince. However, ſo highly was he enamour'd with a young damſel, named Pavia, that he divorced Eſtrith, in order to marry his miſtreſs. By his ſecond wife, he had two ſons, William earl of Arques and Mauger archbiſhop of Roan.

Upon his death, he was ſucceeded by his ſon Richard, inſpite of all the efforts of this younger brother, Robert, to ſupplant him. Robert being, thus, diſappointed was obliged to deſiſt; or, as ſome relate, he took a more effectual method, to put his deſign in execution, by procuring his brother to be poiſoned, who, having reigned two years, left him the dukedom. Whether duke Robert's crime was never fully proved, or his prudent conduct cancell'd all remembrance of it, it is certain, he obtained an intereſt in the affections of his ſubjects, at home, whilſt his valour rendered him famous abroad; and, by his aſſiſtance, Henry I. king of France was fixed on the throne, notwithſtanding the pretenſion of Robert, his brother, who was ſupported by a powerful faction. This prince, on the account of the intrigues of Queen Conſtance, their mother, in favour of her youngeſt ſon, being obliged to demand the duke of Normandy's aid, having an interview with him at Roan, was, at firſt, ſupplied with 500 ſpearmen; and theſe were ſoon followed by a more numerous body of troops, with the duke at their head, who placed Henry on the throne, having forced the younger brother to be ſatisfied with Burgundy. The king, full of gratitude, proteſted, that he would never forget this ſignel piece of ſervice; and, to demonſtrate the ſenſe he retained of the favour, he annexed, to the dutchy of Normandy, the cities of Chaumont and Pontoiſe, which then belonged to the crown of France.

It would be foreign to my preſent purpoſe, to give a particular account of duke Robert's wars with the Norman lords who revolted, or againſt the duke of Brettany, who refuſed to pay him homage; it is ſufficient to ſay, in general, that he ſubdued the rebels, and reduced the duke of Brettany to his allegiance; and, as to his deſign of doing juſtice to his couſins, the loſs of Ethelred II. and how it miſcarried, I have already related it, in the reign of Canute the great.

It is not eaſy to apprehend, why this prince, who had ſuch an affection for his people, ſhould entertain no thoughts of marriage; ſince he could not but foreſee, that his dying, without iſſue, would occaſion great miſchief and confuſion. There were, in Normandy, ſeveral branches of the ducal family, who might, in this caſe, put in their claims to the dukedom; and, in all probability, their ſeveral pretenſions would introduce a civil war into the ſtate. However, the duke was reſolved never to marry; and one would have imagined, that this reſolution was the effect of an inſenſibility for the fair ſex, were it not for his paſſionate love of a young damſel, with whoſe graceful mien he was charmed, as he ſaw her dancing. The damſel, who was called Arlotta *, a ſkinner's daughter of Falaiſe, thinking herſelf highly honour'd by the duke's addreſſes, eaſily yielded to his ſollicitations. It is reported, that, the firſt night the duke lay with her, ſhe dreamt, that her bowels were extended over all Normandy and England, which dream had a very natural interpretation afterwards, if it was not invented after the event. Robert had, by this miſtreſs, a ſon, named William, who, it is ſaid, the moment of his birth, having laid hold on ſome ſtraws, griped them ſo faſt, that they were obliged to unclinch his fiſt, before he would part with them. Upon this, the good women, there preſent, concluded, cluded, that he would hereafter prove a great acquirer, ſince he began ſo early. Robert trained up his young ſon, with all imaginable care, as he deſigned him for his ſucceſſor; but, whilſt he was intent on his education, he took a fancy to go a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem. Some look'd upon this act of devotion to be the effect of his remorſe, for the murder of the duke his brother, being deſirous to make attonement for his crime, by this ſort of penance. However, before he ſet out, he took all the neceſſary ſteps, to ſecure the ſucceſſion to his ſon William; and, with this view, he called together the ſtates of Normandy, conjuring them, that if he ſhould depart this life, whilſt abroad, they would accept of his ſon William, for their ſovereign. The ſtates did all that was poſſible, to diſſuade the duke from his journey; but, when they found, that their arguments were to no purpoſe, they promiſed him, upon oath, that they would obſerve his directions, and, accordingly, they ſwore fealty to William, as the preſumptive heir of the duke his father. Upon this, Robert made Alain duke of Bretaign, his relation and vaſſal, ſeneſchal of Normandy, giving him a commiſſion to govern, during his abſence, with an abſolute authority; and then, taking his ſon with him to Paris, he committed him to the care of the king of France, who took the charge of his education; but, before he left the French court, he obliged William to do homage to the king, as if he had been actually poſſeſs'd of the dukedom.

The duke's abſence was the occaſion of commotions in his dominions, to appeaſe which, the duke of Bretaign was under a neceſſity of exerting his authority, with ſome ſeverity; but, whilſt he was ſollicitous, in reſtoring the publick tranquillity, he was diſpatched by poiſon, and a report was raiſed, that duke Robert died, on his way to Jeruſalem. Tho' this news wanted confirmation, it occaſioned troubles, ſo much the more dangerous, as there was not any perſon, in Normandy, in a condition to compoſe them; for they, who had the management of affairs, were themſelves engaged in factions, which had been in agitation, ever ſince the duke's departure, and, by this means, increaſed the confuſion.

In the mean time, ſome of the duke's domeſticks arrived, who confirmed the news of his death; and, now, ſeveral of the principal lords, of the ducal family, began to cabal openly, how they ſhould exclude the baſtard from the ſucceſſion. The moſt plauſible artifices were made uſe of, to accompliſh their end; but the ſtates declared, they could not ſet him aſide, without the guilt of perjury, and reſolving to acknowledge William, for their ſovereign, they immediately ſent ambaſſadors to the king of France, to demand the young prince. From the moment that Henry was aſſured of the duke's death, the ſhame of doing a diſhonourable action, and deſire of being maſter of Normandy, kept his mind in ſuſpence. He had entertained hopes, that the troubles in that dukedom, would redound to his advantage, and he formed ſome projects, on this occaſion; but when he perceived, that the ſtates of Normandy had declarde, in favour of duke William, he judged it to be convenient, for the preſent, to defer the execution of his deſign. Accordingly, the king, concealing his intentions, ſent home the young prince; and no ſooner was he arrived at Roan, than the ſtates ſwore allegiance to him, appointing Raoul de Gace, conſtable of Normandy, to be his governor.

Notwithſtanding duke William's arrival, the lords, who laid claim to the ducal crown, did not drop their pretenſions; for they imagined, that it was a piece of downright injuſtice to prefer a baſtard before them. However, as they who held the reins of government, were men of great conduct and intereſt, being alſo look'd upon, as ſupported by the crown of France, the claimants durſt not publickly avow their intentions; and, in the interim, king Henry was on fire, to make the beſt uſe of theſe diviſions. Duke Robert's death had effaced the remembrance of his ſignal obligations to that prince; and, not being able to withſtand the temptation any longer, he directly beſieged the Caſtle of Tillireres, to which he had ſome pretenſions. This place, being fortified and well ſtock'd with ammunition, would have held out a long time, if the duke's miniſters had not given orders to the governor, to ſurrender, on condition the caſtle ſhould be demoliſh'd; and Henry, very readily accepting theſe terms, commanded the walls to be levelled to the ground, tho' they were immediately rebuilt, under the pretence, that there was an ambiguous clauſe, in the articles of capitulation. Upon this, the king took poſſeſſion of Argentan, and, marching to Falaiſe, ſubdued that town, with eaſe; and he would have made farther advances, if Raoul de Gace, with a numerous army, had not obliged him to retire, which gave the conſtable an opportunity of retaking Falaiſe, the French not having had leiſure to lay in any ſtores. Chron. Norm.

As ſoon as the lords, who aſpired to the dukedom, found, that the king of France made war againſt duke William, they began to declare their reſpective deſigns. Roger de Treſney, ſtandard-bearer of Normandy, and ſprung from one of Rollo's uncles, was the firſt that appeared. Having acquired great riches in Spain, where he had, for many years, been engaged againſt the Saracens, he returned home, during duke Robert's abſence, and was no ſooner informed of his death, than he reſolved to ſeize on the dukedom. Indeed, he, for ſome time, deferred the execution of his project, from an apprehenſion, that the king of France was in duke William's intereſt; but being convinced of the contrary, by king Henry's proceedings, he muſtered ſome troops together, thinking, that all the dukes forces would be employed againſt France tho' he found himſelf miſtaken, being defeated and ſlain by Roger deBeaumont, who commanded the duke's army. Malmſ.

Nothwithſtanding this example William earl of Arques, ſon to Richard the II. by Pavia, being animated to this undertaking, by the king of France, was ſo hardy as to ſend a defence to the duke; but the duke, at the head of his army, preſs'd him with ſo much vigour and reſolution, that he compelled him to incloſe himſelf ſelf in the city of Arques, where he beſieged him. Henry, who had ſpurr'd him on to this enterprize, thought, he was under an obligation, in point of honour, to aſſiſt him; and, with this view, he marched into Normandy, where he received two defeats, being forced, at laſt, to abandon the rebel, who, upon the taking of the city, was ſent into exile.

Guy of Burgundy, grandſon to duke Richard II. by his daughter, was the next, that made an attempt upon the dukedom, and indeed, he was within an ace of ſurprizing the duke, who was then at Valognes, without any guard, being altogether inſenſible of what was in agitation againſt him; but a fool, whom the conſpirators did not ſuſpect, overhearing their deſign, travelled, all night, to acquaint the duke with it, who had but juſt time to put on his cloaths, in order to make the beſt of his way for Falaiſe; and he was ſo cloſely purſued, that it would have been impoſſible for him to have eſcaped, his horſe not being able to carry him thither, were it not for the aſſiſtance of a gentleman, whom he accidentally met with, on the road. This conſpiracy ſeemed to be of ſuch a dangerous conſequence, that he applied to the king of France; and Henry, either out of generoſity, or for ſome other private reaſons, being unwilling to ſuffer the young prince to be oppreſs'd, ſupplied him with ſome troops, which put him in a condition to give the enemy battle. Guy being vanquiſhed, and taken priſoner, the duke, by a generous action, as glorious as the victory it ſelf, very freely gave him a pardon.

Chron. of Normand. Mezeray.

William Guerland, earl of Mortagne, and another William, earl of Eu, ſon to a natural brother of Richard II. had ſome thoughts alſo of depriving the young prince of his dukedom; but they were prevented, by his vigilance, and ſentenced to perpetual baniſhment.

The duke's courage and conduct, in all theſe commotions, led his ſubjects to entertain great hopes concerning him; and the neighbouring princes apprehended him to be a perſon of uncommon merit, who might, hereafter, give them ſome trouble. The king of France, in particular, was extremely jealous of him; and to make amends for his overſight, in aſſiſting him againſt Guy of Burgundy, he raiſed him up another enemy, the earl of Anjou. At firſt, indeed, he only aided him in a ſecret manner; but at length he openly eſpouſed his quarrel, commencing fierce war againſt the duke, which continued ſeveral years, tho' at laſt, it turned to the diſadvantage of both the allies; for duke William having proved victorious, in two ſucceſſive battles, they ſued for peace, to obtain which the king of France was obliged to ſurrender the caſtle of Tillieres, which he had taken, during the duke's minority.

As the duke was beſieging Alenzon, during this war, ſome of the inhabitants came upon the walls, with skins in their hands, to reproach him for the baſeneſs of his birth, his mother being a skinner's daughter; but the duke was ſo highly incenſed, at this inſult, that he ſwore, by the ſplendor of God, his uſual oath, that he would be revenged; and, accordingly, when he afterwards became maſter of the town, he put out the eyes, and cut off the hands and feet of 22 of the inſolent Burghers.

Henry, dying ſoon after this war, had, for his ſucceſſor Philip I. his ſon, a minor, under the guardianſhip of Baldwin, the fifth earl of Flanders, who had juſt married his daughter, Matilda, to the duke of Normandy; and as the earl was regent to the king, and father-in-law to the duke, he made uſe of all neceſſary precautions, to eſtabliſh a good underſtanding between both theſe princes, which continued many years.

Duke Willlam, in the mean-time, endeavoured to extinguiſh the remains of rebellion among his ſubjects, by baniſhing great numbers, who, for the moſt part, retir'd into Pouille, to Robert Guiſcard, a Norman gentleman, who made a ſplendid figure, in that country. As the duke's relations, by his father's ſide, gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs, he compelled almoſt all of them to abandon Normandy; and confiſcating their eſtates, he beſtowed them to his mother's relations, in order to raiſe the mean circumſtances of that family. Robert, his brother, by the mother's ſide, received the earldom of Mortagne, which William Guerland had forfeited; Odo, his brother, was enriched by his bounty, being alſo made biſhop of Bayeux; and, two of their ſiſters, were married to the earls of Aumale and Albemarle.

Mauger his uncle, archbiſhop of Roan, was not only concerned in all the plots againſt the duke, but even proceeded ſo far, as to excommunicate him, on pretence of the too near relation between him and his wife Matilda, who was his firſt couſin, being daughter to Eleonora, his father's ſiſter. The duke was reſolved to be revenged on this prelate, as ſoon as his affairs ſhould be ſettled; and, accordingly, having called together the biſhops of Normandy, at Liſieux, he charged him with ſeveral miſdemeanours, particularly, his ſelling the conſecrated chalices, to ſquander the money in luxury; and, as he exerted his utmoſt intereſt, to ſupport theſe accuſations, Mauger was ſolemnly degraded, and Maurillus elected in his room.

The duke, having, thus, ſubdued, or diſperſed, all his enemies, he might have paſſed the remainder of his days, in profound tranquillity, having nothing to fear, either abroad or at home; but this quiet, which only ſecured his preſent poſſeſſion, was far from contenting his avarice and ambition. It was, probably, with a view of new acquiſitions, that he made a viſit to king Edward his couſin, who, having no iſſue, perhaps, gave him ſome hopes of being his ſucceſſor; and it is generally believed, that he promiſed him, during his abode at his court, to make a will, in his favour. Tho' the duke never produced this will, nor any evidence for it, it is agreed on, by all the hiſtorians, he made it the foundation of his expedition againſt England; and we have ſeen, in the preceding book, what ſteps he took, to ſupport his pretenſions, till the battle of Haſtings.

The duke's conduct, after the battle of Haſtings. W. Pictav.

It is natural to believe, that the Engliſh were in the greateſt conſternation, after their defeat, at Haſtings, and the loſs of their king, being deſtitute of men, arms, ammunition, and, what was worſe, of a chief to command them and ſupply their preſent neceſſities. On the contrary, the victorious Normans were advanced near London, the capital; Harold's ſons had retreated to Ireland; and Edgar Atheling was not only too young, but wanted ſpirit and reſolution to aſſiſt them, on this preſſing occaſion. The earls Morkard and Edwin, indeed, were retired to London, with a part of the fugitive army; but the Conqueror allowed them no leiſure, to take proper meaſures, for the ſervice of their country. Thus, the affairs of the Engliſh lay in the moſt diſmal confuſion, all the methods, they could take, being clogged with inſuperable difficulties. The duke of Normandy was already on his march to London, in order to increaſe the terror of the Engliſh; but he was diverted from this deſign, by the following reaſons. He conſidered, that altho' the loſs of a battle might have aſtoniſhed the Engliſh, it was not likely, that it would altogether diſpirit them; that as their caſe was not, as yet, deſperate, they might eaſily raiſe freſh armies; that, if this was done, and he ſhould receive but a ſingle defeat, he was not provided with a place of retreating, nor had he any opportunity of ſending for ſuccours from Normandy. He, therefore, reſolved to beſiege Dover, before he made any farther advances; and this cautious proceeding, even after his victory, is an evident proof of the boldneſs, or rather raſhneſs, of his enterprize. Dover was naturally a place of great ſtrength, and, beſides, a great number of Engliſh officers and ſoldiers had retired thither, after the battle; ſo that it was capable of holding a long ſiege. However, ſuch was the conſternation of the beſieged, that they ſurrender'd the town, in a few days; and no ſooner had the duke taken poſſeſſion of it, than he order'd it to be more ſtrongly fortified, ſpending eight days there, to forward the works, after which he ſet out for London.

Kent ſends deputies to the duke.

Some authors relate, that, as the duke was on his march, at the head of his army, he had a diſtant view of a vaſt multitude approaching him, each of them having a branch or bough in his hand, who, appearing like a moving foreſt, at firſt, ſomewhat alarmed him; but he ſoon found, they were deputies from the county of Kent, attended with great crowds of people, who came to aſſure him of the ſubmiſſion of that county, and to demand the preſervation of their antient privileges. They add, that the duke gave them a very gracious reception, and granted their requeſt; but, as William of Poictiers, who was then with the duke, takes no notice of this occurrence, we have reaſon to believe, the whole ſtory to be fictitious *.

The Londoners are in great confuſion.

Whilſt the duke lay before Dover, or was on his way towards the Thames, the confuſion, at London, was, every moment, increaſed, on account of the diverſity of opinions, which prevented them from coming to any final reſolution. Some thought it moſt adviſable, to ſubmit to the duke immediately; others, that it was expedient, before they ſubmitted, to enter into a treaty with him, for the ſecurity of the privileges, not only of the city, but of the whole kingdom; and ſome attempted to prove, that there was ſtill a poſſibility of retrieving their affairs, as the winter, which was already begun, would allow them time to concert meaſures, for their defence, and they were extremely ſollicitous, about having Edgar Atheling placed on the throne. Edwin and Morkard were the chief of the laſt party; but they could not, with all their art and intereſt, perſuade the citizens to fall in with their deſign, who would be prevailed on no farther, than to ſhut their gates againſt the duke, till they ſhould be able to fix upon ſome reſolution. In the interim, the duke, approaching the city, encamped in Southwark, which is ſeparated from London by the Thames; and expecting, that his being ſo near them would oblige the Londoners to a voluntary ſubmiſſion, he lay ſtill, for ſome days. However, the event did not anſwer his expectation; for Morkard and Edwin made uſe of this opportunity to ſpirit up the people to ſally out, in order to ſurpriſe the Normans. This ſally was eaſily repulſed, tho' it convinced the duke, that he muſt alter his meaſures, by vigorouſly attacking this great city which he could have but very little proſpect of ſubduing, if he allowed the inhabitants time to recover from their amazement. However, he was at a great loſs, how he ſhould proceed, and not without reaſon; for, by his late victory, he was far from attaining his ends. He was poſſeſs'd of no more than one caſtle, lying in an extreme part of the kingdom, and all the reſt of the country was againſt him; beſides, the Engliſh might raiſe an army, in ſeveral remote counties, without the leaſt oppoſition. He could not advance towards the center of the kingdom, without cutting of all communication with Dover, which was of dangerous conſequence; and it was next to impoſſible for him to carry on the ſiege of London, during the winter. Moreover, the ſituation of that city render'd it neceſſary for him to leave a conſiderable number of forces, on the ſouthſide of the Thames, which would exceedingly impair his army; and a ſiege of that importance, which, in all probability, would laſt ſeveral months, muſt, of courſe, have put it in the power of the Engliſh to put their affairs in a poſture of defence, as well as to muſter troops in other parts of the kingdom. At this rate, the duke would have been obliged to conquer England, inch by inch, like the Romans, Saxons and Danes; whereas he was not in a condition to ſupport ſuch a tedious war. His only method, then, was to make the beſt uſe of the preſent conſternation of the Londoners, and to bring them into ſubjection, rather by terror than force; and, accordingly, poſting himſelf at Wallingford, he continually ſent out detach-

He likewiſe reduced Southwark to aſhes, to ſhew them what they might expect, if they would not, in time, ſubmit to his laws; but, perhaps, all his attempts would have been ineffectual, if the clergy, who were in London, had not diſconcerted all the meaſures of Morkard and Edwin againſt him.

Morkard and Edwin attempt to place Edgar on the throne.

The view of theſe lords, and other lovers of their country, was to place Edgar Atheling on the throne. They aſſured the people, that the only means, of avoiding the impending danger, was, in the firſt place, to recover from their preſent ſtate of anarchy and confuſion; that, whilſt they wanted a head, who had a right to command, it was impoſſible to take any effectual ſteps, againſt the Normans, who were already at their gates; but that the caſe would be otherwiſe, if they had a king, who would diſpatch his orders into all parts of the kingdom, to levy forces, which would teach the duke, at his coſt, that a ſingle victory was not ſufficient to make him maſter of England; whereas, if they remained inactive, the whole kingdom would infallibly become ſubject to a foreign yoke; and, in a word, that prince Edgar had an undoubted title to the crown of England, and, conſequently, in juſtice, ought to be fixed on the throne. The majority of the people approved of the earl's propoſals; but the clergy openly rejected them, being unwilling to hazard their eſtates and tranquillity, by a war. Edgar was ſcarce in a condition to protect them; but the duke of Normandy had the reputation of a religious prince, and his enterpriſe had received the pope's approbation. Theſe reaſons were ſufficient to prevail on all the clergy, who were then at London, with both the archbiſhops at their head, to cabal among the people, in order to prevent Edgar's election; for they formed hopes, that their ſubmiſſion to the duke of Normandy would prove more advantageous, than a tedious war. But, whatever were their motives, it is certain they made ſuch a ſtrenuous oppoſition, that Edwin and Morkard, deſpairing of ſucceſs in their deſigns, retreated into the north, being perſuaded, it would be a long time, before the duke could follow them. Upon their departure, Stigand, archbiſhop of Both the archbiſhops and prince Edgar ſubmit to the duke.

The clergy oppoſe them.

Canterbury, directly waited on the duke at Berkhamſtead; as did alſo, ſoon after, Aldred, archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of Wincheſter, and, at laſt, prince Edgar himſelf, who acted by their advice and direction. The duke, receiving them very graciouſly, granted all their requeſts, among which there were ſome that concerned the whole kingdom; and it is even aſſerted, that he confirmed his promiſes by an oath. The hiſtorians do not tell us, what the terms were theſe prelates obtained from the duke; but, we may be ſure, the intereſts of the church were remember'd, in a particular manner. However, they ſwore allegiance to the duke, and induced prince Edgar to follow their example; and, by their means, ſeveral perſons of diſtinction made their ſubmiſſion, ſo that the Londoners were, in a few days, abandon'd by thoſe, whoſe aſſiſtance would have been moſt wanted by them, if they had enter'd into a reſolution of ſtanding up, in the defence of their city. 1066.

The duke approaches London.

The citizens continuing ſtill in ſuſpence, the duke advanced nearer London, as if he deſigned to beſiege it, being ſenſible, that it would be of the laſt conſequence to his affairs, to be poſſeſs'd of the metropolis, before the reſt of the kingdom had taken any ſteps, to his prejudice; and the magiſtrates, in their naked and defenceleſs condition, thought it moſt adviſeable to come out of the city to meet him, in order to preſent him with the keys of the gates. The duke was pleaſed to receive them very graciouſly; and, it is affirmed, that he promiſed, upon oath, to preſerve their rights and privileges. Having proceeded ſo far, eſpecially as they perceived, from the whole ſtrain of his actions, that he aſpired to the crown, they judged it to be expedient, in their preſent circumſtances, to anticipate his wiſhes; and, accordingly, after they had held a conſultation with the lords ſpiritual and temporal, that had already ſubmitted, they unanimouſly reſolved to place him on the throne. Having, in a body, therefore, waited on the duke they made him an offer

They offer him the crown, of the crown, repreſenting to him, "That, "as they had always lived under a regal go- "vernment, they apprehended him to be the "moſt worthy of their choice and approbation "to be their king and governor." The duke, on this occaſion, not conſidering, or, at leaſt, pretending to forget, that he had invaded the kingdom, with an armed force, by reaſon of his pretenſions to the crown, at firſt, ſeemed to have ſome doubts, whether he ſhould accept of that dignity. He told them, that their propoſal was of ſuch importance, that it was convenient for him to adviſe with his friends, before he gave them an anſwer; but the reſult of the matter was, that he ought not, at any rate, to refuſe an honour, freely offer'd him by the Engliſh, ſince his refuſal would put it out of his power to reward his followers, who had eſpouſed his cauſe, purely, with a view of fixing him on the throne. They, therefore, intreated him not to reject, what was ſo providentially thrown in his way, and which had coſt him ſo much blood already; and the duke, readily falling in with their pleaſing ſollicitations, in anſwer to the Engliſh lords and magiſtrates of London, declared, "That he was "willing to conſent to their requeſt." Upon this, he accepted the crown, as their gift, tacitly owning a right of election in the people of England, tho' the manner of his election ſeemed to intimate, that he was of the contrary opinion; and, indeed, is it to be ſuppoſed, that the magiſtrates of London, with a few biſhops and temporal lords, had a right to diſpoſe of the crown, without the conſent of the eſtates? However, the duke appointed the chriſtmas-day enſuing to be the day of his coronation; and, as this ſolemnity was to be celebrated at London, he order'd a fortreſs to be built, with all expedition, which he gar-

1066. riſon'd with Normans, having a ſuſpicion of the inhabitants.

His Coronation. Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, tho' he was ſuſpended by the pope, as an intruder into that ſee, in the room of Robert, who was never canonically deprived, continued to exerciſe the archiepiſcopal functions; yet the duke, being under obligations to the pope, and alſo deſirous of avoiding the objections, that might be raiſed againſt his coronation, if performed by a ſuſpended biſhop, would not receive the crown, from the hands of Stigand. He, therefore, made choice of Aldred, archbiſhop of York, for this purpoſe, who, before he placed the crown on the duke's head, asked the Engliſh, whether they would have the duke of Normandy for their king? All the people having expreſſed their conſent, by acclamations, the biſhop of Conſtance put the ſame queſtion to the Normans, who anſwered, in the ſame manner. From hence, it appears, that the duke, at that time, reſolved to make the Engliſh and Normans one people; ſince the conſent of the Normans was asked, before he was crowned king of England; and the ſequel evidently ſhews, that this was his real intention. The archbiſhop of York, having placed the duke on the throne, adminiſter'd to him the oath uſually taken by the Saxon kings; the ſubſtance of which was, "That he would "protect the church and its miniſters; that "he would govern the kingdom with equity; "that he would enact juſt laws, and order "them to be ſtrictly put in execution; and "that he would prohibit all rapines and un-"juſt judgments." Malmsbury adds, "That "he promiſed to behave himſelf mercifully "towards his ſubjects, and that he would go-"vern the Engliſh and Normans by the laws;" and, if this was really the caſe, it follows, that this prince had already determined to ſettle the Normans in England. However, ſome authors aſſure us, that king William took no oath at all, having refuſed to lay himſelf under ſuch a reſtraint to thoſe whom he conquer'd; but, in all probability, they are miſtaken. King William accepted of the crown, as a gift, and, conſequently, had no reaſon to diſpenſe with the uſual oath. Beſides, as none, except the Londoners, had, as yet, ſubmitted to his authority, can it be imagined, that a prince of his ſagacity ſhould ſo ſoon diſcover to the Engliſh, that he deſigned to reign over them, in an arbitrary manner; and, finally, tho' he is ſirnamed the Conqueror, it is evident, that he never openly pretended to poſſeſs the kingdom by the right of conqueſt, being, on all occaſions, extremely cautious, as to the proof of this point.

He takes the uſual oath.

Among all the fortunate turns, that attended the execution of the duke's deſign, that, which I am about to relate, is one of the moſt ſurprizing. Indeed, the battle he won gave him an opportunity of approaching London; but, tho' it would have been next to impoſſible for him to have taken that city, if the burghers and the reſt of the kingdom would have done their duty, it was ſurrender'd to him, and the crown placed on his head. However, as he was crown'd, without the conſent of the whole nation, one would have thought, it would have been very difficult for him to have compleated the conqueſt of a country, which had oppoſed the Romans, Saxons, and Danes, for ages together; and yet, no ſooner was it known, that he had been crowned at London, than he was, in all places, owned to be the king of England, without the leaſt oppoſition, tho' no one could tell, by what right or title, he could poſſibly lay claim to that crown. In all appearance, if the Engliſh had been reſolved to elect a king of their own nation, either Edgar or any other, king William would have been expoſed to a great number of difficulties. Let us, for once, ſuppoſe, that this elected king had muſter'd an army together, in a remote part of the kingdom, how exceedingly muſt it have embarraſs'd king William's affairs? He could not leave London and Dover, without running a great riſque of loſing the metropolis; and, if he ſhould remain in London, the enemy would have had an opportunity of augmenting their forces. The bare mention of this conſideration is ſufficient to ſhew, how extremely lucky it was for the Conqueror to meet with no reſiſtance; and the reader will, I doubt not, be naturally led to reflect on a thouſand other obſtacles, in king William's way, if the Engliſh, even after the battle of Haſtings, had not wanted reſolution to withſtand him. It is obvious, that the more one conſiders this enterprize, it ſeems to be ſo much the more extraordinary, if not ſupernatural.

1066. 1067. The king diſtributes Harold's treaſures. W. Poict.

The firſt thing king William did, after his coronation, was to ſeize on Harold's treaſure, which he had laid up at Wincheſter. He diſtributed one part of it among the chief officers of his army, and another he gave to the churches and monaſteries; and the pope alſo had a ſhare, either in return for money he had lent the king, or in gratitude for his favours, at his firſt ſetting out about his expedition. He likewiſe ſent the late king's ſtandard to Rome, not only as a ſort of homage to the holy ſee, but as a teſtimony, that his enterprize was undertaken, with the pope's approbation. Harold's treaſures being, thus, diſpoſed of, it became neceſſary to deviſe ways and means to fill the king's coffers; and, with this view, the cities and corporations, as well as the moſt wealthy of his ſubjects, were given to underſtand, that it was expedient for them to compliment their new maſter with ſome ſuitable preſents, which propoſal, being chearfully agreed to, brought in a very conſiderable ſum.

The cities and corporations make him preſents. W. Poict.

He is jealous of them.

The king's moderation, at firſt, led the Engliſh to hope, that they ſhould enjoy ſolid happineſs, under his reign; for he order'd the principal officers of his army to treat them with chriſtian tenderneſs and compaſſion, and to refrain from all inſults and outrages, leſt they ſhould provoke them to take up arms. He iſſued out the moſt ſevere edicts againſt ſuch of the ſubalterns and ſoldiers, as ſhould violate the chaſtity of the women, or, in the leaſt, injure the natives; and he afterwards, in the moſt publick manner, confirmed their privileges.

1067. vileges. If we might form a judgment of princes from their manifeſto's or edicts we ſhould be apt to conclude, that they had the ſtricteſt regard for juſtice and equity; but how often does it happen, that ſuch declarations are no more than ſo many words of courſe. Indeed, they generally produce a preſent effect, which is, for the moſt part, the only end propoſed by them; and, accordingly, the Engliſh were inclined to confide in king William's magnificent promiſes, ſuffering themſelves to be tranſported with this ſeeming indulgence. Theſe auſpicious beginnings prevail'd on them to believe, that the Conqueror, like Canute the great, would do all that was poſſible, to gain the hearts of his ſubjects, that he might reap the fruits of his conqueſt, in peace and tranquility.

However, the king was apprehenſive, that their ſubmiſſion proceeded rather from fear, than a ſincere reſpect for his perſon and government; for a few days after his coronation, he retired from London to Berking, not daring to continue in that city. He was equally jealous of the reſt of the kingdom; and, therefore, he placed ſtrong garriſons in Haſtings, Dover, and Wincheſter, the more effectually to ſecure their ſubjection. The Engliſh were ſo far from being alarmed at theſe proceedings, that they conceived them to be abſolutely neceſſary, in the beginning of ſuch a grand revolution; and they, who had, hitherto, refuſed to ſubmit to his authority, reſorted to him, in ſuch crowds, that Edwin and Morkard were obliged to drop their ſchemes, for the defence of their country. As they entertained a raiſed opinion of the king's ſincerity, they ſwore allegiance to him, at Berking, who exerted himſelf to preſerve in them theſe loyal ſentiments; for he not only aſſur'd them of his protection, but even, in their preſence, conferred upon prince Edgar large poſſeſſions, who was the idol of the Engliſh, being commonly ſtiled England's darling.

Edwin and Morkard ſubmit to his authority.

He founds Battel abbey. M. Paris.

The victory of Haſtings redounding ſo much to the king's glory, he was willing to tranſmit the fame of it to poſterity; and, therefore, he founded a church and abbey, on the very ſpot where Harold was ſlain; giving orders, that, as ſoon as they were finiſhed, the church ſhould be dedicated to St. Martin, and the abbey named Battle-abbey *. It is true, he pretended, that the having Harold's ſoul and his own pray'd for was his view, in this foundation; but, in all appearance, it was as much the reſult of the love of glory as devotion. Thus, he paſſed the three firſt months of his reign, to the mutual ſatisfaction of the Engliſh and Normans; as the former believed, they loſt very little, by the late revolution, and the latter, that the king would make good his engagements to them, upon their ſubmiſſion.

The king carries with him into Normandy ſeveral Engliſh lords. Malmſ.

King William's precautions having proved ſucceſsful, he reſolved to go to Normandy, to appear there, in his new grandeur; which, as things ſtood, was not only a needleſs but very dangerous proceeding. However, to prevent any revolts, during his abſence, firſt, he placed ſtrong garriſons of Normans in all the caſtles; and, ſecondly, he took along with him the Engliſh lords, whom he chiefly ſuſpected, viz. Stigand, Morkard, Edwin, Waltheoff ſon of Siward, formerly earl of Northumberland, with ſeveral others of the prime nobility. Theſe lords were not inſenſible, that he allowed this honour, in order to be as ſo many hoſtages, and add to the glory of his triumph; tho' they durſt not refuſe to comply, leſt it ſhould increaſe his ſuſpicion. Before he left England, he appointed Odo, biſhop of Bayeux, and William Fitz-Osbern, to govern the kingdom; and there was no end of the rejoicings among his old ſubjects, upon his arrival in Normandy. He kept his chriſtmas † at Feſcamp, where the French ambaſſador ‡, attended with a great retinue of nobles, came to congratulate him, in his maſter's name, upon his acceſſion to the throne of England. On this occaſion, the king affected to make the moſt magnificent appearance; and he paſſed the reſt of the winter in Normandy.

He appoints two regents.

The regents oppreſs the people. Malmſ.

During his Reſidence among the Normans, Odo, his brother, and William Fitz-Osborn, to whom he had committed the regency of England, abuſed the authority, with which he had entruſted them; for wholly intent about enriching themſelves, by all poſſible methods, they were ſo far from redreſſing the grievances of the Engliſh, which they ſuffer'd from others, that they oppreſs'd them, by continual acts of tyranny, themſelves. One would have imagined, from their indiſcreet management, that they had received inſtructions to excite the people to withdraw their allegiance, that they might incur the puniſhment; but the moſt prudent ſtill continued to behave in a dutiful manner, being perſuaded, that the king, at his return, would rectify theſe diſorders, tho' others were reſolved to make the beſt uſe of his abſence, in order to attempt the recovery of their liberty. The Kentiſhmen were the firſt that revolted, inviting to their aſſiſtance Euſtace, earl of Bulloign, who endeavour'd to ſurprize Dover-caſtle; but his deſign proving abortive, he retreated to his ſhips, leaving the Kentiſhmen to the mercy of the regents, who treated them with the utmoſt ſeverity.

Edric's revolt.

His return, indeed, allayed the ſtorm, raiſed by his abſence; but, from this time, he conſider'd the Engliſh, in general, as ſo many ſecret enemies, who only waited for an opportunity of revolting. The king's opinion was not, without a foundation; for if we reflect on his temper, and the ſtate of Engliſh, it will plainly appear, that it was ſcarce poſſible

there

1067. there ſhould be that mutual confidence between them, which was neceſſary to their common tranquillity. The king was naturally ſuſpicious, and the preparations for his expedition had run him vaſtly in debt; being likewiſe obliged to reward, in a liberal manner, the officers who had engaged in his ſervice; and all this muſt be done, at the expence of the Engliſh. Beſides, he was of a covetous temper, extremely deſirous of great ſums of money, not to expend, for the good of the publick, but to hoard up in his coffers; and, in a word, ſuch was his partiality to the Normans, that he very often was deaf to the complaints of the Engliſh againſt them, tho' they abuſed his favours; and, on the contrary, the Engliſh were exceedingly prejudiced againſt the Normans. This miſunderſtanding, between both nations, which took its riſe, in the reign of king Edward, and was fomented by earl Goodwin and Harold his ſon, became ſtill greater, ſince the late revolution; for, in ſpite of all the king's endeavours, to recommend moderation to his countrymen, they inſulted the Engliſh, whom they conquered. Moreover, ſo weak was the foundation, on which king William built his right to the crown, that the Engliſh muſt, of courſe, be led to believe, that the chief motive of his deſign upon England was, to gratify his avarice and ambition; and, finally, the conduct of the regents, in his abſence, rendered it highly probable, they would not have dared to carry their rapines, to ſuch an extravagant height, if they had not been aſſured of their maſter's approbation. Indeed, the lenity of his government, for the three firſt months of his reign, had, in ſome meaſure, diſſipated all their fears; but, when they found, that, after his return, he not only neglected to puniſh the regents, for their male-adminiſtration, but even approved of their behaviour, they openly expreſſed their uneaſineſs, and, in all parts of the kingdom, vented their murmurs and complaints. Upon this, the king made uſe of all poſſible precautions, to prevent the diſcontents of the Engliſh from flaming into an open rupture; and, as he was naturally inclined to ſeverity, he entered upon very ſevere meaſures, being prompted to it by the Normans, whoſe intereſt it was, that the Engliſh ſhould be reduced to their allegiance, rather by force, than by milder methods. This is the moſt plauſible light, in which the duke's proceedings can poſſibly be repreſented; tho' there are ſome, who aſſert, that it was his intention to enſlave the Engliſh, before he had received the leaſt provocation. However that be, it is certain the mutual confidence, between the king and his new ſubjects, was ſoon interrupted; and he now had nothing elſe in view, but to eſtabliſh himſelf on the throne, not being very ſollicitous, whether the means, he made uſe of, were agreeable to juſtice and equity.

Reaſons for the miſunderſtanding, between the king and the Engliſh.

Matilda's coronation.

The birth of prince Henry.

Soon after the king's return, Matilda, his wife, came over into England, and was crowned with great ſolemnity, being alſo, the ſame year, delivered of a ſon, named Henry; for her other ſons, viz. Robert, Richard, and William were born in Normandy, the eldeſt of whom was about twelve years of age.

1068. The king had not, as yet, rewarded his friends, that had voluntarily aſſiſted him, in his enterprize againſt England, who, beſides their ſalaries, expected a requital, in proportion to their reſpective ſervices; and, his ordinary revenues not being ſufficient to anſwer theſe demands, he was under a neceſſity of having recourſe to the unfortunate Engliſh, reſolving upon an expedient, namely, reviving the Danegelt, which muſt, of courſe, be very ungrateful to them. The king evidently foreſeeing, that this tax, which was aboliſhed by Edward the Confeſſor, would occaſion diſcontents, to prevent any ill effects, careſs'd the principal Engliſh lords, as far as was conſiſtent with the reſervedneſs of his temper. He was moſt jealous of earl Edwin, who, by reaſon of his birth, dignity, and perſonal merit, was exceedingly reſpected by his countrymen; and, to ſecure his friendſhip, he promiſed him one of his daughters in marriage. Edwin was ſo delighted with this propoſal, that, inſtead of increaſing the preſent commotions, he did all that was poſſible, in order to appeaſe them; but Aldred, archbiſhop of York, was not ſo eaſily managed. This prelate had ſuch an exalted opinion of the king, that, on all occaſions, he gave him the higheſt encomiums; but, upon his renewing a tax, which was ſo odious to the nation, he began to alter his ſentiments. He ſent a perſon to repreſent to the king, in his name, the pernicious effects of this proceeding; but he ſeverely reprimanded him, for preſuming to deliver ſuch a meſſage. It is ſaid, Aldred, on this occaſion, curſed the king and all his family; and, perhaps, his reſentment was the cauſe of ſome troubles in the north. This, at leaſt, ſeemed to be the king's ſenſe of the matter, who diſpatched one of his officers, to attempt to pacify that incenſed prelate; but his death, happening, at this juncture, freed the king from his apprehenſions, and the Danegelt was levied, with all imaginable rigour. From this time, the Engliſh conſidered him, under the deteſted idea of a Conqueror, and nothing was to be heard, but murmurs and complaints; whilſt the king, on the other hand, treated them, as ſo many rebels againſt his authority.

Aldred's death.

Danegelt is levied.

Before I deſcend to a particular account of the troubles, in this reign, it will be convenient to remark, that the hiſtorians are exceedingly divided in their opinions, as to the cauſes of them. Some fix the whole blame on the Engliſh, as if he was, at length, obliged to uſe violent methods, when he found thoſe, that were milder, ineffectual; but others look upon all their revolts to be the natural effect of his ſevere uſage. To determine this point, it would be previouſly neceſſary to enquire into the extent of a king's power, who obtained a crown, in the manner, above, related, and into the nature of that obedience due from a people, whoſe ſubmiſſion was partly voluntary, and partly the effect of force and compulſion; but, even in theſe enquiries, we ſhould find the ſame diverſity of opinions, as in the former. I ſhall, therefore, only obſerve, that among the hiſtorians, who treat of William the Conqueror, ſome have ſet off his good qualities, to the ut-1068. moſt advantage, whilſt they have but very ſuperficially touched upon his faults; but others have been as induſtrious, in painting all his actions, in the blackeſt colours, and even aggravating thoſe that might be eaſily juſtified. That the Conqueror uſed the Engliſh very ill is acknowledged, even by the greateſt advocates for his cauſe; tho' they alledge, in his vindication, that it was neceſſary for him to treat them, in that manner, as they were always inclinable to revolt; but others impute the ill treatment of the Engliſh entirely to the king's covetous temper, their revolts being occaſioned by their grief and deſpair. Since, then, authors are ſo divided in their ſentiments, as to this matter, I ſhall content myſelf with a plain narrative of ſuch facts, as are unconteſted, leaving the reader at his liberty to judge of them, as he ſhall think moſt agreeable to reaſon.

Fl. Wor. Hunt. As the caſe ſtood between the king and his new ſubjects, it is no wonder, they made ſome attempts to ſhake off a foreign yoke, which they apprehended to be intolerable; and, accordingly, they began to make inſurrections, eſpecially, in the weſtern parts, where the inhabitants of Exeter refuſed to ſwear allegiance to the king, and to admit a Norman garriſon. William, to put an immediate ſtop to this evil, marched to Exeter, in perſon, tho' in the midſt of winter, to reduce it to obedience; and, when he advanced near that city, ſome of the chief inhabitants waited on him, to petition him for a pardon, in the name of the corporation, and to give him hoſtages; but, in the mean time, the ordinary ſort of townſmen, getting the aſcendent, diſapproved of their proceedings, reſolving to ſtand up, in defence of the city. Gith, king Harold's mother, ſpirited them up to this reſolution; ſo that William found himſelf obliged to beſiege the town, in form, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of the ſeaſon. No ſooner had his army begun to batter the walls, than the citizens implored the king's mercy; which he was pleaſed to grant them, being, at length, prevailed on, by the ſollicitations of the clergy, who very urgently importuned him for a pardon. Gith made her eſcape into Flanders, with a prodigious ſum of money; and, to keep the citizens in awe, for the future, he ordered a caſtle to be built in the city, leaving it to the care and management of Baldwin, ſon to earl Gilbert, with a Norman garriſon.

Exeter revolts.

The inhabitants ſubmit, and receive a pardon.

The king builds a caſtle.

The king finds out means to pay his debts. The king could not defer any longer the payment of his debts, nor the rewards he had ſo often promiſed his troops; but the money raiſed by the late tax, tho', at firſt, appropriated to this uſe, being paid into the treaſury, he could not think of parting with it, even on this preſſing occaſion. He judged it to be abſolutely neceſſary to have a reſerve, to ſupply him, on any ſudden emergency, eſpecially, as the behaviour of the Engliſh gave him reaſon to dread a general revolt; and, therefore, he was reſolved to take other ways and means, for the preſent exigency, which exceedingly heightened the diſcontents of the Engliſh. He ſent commiſſioners into all the counties of the kingdom, to enquire, who they were that eſpouſed the cauſe of Harold, and to confiſcate their eſtates; which the Engliſh loudly exclaimed againſt, as a very unjuſt proceeding. They alledged, that, when they appeared in arms for Harold, he was actually poſſeſſed of the throne, being elected at a time, when it was not ſo much as known, that William had any pretenſions to the crown; that, before the battle of Haſtings, they had never ſworn allegiance to the duke of Normandy, and, conſequently, could not forfeit their eſtates, becauſe they fought againſt him; that, provided they had been guilty, they had made an ample ſatisfaction for their fault, by a voluntary ſubmiſſion, which he was pleaſed to accept of, and even to promiſe the preſervation of their rights and privileges. Theſe arguments were very ſtrong and concluſive; but, at this juncture, William had his eyes more intent upon policy than juſtice, his view being not ſo much to puniſh them, for their pretended crime, as to have a plauſible pretence to raiſe money, and to put it out of their power to do him any prejudice, by depriving them of their eſtates.

This fact is very ſlightly paſs'd over, by the advocates for the Conqueror; and, to divert the reader's attention from it, they repreſent, in the moſt lively colours, as an act of juſtice, the king's reſtoring a confiſcated eſtate to an Engliſh lord, who made it appear, that he never took up arms againſt him *. However, this was, doubtleſs, one of the moſt remarkable events of this reign, ſince the forfeited eſtates paſs'd into the hands of the Normans and other foreigners, who, by this means, became more conſiderable, than the Engliſh themſelves; and, from them, many noble families, ſtill in being, derive their original. Theſe confiſcations were extremely ſerviceable to the king, firſt, as they enabled him to pay his debts, and reward his followers; and, ſecondly, as they gave him an opportunity of ſtocking the counties with thoſe, whoſe intereſt it was to ſupport him on the throne.

Edwin and Morkard revolt. Vital. An. Sax. Dunelm. By this laſt ſtep, for his own ſecurity againſt the Engliſh, he rendered himſelf ſtill more diſagreeable to them; and they were ſollicitous, about finding proper expedients, for the recovery of their eſtates. Edwin, earl of Cheſter, thought himſelf under an obligation, to attempt the reſtoration of the almoſt irrecoverable affairs of his country. The king, indeed, had made him a promiſe of one of his daughters in marriage; but ſo far was he from having any proſpect of its being accompliſhed, that the king ſeemed to want a pretence, for involving him in the common ruin. Morkard his brother, earl of Northumberland, being much in the ſame circumſtances, readily joined him;

* The Conqueror had given Sharnburn, in Norfolk, to Warren the Norman; but Edwin, the lord of it, proving that he did not appear in arms for Harold, it was reſtored to him. Tyrrel diſputes the truth of this fact, becauſe this eſtate is not mentioned in Dooms-day-book, as belonging to the ſaid Edwin.

and,

1068. and, as their intereſt was very great, they ſoon muſter'd an army together, which was reinforced by Blethwin king of Wales, their nephew, with a conſiderable body of troops. The king, as he had reaſon to fear this revolt would be general, drew up his forces, with the utmoſt expedition, to cruſh it, in its embryo. Whilſt he was on his march, towards the rebels, he fortified the caſtle of Warwick, making Henry de Beaumont governor, who was alſo the firſt earl of Warwick, and he likewiſe built Nottingham-caſtle, to ſecure a retreat, in caſe of neceſſity; and then he proceeded on his way to the north, in order to engage the rebels, or lay ſiege to York, which had eſpouſed their cauſe.

Brady.

They, upon their ſubmiſſion, receive a pardon.

In the interim, the two earls, expecting that the reſt of their countrymen would follow their example, were exceedingly diſappointed, the king's great vigilance and the ſuperiority of his forces having diſconcerted all their meaſures againſt him; and they were, in this extremity, obliged either to abandon the kingdom, or ſubmit to his mercy. The latter of theſe they thought fit to make choice of; and the king, notwithſtanding his reſentment, was pleaſed to grant them a pardon, with a view of reclaiming them, by this act of clemency. However, he purſued his march towards York; but the inhabitants, being in no condition to oppoſe him, alone, came out to meet him, in order to preſent him with the keys of their city. Upon this, the king pardoned them, as to corporal puniſhments; tho' they were forced to pay a large fine, and had alſo the mortification of ſeeing a caſtle built in their city, garriſon'd with Normans. Archil, a Northumbrian lord, one of the principal rebels, upon delivering up his ſon, as an hoſtage, was received into favour; and Egelwin, biſhop of Durham, who was likewiſe concerned in the revolt, made his peace with the king.

York is ſurrender'd to the king, who builds a caſtle in it.

The king's clemency terrifies the Engliſh.

William's clemency to the chiefs of this rebellion might have produced a good effect, if it had been, in like manner, extended to thoſe that were leſs guilty; but, as he impriſon'd great numbers, who had not the leaſt concern in the late revolt, he gave occaſion to think, that his mercy to the authors of it was entirely a ſtrain of his policy. This proceeding terrified the whole nation, and the more, when they found that the king had ordered caſtles to be built at Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Cambridge; and Morkard, with the other Northumbrian lords, dreading, that he had only deferred their puniſhment, to a proper opportunity, retreated into Scotland. Earl Coſpatrick, who inſpired Edgar Atheling with the ſame ſentiments, with that prince and his mother and ſiſters, fled for protection to the court of Scotland; and Malcolm Mocmoir, who was then on the throne, treated them with the reſpect due to their quality. He, ſoon after, married Margaret, Edgar's eldeſt ſiſter, from whom deſcended Matilda, grandmother to Henry II. in whoſe perſon the royal families of the Saxons and Normans were united.

He orders caſtles to be built, in ſeveral places.

Several lords, with prince Edgar, retreat into Scotland.

Malcolm marries Edgar's ſiſter.

1069. William ſeemed to be not at all diſpleaſed, at being, thus, rid of his ſecret enemies; but, as their retreat was a plain proof of the diſaffection of the Engliſh, he determined to try all poſſible means, to prevent the effects of their reſentment. In the firſt place, he deprived them of their arms; and, ſecondly, he prohibited them from having any lights in their houſes, after eight o' clock, at night. At this hour, a bell was rung, to put them in mind of extinguiſhing their lights, and covering their fires, under the penalty of a great fine; and, for a long time, the ſound of this bell, called Curfew †, was very grating to the ears of the Engliſh, as it was a remembrancer of their abject and deplorable condition. If they diſobeyed this order, they were inſtantly puniſhed, as if they had committed a very heinous enormity; ſo that this bell was a ſignal, which, being daily repeated, continually reminded them of the ſweets of liberty under their antient kings, as well as of their preſent miſery. This oppreſſive action, as well as a thouſand others they daily ſuffered, not only from the king himſelf, but from the foreigners diſperſed over all parts of the kingdom, rendered the lives of the Engliſh an inſupportable burthen; and yet this is the view, that ſeveral hiſtorians give us of their affairs, at that time.

Harold's ſons make a deſcent into Somerſetſhire. Dunelm.

In the mean time, Goodwin, Edmund, and Magnus, ſons to Harold, made a deſcent into Somerſetſhire; and the only reſiſtance, they met with, was from Eadnoth, formerly maſter of the horſe to the king their father, who was willing, on this occaſion, to demonſtrate his loyalty to William; tho' his zeal proved fatal to himſelf, ſince he was ſlain in the battle, and the enemy made off with a very rich booty.

The Engliſh and Normans complain of each other.

If we may give credit to the hiſtorians, who eſpouſe the cauſe of the Engliſh, England was, at this time, in truly deplorable circumſtances; as the Normans, with the king's conntenance and approbation, conſtantly committed outrages againſt them. However, other authors, advocates for the Normans, aſſure us, that the Engliſh, being impatient under a foreign yoke, were incenſed againſt the Normans, in general; and that, almoſt every day, the bodies of aſſaſſinated Normans were found in the woods or high-ways, without any poſſibility of detecting the murderers, ſo inviolably were the Engliſh attached to one another. In all probability, the king was of this opinion, ſince, in a ſevere edict he publiſhed, on this occaſion, he ordered, that, upon a Norman's being ſlain or robbed, the hundred, in which the fact was committed, ſhould be reſponſible for the crime, and pay a large fine. This law had been, for ſubſtance, in force, from the time of Alfred the Great *; but the circumſtance, that exaſperated the Engliſh was, that William's edict was made in favour of the Normans only.

The king publiſhes an edict, in favour of the Normans.

* In the time of the Danes, if the body of an unknown perſon was found murdered, it was taken for granted, it was a Dane, and the hundred paid the mulct; ſo that king William only changed the name of Dane into that of Norman. Bacon's Hiſt. c. 40. p. 62.

Several Normans leave England.

Notwithſtanding the king's partiality to his countrymen, ſeveral of them deſired leave to return into Normandy; and he readily granted their requeſt, having, firſt, fully diſcharged their arrears, and rewarded them, even above their expectation; tho' all this was done, at the expence of the Engliſh.

Robert Cumin is made governor of Northumberland. Dunelm.

Upon this, the miſunderſtanding between the king and his new ſubjects daily increaſed; for the king complained, that the Engliſh were glad of any opportunity for revolting; whilſt they, conſidering themſelves, as unjuſtly oppreſſed, loudly expreſſed their uneaſineſs. The Northumbrians, eſpecially, who, as has been ſhewn, in ſeveral parts of this hiſtory, had been unaccuſtomed to ſervitude, as they were, in a manner, their own maſters, could not refrain their expoſtulations, on every occaſion, and very often uſhered in their complaints with an inſurrection. Their turbulent temper, and their neighbourhood to Scotland, rendering the king very jealous of them, he appointed Robert Cumin, a Norman lord, to be their governor, being a perſon of a rugged diſpoſition. The Northumbrians received this news, juſt as they were preparing to put their project, of calling in the Danes, in execution; for ſome of them, who had retired into Denmark, had perſuaded king Sweyn, that he might eaſily make a conqueſt of England, aſſuring him, that the inhabitants of Northumberland, in particular, would aſſiſt him in his enterprize. Sweyn had equipped a fleet of 200 ſail, which was ready to embarque, when Cumin, with 700 Normans, took poſſeſſion of his government; and, leſt his arrival ſhould obſtruct their deſigns, the principal contrivers of the plot were reſolved to diſpatch both the governor and his attendants. Tho' Cumin was no ſtranger to their intentions, he had ſuch a deſpicable opinion of their force, that he would not take warning; and, in the interim, the conſpirators, having ſecretly drawn together ſome troops, ſurpriſing him at Durham, in a defenceleſs condition, put him and all his followers to the ſword. Soon after this, the Daniſh fleet arrived, under the command of Osborn, the king of Denmark's brother; and all the male-contents joined the Daniſh general, who had already landed his troops. Edgar Atheling, Coſpatrick, Merleſweyn, and all the other lords, who had retreated into Scotland, brought him conſiderable reinforcements; and Osborn, as all the Northumbrians fell in with the Danes, and the king had no forces, in thoſe parts, capable of withſtanding ſuch a formidable army, marched directly towards York. The Norman garriſon, there, entered into a reſolution of holding out, to the laſt, being confident, that the king would come to their relief, with all poſſible expedition; and, with this view, they ſet on fire the ſuburbs, at the foot of the caſtle, that the houſes might not be of any ſervice to the beſiegers. However, the fire, ſpreading farther than was intended, a great part of the city was conſumed to aſhes; and the cathedral-church, the monaſtery of St. Peter, and a famous library begun by archbiſhop Ecbert, about the year 800, entirely periſhed in the flames. In the mean time, the Danes enter'd the city, without the leaſt oppoſition; and, no ſooner were they maſters of it, than they attacked the citadel ſo briskly, that they took it, at the firſt aſſault, putting the garriſon to the ſword. Upon this, the Daniſh general, being informed, that the king was reſolved to march againſt him, encamped on an advantageous piece of ground, leaving earl Walthoff in York, with an Engliſh garriſon.

1069.

The Northumbrians call in the Danes.

Cumin is ſlain.

The Danes land, and are joined by the male-contents.

They beſiege York.

The news of this invaſion alarmed the king, who was afraid, the Danes had been invited over by the body of the Engliſh nation; and, therefore, he durſt not leave the heart of the kingdom, leſt his abſence ſhould occaſion inſurrections in it; tho' it was no leſs dangerous to neglect the affairs of the north. In this perplexity, he judged it moſt expedient to pacify the Engliſh; and, accordingly, he recalled ſeveral from baniſhment, reſtored others to liberty that were under confinement, and affected, by ſome inſtances of ſeverity, to repreſs the inſolence of the Normans. Having, in ſome meaſure found the good effect of theſe proceedings, he ſent his queen and the princes into Normandy, and then ſet out, in order to engage the Danes. So highly was he incenſed againſt the Northumbrians, that he ſwore, by God's ſplendor, he would utterly extirpate them, without any regard to age, ſex, or condition; and, as ſoon as he came into Yorkſhire, he began to put his menaces in execution, by dreadful devaſtations. In the interim, the Danes kept their poſts; and he durſt not attack them, being very ſenſible, that, by hazarding a battle, he ſtaked his all againſt little or nothing. For this reaſon, he concluded it to be moſt adviſable, as things ſtood, to bribe the Daniſh general; and, with this view, he diſpatched private emiſſaries, to offer him a round ſum of money, with leave to plunder the country along the ſea-coaſt, provided he would depart, before winter was over. Osborn accepted of this propoſal, retreating in the beginning of the ſpring; for which he was ſeverely puniſhed by the king his brother. Upon the departure of the Danes, William marched to York, in order to beſiege it, which was defended by an Engliſh and Scotch garriſon, under the command of earl Walthoff; who, by his courage and conduct, made ſuch an obſtinate reſiſtance, that the king deſpaired of compleating this ſiege, when the want of proviſions obliged the beſieged to come to a capitulation. The king, notwithſtanding his reſentment, readily granted honourable terms to the earl, whoſe valour had ſo often attracted his admiration; and, as a farther teſtimony of his eſteem for him, he gave him in marriage his own niece, daughter to the counteſs of Albemarle, creating him alſo earl of Northampton and Huntingdon, and afterwards of Northumberland. Earl Coſpatrick was likewiſe received into favour; but the other officers and ſoldiers of the garriſon were treated with ſeverity, and he laid a heavy fine upon the citizens of York. The ſiege being over, and the king perceiving it to be in his power to be revenged 1070. venged on the Northumbrians, he ravaged their country in ſo barbarous a manner, that he did not leave a ſingle houſe ſtanding between York and Durham, for ſixty miles together; for he did not ſpare even the churches and other publick buildings, according to William of Malmsbury, who was himſelf a Norman. His pretence, for theſe devaſtations, was, to prevent a ſecond Daniſh invaſion; but the courſe of his actions evidently ſhews, that his deſign was, to gratify his revenge, and to intimidate the reſt of the kingdom. If we may believe the hiſtorians, it is impoſſible to give a juſt and full deſcription of the miſeries of the northern counties; for the lands lay without tillage, the houſes were levelled to the ground, and the inhabitants died, in heaps, after their laſt attempts to prolong their miſerable lives, by eating of the moſt unclean animals, and ſometimes even human fleſh.

The king ravages Northumberland. Malmſ. Dunelm.

1070. The calling in of the Danes effectually convinced the king, that he ſhould never enjoy the crown in peace, till he had reduced the Engliſh ſo low, as not to be in a condition to execute any plots againſt him; and, therefore, he reſolved to humble all thoſe that had any intereſt with them, to prevent their deſigns. It is certain, this ſcheme could not be put in execution, without doing injuſtice to many innocent perſons; but, at this time, it is plain, William's ſole aim was his own ſecurity, being altogether regardleſs, about the lawfulneſs of the means. Purſuant to his reſolution, he directly removed the Engliſh from ſuch poſts or employments, as gave them any influence or authority over their countrymen; and then he ſeized on all the baronies, as well as the fiefs of the crown, in general, diſtributing them among the Normans and other foreigners, that followed him into England; but, as the laſt were not ſo numerous, as thoſe whom he had deprived of their eſtates, it may be ſaid, that he loaded them with benefits, in order to diſpoſſeſs the Engliſh of all the crown-lands. How profuſe the king was, in his diſtributions, will appear from the following inſtances. Robert, his brother by the mother's ſide, had, for his ſhare, the earldom of Cornwall, in which he had 288 manors, beſides 558 in other counties. Odo, biſhop of Bayeux, his other brother, was made earl palatine of Kent and high juſticiary of England, having 180 fiefs in Kent alone, and 255 in ſeveral other places. William Fitz-Osborn received, for his reward, the whole earldom of Hereford; and Hugh Lupus, the king's nephew being, his ſiſter's ſon, was preſented with the county palatine of Cheſter, to hold it with the ſame ſovereign power, as his uncle held the crown. Alan Fergeant, duke of Bretaign, William's ſon-in-law, was put in poſſeſſion of all Morkard's eſtate, with the ſame royal prerogatives, as were granted to the earl of Cheſter. Roger de Montgomery had, firſt, Arundel and Chicheſter, and afterwards Shropſhire; Walter Giffard had Buckinghamſhire, and William Warren the county of Surrey; and Eudes, earl of Blois, had the lordſhip of Holderneſs. Roger de Guader, a Bretaign, was made earl of Norfolk and Suffolk and lord of Norwich; and the king gave to Henry de Ferrars Tutbury-caſtle, and to William, biſhop of Conſtance, 280 fiefs, which he left, at his death, to Robert Mowbray his nephew. It would be an endleſs task to enumerate all the king's donations to the foreigners, at the expence of the Engliſh; but what has been already ſaid ſufficiently proves, that his view, in theſe proceedings, was, to deprive his new ſubjects of their eſtates. This, then, was a remarkable epocha, when, to make uſe of the language of the hiſtorians, the whole kingdom was delivered into the hands of foreigners; and, we may be ſure, they ſuffered none to hold any lands of them, except thoſe of their own nation. Accordingly, for the future, we ſhall hear no more of ealdormans or thanes, but of counts or earls, viſcounts, barons, vavaſſors, and other titles borrowed from the Norman or French tongue; ſo that it may be truly affirmed, that England became Norman; and, perhaps, even the very name itſelf would have been changed into that of Normandy, if, for ſome private reaſons, which I ſhall take notice of hereafter, the Normans, ſettled in England, had not been deſirous of being reputed Engliſh, and even affected that title.

The king's ill treatment of the Engliſh.

He gives their places and eſtates to the Normans.

Brady.

The Engliſh nobility were not the only ſufferers, by theſe ſteps of the Conqueror; for the clergy themſelves met with almoſt the ſame uſage. The Saxon kings had granted to ſeveral biſhops and abbots fees, exempt from all military ſervice, denouncing, in their charters, imprecations againſt ſuch of their ſucceſſors, as ſhould preſume to violate theſe privileges; but William, who was a prince that had no regard for the grants of his predeceſſors, cancelled all theſe immunities; for the church-lands were obliged, in time of war, to ſupply a certain number of horſemen; and ſuch of the clergy, as refuſed their quota, gave the king, what he wanted, a pretence for removing them, in order to place foreigners, in their room. Beſides, he quarter'd almoſt all his troops upon the monaſteries, ſo that he maintained his army, without any charge; and he kept ſpies, in all the religious houſes, to inſpect the actions of the monks.

The king violates the charters of the clergy.

The king, being ſtill uneaſy, entered upon a project, which drew on him the curſes of the people, eſpecially the monks; for, being told by his emiſſaries, that ſeveral perſons had ſecured their money and plate in the monaſteries, he gave orders, that all the religious houſes ſhould be ſtrictly ſearched; and, that every thing, of value, ſhould be carried off, on pretence of its being the property of the rebels. Some authors aſſure us, that the very ſhrines of the ſaints and conſecrated veſſels were taken away; and yet it is extremely probable, that the only motive of the zeal of the eccleſiaſticks, in placing this prince on the throne, was, to ſecure their effects; but they had now too much reaſon to acknowledge, that they were egregiouſly miſtaken in their politicks.

He ſeizes on the money and plate in the monaſteries.

However, the king did not ſtop here; for the great credit of the biſhops and abbots, with the people, led him to reſolve upon removing thoſe, whom he moſt ſuſpected; and,

Several biſhops and abbots are depoſed.

1070. that he might manage this affair, without being directly concerned in it himſelf, he ſent for two legates from Rome, who held a council at Weſtminſter, in which every thing was determined to his ſatisfaction. Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was degraded, as an intruder into that ſee; becauſe Robert, his predeceſſor, was not canonically depoſed. This, indeed, ſeems to have been done, purely out of complaiſance to the pope, ſince it does not appear, that the king had cauſe for complaint againſt him; but Agelman, biſhop of Eaſt-Anglia, who reſided then at Helmham, Algerick, biſhop of Durham, and ſome others, who were depoſed by this council, fell a ſacrifice to his jealouſy; and of thoſe, againſt whom nothing could be alledged by this aſſembly, the king, by his ſole authority, baniſhed ſome, and impriſoned others, aſſigning no other reaſon, for theſe illegal proceedings, but his good pleaſure. Having, thus, removed all thoſe that were diſagreeable to him, he fill'd their places with Normans, or other foreigners, being pleaſed with any, except the Engliſh. He promoted Lanfranc, an Italian, who was abbot of a monaſtery at Caen, to the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, and Thomas, a canon of Bayeux, to that of York; three of his chaplains were made biſhops of Wincheſter, Helmham, and Selſey; and he put Norman abbots into the monaſteries, from which the Engliſh were ejected. After all, it muſt be confeſſed, that the king made choice of perſons of known merit, to fill up the vacancies.

Lanfranc is made archbiſhop of Canterbury. Hoveden.

I would not have any of my readers imagine, that I have, in the leaſt, aggravated matters, in my account of king William's treatment of the Engliſh, or that I have affected to copy after thoſe, who were ſollicitous to ſully the reputation of that prince. They, that will give themſelves the trouble of conſulting the original authors, will find, that I have not mentioned a ſingle circumſtance, that is not to be met with in the hiſtories, written, during his life, or ſoon after his death, by thoſe who have taken the greateſt pains, to juſtify his conduct; and, conſequently, the aſſertion of ſome modern writers, that king William never acted, as a Conqueror, but made the antient laws and conſtitutions of the realm the invariable rule of his proceedings, is entirely groundleſs.

The Engliſh perceiving, that it was the king's deſign to reduce them to the loweſt degree of miſery, ſome of the principal thought it high time, now or never, to make a vigorous attempt, to prevent their utter ruin. Fretheric, abbot of St. Alban's, was one of the moſt active among them, who exerted himſelf, on this occaſion; and, by the means of his wealth and intereſt with his countrymen, a freſh plot was laid, to expel the king and the Normans. The conſpirators proceeded, with ſo much caution and ſecrecy, that they raiſed an army together, before the king had received any intelligence of their proceedings; and, this army being grown very numerous, in a few days, the abbot ſent for Edgar Atheling out of Scotland; and, having placed him at the head of the male-contents, who acknowledged him for their ſovereign, he was proclaimed in all the places, of which they were maſters. This daring enterprize gave the king the greateſt uneaſineſs, who lived in a continual dread, that ſome ſudden revolution would deprive him of the fruits of all his labours. He communicated his ſentiments to Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who adviſed him to treat the Engliſh, in a more gentle manner; and he even aſſured him, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to enter into a negotiation with the revolters, leſt the flame, which was already kindled, ſhould ſpread over the kingdom. The king, falling in with his advice, after many fair promiſes, prevailed on the leaders to come to a conference at Berkhamſted, at which he was preſent; and, having calmly heard, and promiſed to redreſs, all their grievances, he ſwore on the holy evangeliſts, that he would eſtabliſh the antient laws of the realm, which went under the name of Edward, his benefactor. Upon this, the male-contents diſmiſſed their troops, believing they had no farther occaſion for them, tho' the king had not the leaſt thoughts of obſerving his oath, which he conſidered, as extorted; for, ſoon after, he ordered a great number of the revolters to be apprehended; and, having put ſome of them to death, he baniſhed or impriſoned the reſt. Edgar retreated into Scotland, and others fled for refuge into Ireland, Denmark, and Norway. The abbot of St. Alban's retired to the iſle of Ely, where he died with regret; but no ſooner was the king informed of it, than he ſeized on and rifled his monaſtery, which he would have entirely demoliſhed, if Lanfranc had not perſuaded him, to deſiſt from his deſign *.

The abbot of St. Alban's is the author of a revolt.

The king's late ſeverity having made various impreſſions on the minds of the Engliſh, ſome of them were ſo thunder-ſtruck, that they reſolved to bear all their hardſhips patiently, leſt they ſhould increaſe them, by fruitleſs attempts; but others, not ſo paſſive, determined, at all hazards, to free themſelves from the Norman yoke, which they apprehended to be altogether inſupportable. The latter of theſe repair'd to the iſle of Ely, which was convenient for them; not only as there was a rich monaſtery there, whoſe abbot was in their intereſt, but as the iſland was ſurrounded with a very ſtrong moraſs, which was proper to ſhelter them from the king's deſigns, as ſoon as they ſhould be ſupplied with a ſufficient number of men to defend it. Edwin and Morkard choſe to join them, not daring to confide in the king's promiſes any longer; but Edwin, having ſet out for Scotland, in order to ſpirit up his party in that kingdom, was murthered on the road, by ſome of his own men. However, Morkard, his brother, found, in the iſle

* Matthew Paris is the only author, that gives any account of this revolt, in the life of Fretheric, and, therefore it is, by ſome, called in queſtion; but, as it is not to be ſuppoſed, that he invented this ſtory, it is probable he found it in the annals of the monaſtery of St. Alban's. He was baniſhed in the reign of Edward, for ſome outrages he had committed, in his neighbourhood; and, having retired into Flanders, his valour raiſed him to poſts of great honour. His father's death obliging him to return into England, he found his eſtate had been diſpoſed of to a Norman; and, not being able to obtain the reſtitution of it, by a legal proceſs, he expelled the foreigner, by force, and took poſſeſſion. He came to Ely, to avoid the king's reſentment, where he was choſen, by the revolters, to be their commander; and, as he was very remarkable, for his courage and conduct, ſuch perſons being as formidable to the king, as thoſe, who tamely ſubmitted to his arbitrary proceedings, were contemptible, he created in his mind the greateſt perturbation. The honour, the Engliſh had lately conferred on Everard, having animated him with freſh ardour, he made all the neceſſary preparations for a vigorous defence, plainly foreſeeing, it would not be long, before he ſhould be attacked by the king's forces. Whilſt he was laying in ſtores, he took care to fortify all the acceſſible places of the iſland, and did every thing elſe, that could increaſe the difficulties of the ſiege. William, no ſtranger to his enterprizing genius, marched towards him, with all poſſible expedition, expecting to ſurprize him; but Everard had already guarded againſt his entrance into the iſle, by ordering a wooden caſtle to be built in the moraſs, which could not be aſſaulted, and defended the only paſſage to the beſieged. However, William was ſtill reſolutely bent on a ſiege, or rather a blockade, being in hopes of reducing them by famine, and having all the beſieged at his mercy; ſince that, which prevented his approaches, was an invincible obſtacle to their flight. On this account, he built a bridge over the moraſs, two miles long, which cut them off from any proſpect of ſuccours.

Notwithſtanding this, the king was as far from gaining his point, as ever, though he ſpent a great deal of time about the ſiege; ſince the rebels were plentifully ſtock'd with proviſions. This delay was not a little mortifying to the king, not only as it was a bar to his preſent deſign, but as it prevented him from marching againſt the king of Scotland, who had made uſe of this opportunity, to invade the northern counties; but, when he almoſt deſpaired of ſucceeding in his enterprize, a lucky expedient render'd him maſter of the place.

The king of Scotland invades the north.

As the monaſtery of Ely held ſeveral manors, without the limits of the iſle, which ſupplied them with the beſt part of their revenues, the king was adviſed to ſeize on them, in order to reduce the monks to their allegiance; and he had no ſooner done this, and diſtributed the lands among his courtiers, than Thurſtan, the abbot, not being able to withſtand the importunate clamours of the monks, reſolved upon performing a conſiderable piece of ſervice for the king, in order to regain his favour. With this view, he privately ſent him a propoſal, that he would enſure to him the iſle of Ely, and all that were in it, and alſo pay him a thouſand marks, on condition that he would reſtore the lands of the monaſtery. The king accepted this offer, and the abbot performed his promiſe, tho', in what manner, we are not informed by the hiſtorians; who only tell us, that the revolters, by the abbot's treachery, were obliged to ſubmit to the mercy of their ſovereign.

Everard was the only perſon, that had the fortune to eſcape, who forced his way thro' a certain paſs with his ſword, in ſpite of the guards. Of thoſe that were taken, ſome had their eyes put out, or their hands cut off, and others were confined in different priſons; and, among the laſt, was earl Morkard, with Egelrick, biſhop of Durham, who, having excommunicated the king, was ſent to Abingdon, where he was ſtarved to death. The monks of Ely too were chaſtiſed, tho' they had obſerved the articles of capitulation, with the utmoſt punctuality; for, when they came to pay the money, according to agreement, upon its wanting a ſingle groat, they were fined another thouſand marks; and, beſides, the king quarter'd upon them forty knights, whom they were conſtrained to ſupply with all neceſſaries.

Hoveden. M. Paris. Baker.

In the mean time, Malcolm continued his devaſtations in the north, with a barbarity altogether unworthy of a chriſtian prince, if we may believe the account, which the Engliſh hiſtorians give concerning it. They affirm, that the Scotch ripp'd up the bellies of women with child, cut the throats of the old men, and toſs'd young children into the air, to receive them on the points of their ſwords; but, in all probability, theſe things have been exceedingly aggravated, as well as the number of the Engliſh ſlaves, that were carried into Scotland, where, it is ſaid, every houſe had one. Coſpatrick, then governor of Northumberland, not being in a condition to withſtand the king of Scotland, making an inroad into Cumberland, revenged on the Scots the calamities their countrymen had brought upon the Engliſh; tho' this enterprize did only ſo much the more incenſe Malcolm, who, on that very account, carried on, with the greater fury, his ravages in Northumberland. William was not a little diſturbed at theſe inſults; but, before he took any ſteps, to put a ſtop to them, he determined to compleat the affair of Ely, which, in his opinion, was of the greater importance. However, it was no ſooner ended, than he marched into Galloway, tho' he only fatigued his army, to no purpoſe; for Malcolm, who was, at this time, in Scotland, attempted to prolong the war, in hopes of ſome new troubles in England, of which he might take the advantage; and the ſame conſideration obliged William to conclude it, with all poſſible expedition. The moſt ſpeedy method, to accompliſh this, he apprehended,

Moreover, ever ſince the battle of Haſtings, he ſeemed to be utterly averſe againſt running any riſque; and, as this was the reaſon of his declining an engagement with the Danes before, in all appearance, he acted now, upon the ſame grounds, with reſpect to the Scots. However that be, the boundaries of the two kingdoms were ſettled *, by this treaty; and Malcolm did him homage. Some Engliſh authors † pretend, this homage was done for all Scotland; whereas the Scotch aſſert, it was only for Cumberland, and, indeed, with the greateſt probability; for it is not to be imagined, that Malcolm, who had never met with the leaſt repulſe, ſhould do homage for his whole kingdom. I am not inſenſible, that ſome are of opinion, that William had a right to demand it; but the diſcuſſion of this point will come in, more properly, hereafter.

The two kings enter into a treaty.

Several Engliſh families ſettle in Scotland.

Malcolm's hoſpitable treatment of the Engliſh refugees invited great numbers of them into his dominions, where ſome of them continued, having obtained ſettlements there; and, from them, ſeveral conſiderable families, at this day in Scotland, derive their original. Some farther add, that the Engliſh, with their language, brought thither the titles of duke, earl, and baron; but Buchanan will have it, that they were in uſe, before that time. He readily grants, that the Engliſh introduced into Scotland luxury, pride, wantonneſs, drunkenneſs, and other vices, to which, he ſays, the Scotch were, hitherto, ſtrangers. Earl Coſpatrick was one of the principal of the refugees, who was removed from his government, under the pretence of his being concerned in Cumin's death, tho', after that, he had done William very ſignal ſervices; and he was ſucceeded by earl Walthoff, the only Engliſh lord, that had any intereſt in the king, for which he was chiefly indebted to his wife, who was his niece, tho' even he did not remain long in his favour.

1073. The king of France invades Normandy. An. Sax. Malmſ.

As the French did not, in the leaſt, interrupt king William in his proceedings, notwithſtanding the late commotions in England, he flatter'd himſelf, they would be ſtill leſs inclined to give him any diſturbance now, as he was firmly ſeated on his throne, having entirely ſubdued his Engliſh ſubjects; but, on a ſudden, Philip's jealouſy reviving, the king of England's proſperity gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs. He blamed himſelf, for his want of politicks, in not aſſiſting the Engliſh male-contents, and reſolved to make attonement for his fault, by attacking Normandy; and, doubtleſs, he entertained hopes, that the Engliſh would, by this means, be induced to revolt, and ſo detain William in England. However that be, he unexpectedly invaded Normandy, without any declaration of war; and no ſooner did William receive the news of it, than he went over with an army, wholly compoſed of Engliſh, not daring to take his Norman troops out of England, who were abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity of his conqueſt. He retook Mans, and all the province of Maine, which had lately revolted, the Engliſh being ambitious of ſerving him faithfully, in Normandy, tho' he had treated them in their own country, with the greateſt ſeverity; inſomuch that Philip, not meeting with the ſucceſs he expected, concluded a peace with the king of England. 1073.

Soon after this treaty, Edgar, weary of living abroad, returning home, made his ſubmiſſion to the king, who received him graciouſly, granting him an allowance of a pound of ſilver a day; and, from this time, he continued in conſtant obedience to the king. If he had any reaſon to complain, it was not ſo much of William, as of the Engliſh, who, upon Edward's deceaſe, had preferred a private perſon before him; for it was Harold that deprived him of the crown, who, if he could have ſecured it, would have made his ſon his ſucceſſor, without any regard to the rights of the Saxon prince. On the contrary, it muſt be acknowledged, Edgar was under the ſtrongeſt obligations to William, on the account of his clemency, who had admitted him into his good graces, notwithſtanding the jealous apprehenſions he might juſtly entertain concerning him. Edgar Atheling ſubmits to the king.

During the king's abſence in Normandy, Gregory VII. the boldeſt and moſt enterprizing pope, that ever ſate in the pontifical chair, diſpatch'd his nuntio, to ſummon him to do him homage, alledging, that England was a fief of the holy ſee; and he likewiſe inſiſted on the arrears of Peter-pence, which had not been paid, for many years. Some aſſert, that the pope's demand, as to the firſt article, was reaſonable, being the very condition on which William had obtained his approbation of his expedition into England; but others found the pope's ſovereignty over that kingdom, on the voluntary grant of Romeſcot, or Peter-pence, made to the church of Rome by Ina and Offa kings of Weſſex and Mercia, which they take to be a real tribute, by which they became feudatories to the ſee of Rome; and, finally, there are ſome, that date this ſovereignty no higher, than from the time of Ethelwulph's journey to Rome. However, the true ſtate of the caſe ſeems to be this, that, altho' William, whilſt his enterprize was in agitation, made no ſcruple of owning the pope's claims; yet, as it was now compleated, and he found himſelf firmly ſettled on the throne, he altered his ſen- The pope demands homage of the king. 1073. timents. He, in ſo many words, told the nuncio, that he held his crown of none, but God and his ſword, and that he would not render it dependent on any perſon alive; and, upon the nuncio's preſuming to denounce menaces againſt him, he iſſued out an edict, to prohibit all his ſubjects, from ſubmitting to any pope, without his conſent, or receiving any orders from Rome, without his leave. His view, in this, was to convince Gregory, who had then a competitor, of the danger to which he ſhould expoſe himſelf, by perſiſting in his claims; but, at the ſame time, he promiſed to pay off the arrears of Peter-pence, and to be more punctual, for the future; and, by this reſolute anſwer, he obliged the pope to drop his pretenſions.

The king reſolutely refuſes to perform it.

1074. The king's long ſtay, in Normandy, was the occaſion of a freſh conſpiracy in England, which was ſo much the more dangerous, as the principal Norman lords were the authors of it. Ralph de Guader, a Bretaign, earl of Suffolk, and Roger de Bretevil, earl of Hereford, having reſolved to unite their two families, by the marriage of Ralph with Roger's daughter, the king, for ſome private reaſons, put a ſtop to their proceedings. The earls, not daring to compleat this marriage, whilſt the king was in England, accompliſh'd their deſign, in his abſence, making a ſplendid feaſt, on the occaſion, to which they invited ſeveral perſons of quality, and earl Walthoff, among the reſt. At the ſame time, they formed a project of depoſing him, being ſenſible, that it was the only method to avoid the effects of his reſentment; and, taking this to be a proper opportunity, for engaging their gueſts in the plot, as ſoon as they perceived them to be heated with wine, they began to diſcourſe about the king, chuſing to dwell on ſuch ſubjects as had a tendency to incenſe them againſt him. They expreſs'd a tender concern for the abject and deplorable condition of the Engliſh; and, to work upon the Normans, they reminded them of William's ſevere government, who, by exceſſive taxes laid on their eſtates, took from them, with one hand, what he gave them with the other. Finding, at length, that this ſort of language was heard, with a pleaſing attention, they openly declared, that it was inglorious for perſons, of their rank and dignity, to continue in ſubjection to a baſtard, who had uſurped both the crowns he was poſſeſs'd of; and ſuch diſcourſes, as theſe, having inſenſibly made an impreſſion upon men, who, in their cups, fancied, that nothing was difficult or impracticable, they came to a reſolution of taking up arms, in order to oppoſe the king's return into England. Earl Walthoff, being warmed with liquor, inconſiderately conſented to the plot, as well as the reſt; but, the next day, having recovered the uſe of his reaſon, he began to reflect, that he had engaged in an enterprize, which, inſtead of reſtoring the Engliſh to their liberty, would infallibly increaſe their miſery. He plainly foreſaw the difficulties, that would naturally attend this raſh undertaking; and that, if it ſhould prove ſucceſsful, England would be ſo far from receiving any advantage by it, that it would become a prey to ſeveral petty tyrants, who would compleat its deſtruction. Beſides, he was very ſenſible, that, if the conſpiracy miſcarried, he, in particular, ſhould fall a ſacrifice to the king's reſentment, as he was an Engliſhman, whilſt the foreigners might meet with ſome mercy from him; and he likewiſe conſider'd, that William had pardoned him once already, and diſtinguiſhed him, by many favours, from the reſt of his countrymen. Theſe conſiderations leading him to a hearty repentance for his fault, he informed Lanfranc of what was tranſacted; and, having advanced his being intoxicated with the fumes of wine, as an excuſe for his indiſcretion, he intreated him to intercede for his pardon. The archbiſhop adviſed him to repair to the king immediately, and to make a diſcovery of the whole affair, giving him encouragement to expect a pardon, without much difficulty, for a crime, that was committed, in ſuch circumſtances, and of which he ſo ſoon repented, and even wrote a letter to the king, in his favour; and Walthoff, falling in with his advice, waited on the king, who received him very graciouſly, and pardoned his imprudence, after he had given a full account of the conſpiracy that was formed againſt him.

He repents of it, and is pardon'd.

The king, being exceedingly alarmed at this news, reſolved to return to England, with all poſſible expedition, to put a ſtop to theſe proceedings; but the plot was ſtifled almoſt in its very birth, by the vigilance of the biſhop of Bayeux, the regent. The two earls were ſo impolitick, in their meaſures, that they could not even join the troops, each of them had muſter'd together; ſo that Ralph de Guader was obliged to retire to Norwich-caſtle, where he was directly beſieged; but, as he deſpaired of a pardon, if he fell into the hands of the king, without waiting for the reſult of this ſiege, having made his eſcape, he retreated into Denmark. After this, the caſtle was, for ſome time, defended by his counteſs, tho', at length, ſhe ſurrendered, upon terms; and ſhe was permitted to follow the earl, her ſpouſe, who had already obtained a powerful aid from the king of Denmark, to ſupport the revolters. Accordingly, ſoon after, a Daniſh fleet appeared on the coaſt of England; but, the Engliſh not being inclined to take up arms, they immediately ſteer'd their courſe home.

The plot is ſtifled in its birth.

In the interim, king William, upon his return into England, being given to underſtand, that there were ſtill ſome remains of the conſpiracy, in the weſtern counties, marched thither, with all ſpeed, and ſeverely puniſhed all whom he, in the leaſt, ſuſpected. Some were hang'd, and others had their hands and feet cut off; and they, that met with the moſt gentle uſage, were baniſhed the kingdom. Earl Walthoff alſo, notwithſtanding his pardon, being apprehended and carried to Wincheſter, was publickly beheaded, and buried under the ſcaffold. It is ſaid, that the king diſpatched him, for the ſake of his vaſt eſtate; but others add, that Judith, his wife, was very active in promoting his ruin, by falſe reports to the king, that ſhe might be at liberty to marry another.

1074. However that be, the tragical fate of this valiant earl was univerſally lamented; for every one imagined, that his puniſhment was too great for ſo minute a crime, even tho' he had not received the king's pardon. In proceſs of time, his body was removed to Croyland-abbey, where, it is reported, it wrought ſeveral miracles; and, accordingly, he was reverenced by the people, as a real martyr. The abbot of Croyland, having encouraged this belief, was ejected, by the king's order, Ingulphus, a monk of Montevraud, being placed in his room; and yet this very Ingulphus, notwithſtanding his obligations to William, relates, in his hiſtory of Croyland, that miracles were performed at Walthoff's tomb.

He paſſes for a martyr.

The Engliſh are treated with great ſeverity.

Tho' the Engliſh were ſo far from being concerned in the late conſpiracy, that they refuſed to join the male-contents; yet the king, taking it for granted, that they had ſecretly fomented the rebellion, deprived ſome of them of their eſtates, and others of their liberty. From this time, William of Malmsbury dates the ſervitude of the Engliſh; and, tho' a Norman, he evidently ſhews, that, from this period, the king had not the leaſt regard for them. This prince's ſeverity, then, to his Engliſh ſubjects, was certainly very great and univerſal; ſince this author looks upon, as comparatively trifling, all that he had, hitherto, done, with reſpect to the ſpiritual and temporal lords.

William's precautions having, at length, ſettled his affairs at home, he went over to Normandy, to be revenged on Ralph de Guader, who had retreated to his city of Dol in Bretaign; for, having ſeized on all his eſtates in England, he was reſolved alſo to deprive him of his hereditary poſſeſſions. With this view, he laid ſiege to Dol, tho' to no purpoſe, as the defence of the beſieged had given time to the king of France to come to their aſſiſtance; ſo that William, being diſappointed, returned to England, where, during the remainder of that and the following year, nothing material was tranſacted, except that a council was held at London, which determined the precedency of the biſhops.

1077. Robert, the king's ſon, wages war againſt his father. Malmſ. Hoved. Fl. Wig.

The king had, now, a fair proſpect of a long and uninterrupted tranquillity, when a war, unexpectedly, broke out between him and his eldeſt ſon Robert. Robert, being encouraged by the king of France, pretended, that the king, his father, was obliged to reſign Normandy to him, by virtue of a poſitive promiſe he made to that purpoſe; and, upon this, he attempted to render himſelf maſter of the dutchy, treating, with great ſeverity, thoſe, who would not own him for their ſovereign. William, aſtoniſhed at his audaciouſneſs, inſtantly drawing an army together, entirely conſiſting of Engliſh, for the reaſon, above, related, ſet out for Normandy, to oppoſe his ſon's proceedings; but, Robert ſtill purſuing his deſign, with vigour and reſolution, William was conſtrained to carry on the war, in form, as he found, that his own ſon was not an enemy to be ſlighted or deſpiſed. The king, falling into an ambuſh, was forced to hazard his life, as much as the meaneſt officer; and, as he diſtinguiſh'd himſelf, by his valour, Robert, who did not know him, taking him to be the moſt formidable of his enemies, attacked him, wounded him in the arm, and diſmounted him with his lance. William was in the laſt extremity, when, by good fortune, his ſon diſcovered him to be his father, by a mark on his arms; but, upon this diſcovery, the young prince, directly alighting, raiſed him, and ſet him on his horſe, that he might eſcape the preſent danger. In the mean while, the Engliſh troops meeting with rough treatment from the Normans, William was compelled to retreat in diſorder. Robert was ſo deeply concerned, on the account of his being ſo very near the point of killing his father, that, to demonſtrate the ſincerity of his ſorrow for it, he ſubmitted himſelf entirely to his mercy; but this generous action made no impreſſion on the mind of the king, who never afterwards had any affection for him. Some hiſtorians tell us, that, in the firſt emotions of his paſſion, he even denounced a curſe againſt him, which, notwithſtanding his ſon's dutiful and ſubmiſſive behaviour, he would not be prevailed on to retract. Indeed, he gave him a kind reception; but he brought him with him into England, under a pretence of ſending him at the head of an army againſt Scotland; and, the next year, he received a commiſſion to march againſt the Scots, who had renewed the war.

1078. Robert is ſent to fight againſt the Scots.

Robert did nothing remarkable, in this expedition, except the founding of Newcaſtle upon Tyne, in the ſame place, where the abbey of Monkceſter ſtood, famous for the auſterity of the monks; for this war was concluded by a treaty between the two nations.

He founds Newcaſtle.

Before the army was disbanded, William, to make ſome amends for the expence of raiſing it, employed it againſt Wales, in order to chaſtiſe the Welch, for ſome incurſions into his dominions; but the Welch princes, being in no condition to reſiſt him, voluntarily made their ſubmiſſion, obliging themſelves to pay an annual tribute to the crown of England.

The Welch do homage to the king.

About this time, William built the famous tower of London, the more effectually to ſecure the fidelity of the citizens, of whom he had, all along, entertained jealous apprehenſions. Some will have it, that this citadel was founded by Julius Cæſar; but it is no eaſy matter to prove, that Cæſar was ever in London, much more, that he undertook this work, of which he does not make the leaſt mention, in his Commentaries.

William builds the tower of London.

Upon the peace with Scotland, and ſubmiſſion of the Welch, a ſcene of tranquillity was opened, which continued ſome years, during which, the king attempted to regulate the affairs of the kingdom; for, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne, England was in the greateſt confuſion, by reaſon of ſeveral alterations in the government, as well as in the laws and methods of the adminiſtration of juſtice; which was ſtill increaſed, with reſpect to the debts of private perſons. The creditors were of opinion, that the new poſſeſſors of eſtates were obliged to diſcharge the debts of thoſe that had been ejected, and to them did the debtors refer the creditors for their money; but the new proprietors declined

Whatever regulations, he had hitherto made, related only to ſuch caſes, wherein his own intereſt was concerned; for it does not appear, that he had given himſelf any trouble, about private perſons. Indeed, they, who have been moſt ſollicitous to extol all the actions of this prince, take notice of his ſtrict juſtice, as an argument of his affection for his ſubjects; but, then, it muſt be conſidered, that this ſtrictneſs was as advantageous to the king, as to the people, ſince the permitting crimes to paſs, unpuniſhed, exceedingly tends to the prejudice of the ſupreme authority; moreover, offences, in thoſe days, were, for the moſt part, puniſhed by pecuniary fines, all the profit accruing to the king, who deprived the earls, barons, and biſhops of the ſhare they enjoyed, under the Saxon kings.

However, it cannot be denied, that William's reigning paſſion was an inſatiable avarice; for he was indefatigable, in the inventing of means to gratify his covetous temper. I have already ſhewn, how he impoveriſhed the Engliſh; but, in this, he acted, rather more for the advantage of the Normans and other foreigners, than for his own; and, therefore, he thought it reaſonable, that thoſe of them, that were proprietors of eſtates in England, ſhould be ſubject to the ſame impoſitions, as the Engliſh themſelves. But, that he might proceed in this affair, with the greater regularity, being deſirous of knowing the preciſe value of every private perſon's eſtate, he ordered an exact ſurvey to be made of the lands, goods, and chattels of all his ſubjects; which contained the number of acres in each man's eſtate, as well as the ſum he was uſually taxed, not only, during the Saxon monarchy, but ſince the late revolution. This ſurvey alſo gave an account of every one's ſtock of cattle, horſes, ſheep, &c. how much ready money he was maſter of, and what debts he owed, or were owing to him; for theſe ſeveral particulars were, very methodically, ranged in the Doomſday-book, i. e. the book of the day of judgment, probably ſo called, becauſe the means of the Engliſh were canvas'd and examined, in that book, as the actions of all men will be, at that awful day. This general regiſter, which ſome term, the great terror of England, was laid up in the exchequer or king's treaſury, to be conſulted on occaſion; i. e. as an author obſerves, as often as they were diſpoſed to enquire, of how much more wooll they might fleece the Engliſh flocks. The king's orders, about this ſurvey, were executed, with the utmoſt punctuality; ſince the commiſſioners, as well as private perſons, could expect nothing, but the moſt exemplary puniſhment, if they were guilty of any fraud, or even of the leaſt connivance *. 1078.

It is obvious, that this ſurvey was not taken, merely, to ſatisfy the king's curioſity; and the taxes, that he afterwards laid on almoſt all the effects of private perſons, clearly demonſtrate, that he was reſolved to deprive the Engliſh of every thing, that was not abſolutely neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence. William, conſidering England, as a conqueſt, imagined, that he was the great proprietor of all the lands in the kingdom; and, therefore, it is natural to conclude, that his revenues bore a proportion to the eſtates of the Engliſh and his own avarice. Without entering upon the ſeveral branches of his revenues, I ſhall only remark, in the general, that they annually amounted to 400,000 l. ſterling; which ſum, according to a moderate computation, is equal to five millions now. Beſides, he had a vaſt number of perquiſites, as mulcts and fines; tho', it is very obſervable, that no part of all this money was expended, for the ſupport of his ſtanding army; for he obliged the new proprietors of the eſtates, that were taken from the Engliſh, to maintain his troops, who very willingly complied with this condition, as their preſent poſſeſſions were entirely the fruits of his bounty. The king, by this means, kept ſixty thouſand men, in arms, ready to march, upon the firſt notice, without any charge to himſelf; and, for this reaſon, it is no wonder, that he was look'd upon to be the moſt wealthy prince in his time, ſince his revenues ſo vaſtly exceeded his expences, as he ſpent but a very inconſiderable part of the annual profits of the kingdom.

The king's revenues.

The king having, thus, ſettled his revenues, attempted to gratify his extreme fondneſs for hunting, which had almoſt as great a ſway over him, as his covetouſneſs, and led him to the commiſſion of many acts of injuſtice. By theſe, I do not mean the laws he publiſh'd on that account, which were exceedingly ſevere and rigorous; for, in this, he only acted, like ſeveral other princes, who puniſh the violation of the laws of the game, as if they were the moſt capital crimes, and will ſooner pardon the murder of a man, than the killing of a ſtag. What, I now point at, was the prodigious deſolation the king order'd to be made in Hampſhire, above thirty miles in compaſs, the very

* This ſurvey was begun in the fourteenth, and finiſhed in the twentieth year of William's reign, having ſent, as commiſſioners, ſome of the principal earls and biſhops, who, by the verdict or preſentment of juries, or perſons ſworn in every county and hundred, took an account of the particulars, above, related, according to the value, in the time of king Edward, expreſs'd in the Doomſday-book, by T. R. E. viz. Tempore Regis Edwardi. As the chief intent of this ſurvey was, to give the king an exact account of his lands or demeſnes, and alſo what were held by the tenants in chief or of the crown, in every county, the king's name was firſt ſet down, and then all the great men in order, that held in chief. All England, except Weſtmoreland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, was deſcribed, with part of Wales, in two books, called the great and little Doomſday-book, now in the exchequer, the little book containing only Norfolk, Suffolk, and Eſſex. This being the higheſt record in the kingdom, it was then, and is, to this day, a deciſive evidence in caſes, wherein there may be occaſion to conſult it.

This tract of ground, formerly called Ytene, was afterwards named the New-Foreſt. Some authors affirm, that he had a farther view, in this undertaking, than barely the diverſion of hunting, viz. to give a free acceſs to the troops, which, in caſes of neceſſity, he might ſend for from Normandy; but this motive, which ſeems to be very trifling, was, doubtleſs, invented by the advocates for the Conqueror, who imagine, that he always acted on the principles of prudence and policy; as if princes were not as ſubject to their paſſions, as private perſons. Others, having remarked, that two of his ſons and one of his grandſons loſt their lives, in this very foreſt, by extraordinary accidents, have concluded it to be the vengeance of Heaven, for the injuries offered to the proprietors of the lands.

Ordic. Vital.

His great affection for Normandy. Baker.

The king's vaſt affection for Normandy had, alſo, a reigning influence over his actions in England; for, being of opinion, that Normandy was the model of perfection, he endeavour'd to aboliſh the Saxon, in order to eſtabliſh the Norman laws; and, perhaps, he would have purſued this point, with greater zeal and aſſiduity, were it not, that he was informed, that, as the laws of England were diſtinguiſh'd by the name of Edward, his benefactor, all the world would abhor his ingratitude. However, he made ſeveral innovations in the Engliſh laws, and the methods of the adminiſtration of juſtice. Particularly, he would not ſuffer the biſhops to preſide in the ſhire-gemots or county-courts, aſſigning them a court of their own, under the pretence, that eccleſiaſtical and civil affairs ſhould not be confounded; but his main view was, to deprive the biſhops of their ſhare of the mulcts and fines. He likewiſe erected ſeveral new courts, extremely inconvenient for the Engliſh; not only, by reaſon of their ignorance of the rules and practice of theſe courts, but becauſe, as they always attended the prince, the ſuitors were obliged to follow him, wherever he removed, in order to carry on their actions. After all, there was one court, which proved very advantageous to the people, as it was deſigned to moderate the rigour of the laws, viz. the court of exchequer, which continues to this day.

He attempts to aboliſh the Engliſh language. Ingulph.

William not only obliged the Engliſh to try their cauſes in theſe courts, but alſo to make uſe of the Norman, in order to aboliſh the Engliſh language; and, accordingly, he founded ſchools in all the cities and boroughs, where Norman was taught, forcing the parents, under ſevere penalties, to ſend their children to be educated in theſe places. I have already had occaſion to obſerve, that the Norman language was very difficult, and not eaſily to be underſtood, even by the French themſelves, on account of the great mixture of Daniſh and French. However, the king made it his principal ſtudy, to introduce and ſpread his native tongue; and if thoſe, that had any buſineſs at court, did not ſpeak Norman, they were treated with diſreſpect, as perſons that had not the leaſt complaiſance for the king. William, the more effectually to conſtrain the Engliſh to learn Norman, publiſhed his laws in that language; the ignorance of which was not admitted, as a ſufficient plea, in behalf of the offenders. Some pretend, that it was the king's intent, in this proceeding, to enſnare the Engliſh, by laying them under a neceſſity of committing treſpaſſes, which were uſually puniſhed, by mulcts and confiſcations, for his benefit; but, if this was not, in reality, the ſtate of the caſe, as, it muſt be confeſſed, it cannot be proved, his avarice and the means he made uſe of, to accumulate wealth, are but too juſt grounds for ſuch an accuſation. 1080.

To return to my ſubject. Some authors aſſert, that, notwithſtanding all his endeavours, he was not able to introduce the Norman language into England; but that, on the contrary, the Normans, at length, learnt to ſpeak Engliſh, their ſmall number being obliged to give way to the bulk of the nation. Others attempt to make appear, that the Norman was eſtabliſhed, upon the ruins of the Engliſh tongue. Tho' the proof of each of theſe aſſertions be extremely difficult; yet it is very certain, the language, uſed in England, after the conqueſt, was not preciſely the ſame with that which was ſpoken, under the Saxon monarchy. However, it cannot be ſaid, that the Normans ſpoke Engliſh, or the Engliſh Norman, but rather that a third language was formed, that was a mixture of both; nevertheleſs, all publick acts were in Norman, till the time of Edward III.

A remark on the Engliſh tongue.

Such was William's partiality for the Normans, that he expreſs'd it, on all occaſions; and Ingulphus, abbot of Croyland, give us an inſtance of it, that is very remarkable. He tells us, that he appeared one day before the council, the king being preſent, to demand ſome lands belonging to his monaſtery, then poſſeſs'd by Talboys, a Norman, who had ſettled there ſome monks of his own nation. The king, as the hiſtorian adds, having examined the original charter or grant of the abbey-lands, at firſt, acknowledged, that the demand was juſt and reaſonable; but no ſooner had Talboys alledged, that the monks, he had ſettled on theſe lands, were Normans and well affected to the king, whereas thoſe of Croyland were Engliſh, than he determined this affair, in favour of the Norman, being byaſs'd by his intereſt and natural inclination; for the former prompted him to do all that was poſſible, to prevent the revolt of the Engliſh, and the latter, to be partial to the Normans.

What

1081. What has been, hitherto, related, ſufficiently ſhews, that the Engliſh did not complain of their oppreſſions, without reaſon; tho', poſſibly, their impatient behaviour was the occaſion of them. However that be, it is evident, that they were reduced to the laſt extremity, whilſt they had the mortification to ſee the Normans enriched by their ſpoils. The following inſtance will convince us, how much they were pillaged by thoſe, that were the particular favourites of the king. Odo, biſhop of Bayeux, 1082. brother to William, by his mother's ſide, who had not lived in England, above 15 or 16 years, fancied himſelf to be in a condition to purchaſe the papacy; and, with this view, having bought a magnificent palace at Rome, he reſolved to convey all his treaſures thither, and make it the place of his reſidence, that he might be in readineſs, upon the pope's death, to put his project in execution. That he might proceed, with the greater caution and ſecrecy, he ſet out, during the king's abſence in Normandy, for the iſle of Wight, where his ſhips lay ready for him; but being forced, by contrary winds, to continue, ſome time, in the iſland, he could not embarque, ſo ſoon as he expected, which diſconcerted all his meaſures; for William, having received intelligence of his deſign, came over, with all expedition, and ſurprized him, juſt as he was upon his departure and going to ſail. He ordered his officers to ſeize him directly; but, as fear and reſpect deterr'd them from doing their duty, he took him priſoner with his own hands. The prelate, to no purpoſe, pleaded the privileges of his order; for the king told him, that he did not ſeize on him, as a biſhop, but as earl of Kent, commanding him to be impriſoned; and, upon this, all his effects were confiſcated to the king's uſe, having been proved to be guilty of numberleſs rapines and extortions.

1084. The death of the queen. Malmſ. Hoved. As nothing material was tranſacted, in this or the following year, I ſhall proceed to the year 1084, in which we meet with the death of Matilda, William's queen, and the king's preparations againſt a foreign invaſion. The Engliſh, who had retreated to Denmark, having perſuaded king Canute, that their countrymen only wanted an opportunity to ſhake off the Norman yoke, he formed a deſign of ſubduing England, to which kingdom, he apprehended, he had ſome plauſible pretenſions, eſpecially, when ſeconded by an armed force. Accordingly, he equipped a fleet, and levied ſome troops, which preparations alarmed William; ſince the advices from Denmark aſſured him, that they were made againſt him. As he durſt not place any confidence in the Engliſh, he muſter'd up an army of foreigners, laying a tax of ſix ſhillings upon every hyde of land in England, which was three times as much as the Danegelt; but, whether Canute was diverted by William's vigilance, in England, or by ſome other unexpected accident, he dropped his deſign, without making any attempt to put it in execution. William, upon this, diſbanded his army, tho' he did not refund the money, that was raiſed for their pay; but, on the contrary, he impoſed a new tax, on account of the order of knighthood, he was willing to confer on Henry, his youngeſt ſon; for the Norman cuſtom of making the prince preſents, when he knighted any of his ſons, was too advantageous, not to be introduced into England. 1084.

The king might eaſily lay any burthens on his ſubjects, ſince all his orders of this kind were punctually obſerved; for the Normans were afraid of oppoſing his will, leſt they ſhould loſe their eſtates, as they acquired them, by a bare act of his good pleaſure, and the Engliſh were in no condition to throw off the Norman yoke. There was ſcarce a lord of that nation, that was not either impriſoned or baniſhed; and thoſe of them, that ſtill preſerved their liberty, were watched ſo narrowly, that the leaſt oppoſition, or even grounds of ſuſpicion, was ſufficient to compleat their ruin. Edgar Atheling, who ſeemed to be the moſt formidable, entirely depended upon his penſion from the king; and, ſince his voluntary ſubmiſſion to the Conqueror, he had forfeited the affections of the Engliſh, who now entertained a very deſpicable opinion concerning him. A certain hiſtorian does not ſcruple to aſſert, that he was, in ſome degree, fooliſh; and, to prove his ſtupidity, he aſſures us, that, for a horſe which the king beſtowed him, he remitted his penſion, the very means of his ſubſiſtence. Perhaps, the ill ſtate of Edgar's affairs, and the dread of falling a ſacrifice to the king's jealouſy, led him to reſolve upon a journey into the eaſt, to fight againſt the Infidels; and, having eaſily obtained the king's leave, he ſet out, attended with 200 knights, who, being deprived of their eſtates in England, were willing to try their fortunes in foreign countries; and, after he had ſpent two years in thoſe eaſtern parts, where, it is ſaid, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by many valiant exploits, he returned to England, having refuſed the eſtates and honours, that were offer'd him by the emperor of Conſtantinople, on the account of his bravery.

William being made eaſy, upon Edgar's departure, as to any apprehenſions on his ſcore, it was univerſally believed, that, for the future, he would apply his thoughts to peace, to which he had been a ſtranger, almoſt from his very nativity; beſides, he was ſo corpulent and unwieldy, that a quiet life ſeemed to be abſolutely neceſſary for him. However, theſe were far from being the ſentiments of the king himſelf; for, on a ſudden, he ſet about ſome mighty preparations, and, ſoon after, embarqued for Normandy, in order to begin a fierce war with France; but Philip, to avert the impending ſtorm, offered ſome propoſals, which were followed by a truce. William, on the account of his corpulency, having taken this opportunity of going thro' a courſe of phyſick, a jeſt of king Philip's was the occaſion of breaking the truce. This prince only enquired of one, that was come from Roan, "Whether the king of Eng"land was, as yet, delivered of his great belly?"
But William, being informed of the matter, ſent him word, "that, as ſoon as he ſhould

"the church of Notre Dame at Paris, 10,000 "lances, inſtead of wax-lights*." His menaces quickly paſs'd into deeds; for, marching in the very hotteſt time of ſummer, he ravaged the Vexin in a horrible manner, and then laid ſiege to Mantes; and he was ſo highly incenſed, that, after he had taken it, he reduced it to aſhes, without even ſparing the churches, in one of which, two hermits were conſumed in the flames. The warmth of the ſeaſon, and the great fire, which he ſtood very near, to ſee his orders put in execution, threw him into a fever, which interrupted his progreſs; and, whilſt he was on his return to Roan, in leaping a ditch, on horſe-back, he ſo bruiſed the rim of his belly, againſt the pummel of his ſaddle, that the violence of the blow exceedingly increaſed his diſtemper. Being diſabled, by this accident, from remounting his horſe, he was carried in a litter to Roan, where, the malignity of his fever daily increaſing, he apprehended, that he was not far from the end of his days; and he no ſooner found, that he was paſt all hopes of recovery, than he began ſeriouſly to reflect on all the paſt actions of his life, and to view them in their proper colours. He order'd large ſums to be given to the poor and to the churches, particularly, towards rebuilding thoſe of Mantes, which he had deſtroyed; and he reſtored to liberty all the priſoners, among whom were Morkard and Ulnoth. This laſt, who was brother to king Harold, had been confined in Normandy, from his childhood, being delivered up by earl Goodwin, as an hoſtage, to Edward the Confeſſor; but it was not, without extreme difficulty, that the like favour was obtained for the biſhop of Bayeux, the king's brother, becauſe he had ſworn, that he would never releaſe him; tho' he was, at length, prevailed on by the importunities of his friends. Being on the point of death, having commanded his principal officers to ſtand round his bed, notwithſtanding his weakneſs, he made a long harangue, in which he enlarged copiouſly on the great reputation he had acquired, by his martial exploits; yet he, at the ſame time, owned, that he had uſurped the crown of England, and was guilty of all the blood, that was ſpilt on that occaſion; and, therefore, he added, that, as he durſt not bequeath a crown, to which he had no right, he left it to the diſpoſal of the Almighty; tho' he could wiſh, that William, his ſecond ſon, ſhould wear it after him. In his will, made juſt before he died, he left the dutchy of Normandy to Robert, his eldeſt ſon; not ſo much on the account of his affection for him, as becauſe he foreſaw great obſtacles in the way, if he ſhould diſpoſe of it otherwiſe. Henry, his third ſon, had no more, for his ſhare, than an annuity of 5000 marks †, with all his mother's effects. It is reported, that, the young prince complaining of his being ſo meanly provided for, the king told him, by a prophetick ſpirit, that he ſhould, in proceſs of time, be king of England, and ſurpaſs his brother in wealth and glory; but that God ſhould communicate himſelf to ſuch a prince, as the Conqueror, is altogether incredible.

Tho' the dying king had left his crown to the diſpoſal of the Almighty, he did all that was poſſible, to ſecure it to his ſecond ſon; for he wrote a very preſſing letter to Lanfranc, upon that head, and order'd his ſon William, even before his death, to deliver it with his own hands; being, doubtleſs, apprehenſive, that he would meet with too ſtrenous an oppoſition in England, if meaſures were not previouſly taken, to gain the conſent both of the Engliſh and Normans. Having, thus, ſettled his temporal affairs, he cauſed himſelf to be removed to the village of Hermentrude, on the other ſide of the Seine, over-againſt Roan, that he might, with the leſs interruption, take care of his ſpiritual concerns; where he departed this life, on the 9th of September, in the 61ſt year of his age, after a reign of 42 years in Normandy and 21 in England; and, if we may give credit to ſome of his hiſtorians, he expreſs'd, on his death-bed, a ſincere ſorrow for all his injuries to the Engliſh. His body was removed to Caen, without any ceremony, and interr'd in the abbey-church, which he had founded, purſuant to his own deſire; and, Robert being then in Germany, and William in England, his youngeſt ſon, Henry, took care of the funeral. His corpſe was but poorly attended, for ſo great a perſonage; for his principal officers abandon'd him, before he expired, ſome to make their court to Robert, and others to William; but an extraordinary occurrence render'd the funeral of this monarch extremely remarkable. Juſt as they were going to lay him in his grave, Anſelm Fitz-Arthur, a Norman Gentleman, ſtands up and forbids the burial, in that place, claiming the ground, as his inheritance; alledging, that the deceas'd had built the church upon it, without paying him for it. Upon this, they were conſtrained to deſiſt, according to the laws of the country, in order to examine the validity of his pretenſions; which being ſufficiently proved, Henry was obliged to ſatisfy his demands, and then the corpſe was interr'd.

Thus, lived and died William I. ſirnamed the Baſtard and Conqueror, if this latter title may be properly applied to him, which ſome of the hiſtorians call in queſtion. They, that maintain the affirmative, found their opinion upon his having no other right to the crown, except that of conqueſt, as well as upon the ſeverity of his government, which was, all along, arbitrary; but others aſſert, that his election entirely cancelled his right of conqueſt. The great uncertainty of this affair gives occaſion to compare him, in this reſpect, to the emperor Auguſtus, who, it is ſaid, obtained the empire, neither by conqueſt, uſurpation, inheritance, nor election, but by a ſtrange mixture of them all; however, how much ſoever William may be accuſed or juſtified, as William's character. Malmſ.

The hiſtorians exceedingly differ in their accounts of William's character. Some of them, conſidering him only, as a Conqueror, have highly applauded his courage and conduct, having thrown a veil over his other actions; but others, taking the ſame conqueſt to be no other than a downright uſurpation, and reflecting on the means he made uſe of, to preſerve it, have not ſcrupled to repreſent him, as a real tyrant; and, perhaps, they are both of them in the right, ſince this monarch had an uncommon mixture of good and bad qualities. He was reputed to be one of the wiſeſt princes of his time, being always vigilant and active, as reſolute in executing, as he was bold and undaunted in forming his deſigns. He had the ſagacity to ſee danger at a diſtance, and, for the moſt part, prevented it; but, when that was not poſſible, after his utmoſt efforts, no man could face it, with greater intrepidity; but, on the other hand, his covetouſneſs and partiality for the Normans put him upon many projects, that are not to be juſtified.

In his younger years, he was handſome and well-proportioned, and he had rather a ſtern and majeſtick than a mild and engaging countenance; tho', upon occaſion, he could aſſume ſuch a ſweet and gentle aſpect, as was not eaſy to be reſiſted. We may form a judgment of the ſtrength and vigour of his conſtitution, from the account of the hiſtorians concerning him, that none, but himſelf, could bend his bow; yet the ſame authors are divided in their ſentiments, as to his chaſtity. Some aſſure us, that, after marriage, he never gave the queen any grounds for jealouſy; whilſt others affirm, that he kept, for his miſtreſs, a clergyman's daughter, who was ham-ſtringed, by Matilda's order. However that be, after he was king of England, it is obſerved, that hunting was his ſole diverſion. He was an excellent œconomiſt, the affairs of his family being under the moſt perfect regulation; tho his expences bore no proportion to his dignity and fortune. Nevertheleſs, upon ſolemn occaſions, he was ſo fond of magnificence, that he affected to appear in all his grandeur. He ſeldom failed of being crowned every year, at the three great feſtivals of Chriſtmas, Eaſter, and Whitſontide, which he generally kept at Glouceſter, Wincheſter, and Weſtminſter; and, at theſe times, he kept a ſplendid court, was much more eaſy of acceſs and liberal of his favours. The great men of the kingdom uſually attended him, during theſe ſolemnities; but it is not to be ſuppoſed, that it was to hold a Wittena-gemot or parliament, as ſome do imagine; for it is not, in the leaſt, probable, that, after he had deprived the Engliſh of their eſtates, he ſhould leave them in poſſeſſion of the greateſt of their privileges. It is yet more unlikely, that he ſhould transfer this right to the Normans, to whom he beſtowed the Engliſh eſtates, as it was in his power to grant them, on his own terms; and it is evident, from his natural temper, that he would never voluntarily render himſelf dependent on any of his ſubjects; however, if the Wittena-gemot did ſubſiſt, in his reign, we may be ſure, its authority was exceedingly diminiſhed, and its nature very different from the general aſſemblies, in the time of the Saxons. 1087.

Some hiſtorians highly extol this prince's clemency, becauſe he very often only puniſh'd the Engliſh rebels, by the confiſcation of their eſtates. It muſt be acknowledged, that this is true, with reſpect to perſons of diſtinction; ſince it does not appear, that, beſides earl Walthoff, who was publickly beheaded, and Egelwin, biſhop of Durham, who was ſtarved in priſon, any of the principal Engliſh lords were put to death, in this reign; but the caſe is otherwiſe, as to perſons of an inferior rank. It is certain, that vaſt numbers of theſe were ſacrificed to William's reſentment, whilſt many others had their eyes put out, or their hands and feet cut off, or were condemn'd to perpetual impriſonment, for very minute crimes. All the hiſtorians are agreed, that his taking away the life of earl Walthoff was a very heinous and diſhonourable action, as he had beheaded him, for a crime he had already pardoned; but but this inſtance of ſeverity was, in ſome degree, attoned for, by his moderation to prince Edgar, who had often furniſhed him with pretences to diſpatch him, as a ſacrifice to his jealouſy. Perhaps, the little merit of this prince was the ſole motive of his clemency; tho', after all, in my opinion, we ought not to rob him of the honour due to him, on that account, ſeeing we are ignorant of the grounds of his lenity towards him. Whatever deſpicable ſentiments the king might entertain, with regard to his perſonal qualities, yet, it muſt be own'd, he was formidable, by reaſon of his birth; for he was the only ſurviving prince of the royal family of the Saxons, and had been made uſe of, as a handle, to ſeveral inſurrections in the kingdom.

His iſſue.

William had, by Matilda, daughter to the earl of Flanders, four ſons and five daughters. Robert was duke of Normandy; and Richard was kill'd by a ſtag, in the New-Foreſt, or, according to others, he catched, as he was hunting, a diſtemper, which carried him off, in his father's life-time. William aſcended the throne of England, being ſucceeded by Henry, his brother. Cicely, his eldeſt daughter, was abbeſs of the nunnery of Caen; and Conſtance was married to Alain Fergeant, duke of Bretaign. Adela was wife to Stephen, earl of Blois, by whom ſhe had a ſon of the ſame name, who ſucceeded to the crown of England; but Margaret, who was promis'd to Harold, died young. Alphonſo, king of Gallicia, married the fifth, whoſe name was Eleanor; tho', it is ſaid, ſhe continued a virgin, after marriage, being entirely devoted to the ſervice of God, and ſpent her days, in the conſtant exerciſe of prayer.

2. WIL-

2. WILLIAM II. ſirnamed Rufus.

WILLIAM II.

WHilſt the Conqueror was taken up, in Normandy, with the thoughts of dying, William, his ſon, was, in England, very induſtriouſly employed, in ſecuring the crown for himſelf, purſuant to his father's intentions; and ſo much the more expedition was neceſſary, on this occaſion, as he had reaſon to apprehend, that his brother's coming, in time, would defeat his deſign. It was, therefore, his buſineſs, in the firſt place, to gain an intereſt in the Normans, who, doubtleſs, would have the chief ſway in the enſuing election, as they were poſſeſs'd of all the fiefs and places in the kingdom; tho', at the ſame time, the Engliſh were not to be neglected, leſt, by joining Robert's friends, they might incline the balance to his ſide. In the mean while, William was beloved neither by the Engliſh nor Normans; for the former found him, from their own experience, to be too like the king, his father, and the latter, having a ſtill farther knowledge of him, dreaded his rough temper. On the contrary, Robert might alledge the right of primogeniture; whereas William had nothing, to ſupport his pretenſions, but the bare deſire of the late king, which was far from being an expreſs nomination; and, in all probability, it would have proved ineffectual, if the minds of the people had not been prepared, before the news of his death. It was with this view, that he ſent over his ſon, with all ſpeed, that, in conjunction with Lanfranc and ſome other lords, he might concert proper meaſures; Eudo, the high-treaBrompton. ſurer, and Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, did him ſingular ſervice, at this critical juncture. The firſt of them not only ſecured Dover, Wincheſter, Pevenſey, Haſtings and ſome other places on the ſouth coaſts; but he likewiſe delivered up, to prince William, all the late king's treaſures, amounting to 60,000 l. in money, beſides plate and jewels of a much greater value. Lanfranc, who had the love and eſteem of the Engliſh, as well as the Normans, was ſo ſucceſsful in his endeavours, that, in a little time, he prevailed on the principal lords of both nations, to come over to his party; and other means were not wanting, to induce the people to eſpouſe William's cauſe. A report Daniel. was induſtriouſly ſpread abroad among the Engliſh, that this prince had made a firm reſolution, to govern in a very different manner from the king, his father; that he would regard their juſt complaints, and aboliſh the too rigorous laws, enacted, ſince the late revolution, particularly, thoſe relating to the game; and, finally, that he would reſtore them, in part, their eſtates and antient privileges. On the Brompton. other hand, it was repreſented to the Normans, that the beſt way, to keep their preſent poſſeſſions, was to confirm the Conqueror's choice of a ſucceſſor; and that the young prince, being fixed on the throne, would, of courſe, maintain their cauſe, ſince his and their rights ſtood on the ſame foundation, viz. the will of the late king. Robert, being abſent, had but a few friends, that were active, in his behalf, being afraid to make an open declaration of their ſentiments; for they foreſaw the bad conſequences of ſuch a proceeding, if, upon his return, he ſhould not be willing to ſupport them. Beſides, they had none to be their leaders, Ulnoth and Morkard being detained in priſon, by William's order, Hoveden. notwithſtanding his father's directions to the contrary, leſt they ſhould head the Engliſh, whom he ſuſpected to be his enemies; and, all William is crowned. theſe circumſtances being improved to the beſt advantage, by his adherents, he was crowned Eadmer. the 27th of September, 18 days after his father's deceaſe. Ord. Vit.

His character. This prince, ſirnamed Rufus, from his having red hair, was 30 years of age, when he received the crown; and, in all likelihood, his good fortune was occaſioned by Robert's diſobliging the king, his father, who never could forgive his revolt. Indeed, as to William, he was, in no reſpect, ſuperior to his elder brother; ſince the only quality, for which he was remarkable, was his courage, tho' it was ſcarce to be diſtinguiſhed from a brutal fierceneſs. His extreme ill-nature, as it had never been corrected by education, very often prompted him to commit baſe and unworthy actions; for, being trained up to arms, from his youth, at a court, where he daily beheld inſtances of ſeverity and deſpotick power, he was a complete brute in his behaviour. Beſides, he was altogether indifferent, as to religion; and the whole ſtrain of his conduct ſhew'd, that he had not the leaſt regard for honour or honeſty. He was as covetous as his father; but, whereas the father accumulated wealth, purely, for the ſake of hoarding it, the ſon was deſirous of money, merely, to ſpend it profuſely, being, in all his vain expences, guided more by caprice than reaſon. However, he had the art to conceal his inclinations, in the beginning of his reign; and his ſubjects took pleaſure in obſerving, that, for ſome time, he paid a deference to the prudent counſels of Lanfranc, who was univerſally beloved and eſteemed. This conſideration led Hoved. the Engliſh to entertain hopes of a happy change in their fortune, and prevented them from falling in with the ſollicitations of thoſe, who attempted to perſuade them to eſpouſe Robert's cauſe.

1088. But tho' the confidence, William placed in the archbiſhop, was of ſervice to him, with reOdo forms a conſpiracy againſt William. ſpect to the Engliſh, it gave him ſuch diſturbance from another quarter, as even ſhook him on his throne. Odo, his uncle, biſhop of Bayeux, who Malmſ. was lately releaſed from priſon, was, to the laſt Hoved. degree, uneaſy, at Lanfranc's being in ſuch fa- Dunelm. vour at court; for he had harbour'd a ſecret Ord. Vit. animoſity againſt that prelate, ever ſince he adviſ'd the king to ſeize him, juſt as he was upon the point of embarquing for Rome. This, with 1088. with a deſire of ruling again, as he had formerly done, put him upon projecting, how to depoſe the king, and place Robert on the throne, who was lately returned to Normandy, that prince's birth-right furniſhing him with a plauſible pretence, to countenance his enterprize. As ſoon as he had reſolved upon this undertaking he engaged in the plot ſome of the principal Norman lords; and, indeed, without their concurrence, the Engliſh were unable to promote his deſign; but, theſe leading the way, and ſeveral others being brought over to his party, it was an eaſy matter for them, to prevail on the Engliſh to come into their meaſures; for, as the moſt of them were deprived of their eſtates, in the late reign, they expected, that the diſſenſions between the two brothers would turn to their advantage. In order to confirm both the Engliſh and Normans in their reſolution, Odo aſſured them, that it was impoſſible to enjoy any happineſs, under the government of a capricious and brutiſh prince, who had neither religion nor honeſty; that, if they did not immediately exert themſelves, to avert the impending evil, they would allow him time to eſtabliſh himſelf upon the throne, and then, perhaps, they would never meet with another opportunity, ſo favourable as the preſent; and that, in juſtice, the crown ſhould be given to Robert, as he was the firſt-born, who was alſo a a prince of great uprightneſs and generoſity. The prelate, at the ſame time, ſet off, to the utmoſt advantage, his mild and gracious diſpoſition; which encouraged them to hope, that they ſhould, at length, under a king poſſeſs'd of ſuch agreeable qualities, attain the tranquillity, they ſo earneſtly deſired.

Whether the right of primogeniture had any weight with theſe lords, or, whether William's ill temper prevailed on them to wiſh for a new maſter, they readily fell in with the biſhop's ſcheme; and each of them promiſed to do all that was poſſible, to put it in execution, provided Robert would aſſiſt them, and bring over with him ſuccours from Normandy. Odo, being, thus, aſſured of the aſſiſtance of the Norman lords, whom he apprehended to be more capable of ſerving Robert, than the Engliſh, he ſent word to that prince, that nothing was wanting, but his preſence with a body of Norman troops, to put him in poſſeſſion of the crown, his brother had unjuſtly uſurped. The duke, at once, determined to accept of this advantageous propoſal; but, not having money, ſufficient to ſupport the charge of ſo great an undertaking, he borrowed ſome of his brother Henry, mortgaging the whole country of Cottentin, for his ſecurity; upon which, he acquainted his uncle, that he would infallibly come over to England, with all expedition, intreating him to make the neceſſary preparations, for the execution of their deſigns.

Robert borrows money of his brother Henry. Brompt.

The conſpirators take up arms.

No ſooner were the Norman lords certified of Robert's reſolution, than they began to move with vigour and activity. The biſhop of Conſtance, with Mowbray, his nephew, ſecured Bath and Barklay-caſtle, and fortified Briſtol, in order to make it their chief magazine. Roger Bigod ſeized on ſeveral places in Norfolk; and Grantmenil did the ſame in Leiceſterſhire. Roger de Montgomery, William, biſhop of Durham, Bernard of Newark, Roger Lacy, and Ralph Mortimer made themſelves maſters of Worceſterſhire; and, in a word, there was not a ſingle lord, among the conſpirators, that did not take poſſeſſion of ſome city. Had Robert come over, at this juncture, in all probability, he would have dethroned his brother; but his natural indolence, together with his extravagance, in ſquandering his money, on things altogether unneceſſary, prevented his making any uſe of ſo fair an opportunity. In the mean while, William, who was of a quite different temper, left nothing unattempted, to ſtifle the conſpiracy; and the moſt effectual means, to this purpoſe, he found to be, the gaining the Engliſh to his intereſt, in promoting which, Lanfranc was very ſerviceable to him. This prelate, who, in the late reign, had treated them in an obliging manner, made uſe of his credit with them, to engage their adherence to the king, on this occaſion; and, by his ſollicitations, he brought back to their duty ſuch as had already revolted, and confirmed the reſt in their allegiance; ſo that, in a very ſhort time, he was in a condition to ſend out a fleet, whilſt, with an army of Engliſhmen, he marched againſt Odo, his uncle, whom he juſtly apprehended to be the author of the rebellion. The biſhop had fortified himſelf in Kent, where he ſecured Rocheſter and Pevenſey; but, being informed of the king's approach, he ſhut himſelf up in the latter, expecting that he ſhould be able to hold out, till the duke of Normandy ſhould come to his aſſiſtance; but, having more fire than true courage, and as he had neglected to make the neceſſary preparations, for his defence, the caſtle was taken, in a few days, by the vigorous attacks of the king. Odo could obtain his pardon, on no other condition, but his obliging Rocheſter to ſurrender, which was defended by the principal Norman lords, under the command of Euſtace, earl of Bulloign. Being conducted to the gates of Rocheſter, by his outward expreſſions, he ſeemed willing, that the governor ſhould deliver up the city; but Euſtace, obſerving, by his looks, that he did not ſpeak, as he meant, detained him, as a priſoner, which furniſhed him with a plauſible excuſe, for the violation of his promiſe.

The king attacks Odo. Sax. An. Ord. Vit. Hoved. Brompt.

William, upon this, deſpairing of being maſter of Rocheſter, by Odo's means, reſolved to beſiege it; and he lay ſix weeks before the town, to no purpoſe, the beſieged continuing to make a brave and vigorous defence; but, at length, a contagious diſtemper, which daily carried off great numbers of them, conſtrained them to come to a capitulation, tho' it was not an eaſy matter to agree upon the terms. However, at laſt, after many debates, the king granted them leave to march off with their horſes, without giving them any hopes of being ever reſtored to their eſtates and places. The biſhop of Bayeux, being, by this means, reduced to a very low condition, retreated to the duke of Normandy, who entruſted him with the adminiſtration of the affairs of the dutchy. 1088. Rocheſter, the duke might eaſily have made a diverſion into ſome other part of the kingdom; but the inexcuſable negligence of that prince deprived him of the advantage of ſuch a favourable opportunity; for, inſtead of coming himſelf into England, with a force proportionable to the greatneſs of his enterprize, he only ſent over a ſingle ſhip with a handful of ſoldiers, who were all taken and drowned.

Robert's negligence. Brompt. Hoved.

The king beſieges Durham, and baniſhes the biſhop.

William, being now poſſeſs'd of Rocheſter, marched his army towards Durham, to chaſtiſe the biſhop, who was one of the revolters; but, as the garriſon of that place was very weak, the city was ſoon forced to ſurrender, and the biſhop, with all the other rebels, was ſent into baniſhment. Thus, this conſpiracy, tho' it had a very dangerous aſpect, was cruſh'd, by William's reſolution and conduct; for he equally made uſe of policy, as well as force, in bringing the conſpirators to reaſon. He had, by his addreſs, gained over Montgomery and ſeveral other Norman lords, whoſe defection was extremely prejudicial to Robert's party, having, by his ſecret emiſſaries, aſſured them, that they were very impolitick, in taking any ſteps againſt him; that, ſince they held their eſtates, by no other right, but that, by which he acquired the crown, it was evidently their intereſt to eſpouſe his cauſe. On the other hand, he diſcovered the greateſt prudence, in beginning with his uncle's deſtruction, who was the author of the conſpiracy; but his ſucceſs, on this occaſion, was chiefly owing to his expedition.

William oppreſſes the Engliſh. Hoved. Eadmer. Malmſ.

As the Engliſh had been ſo ready to aſſiſt William, in his extremity, they naturally expected to be rewarded, in proportion to their ſervices; but they ſoon found, that all their hopes were vain and imaginary. Whilſt he wanted their aſſiſtance, he amuſed them with fair promiſes; but, his turn being ſerved, he entirely forgot them; nay, he even began to oppreſs them, with ſeveral impoſitions, in which he ſhew'd ſtill leſs moderation than the king, his father. Lanfranc gave him ſome gentle admonitions on the head, who could not forbear reminding him, to make good his engagements; but, how careful ſoever the archbiſhop might be, in uſing the moſt reſpectful language, William was highly offended, and asked him, in an angry tone, and with an oath, "Whether he thought it poſſible for a "king to perform all his promiſes?" From this time, Lanfranc was entirely out of favour, tho' his diſgrace was of a ſhort continuance; for he died ſoon after, lamented by both nations, as one of the moſt worthy prelates, that had filled the ſee of Canterbury, ever ſince the converſion of the Saxons.

Lanfranc is diſgraced, for admoniſhing him about it, but he dies ſoon after.

The king's tyrannical proceedings.

Whilſt Lanfranc was alive and at court, his venerable preſence was ſome cheque to the king's inclinations; but, upon his death, he threw off all reſtraint. Particularly, he gave great indulgence to his natural deſire of heaping up money, in order to ſpend it in a vain and profuſe manner; and, being avaricious without frugality, covetous and yet prodigal, he was always in want, and under a neceſſity of inventing continually new ways and means for raiſing money, to ſupport his extravagance. One of his methods, never before practiſed in England, was to ſeize upon the vacant benefices; for, not being content with the firſt-fruits, he appropriated the whole profits to himſelf, without filling them; and, after he had diſpoſed of every thing, that was convertible into money, he ſold them to the higheſt bidder, without any regard to their merit or capacity. No ſooner was the ſee of Canterbury vacant, by Lanfranc's death, than he ſeized on the temporalities, keeping them in his hands, for four years together; and he acted in the ſame manner, with reſpect to the biſhopric of Lincoln, and all others that became vacant, in his reign. As they, who have written the life of this prince, were, moſt of them, monks or eccleſiaſticks, they have, on that account, publiſh'd the ſevereſt invectives againſt him; and, ſince they ſo frequently inſiſt on this topick, it may be reaſonably preſumed, that this was one of the chief motives, which induced them to ſully his reputation, to the utmoſt of their power. However that be, his proceedings occaſioned loud clamours, among the clergy, tho' the king did not, in the leaſt, regard them; and it was to no purpoſe for them, to carry their complaints to the pope. The court of Rome, in the preſent poſture of affairs, durſt not interpoſe, in their behalf, the church being rent by a ſchiſm, in which England had not, as yet, engaged; beſides, Urban II. to whom the Engliſh clergy made application, was then wholly taken up about his project of recovering the Holy Land, in which he propoſed to engage all the princes in Chriſtendom; and, therefore, it was impracticable for the pope, as well as inconſiſtent with his intereſt, to fall upon William, at this critical juncture.

1090. As William was now poſſeſs'd of a crown, which he had no juſt grounds ever to expect, one would have thought, this ſingle conſideration ſhould have prevailed on him, to do all that was poſſible, to render his brother eaſy, under the injury he had offer'd him, in invading his right; but neither duty, nor fraternal affection, could preponderate his deſire of being maſter of all his father's dominions; for he was no ſooner ſettled on his throne, than he reſolved upon the conqueſt of Normandy. Perhaps, his view, in this undertaking, was not only to gratify his covetous temper, but alſo to be revenged on the duke, for his attempt to dethrone him. However, after extraordinary preparations, he made a deſcent into Normandy; and he ſpeedily ſubdued St. Valeri, Albemarle and ſome other places, whilſt Robert, who had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of any ſuch deſign, was in no condition to oppoſe him.

William invades Normandy. Malmſ. Hoved. Brompt. Ord. Vit.

Robert implores aid from the king of France, who is bribed by William.

Robert, in this extremity, was obliged to apply to the king of France, who came, in perſon, to aſſiſt him; but William, who knew how to make uſe of cunning, as well as force, found the means to gain Philip's friendſhip, who left Robert expoſed, as before, to the inſults of his brother. The king of France's retreat put the duke's affairs in a worſe poſture than ever, as he had his ſole dependence upon his aid; and William not only took from him ſeveral 1090. several other places, but also bribed some of the burghers of Roan, who promised to surrender to him the metropolis of Normandy.

Robert is assisted by his brother Henry,

In the interim, Robert had no prospect of any assistance, except that of Henry, his youngest brother; and he had very little grounds to expect any favour, even from him; for he was incensed against the duke, for having taken possession of Cottentin, before he had discharged his debt, and was making preparations, to do himself justice, by force of arms; but, upon Robert's promising to give him satisfaction, when the war was over, he dropp'd his design, and even espoused his cause. Henry, being informed of the plot, that was in agitation at Roan, enter'd the city, on a sudden; and, seizing on Conon, the chief of the conspirators, he threw him, headlong, from a tower; by which bold adventure, he quash'd the conspiracy, and so prevented the loss of Robert's capital, and, in all probability, of his whole dominions.

1091. The king and duke enter into a treaty. Flor. Wig. Ord. Vit. Malms.

Upon this, William was obliged to strike up a peace with his brother. According to the articles of the treaty, Robert was under obligations, to deliver up to the king the country of Eu and the towns of Feschamp and Cherburgh, with all the places he was possess'd of, on the coast of Normandy; and William, on his part, was to assist the duke, in reducing the province of Maine, which had revolted, to restore to the Normans all their confiscated estates in England, and to grant some certain fiefs to his brother in the same kingdom. Lastly, it was mutually agreed on, that, if either of them died, without an heir, the survivor should succeed to all his dominions; and this agreement was solemnly sworn to by 12 barons, on each side, the brothers seeming to be thoroughly reconciled.

Henry seizes on Michael's Mount. Malms.

But, whatever satisfaction the king and duke received from the late treaty, prince Henry was not a little disgusted at it, as he perceived, that his case was not at all considered, in this transaction, and that there was no likelihood of Robert's being punctual, in the performance of the promise he made him; and, therefore, conceiving it to be lawful to do himself justice, he directly took possession of St. Michael's Mount. This sudden and surprizing occurrence alarmed Robert, who, being unwilling to leave a place of such importance in the hands of his brother, desired William's aid, to retake it; who, tho' he was altogether unconcerned in the affair, at once, joined his brother, in besieging or rather blocking up the mount; which, being situated on a rock, and having the advantage of the sea's flowing round it, twice a day, was render'd inaccessible.

William's adventure. Knyghton.

Whilst the two brothers lay before this place, William, as he was riding, alone, some distance from the camp, espied two horsemen coming from the mount; and, being naturally of a daring and impetuous temper, he rid up to them, resolving to take one of them prisoner, that he might get intelligence of the state of the besieged. The soldiers, finding, that they had only a single person to encounter, made a brisk defence; and, upon the first attack, kill'd his horse under him, which fell upon him in such a manner, as to prevent his rising. This accident would have been the occasion of his death, if, the very moment one of the soldiers was going to dispatch him, he had not cried out, "Hold, rascal, I am the "king of England"; but, these words commanding their fear and respect, they help'd him up, and gave him one of their horses. Having nimbly vaulted into the saddle, he address'd himself to the person that dismounted him, as follows: "Come, thou shalt be my "soldier, for the future, and shalt receive the "reward of thy valour".

Tho' the king and duke had made but a very slow progress in the siege, Henry was in great distress, for want of water; yet, as he was no stranger to Robert's good-nature, he did not despair of some relief, by representing to him, that it would be more glorious to subdue him by arms, than by thirst. Robert, upon this, generously sent him a tun of wine, permitting him to fetch as much water, as would supply his necessities. William, having upbraided him, on this account, he replied: "What is the quarrel between us and our bro- "of that consequence, that we should suffer "him to perish by thirst? We may stand in "need of a brother hereafter; but where "shall we meet with another, when this is de- "stroyed by our means?" However, William, being displeased with this act of generosity, which he apprehended to be very weak and ill-timed, quitting the siege, returned to England; tho' Robert carried it on, in spite of all difficulties, till, at last, he obliged his brother to surrender, upon terms; and Henry, having liberty to go, where he pleased, wander'd up and down, for some time, without any fixed place of residence, attended only by a chaplain and three or four domesticks.

Robert's generosity to Henry.

He takes the mount.

About the same time, Robert banished Edgar Atheling from Normandy; and William prohibited his return into England. The historians have not taken notice of the cause of his disgrace; for they only tell us, that he retreated into Scotland, his usual place of refuge, in his misfortunes.

Hoved.

During William's absence in Normandy, Malcolm Mocmoir, king of Scotland, made an incursion into Northumberland, carrying off a great booty. The northern people were extremely uneasy, at the king's stay abroad, whilst his frontiers were rifled by foreigners; and their complaints hastened his return. Upon his arrival, he directly set about mighty preparations, in order to be revenged on the king of Scotland; but, left Robert, who had taken Michael's Mount, should, in the mean time, seize on his castles in Normandy, he invited him to come over to his assistance, pretending that his valour and experience were absolutely necessary, to conclude the war, in an honourable manner; and, to engage him the more effectually, he promised, that, as soon as this affair was ended, he would punctually perform his part of the late treaty. Robert, being prevailed on by these motives, came speedily over, and accompanied his brother into Scotland.

How-

1091. However, the ſucceſs of this affair was not anſwerable to William's preparations; for the greateſt part of the fleet he had equipp'd, to ravage the coaſts of Scotland, was deſtroyed by a ſtorm; and his army, for want of proviſions, and the roads being impaſſable by bad weather, was exceedingly diminiſhed, in marching over the moraſſes and mountains. He often repented of the preſent undertaking, on the account of theſe loſſes; and, indeed, they would have proved very fatal to him, if Malcolm, dreading the conſequences of a war, which had brought the enemy into his own kingdom, had not thought it more adviſable, to oblige William to leave Scotland by fair means, rather than by compulſive methods. Accordingly, he ſent propoſals, which, being joyfully accepted, were ſoon followed by a treaty of peace. The conditions were, that Malcolm ſhould pay William the ſame homage, his father had done; that the 12 manors, he had in England, before this rupture, ſhould be reſtored to him; and that William ſhould allow him, yearly, 12 marks, for all his other claims. Prince Edgar, who was employ'd in this negotiation, having acted, to the ſatisfaction of both parties, William and Robert received him into favour, and permitted him to return into England. The war being now compleated, the duke expected, that his brother would immediately make good his engagements to him; but finding, at length, that he only amuſed him, taking Edgar along with him, he returned to Normandy.

Whilſt William was in Scotland, Robert Fitz-Hamon, gentleman of the bed-chamber, ſubdued Glamorganſhire in South-Wales. He had aſſiſted Jeſtyn, lord of Glamorgan, againſt Rees, king of Wales, on certain terms, to which he ſhew'd no regard, as ſoon as the war was over; but Fitz-Hamon, to revenge this breach of faith and do himſelf juſtice, muſtering ſome friends together, attack'd Rees, ſlew him in the fight, and ſeized on his country; and 12 knights, that attended him, in this expedition, were, each of them, rewarded with a manor, to be enjoy'd by them and their poſterity *.

1092. The next year, prince Henry ſurprized Domfront, a ſmall town in Maine, where he retired, in expectation of ſome better fortune.

William orders Carliſle to be rebuilt.

The king, from the frequent incurſions of the Scots into the northern parts of England, apprehending it to be neceſſary to ſtop their progreſs, by a ſtrong barrier, order'd the city of Carliſle upon Tyne to be rebuilt, which had been demoliſh'd by the Danes, and lay in ruins, for 200 years together; and, having repeopled it, he endowed it with great privileges, which are preſerved to this day †. About this time, the ſee of Dorcheſter was tranſlated to Lincoln, and that of Wells to Bath, with the king's conſent, tho it was not obtained, without a conſiderable ſum.

The proceedings of this monarch were abſolute and arbitrary; and he daily renewed taxes and impoſitions, on various pretences. Every occurrence was improved, as a handle, to levy money on the cities, boroughs, and private perſons, without any regard to the Normans, more than the Engliſh. As none durſt preſume to oppoſe his oppreſſions, the people waited for no other remedy, for their intolerable evils, except the king's death, which they heartily prayed for, in private; and the king's being ſeized with a diſtemper, at Glouceſter, which he himſelf look'd upon to be mortal, gave them ſome hopes, that their prayers would prove ſucceſsful. The near view of death, and the exhortations of the biſhops that attended him, led him to reflect on his paſt actions; and he ſeemed to be firmly reſolved to correct the miſmanagements in the government, if it ſhould pleaſe God to reſtore him to health. The prelates, taking this to be a favourable opportunity, admoniſh'd him to fill the vacant benefices; they aſſured him, that, by applying the church's revenues, contrary to the intent of the donors, he greatly endanger'd his ſalvation. The king's weak condition render'd him very willing to comply with all their deſires; and, accordingly, he nominated Robert Bloet, one of his counſellors, to the ſee of Lincoln, and Anſelm, abbot of Bec in Normandy, to that of Canterbury, who was not eaſily perſuaded to accept of that dignity. As he was a zealous aſſertor of the rights of the church, and no ſtranger to William's indifference, as to theſe matters, he apprehended that the archbiſhoprick would be too weighty a burden for him, in his reign; but, at length, he was, by the ſollicitations of the biſhops and the king's ſeeming repentance, brought to a compliance. Before his conſecration, he intreated William to reſtore to the church of Canterbury all that belonged to it, in the time of Lanfranc, for which he had his poſitive promiſe; but William no ſooner perceived, that he was in a fair way of recovery, than he delayed matters, in order to avoid the performance of it. At laſt, as the archbiſhop continually preſs'd him on this head, he openly declared, that it was his intent, that not only the preſent poſſeſſors of the church-lands, to whom he had given them, but their poſterity alſo ſhould enjoy them, and he even told the archbiſhop, that he expected his concurrence; but as Anſelm could never think of conſenting to what, he took to be a downright prevarication, a great conteſt aroſe between the king and him, which proved very vexatious to them both.

Extortion, injustice, and rapine were in as great reputation, as ever; and none had any concern in the administration of justice, but such as were more sollicitous to make their own fortunes, than to discharge the duties of their respective posts. All were impoverish'd, except those, who had the management of the publick money; and it was absolutely necessary to sacrifice honour and conscience, to become a court-favourite, since informers were the only persons that met with any encouragement. These irregular proceedings obliged many honest men, to resolve upon abandoning their native country, in quest of that tranquillity they could not find at home; but the king, by an edict, which prohibited all persons to depart the kingdom, without his leave, deprived them of the liberty of putting their designs in execution.

The king of Scotland arrives at Gloucester.

Whilst England was in these miserable circumstances, Malcolm, king of Scotland, came to Gloucester, according to an agreement he had made with William, to settle some affairs, that were not determined in the late treaty. No sooner was the king informed of his arrival, than he sent him word, that he expected, in the first place, that he should do him homage. Malcolm replied, that he was willing to do it, on the frontiers of the two kingdoms, according to custom; but William insisted on its being done in Gloucester, giving him to understand, that it was not in a vassal's power to appoint the place, where he should do homage. Malcolm, upon this, returned home, without seeing him, being incensed at his haughty behaviour; and he was scarce arrived in Scotland, before he invaded Northumberland, being the fifth time he had ravaged that country, revenging, on innocent subjects, the injuries he pretended to have received from their sovereign. Robert de Mowbray, a person remarkable for courage and conduct, being then governor of the northern parts, finding that the king's forces were at too great a distance, got together a body of troops, with such expedition, that he attack'd the Scots, at a time they least expected it; and, having put them into disorder, they gave way, without making scarce any resistance. Malcolm and Edward, his eldest son, distracted even to madness, to see their army retreat so tamely, attempting to rally them, were slain on the spot; tho' the Scotch historians pretend, that the English were indebted, for their victory, to a notorious piece of treachery*. Perhaps, the reason of this was, because the Scots suffered themselves to be so suddenly surprized; but, however that be, the late fatal battle introduced innumerable evils into Scotland. Malcolm had with him a general, named Walter, whom, as a reward for his services, he promoted to be the steward or great master of his household; from whom descended the family of the Stuarts, who, for a long time, reigned in Scotland, and, for above a century, in England †. Margaret, Malcolm's queen and sister to Edgar Atheling, survived the melancholy news of the death of her husband and son, no more than three days. Tho' Malcolm had left three sons, of age to succeed him, the Scots placed Donald, his brother, on the throne; and he was no sooner possess'd of the crown, than he expelled all the English out of the kingdom, and Edgar Atheling, among the rest, who, with Malcolm's sons, his nephews, retired into England.

Donald is made king of Scotland.

Donald, immediately after his coronation, towards the end of summer, made a descent into England, and revenged Malcolm's death, in a barbarous manner; but, as soon as William received intelligence of it, he dispatched an army into the north, under the command of Duncan, natural son to the late king of Scotland. Upon their approach, Donald made a speedy retreat into his kingdom; but he was so eagerly pursued, that he could not avoid an engagement; and, his army not being near so numerous as that of the English, he was defeated, and forced to take sanctuary in one of the Hebrides ‡, whilst Duncan, making the best use of this juncture, obtained his crown.

He invades England,

but is defeated.

About the same time, the English army marched into Wales, to put a stop to some new commotions, that were raised in that quarter; but this war proved fatal to the Welch, who lost part of their country, after Rees, their king, had been slain in a battle.

1093. The war with the Welch.

The affairs of Scotland and Wales being happily concluded, it was not long before William found another occasion, to exert his activity. Robert, his brother, incensed against him, because he had not performed the articles of their treaty, was making preparations, and, as the king imagined, with a view of retaking the places he was possess'd of, pursuant to the same treaty; upon which, without any regard to his engagements to the duke, he resolved to bring an army into Normandy, to secure his fortresses, and enlarge his conquests. As he went to his ships, he passed thro' Hastings, and visited Battle-abbey, ordering the church to be consecrated, which was dedicated to St. Martin, according to his father's directions. Upon his arrival, he was desirous of holding a conference with the duke, in order to amuse

* Boethius and Buchanan relate, that Malcolm, having reduced the castle of Alnewick to extremity, the besieged, who were obliged to surrender, only desired, that the king, in person, would receive the keys of the city; which were brought by a soldier, upon the top of a lance, who, standing within the wall, thrust the point of the lance, into the king's eye, just as he was going to take them; and that, upon this, Edward his son, falling too rashly upon the enemy, had the misfortune to receive a wound, of which he died soon after.

† Cambden tells us, that Malcolm made Walter steward of the whole kingdom of Scotland; and that he was Fleanl's son, by Nesta, daughter to Griffith ap Llewelin, prince of North-Wales, Flean being the son of Banquo, that was slain by Macbeth.

William's ſole view, in this, was to overawe the barons, that they might eſpouſe his cauſe; but, perceiving, that, on the contrary, they openly declared their ſentiments, in favour of Robert, he determined to begin his hoſtilities. He, at once, became maſter of ſome places, by bribing the governors; but Robert, being ſupplied with ſuccours from France, recovered Argentan, and took the garriſon priſoners, conſiſting of 800 men; and then he laid ſiege to the caſtle of Holms, which ſurrender'd, at diſcretion. William, finding, from theſe ſucceſſes, that he was in great danger of being, at length, a loſer by the war, if the French troops continued in his brother's ſervice, reſolved to try the virtue of preſents, being ſenſible, from experience, that Philip was not proof againſt bribery; but, having already laid exceſſive taxes on the kingdom, it ſeemed to be impracticable for him to raiſe a ſufficient ſum, for this purpoſe. However, as he had a very fertile invention, on ſuch occaſions, he projected a method, that fully anſwer'd his expectation; for, under the pretence, that he was in extreme want of a reinforcement, he diſpatched orders into England, to levy 20,000 men, with all poſſible expedition. In conſequence of this, care was taken to preſs ſuch, for ſoldiers, as were in good circumſtances, or could not conveniently leave their families; and, when theſe recruits were juſt upon the point of embarquing, the high-treaſurer acquainted them, from the king, that they might, all of them, upon the payment of ten ſhillings a-piece, repair to their reſpective habitations. Theſe ſoldiers, being forced into the ſervice, were, to a man, tranſported with joy, at the thoughts of their being releaſed, at ſuch an eaſy expence; whilſt William, by this means, made up a ſum of 10,000 l. ſterling, with which he bribed the French, to retire from the camp of the duke, his brother.

1095. The war with the Welch. Chron. Cambr.

The retreat of the auxiliaries would, in all appearance, have been attended with the loſs of all Robert's dominions, if the king had not been obliged to return into England, to put a ſtop to the ravages the Welch were making in Shropſhire and Cheſhire. This diverſion could never have happened, at a more unſeaſonable juncture, as it prevented the king from the conqueſt of Normandy, when he thought that he was ſure of it; and, therefore, he left that country, with extreme regret, after he had been reconciled to Henry, his brother, who came over with him into England.

The king's two expeditions into Wales.

Upon his arrival, he marched into Wales, where he rebuilt the caſtle of Montgomery; and, at his approach, the Welch, according to cuſtom, retired among the mountains, where it was impoſſible to attack them; and, as he was a ſtranger to the intricate windings of this hilly country, he loſt ſo many men, by obſtinately purſuing the enemy, that he was, at laſt, conſtrained to deſiſt from his deſign.

However, notwithſtanding the difficulties of this expedition, he reſolved upon a ſecond, the ſame year, after he had reinforced his army with new levies; but ſcarce had he entered Wales, before he was diverted from his enterprize, by an affair of greater importance. 1095.

Robert de Mowbray, being elated, on the account of his ſignal ſucceſs over the Scots, imagined, that William could not ſufficiently reward him, for that valiant undertaking; but the king, who had not the leaſt ſpark of generoſity in his nature, expreſs'd ſo little gratitude, on this occaſion, that the earl's lofty ſpirit prompted him to reſent the treatment he received; and nothing leſs would gratify his revenge, than an attempt to dethrone his ſovereign, in order to place the crown on the head of Stephen, earl of Albemarle, nephew to William the Conqueror. He had engaged, in this conſpiracy, a great number of lords, who were equally diſguſted, at the ſevere and haughty uſage they met with from the king; and William was informed of theſe proceedings, as he was on his march to Wales; but, this war ſeeming to be trifling, in compariſon of the plot, that was forming in the north, he ſteered his courſe thither, reſolving to cruſh, at once, the author of this revolt, before he could be join'd by the reſt of the conſpirators. The rebels, foreſeeing that he would advance towards them, laid an ambuſh for him on the way, which would have infallibly ſucceeded, were it not that William de Tunbridge, one of their number, apprized him of it; and, upon this, the king, continuing his march, went and beſieged the caſtle of Banborough, which was inveſted by Mowbray. This place, which was not only very ſtrong, but alſo well ſtored with neceſſaries, holding out longer, than was expected, he determined to change the ſiege into a blockade, that he might go in queſt of the other revolters, who were already up in arms; and, therefore, he built, near Banborough, a fortreſs, which he named Mal-voiſin, or bad neighbour, to cut off the beſieged from the poſſibility of a reinforcement. Mowbray, ſoon after, going out of the caſtle, upon a falſe information, had the misfortune of falling into the hands of the beſiegers; and, no ſooner was the king informed of it, than he ordered the priſoner to be conducted cloſe up to the walls of Banborough; and that, if the enemy refuſed to ſurrender, his eyes ſhould be put out, before their faces. Upon this, the caſtle was delivered up, on certain conditions; and Mowbray was impriſoned in Windſor-caſtle, where he remained 30 years. His accomplices, in the revolt, were treated with equal ſeverity; for Roger Lacy was diſpoſſeſs'd of all his eſtates, and Hugh, earl of Cheſter, redeemed his life, with the ſum of 3000 l. ſterling. The count of Eu, chuſing to vindicate his innocence, by ſingle combate, againſt his accuſer, being vanquiſhed, had his eyes put out, and was forced to endure caſtration; William of Arles was ſentenced to be hanged, tho' he proteſted that he was innocent, with his dying breath; and all the reſt, to a man, were condemned to various puniſhments.

This commotion being appeaſed, another aroſe, occaſioned by the revival of the quarrel between 1095. between the king and the archbiſhop of Canterbury. William had very little regard to the immunities of the church, which Anſelm inſiſted on, in too imperious a manner; for he even preſumed to own Urban II. to be the lawful pope, tho' he was no ſtranger to the king's ſentiments, in favour of Clement, in direct contradiction to a law, enacted in the late reign, that no perſon ſhould acknowledge any pope, without the king's conſent. Anſelm did not pay the leaſt deference to that order, pretending, that the king had no right to concern himſelf about eccleſiaſtical affairs; but, by the way, what grounds had the archbiſhop, for aſſuming the power of determining that affair, for the whole church of England? The king was not of ſuch a paſſive temper, as to ſubmit to his ſubject; and, having given him ſome rough uſage, on the account of his haughty behaviour, he deſired leave to take a journey to Rome. William, at firſt, denied his requeſt, tho', at length, he was brought to a compliance, thinking his abſence would be an happy riddance of ſo troubleſome a prelate; but, that he might not depart, without ſome farther marks of his diſpleaſure, he ſent an officer after him, who, overtaking him, juſt as he was upon the point of embarquing, ranſack'd his baggage, and rifled him of all the money he could find, pretending, that it was contrary to law, to carry the coin out of the kingdom. The king, upon Anſelm's departure, ſeized on the temporalities of the archbiſhoprick, enjoying them, to the day of his death; tho' the archbiſhop continued, for ſome time, at Rome, where he exerted all his art and intereſt, to excite the pope againſt the king; but, perceiving, at the long-run, that Urban would not interpoſe, in his behalf, he retired to a monaſtery, at Lyons, where he reſided, till he was recalled into England, in the ſucceeding reign of Henry I.

1096. Urban II. was, about this time, ready to diſcloſe the grand deſign, which had employed his thoughts, for a conſiderable while, viz. the famous Cruſado, which was undertaken, to recover the Holy Land from the Saracens; but this important tranſaction is ſo notorious, that it is entirely needleſs to enter into particulars. It will be ſufficient to obſerve, that Peter, the hermit, was the projector of this ſcheme; that pope Urban II. held, upon it, the council of Clermont; and, that vaſt numbers, of all nations and conditions in Europe, were deſirous of engaging in it. The badge, they wore, was a red croſs wrought in their habit, and appearing on their ſhoulders; from whence they were called the Croiſes, or the croſs'd, and the expedition, the Cruſade. Their motto was, It is God's will; and the principal perſons of the Croiſes were Hugh of France, Godfrey of Bulloign, Raimund of Tholouſe, count of St. Giles, Robert, earl of Flanders, Baldwin, earl of Haynault, Bohemond, prince of Tarentum, Tancred, his nephew, and Robert, duke of Normandy. The laſt of theſe was extremely fond of making a figure in a war, which was ſo very remarkable; but he wanted money, to defray the neceſſary charges. He had no other way, to ſupply this defect, than to borrow a ſum of the king, his brother, and pawn Normandy, for his ſecurity, who very gladly accepted the propoſal; but, as the kingdom was exhauſted by his late levies and impoſitions, he was obliged to make uſe of other expedients. The moſt expeditious method, in his opinion, was to deſire the riches of his ſubjects, particularly, the nobility and clergy; and his requeſt, having the force of a command, ſuch, as would not fall in with it, were compelled to a compliance, without any reſpect of perſons. This proceeding furniſhed the lords with a handle, for treating their vaſſals in the ſame manner; and ſeveral eccleſiaſticks either were, or pretended to be, under a neceſſity of melting down the church-plate, and even the ſhrines of the ſaints.

1096. Robert mortgages Normandy to the king, his brother. Hoved. Malmſ.

Let us ſtop here, for a moment, to reflect on the oppoſite tempers and characters of the king and the duke. The latter ſcruples to oppreſs his ſubjects, in order to carry on an expedition approved of by all the world, chuſing rather to mortgage his own dominions; whilſt the former makes no conſcience of extorting money from his people, merely, to gratify his own ambition; which abundantly proves, how exceedingly the Conqueror injured the Engliſh, in preferring the younger before the elder brother.

The different tempers of the king and the duke.

William, upon Robert's departure, immediately took poſſeſſion of Normandy, and demanded of the king of France the French Vexin, which, he alledged, was a branch of the dutchy; but this demand was the occaſion of a war, which ended, the next year, in a treaty of peace.

1097. William, having eaſily made himſelf maſter of Normandy, ſet about the conqueſt of Wales; and, after extraordinary preparations, he thought he could not fail of proving ſucceſsful, as he expected to ſurprize the Welch, reſolving to extirpate all their males, whoſe neighbourhood had given him ſo much diſturbance; but he was, at length, notwithſtanding his ſanguine hopes, diſappointed. Tho', by the aſſiſtance of ſome deſerters, he had penetrated, a conſiderable way, into that difficult country, his loſs of men exceeded that of the enemy; ſo that he was obliged, once more, to drop this deſign.

1098. In a little time after, upon a new revolution in Scotland, William ſent an army thither, under Edgar Atheling's command; for Donald, who was dethroned, recovered his crown, and, in his turn, not only depoſed Duncan, but forced him to abandon the kingdom. The moſt of the Engliſh hiſtorians aſſert, that William, as ſovereign lord of Scotland, made himſelf an umpire, in this affair; and that, in juſtice to Edgar, Malcolm Mocmoir's eldeſt ſon, he diſpatched his troops into Scotland, to place that prince on the throne. However, without ſtaying to canvas this point, I ſhall only take notice, that Edgar Atheling, with the help of the Engliſh army, put Edgar, his nephew, in poſſeſſion of the crown of his anceſtors; and that William could not undertake this expedition, in perſon, by reaſon of the revolt of the province of Maine,

The Engliſh invade Wales. Chr. Gal. An. Sax. Hoved.

In the mean while, Wales was again expos'd to the inſults of the Engliſh, or rather Normans; for Owen, a Welch lord, father-in-law to Griffith and Cadagan, kings of Wales, having been affronted by his ſons-in-law, privately invited the earls of Cheſter and Shrewſbury into his country, promiſing them a large booty. The earls, having raiſed ſome troops, were received, by Owen, into Wales, where they committed inexpreſſible cruelties; and both the kings, being, thus, ſurprized, were obliged to retreat into Ireland; upon which, the Engliſh penetrated, as far as the iſle of Angleſey, deſtroying all before them, with fire and ſword. Whilſt they were in the height of their outrages, Magnus, king of Norway, who had, juſt before, ſubdued the iſle of Man, chanced to come thither, and was deſirous of landing; but the Engliſh attempted to prevent him, and the earl of Shrewsbury was ſlain, in the skirmiſh, his death being conſidered, as a juſt judgment, for the horrible barbarities he committed in the iſle. This accident having thrown the Engliſh into diſorder, they were compelled to retire from the ſhore; but Magnus, after he had landed, perceiving that they had left him nothing to plunder, put to ſea again, and the Engliſh made off with their booty.

William rebuilds London-bridge, Weſtminſter-hall, and a wall round the tower.

Theſe little advantages bore no proportion to the calamities of the Engliſh, in this very year; for, beſides a great ſcarcity, occaſioned by bad weather, which continued ſeveral months, the king laid heavy taxes upon them, ſo much the more grievous and inſupportable, as the money was to be expended in works that were unneceſſary, or, at leaſt, might be deferr'd to a more convenient ſeaſon. He not only rebuilt London-bridge, which had been carried away by an unuſual flood, but engaged in other undertakings, that were vaſtly expenſive. He raiſed a new wall round the tower, and built a magnificent hall at Weſtminſter, 270 foot long, and 70 broad; tho' William, when he returned from Normandy, was pleaſed to ſay, it ſcarce deſerved the name of a bed-chamber, in compariſon of what he intended. It is related, that his ſole view, in this edifice, was to have a pretence for raiſing money; and that, for the ſame reaſon, he would have ordered it to be pull'd down, in order to have been made more ſpacious, if he had not been prevented by other affairs.

1099. William relieves Mans. Malmſ. Dunelm. Hunting. Sax. An. Daniel.

About midſummer, as William was hunting in the New-Foreſt, he received information, that Hely, count de la Fleſche, had taken, by ſurprize, the city of Mans, and was then beſieging the caſtle, which would ſoon be conſtrained to ſurrender, if it were not ſpeedily relieved. Upon this, the king, breaking off his ſport, ſent the meſſenger back, with all expedition, giving him orders to aſſure the beſieged, that he would be with them in eight days; and, at the ſame time, he turned his horſe towards the ſea-ſide, crying out, "Let him, that loves "me, follow me," and arrived at Dartmouth, that very day, where he expreſſed a great deſire of embarquing immediately; for, upon the maſter of the ſhip's acquainting him, that, on the account of a contrary wind, he could not put to ſea, without manifeſt danger, William replied, "Tuſh, ſet forward, thou never yet "heardeſt of a king that was drowned;" and, having obliged him to ſail, he ſafely arrived at Barfleur. The very next day, he ſent for his troops in Normandy, to attend him, on the road to Mans; and, in a few days, he marched to the relief of the beſieged. By this prodigious expedition, he not only relieved the caſtle, but took the count of Fleſche priſoner; and, being fluſh'd with his ſucceſs, he could not forbear jeſting on the misfortune of his enemy. However, the count, far from being dejected, bravely anſwer'd, that he had no reaſon to boaſt of an advantage, which he gained, by ſurprize; and that, if he were again at liberty, he would convince him, that it would not be ſo eaſy a matter to conquer him, at another time. The victorious king, upon theſe words, in point of honour, releaſed him, on the ſpot, declaring, "that the only return, he "deſired, was, that he ſhould do his worſt;" and then he returned to England, with all imaginable ſpeed, and purſued his diverſion, which this affair had interrupted. 1099.

The ſame year, the Croiſes took Jeruſalem, by ſtorm, putting 40,000 Saracens to the ſword; and, when they proceeded to elect a king, to govern the country they had ſubdued from the Infidels, the majority of the leaders of the chriſtian army gave their votes, for Robert duke of Normandy; tho' this prince, for ſome private reaſons, refuſed to accept their offer *; and afterwards they made choice of the famous Godfrey of Bulloign, who, by his courage and conduct, had exceedingly contributed to the ſucceſs of that expedition. 1100. The earl of Poitiers mortgages his dominions to the king. Malmſ. Ord. Vit.

Fortune ſeemed, now, to delight, in heaping favours on William; for, having obtained Normandy, by a fortunate turn, he met with a fair opportunity of becoming maſter of the dutchy of Guienne and earldom of Poitou. William, earl of Poitiers, was reſolved to join the many princes, that had engaged in the holy war, with a powerful reinforcement; but, as he could not accompliſh his deſign, without a vaſt expence, he had recourſe to the king of England, for the ſum he wanted, propoſing to mortgage his dominions, for his ſecurity. William, gladly embracing ſuch an advantageous propoſal, raiſed the money, with all poſſible expedition; and he determin'd to carry it himſelf to the earl, that he might, at the ſame time, enter into poſſeſſion of Guienne and Poitou, two of the richeſt provinces in France; but, whilſt he was making preparations for his voyage, he was diſpos'd to take the diverſion of hunting in the New-Foreſt, where an unexepected death put a period to all his projects.

* At leaſt, it paſs'd current in England, as we ſhall ſee, in the year 1106; the motive of his refuſal is ſaid to be an expectation of the Engliſh crown; and the hiſtorians remark, that, after this, he never proſpered in any of his undertakings.

It is reported, that, as the king was juſt going to mount his horſe, he was informed, that a certain monk had dreamt a dream, which portended ſome great misfortune to him; yet, as he paid very little regard to ſuch preſages, he anſwered, in a jeſt, that he evidently ſaw, that the monk wanted money, and, therefore, order'd him 100 ſhillings; tho' he directed him to dream better dreams, for the future *. Whether this is to be conſidered, as an omen, or as the mere effect of chance, it is certain, that very day, towards evening, William, having wounded a ſtag, was, with full ſpeed, purſuing the game, when Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, ſhooting at the ſame ſtag, pierced the king through the heart; upon which, he inſtantly dropp'd down dead, without ſpeaking a word †. The murderer, tho' he was conſcious of his own innocence, made his eſcape, as no one attempted to apprehend him; for all the king's attendants were employ'd about him, whoſe body was laid in a cart, which accidentally paſs'd by, and carried to Wincheſter, where it was interred, the next day. Henry, his brother, to forward his own meaſures, to ſecure the crown, diſpatched the funeral; which was celebrated, without much ceremony, as no one lamented the loſs of a prince, that had ſo ſmall an intereſt in the love and eſteem of his ſubjects.

William Rufus's character.

Thus, William Rufus departed this life, on the ſecond of Auguſt, in the year 1100, in the 44th year of his age, having reigned 12 years, 10 months, and 20 days; and his tragical end, on the very ſpot where one of his brothers and a nephew fell, by extraordinary accidents, occaſion'd many reflections. It was generally believed, and reported, the Almighty was pleaſed, in this manner, to take vengeance of the Conqueror's family, for his deſolating the country, ſo very unaccountably, to make the New-Foreſt; but, without having recourſe to his father's crimes, the ſon had guilt enough of his own, to juſtify his being taken off the ſtage of this world, by an uncommon death; and, accordingly, the hiſtorians have not ſcrupled to range William, among thoſe princes, who were far from adding any luſtre to the crown of England.

This prince inherited all his father's vices, tho' he was a ſtranger to his virtues. Indeed, William I. made ſome attonement for his blemiſhes, by his ſtrict temperance and chaſtity; but, as for William II. it appears, that he was neither religious, chaſte, nor temperate. He was prodigal of his favours to his courtiers and ſoldiers, as well as he affected great pomp and magnificence, in his buildings and habit. It is related, that, his valet bringing him, at a certain time, a new pair of breeches, which coſt no more than three ſhillings, he was extremely diſpleaſed, and, in a paſſion, gave him orders never to buy him a pair, that coſt him leſs than a mark; and, it is ſaid, he was content with a worſe pair, being valued at that price. If we may give credit to the accounts concerning him, he had neither honour, conſcience, faith, nor religion; and he was even ambitious of expreſſing an open contempt of theſe noble principles. It is affirmed, that 50 Engliſh gentlemen accus'd of hunting and killing the king's deer, having, one day, paſs'd through the fire-ordeal, unhurt, he ſwore, "that "he could not believe, that God was a righteous "judge, ſince he protected ſuch perſons;" and Eadmer, who lived in his time, tells us, that he took money from the Jews at Roan, to force thoſe, that received baptiſm, to relapſe into Judaiſm ‡. Malmsbury aſſures us, that William, having ordered ſome biſhops and rabbins to diſpute, in his preſence, about religion, he declared to the rabbins, that he would be circumciſed himſelf, if their arguments appeared to him to be more concluſive, than thoſe of the chriſtians; tho', as the hiſtorian obſerves, it is to be preſumed, this was done, in order to ridicule them; and he is likewiſe charged with denying Divine Providence, as well as publickly maintaining, that prayers, addreſs'd to ſaints, were vain and impertinent.

Eadmer.

Remarks on the account the hiſtorians give us of his character.

But, that we may form a true judgment of the teſtimony of theſe hiſtorians, who were either monks or eccleſiaſticks, it muſt be conſidered, that it is very poſſible, they may have aggravated his faults; becauſe he was the firſt king of England, that ſeized on the church's revenues, without any regard to the clamours of the clergy. This, they apprehended, to be an unpardonable crime; and, perhaps, their inveterate prejudices againſt him might induce them to imagine,

* The monk dreamt, that he ſaw the king gnaw a crucifix, with his teeth, and, that, when he was going to bite of its legs, the image ſpurn'd him to the ground; but, as he lay groveling on the earth, a flame of fire proceeded out of his mouth, with much ſmoke. Malmſ.

† The caſe is, thus, according to Sir John Hayward. As the king was hunting at Choringham, in the New-Foreſt, he ſlightly wounded a deer, with an arrow; and, ſtopping his horſe, to look after the deer, he held his hands before his eyes, that the ſun-beams might not dazzle his ſight; but, another deer croſſing the way, Sir Walter Tyrrel, ſhooting at it too careleſly, or too ſteadily at the king, he ſtruck him full in the breaſt. Mr. Tyrrel obſerves, that tho' Florence of Worceſter, Malmsbury, and Simeon of Durham, who wrote, within 40 years after this accident, do all agree in the circumſtances of this ſtory; yet there are authors of that very age, who poſitively deny, that Sir Walter had any concern in it. Eadmer relates, "whether the arrow was ſhot at him, or, as moſt affirm, ſlew him, by his fal-"ling upon it--." His tomb, ſomewhat elevated from the ground, continues, to this day, in the choir of Wincheſter-cathedral.

‡ A young Jew being converted, by the viſion of a ſaint, it is ſaid, his father made the king a preſent of 60 marks, intreating him to oblige his ſon to return to his old religion. Upon this, the king ſent for the young man, and commanded him to turn Jew again, without the leaſt heſitation; but the youth refuſing to renounce chriſtianity, and being amazed, that the king, who was a chriſtian, ſhould make ſuch a propoſal to him, he was ordered to depart from his preſence. The father, finding that the king had not reclaimed his ſon, deſired to have his money returned. "Nay, replied the king, I have taken pains enough, for it all; but to ſhew thee, how kindly I will uſe thee, thou "ſhalt have one half, and the other thou can'ſt not, in conſcience, deny me, for my pains." Eadmer, p. 47.

1100. that a prince, guilty of ſuch an heinous enormity, muſt, of courſe, be entirely deſtitute of faith and religion.

This obſervation receives farther confirmation, as the writers, who charge him with profaneneſs, only found their aſſertions on ſome publick rumours; and, tho' he is alſo accuſed of incontinence, they do not produce any particular inſtances, nor ſo much as mention the names of any of his miſtreſſes; and yet the amours of kings are not eaſily concealed. It is Baker. Thorn. certain, they father a baſtard-ſon on him, named Berſtrand; but this, alone, would never have ſo highly diſguſted them, had they not been incenſed by his other actions, in the conſequences of which they were more nearly concerned. However, I advance this obſervation, as no more than a conjecture, referring it to the reader's judgment; yet, as there are very few of this prince's actions, that are worthy to be ſet in the balance, againſt theſe accuſations, I cannot conceive, how it is poſſible to vindicate a perſon, whom all the hiſtorians agree to paint in the blackeſt colours.

His ordinary revenues were, probably, the ſame with thoſe of his father; but, as he was more extravagant, he often increaſed them, by extraordinary taxes and impoſitions. He had likewiſe the profits of the vacant benefices; for, Hunting. at the time of his death, he was poſſeſs'd of the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, the biſhopricks of Wincheſter and Salisbury, and 12 rich abbies, beſides a great number of other inferior church-preferments. When he had enjoyed the incomes of theſe vacant benefices, for ſome years, and was diſpoſed to fill them, he had no regard to the merits of the candidates, but only to the higheſt bidder; tho', it is ſaid, that, on a certain day, as two monks at- Higden. tempted to outbid each other, for a wealthy abbey, the king, perceiving a third, who was no more than a ſpectator, he ask'd him, How much he would give for it? The monk replied, "He had no money; and that, "if he had, his conſcience would not allow "him to expend it, in that manner;" upon which, the king ſwore, by St. Luke's face, his uſual oath, that he deſerv'd it better than the other two, and ſhould have it for nothing.

Ranulph Flambart, a perſon of mean extraction, was his high-treaſurer, being the projector of moſt of the ways and means, by which he extorted money from his ſubjects; and he was rewarded, for his ſervices, with the biſhoprick of Durham, which the king conferred on him, a little before his death. 1100. Ranulph was his prime miniſter.

Among his charitable works, are reckon'd the hoſpital he founded at York, and the church he built in Southwark, for the uſe of the mendicant friars. Baker.

This prince was of a middle ſtature, tho' he ſeem'd to be ſhorter, than he really was, on the account of his fatneſs. His hair was of a deep yellow, inclining to red; and his eyes were of two different colours, being ſpeckled with ſmall black ſpots. He was, for the moſt, of a very ruddy complexion; and, tho' he was far from being eloquent, he made uſe of many words, eſpecially, when he was in a paſſion. He had a ſevere aſpect, and a ſtrong voice, which he would ſometimes raiſe, on purpoſe to terrify thoſe to whom he ſpoke; tho' it is ſaid, he convers'd affably with his courtiers, who eaſily found the way to ſoften his rough temper. Malmſ. Baker.

We have an account of ſeveral extraordinary accidents, which fell out, in this reign, as earthquakes, comets, and a ſpring which ran blood, for three days together; but the moſt deſtructive was, firſt, a great fire in 1092, which conſumed a conſiderable part of London; and, in the next place, the ſea riſing to an unuſual height, overflowed the coaſt of Kent, and ſwept away vaſt numbers of people and cattle. This inundation covered the lands, that formerly belonged to earl Goodwin, in the time of Edward the Confeſſor; which are, to this day, called Goodwin's Sands, and are famous for ſhipwrecks. 1100. Extraordinary accidents in his reign.

Malmſbury remarks, that tho' the minds of men were inclined to war, in this reign; yet exceſs and ſenſuality prevailed, to a ſcandalous degree, among the nobility, and even among the clergy. Vanity, luſt and intemperance, the ſame hiſtorian aſſures us, reigned in all places; and the men affected ſo much effeminacy, in their dreſs and converſation, that they diſcovered their own ſex, in nothing, except their daily attempts upon the chaſtity of the women. Malmſbury's remarks on the vicious manners of this reign.

3. HENRY I. ſirnamed Beau-Clerk.

Henry I. 1100. THE Engliſh look'd upon the death of William Ruſus, as a remarkable deliverance, tho' it did not put an end to the Norman yoke; ſince there ſtill ſurvived two ſons of William the Conqueror, to one of whom they muſt, in a little time, of courſe, own their ſubjection. Indeed, they had now a fair opportunity of ſhaking it off, if they had reſolved upon the recovery of their liberty, or the two late kings had left it in their power, to attempt it; but ſuch was their abject and deplorable condition, being deprived of their eſtates, and excluded from all publick employments, that they could not give way to ſuch aſpiring thoughts; ſo that they were obliged to acquieſce in the proceedings of the Normans, who were maſters of the kingdom; and, in all probability, the Normans themſelves were exceedingly perplexed, by reaſon of the two brothers, who might, both of them, lay claim to the crown. Robert, duke of Normandy, had, by his primogeniture, an inconteſtable right, which was farther corroborated by his treaty with William Ruſus; in which it was agreed, that, upon the deceaſe of the one, the other ſhould be heir to all their father's 1100. ther's dominions. Beſides, his good-nature and generoſity, which had gained him a numerous party in England, ſeemed to give him a great advantage over prince Henry, whoſe temper was very little known; but, on the other hand, his ſloth and indolence exceedingly prejudiced people againſt him, inſomuch that his beſt friends were afraid of declaring, in his favour, leſt he ſhould not be in a condition of ſupporting his right. They knew, that he had ſet out from the Holy Land, tho' they were ignorant of the place, where he halted; and, conſidering the vaſt expence of his voyage, they had grounds to preſume, that, at his return, he would be in want of the neceſſary means, to diſpute the crown with his brother. On the contrary, Henry was born in England, which argument had a mighty influence over ſome perſons; and his pretenſions were ſeconded with his preſence, as well as with a poſitive promiſe, both to the Normans and Engliſh, that he would abrogate all the rigorous laws, made ſince the conqueſt, reſtore the government to its antient ſtate, in the time of the Saxons, put a ſtop to all unreaſonable and arbitrary taxes, recover the privileges of the clergy, fill up all the vacant benefices, and recall the eccleſiaſticks, that were ſent into baniſhment; but, perhaps, all theſe promiſes would not have anſwered his purpoſe, if his diligence and activity, at this juncture, had not added weight to his reaſons. Upon William's death, he directly poſted to Wincheſter, where the regalia were kept, with the royal treaſure, and would have taken poſſeſſion of them, had he not been ſtoutly oppoſed by Roger de Bretevil, one of Robert's party. This lord alledged, that he was obliged, by oath, to own the duke of Normandy for his ſovereign, provided William died, without iſſue; and that, beſides, the law of nature gave Robert a right, which could not juſtly be called in queſtion. During this conteſt, ſeveral other lords, being arrived at Wincheſter, there was quickly a great concourſe of people, who came, from all parts, to know what was in agitation; and, if the election of a king had ſolely depended upon the voices of the lords, then aſſembled, the duke of Normandy would, doubtleſs, have been choſen; but Henry did not allow them time, to put their deſign in execution. As he perceived, that the people eſpouſed his cauſe, he made the beſt uſe of that advantage; and, drawing his ſword, he ſwore, that no man ſhould ſeize on the crown. The diſpute riſing to a ſtill greater height, the lords thought it convenient to retire into a private room, to conſult more calmly, what ſteps were moſt expedient, on this occaſion; but, whilſt they were, thus, employed, the people made the name of Henry rebound in their ears, by loud acclamations, which gave them reaſon to apprehend, that it would be extremely dangerous to declare for Robert; and, therefore, preferring their own ſafety to juſtice and equity, they, at once, came to a reſolution, that, in order to prevent a civil war, Henry ſhould be placed on the throne. This proceeding, the prince imagined, ſufficiently eſtabliſh'd his authority; and, without waiting for the confirmation of the eſtates, he directly ſet out for London, and was crowned, the day after his arrival, by Maurice, biſhop of that city, having, firſt, adminiſter'd to him the uſual oath.

He is crowned.

The ſhort interval, between William's death and Henry's coronation, is advanced, as an argument, by thoſe who maintain, that the right of electing kings was, at that time, confined to a few of the principal lords; at leaſt, that the commons had no concern in the elections; for, as Henry was not in a condition to take poſſeſſion of the crown, by downright violence, and was not the next heir to it, his elder brother being alive, it follows, that he obtained it, by election. Now, to prove, that he was choſen by the repreſentatives of the nation, as at this day by a parliament, it muſt be made appear, that they were then ſitting, which is impoſſible; much leſs can it be pretended, that, in the ſpace of three days, the ſtates could be ſummoned and actually aſſembled. This is a very ſpecious argument; but yet, nothing can be inferred from it, as there had not been any regulations made, ſince the conqueſt, about the ſucceſſion to the crown*.

A remark on this election.

As Henry's haſty and irregular election interrupted the natural order of things, there was ſome reaſon to fear, that it would have a dangerous influence on the minds of his ſubjects; and, therefore, it was, to the laſt degree, neceſſary, that, in the beginning of his reign, he ſhould do all that was poſſible, to induce them to entertain a good opinion of his government. The accompliſhment of his promiſes being the beſt criterion, to demonſtrate his integrity, he immediately ſet about it, in order to gain the people's affections; and, firſt of all, he undertook to reform the court. The courtiers, for the moſt part, ſure of eſcaping with impunity, in the late reign, treated the people, in a very infamous and tyrannical manner; for they not only loaded them with all ſorts of cruel and unjuſt oppreſſions, and ſecretly attempted to violate the chaſtity of the women, but openly gloried in theſe odious and ſhameful practices. To rectify theſe diſorders, Henry iſſued out a very ſevere edict, againſt all offenders, in general, but, eſpecially, againſt adulterers; and thoſe, who abuſed their power, in oppreſſing his ſubjects, he order'd to be put to death, without mercy. Some, who were already notorious, on this account, were baniſh'd from the court; and Ranulph, biſhop of Durham, the deteſted miniſter of the late king, was impriſon'd.

Henry reforms abuſes.

Theſe proceedings were attended with others, that render'd him ſtill more agreeable to the Engliſh; for he aboliſh'd the Couvre-feu, and granted them a charter, in which he ratified ſeveral privileges, they had enjoyed

He grants a charter to his ſubjects.

Henry is elected.

* This diſpute, whether the commons were concerned in the election of kings, ſeems to take its riſe, from not conſidering, that the barons were poſſeſs'd of all the lands, in thoſe days; and that there were not then any commons, like thoſe that we now call by that name, nor till ſome time after.

under

1100. under the Saxon kings, renouncing all thoſe unreaſonable prerogatives, his father and brother had uſurped. By this charter, he reſtored to the church all her antient rights and immunities, freeing her from all the hardſhips, ſhe had, for ſome time, ſuffered, particularly, during the vacant ſees and abbies; and he conſented, that the heirs of earls and barons, upon a death, ſhould enter upon their inheritance, upon the payment of a lawful relief, without being obliged to give any thing to the king, by way of redemption, commanding the lords, alſo, to treat their vaſſals in the ſame manner. He allowed the nobles to diſpoſe of their daughters in marriage, without asking his leave, provided they were not married to the enemies of the ſtate; and he appointed mothers, or the neareſt relations, to be the guardians of minors. He made a ſtandard for all weights and meaſures; and he ordained, that coiners ſhould be puniſhed with the loſs of limbs. In fine, having granted a general pardon for all crimes, committed before his coronation, and remitted all the arrears and debts due to the crown, he confirmed the laws of king Edward, i. e. the laws in force, during the Saxon monarchy, which were either wholly laid aſide, or expreſly aboliſhed, after the conqueſt; and this laſt material article gave entire ſatisfaction, both to the Engliſh and Normans. The Engliſh, of courſe, were extremely well pleaſed, at the reſtoration of their antient laws; and the Normans, who, hitherto, were liable to be diſpoſſeſſed of their eſtates, at the king's pleaſure, were, by this means, ſcreened from the violence of arbitrary power. This charter being approved and ſigned by the lords ſpiritual and temporal, ſeveral copies of it were tranſcribed, and laid up in the principal monaſteries, to be conſulted, as occaſion offered*.

1101. He recalls Anſelm.

The people, from theſe auſpicious beginnings, were led to promiſe themſelves great happineſs, under their new monarch; but there was, yet, one thing wanting, to compleat their ſatisfaction, viz. the recalling Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury. However, Henry, willing to gratify them, in this particular, wrote a letter to that prelate, who was ſtill at Lyons, to invite him home, giving him to underſtand, that he would be guided by his counſels, and entruſt him with the adminiſtration of affairs; upon which, Anſelm, being tranſported with this agreeable news, returned to England, with all poſſible expedition.

The king deſigns to marry Matilda of Scotland.

The arrival of Anſelm was no leſs acceptable to the king, than to the people; for he wanted his aſſiſtance in an affair, that could not well be brought about, without it. As his view was to gain the affections of the Engliſh, he thought nothing could more effectually contribute towards this deſign, than his marrying Matilda, daughter to Malcolm, king of Scotland, by Margaret, ſiſter to Edgar Atheling; and, indeed, this alliance could not but be very pleaſing to the Engliſh, as it would be a means of reſtoring the royal family of the Saxons to the crown. 1101.

A great obſtacle to the marriage.

Henry had already demanded the princeſs of king Edgar, her brother; but he met with an almoſt inſuperable obſtacle in his way, as ſhe had been educated in England, in the monaſtery at Wilton, and had even put on the veil. It is certain, it was alledged, in her behalf, that ſhe only took the vow of virginity, as a ſafeguard to her honour, which was ſuppoſed to be in danger, at the beginning of the conqueſt; but this reaſon did not appear to be ſatisfactory to the two kings, tho' they were both equally deſirous of the match. It was notorious, that Matilda had taken up the veil; and it was generally believed, that ſhe had vowed chaſtity. Some authors even affirm, that ſhe excepted againſt her marriage, as unlawful; and that, tho', at length, ſhe yielded to the ſollicitations of her brother and lover, ſhe curs'd the line, that ſhould ſpring from her, as abominable in the ſight of God. The deciſion of this affair, which ſeemed to be an intricate point, being referred to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, he called a council to aſſiſt him, which was convened at Lambeth; but, this aſſembly being entirely inclined to the king's ſide of the queſtion, the arguments, to prove that Matilda was at liberty to marry, were ſo artfully managed, that the council declared the intended marriage to be lawful; and, accordingly, it was, ſoon after, ſolemnized, to the general ſatisfaction of both kingdoms. M. Paris. P. Virg.

Duke Robert makes an attempt to recover the crown.

Whilſt theſe things were in agitation, duke Robert was returned to Normandy, and had taken poſſeſſion of his dutchy, without any reſiſtance; for tho' Normandy was mortgaged to the late king, Henry judged it inexpedient to diſpute the matter with his brother, at this juncture, as he was apprehenſive of being attacked, on the account of England. Robert, having, on his way home, from the Holy Land, ſtaid, ſome time, at Apulia, where he married a wife, had given his brother an opportunity of ſecuring the crown; but he was no ſooner arrived, than he publickly expreſſed his uneaſineſs, at being, thus ſupplanted, and reſolved upon an attempt, to recover his loſs. The biſhop of Durham, now, in Normandy, having made his eſcape out of priſon, exerted himſelf, to confirm the duke in his reſolution; and ſeveral Norman lords, who had been, in a manner, forced to conſent to Henry's election, began to concert meaſures, how to place Robert on the throne. They had already tamper'd with ſome of the principal Engliſh lords, in order to engage them in a conſpiracy againſt the king; and, as they were no

* There were as many copies of this charter, as counties, which were ſent to certain abbies in each county; and yet there was ſcarce one to be found, in the reign of king John, whoſe Magna Charta was founded upon it. There is a copy, at this day, in the Red-book of the Exchequer; and M. Paris has given us a tranſcript of that, which was ſent into Herefordſhire, which is to be found, as tranſlated by Tyrrel, p. 114. b. 111. vol. II.

1001. ſtrangers to the duke's mild and generous temper, they promiſed themſelves far greater happineſs under him, than in the reign of Henry, who ſeemed to be a perſon of more ſpirit and vigour. In the interim, the rumour of Robert's deſign had made different impreſſions on the minds of the people; for, tho' ſome of them were inclined to perſevere in their loyalty to the king, to whom they had ſwore allegiance, others reſumed their former inclinations, in favour of the duke, which exceedingly perplexed Henry's affairs; and, if he was jealous of the fidelity of the Engliſh, they no leſs ſuſpected the ſincerity of his intentions. From the experience they had of the two late kings, they had but too much reaſon to dread, that the part, he had, hitherto acted, was only to amuſe them, and to prevent their eſpouſing the cauſe of his brother; and, in this extremity, Anſelm was very ſerviceable to the king, in fixing the ſentiments of the Engliſh. The archbiſhop, who was under great obligations to the king, took a pleaſure, in ſhewing his gratitude, on this occaſion; and, having aſſembled the chief of the Engliſh and Norman lords, he ſo poſitively aſſured them, that the king would make good his engagements to them, with the utmoſt punctuality, as to give them entire ſatisfaction; and yet it was no ſooner known, that the duke was on the point of embarquing for England, than the moſt of the nobles declared for him, and part of the fleet followed their example. Upon this, the duke landed at Portſmouth, without the leaſt oppoſition; and ſuch as daily came over to him, aſſuring him, that their countrymen were cordially affected to him, inſpir'd him with hopes, that the king would, in a little time, be deſerted by the whole nation, who conſider'd their oath of allegiance, as extorted from them. In the mean while, Henry, taking all proper ſteps, to defeat the duke's deſigns, made ſingular uſe of Anſelm's credit, for whom the people had the moſt profound veneration; and no ſooner was the army in readineſs to march, than the archbiſhop, having called the principal officers together, repreſented to them, in ſo pathetick a manner, the guilt of the violation of their oaths to the king, that they unanimouſly declared, that they would hazard their lives and fortunes, for his ſake. Robert did not ſo much depend on his own forces, as on the auxiliary troops of the Engliſh, and he even threaten'd ſuch as perſiſted in their obedience to his brother, whom he ſtiled an uſurper; but, when he perceived, that the body of the nation adhered to the king, and that the army had juſt renewed their oath of allegiance to him, he was convinced, that his enterprize was become altogether impracticable. Thus, falling, at once, from the moſt raiſed hopes, into a ſtate of deſpair, he immediately embraced the propoſals of peace, ſent to him from the king; and the rather, becauſe he found, that the very perſons, who, at firſt, were moſt zealous for him, began to waver in their minds; and, both the brothers being equally deſirous of an accommodation, the lords of each party had a meeting, to conſult about the means. It is natural to imagine, that Robert did not expect to obtain, by a treaty, a crown, which he could not acquire, by the force of arms; ſo that, as Henry was already crown'd, and born in England, after the king, his father, had aſcended the throne, the reſult of this conference was, that he ſhould keep the crown he had received. The king, on his part, promiſed to deliver up to Robert the caſtles in Normandy, that were garriſon'd with Engliſh, and to pay him, yearly, the ſum of 3000 marks; and it was alſo mutually agreed on, that, if one of the brothers died, without iſſue, the ſurvivor ſhould be heir to his dominions. This treaty, being ſigned and ſworn to, by 12 lords of each party, both the armies were disbanded; and Robert continued, two entire months, at the court of England, in perfect friendſhip with his brother.

Robert enters into a treaty with his brother.

1102. Ord. Vit. Brady.

This accommodation was extremely advantageous to the king; for it not only ſecured his crown, but gained him the eſteem and reverence of the people, who obſerved, that, by his prudence and ſteady conduct, he had put a ſtop to ſuch a difficult and dangerous buſineſs. However, he could not forget the danger he had eſcaped; and, leſt his enemies ſhould hereafter renew their attempts, to dethrone him, he reſolved to put it out of their power, by ruining them, one after another. It was an eaſy matter for him, to execute his reſolution; for opportunities of being revenged are ſeldom wanting to powerful princes. Soon after the treaty, he attacked, under various pretences, Hugh de Grantmenil, Robert de Pontefract, and ſome others, who evidently apprehended, that their greateſt crime was the regard they had expreſs'd, for the duke of Normandy; and he was particularly incenſed againſt Robert de Beleſme, who had ſhewn him the leaſt reſpect, and appear'd to be ſtill deſirous of raiſing new commotions. This young lord, who was ſon to the late earl of Montgomery, openly declared, that Henry was an uſurper, and that it was a diſhonour to the Normans, as well as the Engliſh, to ſuffer him to ſupplant his elder brother; and, not content with theſe bold and unguarded expreſſions, he proceeded to action, by fortifying his caſtles in Shropſhire. The king, who had determined to deſtroy him, was far from being diſpleaſed, at the plauſible handle he gave him; and, to compleat his deſtruction, he planted ſpies about him, who, pretending to come into his meaſures, had an opportunity of inſpecting all his actions; and they took care to have ſuch things ſaid to him, before ſuborned witneſſes, as might ſupport an accuſation againſt him. When the king thought, that he had ſufficient evidence, he ordered him to be accuſed of 45 articles, the leaſt of which had guilt enough, to convict him. Beleſme, making his appearance in court, asked for time, to prepare his anſwer; but, this being granted,

The king revenges himſelf on his enemies.

He attacks Robert de Beleſme.

1102. he retreated to Shrewsbury, expecting to be in a condition to defend himself, by the assistance of the Welch, who had espoused his cause. He was also buoyed up with the hopes of succours from several other lords, who seemed to give into his own sentiments; but, whether he was imposed upon, or they took him to be an improper person to be at the head of such an important undertaking, he was abandon'd by all, and, when it was too late, saw into the vanity of his projects. The king, having proclaimed him a traitor, marched against him, with such a superior force, that, in a few days, he subdued Shrewsbury, where the rebel durst not wait his arrival; and he afterwards seized on all his other castles, obliging him to quit all his possessions in England, and retire into Normandy, where he brought with him his ill-temper; but Henry confiscated his estate, involving his brothers in the same punishment, notwithstanding their innocence, in order to extirpate the whole family.

1103. The contest between Anselm and the king, about investitures.

The insolence of this lord did not occasion so much trouble to the king, as Anselm's haughty and imperious conduct. The archbishop was full of two projects, which could not, in all probability, without great difficulty, be put in execution; the first of which was to oblige the clergy to celibacy, and the second, to wrest from the king the investiture of bishops and abbots. With this view, he held a synod, which, by his influence and direction, in the first place, excommunicated all the married priests, tho' they were, then, very numerous in the kingdom; but, as this affair did not immediately affect the king, being unwilling to disoblige Anselm, he permitted this decree to pass in the synod, notwithstanding the vigorous efforts of the inferior clergy, to the contrary. An historian observes, that tho' the archbishop's intentions were generally applauded; yet it was apprehended to be a proceeding of dangerous consequence, as it was not in the power of several of the priests to live continently; and he farther remarks, that there was reason to fear, that this rigorous order would give occasion to their committing uncleanness of a much more criminal nature than marriage.

Hunting.

Anselm, having gained his first point, engaged in the second, and would have even presumed to excommunicate the bishops, that were invested by the king; but the king's interest was too deeply concerned in this affair, not to exert himself, for the preservation of a prerogative his ancestors had enjoyed, without the least interruption; tho', after all, he could not hinder some bishops, whom he had invested, from resigning their bishopricks, to prevent excommunication. On the other hand, Anselm refused to consecrate such as the king had nominated to their sees, unless the king would resign the right of investitures; and, this new claim being very boldly asserted by the archbishop, who was seconded by the court of Rome, a quarrel commenced between him and the king, which continued, for many years. As Henry would not recede from his prerogative, Anselm declared he could not submit, without betraying the cause of God; and, as there was no prospect of an accommodation, the archbishop was resolved to carry his complaints to Paschal II. then bishop of Rome; by whose orders, in all likelihood, he, first, embarqued in this undertaking. He was attended, in his journey, by the prelates, who had given up their bishopricks; and, upon his arrival at Rome, he instantly desired the pope, to restore them, by his authority. "Then, as an author "relates, the holy see, whose clemency is open "to all the world, provided care be previously "taken to prepare it, by a certain dazzling me-"tal, restored the bishops, and sent them back "to their respective sees." The king, upon Anselm's departure, dispatched Hebert, bishop of Norwich, and Robert of Litchfield, to Rome, to plead his cause; and these ambassadors were accompanied by William de Warelwast, an ecclesiastick of great learning, in order to have the assistance of his advice; but, tho' they were zealous and resolute, in behalf of the king, Paschal would not recede a tittle from his pretensions. This affair was carried on to such a height, that Henry was upon the point of being excommunicated; and on the contrary, the archbishop was deprived of his temporalities, during his absence. However, at last, after many contests, for near three years together, the circumstances of each of the parties render'd both of them equally desirous of putting an end to the quarrel; and, upon the pope's consenting, that the bishops should pay homage to the king, and the king's giving up the point of investitures, this vexatious business was brought to a conclusion, which I have but just mentioned here, because I design to treat more copiously upon it, in another place.

1104. Robert makes a visit to the king his brother. Malms. An. Sax.

Notwithstanding Henry's tedious and troublesome contest with the court of Rome, he was, at the same time, very intent on his other affairs; and his brother Robert, who was then in England, but too well experienced, what a strict regard he had to any thing, that was likely to turn to his advantage. The occasion of the duke's visit was, to insist upon the payment of his pension; but the king, who was no stranger to his brother's easy and generous temper, caress'd him, in such a manner, and amused him with so many fair promises, that he insensibly prevailed on him, to desist from his demands. This unseasonable piece of generosity proved very fatal to the duke; and, indeed, his good-nature and generosity had, all along, obstructed his designs. We have already seen, in the beginning of William Rufus's reign, how profusely he squander'd the money Henry had lent him, instead of expending it, for the support of his party in England; and, when he afterwards borrowed 10,000 marks, for his voyage to the Holy Land, that sum not being sufficient to defray the great expences of it, he contracted so many debts, whilst abroad, and after his return to Normandy, that he was obliged to mortgage almost all his demesnes, having nothing left, except the city of Roan, which he would have also pawned, if the Burghers had not refused to give their consent. His pressing

He gives up his pension.

1104. His preſſing wants, which daily increaſed, ſoon convinced him of his overſight, in giving up his penſion, to which he had ſo juſt a right; and, complaining that his eaſy temper had been abuſed, and indiſcreetly adding menaces to his complaints, he furniſhed Henry with a pretence for acting openly againſt him. The king, ever ſince his eſtabliſhment on the throne, was extremely deſirous of annexing Normandy to his other dominions; but Robert's imprudent conduct confirmed his hopes of being, one day, maſter of that dutchy; and, as he only waited, for a proper occaſion, to put his deſigns in execution, he readily embraced the firſt that offer'd.

He repents of it, and complains of the king.

I have already taken notice, that Robert de Beleſme, after he had been deprived of his eſtates in England, retreated into Normandy; but he was no ſooner arrived there, than he attempted to be revenged on the king, by attacking ſuch of his ſubjects as had lands in thoſe parts, pretending that his only view was, to repair the loſſes he had ſuſtained in England. The duke's indolence, in not chequing his proceedings, at firſt, encouraged his audacioufneſs; for he committed ſo many outrages, that complaints were brought, from all quarters, againſt him. Robert, at length, alarmed by the people's murmurs, muſter'd up an army, in order to put a ſtop to his progreſs; but he had the misfortune to be defeated. The rebel, fluſh'd with his ſucceſs, and invigorated by his ambition, formed a deſign of ſubduing the whole dutchy; and, whilſt he was carrying it on, he was joined by the eldeſt of the two half-brothers of William the Conqueror. This lord not being contented with the earldom of Cornwall, he expected that the king would have given him alſo that of Kent, which had been enjoyed by the biſhop of Bayeux, his uncle; but, Henry having diſappointed his expectation, he fell into ſuch a furious paſſion with him, on that account, that he even preſumed to threaten him. Upon this, the king diſpoſſeſs'd him of the earldom of Cornwall, as a puniſhment, for his inſolent behaviour; and, not daring to continue any longer in England, he retired to Normandy; but he was no ſooner arrived there, than, being extremely incenſed againſt the king, he fell in with Robert de Beleſme, and ſo ſtrengthened his party, that the duke was conſtrained to enter into a treaty with them, on terms very diſhonourable to a ſovereign prince.

Beleſme commits great ravages in Normandy.

He defeats the duke, who enters into a treaty with him.

1105. This peace, inſtead of reſtoring the publick tranquillity, only increaſed the inſolence of the earls, who, deſpiſing the duke's orders, daily committed ravages, that were inſupportable to the nobility, as well as the people; till, at laſt, ſome of the principal lords, deſpairing of any protection from the duke, made their application to the king of England, for the redreſs of their grievances. Their ſuit was very acceptable to Henry, who only wanted a pretence to interfere in the affairs of Normandy, that he might have an opportunity of becoming maſter of the dutchy; but, as this deſign was deteſtable, in itſelf, to gloſs it over with the appearance of juſtice, he wrote a letter to his brother, giving him to underſtand, that his conduct very juſtly occaſioned the complaints of the Normans, ſince he protected perſons, that ought to be treated, as enemies to the publick; that, notwithſtanding the peace that was concluded with them, they ſtill continued their ravages, and that his ſubjects could no longer conſider him, as their ſovereign, as they had no grounds to expect his protection; and, in fine, he intreated him to apply a remedy to the intolerable evils the Normans laboured under, aſſuring him, at the ſame time, that, if he did not, he himſelf would eſpouſe their cauſe. He likewiſe complained of certain injuries, which, he pretended, the duke had done to himſelf, and demanded ſpeedy ſatisfaction. Doubtleſs, Henry would have highly reſented his brother's conduct, if he had preſumed, thus, to intermeddle in his affairs; but ſuch is the unrighteous partiality of moſt men, that they make no ſcruple of practiſing, themſelves, what they condemn in others, vainly imagining, that the world does not ſee into the injuſtice of their actions, becauſe they have the addreſs to varniſh them over with the ſpecious pretences of love and kindneſs.

1105. The Normans apply to Henry. Ord. Vit. Malmſ.

Whilſt Henry ſeemed to have no other view, but the relief of the Normans, he himſelf oppreſs'd his own ſubjects, by an exorbitant tax, to ſupport a war, in which the Engliſh were not, in the leaſt, concerned; and, in ſpite of all his fair promiſes to the people, it was levied, with all imaginable rigour, even to the impriſoning and diſtreſſing, by various methods, ſuch as either refuſed, or were unable to pay it. Having finiſhed his preparations, he ſet out for Normandy, with a numerous army, carrying with him large ſums of money, to bribe the nobles and governors of the fortified places; and he could accompliſh this, with the greater eaſe, as Robert was in no condition, to traverſe his deſigns, or to ſecure, by the ſame means, the allegiance of his ſubjects. The king, making the beſt uſe of the preſent opportunity, ſeized on Caen and ſome other cities; the duke of Bretaign and the earl of Anjou even permitted him, to place garriſons in ſome of the frontier-towns, leſt they ſhould draw upon themſelves the edge of the war, that was pointed at Robert. On the other hand, they, that invited him over, evidently foreſeeing the dangerous conſequences of an accommodation between the two brothers, inceſſantly preſs'd him to puſh on his conqueſts, and make himſelf maſter of all Normandy, aſſuring him, that this was the only way to relieve their oppreſſions; and the biſhop of Seez, an avowed enemy to both the earls, who had turned him out of his dioceſe, on all occaſions, excited Henry to proceed in his undertaking. On a certain day, as he was with him in the church of Carenton, he ſhewed him, how full it was of goods, which the people had brought thither, to ſecure them from the tyrants; upon which, he made a long harangue, to prove, that all their miſeries were entirely the effect of Robert's negligence or connivance; and that they ſhould never be reſtored to their former tranquillity, whilſt he was

The king, liſtening to this pleaſing diſcourſe, with the cloſeſt attention, promiſed to do all that was poſſible, to procure their relief; tho' he aſſumed an air of extreme concern, at his being conſtrained to deprive his brother of his dominions, who, on the account of his incapacity, was on the brink of deſtruction. Purſuant to this reſolution, which, he declared, he had taken up, with great reluctance, and, purely, in compliance with the ſollicitations of the Normans, he continued the war. The duke, as he had not, in the leaſt, ſuſpected his deſigns, and had no time to make ſuitable preparations, made a very weak defence; ſo that Henry, having put his affairs in ſo promiſing a poſture, in his firſt campaign, returned to England, in order to raiſe, during the winter, the money and forces neceſſary to compleat the work, he had ſo happily begun.

1106. Robert ſues for peace. Paris. Vital.

The Duke being, at this time, in very miſerable circumſtances, and, at length, apprehenſive, that his utter ruin was determined, tho' he did not know how to prevent it, reſolved to wait on the king, his brother, to try the virtue of humble intreaties; for, as he was of a kind and flexible diſpoſition himſelf, he imagined, that Henry was of the ſame generous and forgiving temper. Accordingly, he came over into England, and ſued for peace, in a manner that ſuited his deſperate and forlorn condition, tho' it was entirely unworthy of the ſon of William the Conqueror; but the king had his eyes too intently fixed on his Norman dominions, to be capable of entering into any amicable meaſures with his brother. For this reaſon, he was deaf to all overtures towards an accommodation; inſomuch, that he thought, he was very favourable to the duke, in permitting him to return to Normandy; upon which, Robert departed, full of rage and vexation, and even threaten'd, that he would be revenged on the king, who had not the leaſt regard to his menaces. However, a certain hiſtorian * affirms, that Henry felt ſome remorſe, for the injury he deſigned againſt his brother, who had never injured him, and whom he had already deprived of a crown; but, if he had any ſuch reflections, they had no other influence upon him, than to inſpire him with a dread, that his injurious treatment of the duke would excite the compaſſion of the Engliſh, and revive their former affection for him. This apprehenſion giving him ſome uneaſineſs, he look'd upon it to be neceſſary, to prepoſſeſs his ſubjects in his favour, by the renewal of his promiſes; and, accordingly, having convened the great council or parliament, he attempted, in a premeditated ſpeech, to repreſent to that aſſembly, the juſtice of his undertakiug. He aſſured them, "that "Robert, ever ſince his refuſing to be king of "Jeruſalem, was viſibly abandon'd by the "Almighty, as a prince unworthy of his care "and protection *; and he aggravated the op- "preſſions of the Normans, in order to en- "gage the Engliſh, in the defence of a mi- "ſerable people. He intreated the lords to "conſider, how patiently he had received his "brother's menaces, to which he did no more "than return gentle and affectionate admoniti- "ons; and, inſiſting very copiouſly on the duke's "ill qualities, he ſet, in the worſt light, his "exceſſive generoſity, which render'd him a "continual burden to all the world. Beſides, "he charged him with an extreme arrogance; "and, that, on all occaſions, he had expreſs'd "the greateſt contempt for the Engliſh nati- "on. He declared, that, for his part, he "would always govern them, according to "juſt laws, of which the charter, he had gi- "ven them, was an unexceptionable proof; "and, in fine, that, provided he could de- "pend upon an intereſt in the hearts of his "ſubjects, he did not, in the leaſt, regard all "the attempts of his enemies againſt him." This diſcourſe effectually anſwered the king's expectation; for the lords, thinking they were highly honoured, by the confidence he repoſed in them, and entertaining great hopes, that he would perform his promiſes, unanimouſly aſſured him, that they would defend his cauſe, at the expence of their lives and fortunes.

Remarks on the king's ſpeech.

How much ſoever the king varniſhed over his ambition; yet it is eaſy to ſee into the weakneſs of the arguments he advanced, in vindication of his enterprize; and, indeed, they were not even plauſible. The pretended refuſal of the crown of Jeruſalem was entirely founded on an uncertain rumour, ſpread over England; which, in all probability was falſe, becauſe the beſt hiſtorians are ſilent, as to this particular. However, admitting it to be fact, as it is very doubtful, Robert might be ſuppoſed, in this refuſal, to have acted, as well out of modeſty, as from a principle of pride or irreligion; but, whatever was his motive in this proceeding, Henry could not derive any right, from hence, to deprive him of his dominions; and, therefore, it is evident, that the ſole reaſon, that prevailed on the Engliſh lords to declare, that they would aſſiſt him, was his ſolemn promiſe to cauſe his charter to be obſerved, which had, hitherto, been much neglected.

Henry returns to Normandy. An. Sax. Fl. Wig. Vital.

Henry, upon this declaration of the Engliſh in his favour, took occaſion to obtain a grant of freſh ſubſidies, by the means of which, he made a conſiderable addition to his troops; and no ſooner did the ſeaſon permit, than he embarqued with a numerous fleet, in order to compleat the conqueſt of Normandy. He open'd the campaign with the ſiege of Tinchebray, where the earl of Mortaigne, who was, now, in the duke's intereſt, had brought a powerful reinforcement; and, as this was a place of great ſtrength, and well ſtored with neceſſaries, it held out, till Robert came to its relief. Ever ſince the duke had parted from the king, having, in vain, ſollicited him to come to an accommodation, he had joined

All theſe ſuccours having enabled Robert to give his brother battle, he advanced towards him, with an undaunted reſolution. The two 1107. armies were very near equal, as to number; for, tho' Robert had more foot than Henry, he had not near ſo many horſe. Thus, each party might amuſe themſelves, with the hopes
The battle of Tinchebray, in which Robert is taken priſoner. of ſucceſs. However, the battle, which was fought under the walls of Tinchebray, did not laſt long; for, the Norman horſe being put into diſorder, at the firſt onſet, and the foot being unable to withſtand the enemy, without their aid, the whole army was entirely routed, the Engliſh having nothing to do, but to kill or take priſoners. The duke, finding that it was impoſſible for him to rally his troops, and abhorring the thoughts of a retreat, choſe rather to fall into the hands of the enemy, than to diſcover the leaſt appearance of cowardice. Edgar Atheling, the earl of Mortaigne, 400 knights, and 10,000 ſoldiers were likewiſe taken priſoners; and as the battle of Haſtings render'd the Normans maſters of England, this of Tinchebray, which was fought, about 40 years after, put the Engliſh in poſſeſſion of

Prince Edgar, who had often been the ſport of fortune, was immediately releaſed, and ſpent the remainder of his days in England, where he died of extreme old age; but the duke of Normandy and the earl of Mortaigne did not meet with ſo favourable treatment; for the earl was confined in the tower
He is confined in Cardiffe-caſtle. Mezeray. of London, and the duke in Cardiffe-caſtle in Wales, where he continued, as a priſoner, for 26 years, to the day of his death. Some tell us, that this unhappy prince having attempted to make an eſcape, the king ordered his ſight to be taken away, by a burning-hot braſs baſon, held before his eyes*; but this fact ſeems to be improbable, as it is not taken notice of, by moſt of the beſt hiſtorians. I do not alledge this, to excuſe the king's cruelty, who ought to have remember'd Robert's generoſity to him, during the ſiege of Michael's Mount, even tho' he had forgot, that he was his brother. A certain author in vain endeavours to Malmſ. juſtify his conduct, by obſerving, that Robert had never any affection for him, during their younger years, and had done him many injuries; for ſuch a reaſon, as this, will ſcarce anſwer the purpoſe, for which it is advanced.

Henry becomes maſter of all Normandy. Paris. Eadmer. The victory of Tinchebray having rendered Henry maſter of all Normandy, he returned in triumph to England; and, upon his arrival, he, in the firſt place, ſet about the reformation of ſeveral abuſes, that, for a long time, had prevailed in his court. In the late reign, when the king took a progreſs, his attendants committed all ſorts of outrages, in the houſes where they lodged; for they not only baſely extorted what they pleaſed from their hoſts, but made attempts on the chaſtity of the women, without cheque or controul. Coiners of baſe money were become very numerous, and even impudent, being aſſured of the protection of the great, who employed them in their houſes, where none durſt preſume to enter, in ſearch of them. Theſe diſorders not being reſtrained, by the king's edict, in the beginning of his reign, he iſſued out a ſecond, under ſtill greater penalties; and this was no more than a neceſſary piece of ſeverity, at this juncture, in order to put a ſtop to the licentiouſneſs, that was ſpread over the kingdom, by the connivance of the late reign. 1107.

Before the war in Normandy, Henry ſolemnly promiſed, that he would govern his ſubjects, according to the rules of equity, and preſerve their rights and privileges; but, upon his late ſucceſs, he forgot all his engagements. He was no ſooner arrived in England, than it was obſerved, that he behaved in a more haughty and imperious manner, than ever, treating even the nobles with abuſive language; and, as for his own charter, he paid very little regard to it, nor did he regulate any abuſes, that turned to his advantage. He diſcovered a contempt of all perſons, except Anſelm; and his paſt experience of the trouble, he gave him, led him to avoid, as ſo many dangerous quick-ſands, all occaſions of quarrelling with that prelate; but the archbiſhop, perceiving that the king was afraid of engaging in freſh diſputes, about eccleſiaſtical affairs, made uſe of this opportunity, to proſecute, with the utmoſt ſeverity, the prieſts, who obſtinately perſiſted in keeping their wives. His diſgrace and long abſence induced them to hope, that they ſhould, at length, be freed from his perſecutions; tho' he now convinced them of their miſtake, by vigorouſly purſuing his former deſign. Some time after his return, he held a ſynod, in which, rigorous penalties were decreed againſt all eccleſiaſticks, that continued in a ſtate of marriage, and ſome of them were actually deprived of their livings; but theſe proceedings, inſtead of the pretended diſorder of marriage, only proved the occaſion of real crimes. 1108. He treats his ſubjects in a more haughty manner, than ever.

The king of France forms a deſign againſt Henry. Eadmer. Vital. Hunting. As it was a matter of great indifference to the king, whether the clergy married or lived ſingle, he did not, in the leaſt, interrupt Anſelm in the proſecution of it; but there was another affair in agitation, which deſerved his cloſeſt attention. Lewis the Fat, king of France, having ſucceeded Philip, his father, as he look'd upon Henry to be a formidable neighbour, was extremely ſollicitous, how to lower his exorbitant power; and, with this view, he determined to make uſe of, as his inſtrument, William, ſirnamed Crito, ſon to Robert, a very hopeful young prince, tho' he was now in his minority. How cautious ſoever he might have been, as to the concealing of his intentions, Henry, being apprized of them, on a ſudden, ſet out for Normandy, where he order'd his nephew to be taken into cuſtody, to prevent any inſurrections in his favour; ſo that Lewis was obliged to defer the execution of his project, to a better opportunity. In the interim, William, having eſcaped out of priſon, by the means of his tutor, was carried to Paris 1109. Matilda, Henry's daughter, is married to the emperor Henry V.

Henry, having ſpent the winter and part of the ſummer in Normandy, returned to England; where, ſoon after, ambaſſadors from the emperor Henry V. waited on him, to demand his daughter, Matilda, in marriage. The king very joyfully accepted the propoſal; and, as ſoon as the terms were agreed upon, the nuptial ſolemnity was celebrated by proxy; but the princeſs, being very young, was not ſent to the emperor, her husband, till the year following, when ſhe was attended with a magnificent retinue, having alſo with her a conſiderable ſum of money, for her portion.

He raiſes money for her portion.

The obligation the king was under, of paying his daughter's marriage-portion, furniſhed him with a pretence, for laying a tax of three ſhillings on every hyde of land; which brought him in an immenſe ſum, if the calculation of ſome be juſt, who tell us, that it was equal then to 824,850 l. ſterling now. This cuſtom of levying money, for the marriage-portions of the king's daughters, was introduced by Henry, and very ſtrictly obſerved by his ſucceſſors, who found it to be too beneficial to be diſcontinued; and, from hence, we may learn, how far innovations of this kind, which obtain the force of a law, from a ſingle precedent, are prejudicial to a free people.

Anſelm's death.

Before this marriage was compleated, Anſelm departed this life, who was a learned prelate, for that age, tho' he was, to the laſt degree, a haughty and imperious bigot; and it may very reaſonably be preſumed, that his zealous attachment to the court of Rome, his reſolution, in the affair of inveſtitures, and his conſtant endeavours, to eſtabliſh the celibacy of the clergy in England, entitled him to a place in the calendar. No ſooner was Anſelm laid in his grave, than the king ſeized on the revenues of the archbiſhoprick, and kept them in his poſſeſſion, for five years. The clergy expected, that the perſecution they had ſuffer'd, during his life, would end with his death; but the court of Rome ſtill zealouſly purſued Anſelm's meaſures, which were, firſt, concerted purely, in compliance to their orders. Moreover, Henry, who was extremely unwilling to fall out with the pope, ſtrictly enforced what the council had determined; ſo that the clergy were conſtrained to live continently, as to outward appearance, being debarred from marriage, tho', in private, they were guiity of the moſt ſcandalous and enormous crimes; at leaſt, the hiſtorians of that age do not ſcruple to give us this account concerning them.

The year 1110 was remarkable, for the reſtoration of learning at Cambridge, from whence it had been baniſhed, for many years. Indeed, it is the received opinion, that Edward the Elder had founded an univerſity, in this place; but, the town having been expoſed to very great calamities, in the Daniſh wars, the ſtudy of the ſciences was brought to decay, and never revived, till the preſent time.

The following year, Henry, coming over into Normandy, attempted to ſtop the progreſs of Fulk, earl of Anjou, who had engaged the city of Conſtance in a revolt; and Elias, earl of Maine, who had joined Fulk, being taken priſoner in a battle, was put to death; for Henry judged this inſtance of ſeverity to be neceſſary, to intimidate the Normans, of whoſe allegiance he was jealous, ſince he was very ſenſible, that France would be ever ready to aſſiſt them.

1111. Henry puts the earl of Maine to death. Malmſ. Hunt. Fl. Wig.

Before Henry ſet out for Normandy, he had permitted great numbers of Flemings to ſettle in England, who, by the inundation of the ſea, in their native country, were obliged to go abroad, in queſt of new habitations. He planted them, at firſt, in the deſolate parts of Yorkſhire *; but, upon ſome complaints that were made to him, after his return, he removed them to the lands, about Ros and Pembroke, that were conquered from Wales; and their poſterity there, to this day, retain ſo much of their antient cuſtoms and language, as evidently diſtinguiſhes them from the Welch, and proves that they are of foreign extraction.

1112. Henry ſettles a colony of Flemings in Wales.

The year enſuing, Henry was obliged to embarque for Normandy, becauſe the king of France had been the author of a new rebellion there, by perſuading the earl of Anjou to make another inſurrection; but, tho' this war gave him ſome fatigue and diſturbance, he happily ſurmounted all the difficulties attending it; and Lewis had the mortification of being deſerted, even by the earl of Anjou, who, by that means, gained the advantage of marrying his daughter to prince William, ſon to the king of England. During Henry's ſtay in Normandy, he had the pleaſure of having Robert de Beleſme, his moſt inveterate enemy, at his mercy, whom he ſent into England, and detained in priſon, to the day of his death; but, theſe commotions being appeaſed, he returned into England, where he ſpent the five following years, in uninterrupted tranquillity, except that the Welch, now and then, made ſome incurſions.

1113. He goes over into Normandy, and the earl of Anjou, ſubmitting to him, marries his daughter to prince William, his ſon.

During this calm, the pope and clergy, at length, prevailed on him, to permit the vacancies in the church to be filled, eſpecially the ſee of Canterbury; and, having given his conſent, a ſynod was called, in which Ralph, biſhop of Rocheſter, was unanimouſly elected archbiſhop, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, by whom he was highly eſteemed. Henry makes a deſcent into Wales.

The Welch becoming daily more troubleſome, on the frontiers, Henry reſolved not only to chaſtiſe, but even to extirpate them; and, purſuant to this cruel reſolution, he entered their country, with a powerful army, which he divided into three bodies, in order to ſurround them on every ſide; but, upon his approach they retired to their mountains, where it was not poſſible for him to attack them. However, he determined to confine them there, for ſome time; yet perceiving, at laſt, that he could not force them from their retreat, he agreed to a treaty with them; and no ſooner had he returned to London, than he received the joyful news of the conſummation of his daughter Matilda's marriage, and of her coronation at Mentz.

1115. The Normians ſwear fealty to prince William, Ann. Sax. Malmſ. and alſo the Engliſh.

Soon after this, Henry went over to Normandy, where he got the ſtates to ſwear fealty to prince William, his ſon, who was then 12 years of age; and, the year enſuing, he did the ſame in England. With this view, he convened a general aſſembly at Salisbury, where all, that were preſent, promiſed to own prince William for their ſovereign, after the death of the king, his father, and, accordingly, ſwore allegiance to him; and ſome, from this very aſſembly, derive the original of the right of the houſe of commons to ſit in parliament. They alledge, that Henry, in imitation of the practice in Normandy, ſummoned the commons as well as the nobility and clergy; and that this was the firſt time, that the repreſentatives of the people were admitted to ſit in parliament *. Others aſſure us, that the general aſſemblies were diſuſed, before this time; and, in fine, ſome affirm, that this was the firſt aſſembly, that was called a parliament. The firſt of theſe three opinions can never be proved; the ſecond is evidently falſe; and the third is very uncertain.

1116. Eehard.

1117. Henry revenges himſelf on Lewis, for creating him troubles.

Lewis the Fat, ever ſince his acceſſion to the crown of France, continually interrupted Henry's proceedings, either by encouraging the male-contents in Normandy, or by exciting the neigbouring princes againſt him; but, altho', for the moſt part, he acted with ſecrecy, Henry was not inſenſible of his deſigns; and, therefore, he reſolved to treat him in the ſame manner. Theobald, earl of Blois, his nephew, being the ſon of his ſiſter Adela, having been affronted by the king of France, Henry perſuaded him, in revenge, to take up arms, and ſupplied him with a numerous army; whilſt Lewis, on the other hand, inveſted William Crito, Robert's ſon, with the dutchy of Normandy, and promiſed to aſſiſt him, with all his troops, to make himſelf maſter of it; and the young prince, having the aſſiſtance of France and Baldwin, earl of Flanders, attempted to wreſt Normandy from the king, his uncle.

Lewis inveſts William Crito with Normandy.

1117. Lewis publickly aſſerted a right, as ſovereign lord of Normandy, to diſpoſe of that dutchy, eſpecially, to the only ſon of duke Robert, who was unjuſtly detained in priſon; and, being reinforced by a conſiderable body of troops, which the earl of Flanders brought with him, he penetrated into Normandy, in order to put William in poſſeſſion of it.

Henry embarques for Normandy.

Henry, receiving intelligence of his motions, ſet about great preparations for the war, which were entirely made, at the expence of the Engliſh; and, as ſoon as all things were in readineſs, he went over to Normandy; and, being joined by the duke of Bretaigne and the earl of Blois, he advanced towards the enemy, to give them battle. But Lewis did not wait for his approach, chuſing rather to retire, being diſtracted to find, that his project was defeated by Henry's expedition †; and he ſent him propoſals of peace, which were not accepted, till he had engaged to reſign Giſors, which he had taken. The treaty being ſigned, Henry returned immediately into England, to prevent the entry of a legate, whom the pope had ſent, without asking him leave; and, ſome months after, queen Matilda died, to the inexpreſſible grief of all the Engliſh, as well on the account of her perſonal merit, as becauſe ſhe was a branch of the family of their antient kings.

He enters into a treaty with Lewis.

Matilda's death.

Lewis renews the war,

In the mean while, the king of France purſued his firſt deſign; for, as Henry had not razed the walls of Giſors, according to the terms of the late treaty, he took occaſion ſuddenly to invade Normandy, and commit great ravages. Henry, for ſome time, ſeemed to overlook this inſult, inſomuch that all the world was amazed, at his negligence; and ſome even charged him with the want of courage and reſolution. However, at laſt, one of his courtiers having freely repreſented to him, how much he injured his reputation, by this omiſſion, he calmly replied, that he was taught by the king, his father, that the moſt effectual way, to conquer the French, was to ſuffer their firſt heat to cool a little; and, to prove that he was not afraid of their attempts, he, quickly after, embarqued for Normandy, with a numerous army, and offer'd to engage his enemy. Lewis, embracing his challenge, the two armies came to an engagement; and, during the fight, a French cavalier, named Criſpin, attack'd the perſon of the king of England, and ſtruck him twice on the head, with ſuch force, that, notwithſtanding his helmet, he was, all over, bloody. However, in ſpite of this, he continued the combate; and, the ſight of his blood animating his courage, he gave his adverſary ſo furious a blow, that he tumbled him from his horſe and took him priſoner. This valiant action raiſed ſuch an emulation among his troops, that, after a ſharp and obſtinate battle, the enemy were con-and is defeated by Henry.

* Malmsbury ſays, "All the freemen of England and Normandy, of whatſoever rank or dignity, or to whatſoever lord they were vaſſals or tenants, were obliged to do homage and ſwear allegiance to William, the ſon of Henry, and his queen, Matilda;" but this aſſembly did not, in the leaſt, reſemble a parliament Polydore Virgil, and, from him, Stow and Speed's Chronicle, date the commencement of the Engliſh parliaments, from the time of this aſſembly, tho' they produce no authorities, to ſupport their opinion.

† The French hiſtorians take no notice of this retreat, or of the peace that ſucceeded it, confounding this war, in 1118, with that which was renewed, the ſame year, after the ſurrender of Giſors.

1118. ſtrained to quit the field; and the ſtandard of France, being taken, was ſent in triumph to Roan. Some time after, the two kings had a ſecond engagement, tho' the ſucceſs of it was doubtful, as each of the parties pretended to have the advantage; and, in a word, this war, proving to be a very ſmart one, gave both the monarchs ſufficient employment.

1119. The council of Rheims. In the interim, Lewis attempted to make the beſt uſe of the ſtay, pope Calixtus II. then made in France, to embroil Henry's affairs, hoping, that, as he was of the houſe of Burgundy, he would be eaſily induced to fall in with his deſigns; and, therefore, before he had diſcovered his intentions to him, he prevailed on him to call a council at Rheims, to which the Engliſh biſhops were ſummoned. Henry, who ſuſpected nothing, made no ſcruple of permitting them, to give their attendance; only, when they took their leave, he order'd them to ſalute the pope, in his name, to obey his apoſtolical precepts, but, at the ſame time, to take ſpecial care, that they did not bring back with them any new inventions of the court of Rome. The council was chiefly compoſed of French biſhops; and ſome of them, that were privy to the ſecret, ſeverely inveighed againſt the king of England. They even propoſed to excommunicate him, for unjuſtly detaining the perſon and dominions of the duke of Normandy, his brother, who, as one of the Cruſade, had a right to the church's protection; and this propoſal would, doubtleſs, have received the approbation of the majority, if the pope, willing to cultivate a good underſtanding with Henry, to ſhift it off, had not undertaken, himſelf, to exhort him to do juſtice to his brother. Some time after, Calixtus, having had a long conference with the king, at Giſors, acquainted him, that it was the council's deſire, that Robert ſhould be reſtored to his dutchy. Henry replied, that he had not taken Normandy from his brother, but from a pack of diſſolute wretches, who made it their buſineſs to ſquander away the inheritance of his anceſtors, which Robert had put into their poſſeſſion; and that his proceedings were entirely the effects of the importunate ſollicitations of the nobility, clergy, and people of Normandy; and, beſides, he ſo ſtrengthened his reaſons, by magnificent preſents, that the pope and the cardinals, that attended him, declared, at their return, that they had never met with a more eloquent prince, than the king of England. Thus, Calixtus, abandoning Robert's intereſt, exerted himſelf, to bring about a peace between the two kings; and, the following year, his endeavours proved to be ſucceſsful *.

1120. No ſooner was the peace concluded, than Henry, impatiently deſirous of returning to England, after ſuch a long abſence, embarqued at Barfleur, with a great retinue; and William, his ſon, then 16 years of age, invited on board his ſhip all the young nobility, to render his paſſage the more agreeable. As he ſet out laſt, he had a ſtrong inclination to overtake the king, his father, and aſſured the ſeamen of a reward, if his ſhip arrived firſt; but this raſh emulation proved fatal to the young prince; for the pilot, in order to get before the king, keeping too near the ſhore, on the coaſt of England, the ſhip ſplit againſt a rock. The ſeamen, in the greateſt conſternation, on this occaſion, took particular care to hoiſt out the boat, with a view of ſaving the prince; and, indeed, by their diligence, they had ſecured him from danger. However, upon the cries of Matilda, his natural ſiſter, as he was making off, he rowed back, to take her in alſo; and, ſeveral others having, by this means, an opportunity of leaping in, the boat ſunk with its load, and it was impoſſible to ſave the prince. Among all thoſe that remained in the ſhip, there were but a very few that eſcaped with life, by ſwimming, who gave an account of the circumſtances of this tragical occurrence; but, among the reſt, that periſhed in the waves, were, beſides the prince, one of his natural brothers, named Richard, Matilda, his ſiſter, who was the counteſs of Perch, Lucia, the king's niece, the earl of Cheſter, and ſeveral lords, whoſe debauched lives, it is alledged, juſtly provoked the vengeance of Heaven, to inflict upon them this remarkable judgment †.

1120. Prince William is drowned.

1121. Henry marries Adelicia of Lovain. This unexpected accident made ſuch an impreſſion on Henry, that he was never afterwards ſeen to laugh; but, to repair his loſs, he married Adelicia, daughter to Geoffrey, earl of Lovain; tho' this marriage did not anſwer his expectation, as he never had any iſſue by her.

He wages war with the Welch. The ſame year, the Welch, under Gryffin, their king, made an inroad into Cheſhire; and, having conſumed ſeveral caſtles and committed great ravages, they brought upon themſelves an invaſion from the Engliſh. Henry, at the head of his army, over-ran a part of Wales; but, attempting, one day, to ſecure a certain paſs, he fell into an ambuſh, where he loſt a great number of his men, and received, himſelf, the ſtroke of an arrow on his breaſt-plate. This diſappointment, preventing him from making any farther progreſs, he enter'd into a treaty with Gryffin; tho' not without his giving him hoſtages and 1000 head of cattle, to make him reparation, for the expence of the war.

Ralph, archbiſhop of Canterbury, died, ſoon after, who was a prelate of an unblameable life; yet ſo zealouſly did he inſiſt on the prerogatives of his ſee, that he would not ſuffer the leaſt infringement, even in things, that were

* Father Daniel tells us, that the pope not only threatened to excommunicate Henry, but actually did ſo; but the Engliſh hiſtorians give us a quite contrary account of this interview.

† No leſs than 140 perſons periſhed, in this ſhipwreck, moſt of them young noblemen, beſides 50 mariners, not ſo much as one eſcaping with life, except a butcher; and the Engliſh hiſtorians look upon this, as a juſt judgment, for their ſodomitical practices. The loſs of this young prince was far from being a misfortune to the Engliſh nation, if Brompton's account of him be genuine, which he relates from Malmsbury, tho' it is not to be found in his hiſtory, that he threatened, "if ever he ſucceeded to the crown of England, he would oblige them to draw the plough like oxen." By this unhappy accident, the perſons, honours, and eſtates of the heirs of the greateſt part of the nobility, were in Henry's power; and he ſtrengthened his intereſt in England, by marrying their widows, daughters, and ſiſters to his courtiers and ſpecial favourites.

1121. were the moſt minute and inſignificant. For example, on the ſolemn feſtivals, when the king uſually wore his crown, he would not ſuffer him to put it on, with his own hands, pretending, that this was, on all occaſions, his office, as archbiſhop of Canterbury. The ſee continued vacant, till the year enſuing, when Corbet, abbot of St. Bennet's, was elected by a ſynod at Wincheſter.

1123. Henry prevents the revolt of the Normans. Dunelm. Hunting. Ord. Vit.

Henry imagined, that, having made a peace with the king of France, he had effectually ſecured his Norman dominions, beyond the poſſibility of any interruptions, for the future, on that ſcore; yet Robert de Mellent, lord of Pont-Audemer, created him new troubles, which obliged him, once more, to embarque for that dutchy. This lord, having a great intereſt in the Normans, and being privately aſſiſted by the king of France, undertook to reſtore William Crito to his dominions; and the Normans were juſt on the point of revolting, if Henry's ſudden arrival had not prevented it. The king immediately beſieged Audemer and took it; upon which, he increaſed the fortifications of the caſtles of Caen, Roan, and Arques, and reinforced the garriſons. Theſe precautions diſpirited the Normans; tho' Robert de Mellent and the earl of Monfort, who joined him, ſtill kept the field, with ſome troops; but, being drawn into an ambuſh, they were both taken priſoners, and the reſt returned to their allegiance.

1124. Robert de Mellent is taken priſoner.

1125. The pope's legate arrives in England.

During the king's abſence in Normandy, cardinal John de Creme, the pope's legate, came into England, to compleat the reformation of the pretended great diſorder of the clergy's marrying, which they ſtill perſiſted in, in ſpite of all the attempts to the contrary; and the legate was received in a very pompous manner, tho' the people were far from being pleaſed at his reception, who had not been accuſtomed to ſee legates exerting their authority in the kingdom. Having convened a council at London, he procured ſeveral ſevere canons to be paſs'd againſt ſuch eccleſiaſticks, as continued to keep their wives *; but to very little purpoſe, tho' they were ſtrictly enforced by the king's authority. However, Henry's view, in this, was not ſo much to debar the clergy from marrying, as, by his ſeeming zeal, to obtain, from the pope, a power to put in execution the decrees of the councils, on this article, as he actually did, in the year 1129; for no ſooner had he gained this point, than he allowed the prieſts to keep their wives, upon the payment of a certain ſum, for a diſpenſation.

1127. Henry procures Matilda to be owned, as his heir.

Tho' the king had been, now, ſix years married to his ſecond wife, he ſaw no proſpect of his having any children by her; and, therefore, to ſecure the ſucceſſion to his family, he reſolved upon procuring his daughter, Matilda, who, ſince the emperor's death, was returned to England, to be acknowledged the preſumptive heir to the crown. As this princeſs was, by the mother's ſide, deſcended from the antient Saxon kings, ſhe was the darling of the Engliſh; and, as for the Normans, who wanted a prince of their own nation, it was evidently their intereſt to place on the throne a grand-daughter of William the Conqueror, to whoſe bounty they were indebted, for all their poſſeſſions in England. Theſe conſiderations inſpired the king with hopes of ſucceſs, in his undertaking; and, accordingly, he aſſembled all the immediate vaſſals of the crown. Among the barons, in this aſſembly, were Stephen, earl of Bulloign, the king's nephew, and David, king of Scotland, on the account of his fiefs in England; and, all the members of the council having unanimouſly conſented to Henry's propoſal, David and Stephen were the firſt that ſwore allegiance to Matilda, provided the king, her father, died, without any male iſſue. 1127.

Matilda is married to Geoffry of Plantagenet. Hunting. Hoveden. M. Paris.

This affair being ſettled, to Henry's ſatisfaction, he married the empreſs to Geoffrey Plantagenet, ſon to Fulk, earl of Anjou, who had reſigned his dominions to his ſon, in order to go and take poſſeſſion of the crown of Jeruſalem, upon the death of Baldwin II. his father-in-law; tho', in this match, he conſulted his own advantage, more than Matilda's inclinations. The princeſs, being an emperor's widow, imagined ſhe debaſed herſelf, in accepting the earl of Anjou for her husband; ſo that the king, her father, was obliged to make uſe of compulſive methods, to bring her to a compliance; but, to prevent William Crito from ſeizing on Normandy, he thought it adviſable, to attach Geoffrey to his intereſt, that he might always be ready to aſſiſt him, as occaſion offer'd.

The barons are diſpleaſed with this match.

The Engliſh and Normans ſeemed to be no leſs diſpleaſed, than Matilda, with this alliance; for they expected to have been conſulted in a matter of this importance, which was, in effect, to give them a king. Moreover, ſome of them flatter'd themſelves with the proſpect of the crown, by marrying the empreſs; ſo that, all things conſidered, it was eaſy to apprehend, that the oath, by which the king intended to bind them, would have very little virtue, after his deceaſe. However, Henry, believing that none would preſume to violate ſuch a ſolemn engagement, as he dreaded the deſigns of the king of France, in favour of William Crito, only regarded the preſent benefit he ſhould receive, from the marriage of his daughter.

1128. William Crito is made earl of Flanders.

The king had ſome grounds to ſuſpect a league between Lewis and William Crito; for the king of France, afterwards, openly eſpouſing William's cauſe, inveſted him with the earldom of Flanders, the more effectually, to enable him to wage war with the king, his

* The legate, ſeverely inveighing againſt the prieſt's marrying, alledged, "that it was an abominable ſin, for a "prieſt to riſe from the ſide of an harlot, and then to make the body of Chriſt;" tho', the very next night, having ſaid maſs, the ſame day, he himſelf was taken in bed with a whore. Huntingdon, who was not only a prieſt, but even the ſon of a prieſt, and lived at this time, after an apology for the freedom he uſes with the fathers of the church, is the firſt, that relates this ſtory, at large, and concludes, "that it was too notorious to be denied, and ought not to "be concealed."

1128. uncle; but, to defeat their meaſures, Henry, in the firſt place, carried the war into France, and, ſecondly, excited the Flemings to revolt againſt their new earl, and engaged them in the intereſt of Theodoric of Alſatia, who pretended a title to Flanders. Purſuant to this ſcheme, he enter'd France with a numerous army; whilſt, on the other hand, ſeveral towns in Flanders boldly declared againſt his nephew. William, in order to reduce them to obedience, firſt of all, laid ſiege to Aloſt, which held out, till his rival came to its relief; but, having intelligence of Theodoric's approach, he advanced towards him, and, obtaining a compleat victory, returned to carry on the ſiege. The defeat of the land-grave of Alſatia would have rendered it impoſſible, for the beſieged, to hold out any longer, if, in one of their ſallies, William had not received a wound, which, in a few days, was the occaſion of his death. William was a young prince of conſiderable courage, being likewiſe endowed with ſeveral other good qualities; but, to avoid the misfortunes the duke, his father, had plunged himſelf into, by his exceſſive generoſity and profuſeneſs, he ran into the contrary extreme; and his covetouſneſs, joined to ſome outrages he committed in Flanders, together with his immoderate love of women, render'd him odious to the Flemings, and diſpoſed them to fall in with his uncle's ſollicitations. The ſudden death of this prince, and the Engliſh army being in France, conſtrained Lewis to lay aſide his projects, and ſtrike up a peace with the king, which continued, without any interruption, to the day of his death; and, in the reſidue of his reign, which laſted ſix years longer, there happened very few remarkable occurrences, the principal of which are, as follows.

William is ſlain at the ſiege of Aloſt.

1130. In the 30th year of the century, Henry went over to Normandy, where he remained, the greateſt part of the year; and his chief buſineſs was, to have an interview, with Innocent II. whom, at length, he acknowledged for the true pope, tho' Anacletus, his competitor, was maſter of Rome. France having owned Innocent, Henry, for that very reaſon, was inclined to eſpouſe the cauſe of Anacletus; but Innocent had the art to manage him, with ſo much dexterity, that he gained him over to his party, which did not a little turn to his advantage.

Henry acknowledges, for pope, Innocent II.

Henry, returning to England, brought with him his daughter, Matilda, who, upon ſome diſguſt, was parted from the earl, her husband; and, upon his arrival, he convened a general aſſembly, in which the oath of allegiance to the empreſs was renewed; but, after this, ſhe went home to her husband, who deſired her company.

The barons renew their oath to Matilda.

1132. In the year 1132, an epiſcopal ſee was founded at Carliſle, and a great part of London was conſumed by fire; for, as that city conſiſted chiefly of wooden houſes, it frequently ſuffer'd by the like accidents.

The following year, the remembrance of this misfortune was entirely blotted out, by the joyful news of Matilda's being ſafely delivered of a prince, named Henry, after his grandfather; upon which, the king aſſembled all the great men, to renew their oath to the ſucceſſion, in which prince Henry was included; but, tho' this was the third time of their ſwearing, they did not, however, make conſcience of obſerving their oath. Matilda had two other ſons, viz. Geoffrey and William, whom I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of hereafter.

1133. The birth of prince Henry.

Towards the end of ſummer, the king, for the laſt time, ſet out for Normandy; and, the very day of his embarquement, there was an eclipſe of the ſun, and, two days after, a great earthquake, in which raging flames of fire proceeded out of the clefts; and ſome look'd upon theſe accidents to be preſages of the king's death, tho' it did not happen, till two years after. Robert, his elder brother, died before him, in the caſtle of Cardiffe, where he had been impriſoned, for 26 years, who was a prince of great courage, and, for ſome time, of a ſhining reputation; but his eaſy, indolent, and profuſe diſpoſition twice deprived him of the crown of England, to which he had a fairer title, and, perhaps, better deſerved it, than either of his brothers. He was ſirnamed Court-hoſe, either becauſe he wore very ſhort breeches, or that his legs, as to length, bore no proportion to the reſt of his body. Some, indeed, aſcribe to him the ſirname of Courteous, through ignorance of the true meaning of the term Court-hoſe, and becauſe that appellation was ſuitable to his generous temper. He was buried at Glouceſter, in the choir of the cathedral, where his tomb is to be ſeen, at this day *.

Henry paſſes over into Normandy.

Robert, his brother, dies.

1135. The death of Henry I.

The death of Robert was ſoon followed by that of the king; for, about the latter end of Auguſt, 1135, he was ſeized with a violent illneſs, which carried him off, in ſeven days; and it is ſaid, he occaſioned it himſelf, by eating to exceſs of ſome lampries, which he loved exceedingly. He was then at the caſtle of Lyons near Roan, a place he much delighted in; and, when he perceived, that he was on the point of death, he ſent for the earl of Glouceſter, his natural ſon, and preſſingly recommended to him the concerns of the empreſs, his ſiſter, without taking the leaſt notice of the earl of Anjou, his ſon-in-law, with whom he was diſguſted; and, upon this, he made his will, by which he left to his domeſticks above 60,000 l. ſterling, giving orders alſo, that his debts ſhould be punctually paid, and all arrears due to him remitted. He died on the 2d of September, in the 68th year of his age, and the 36th of his reign; and his body was cut in pieces, after the rude and barbarous manner of thoſe times, in order to be embalmed †, becauſe he was to be buried in England, in the abbey of Reading.

* He lies in the middle of the choir, in a wooden monument. Huntingdon tells us, he died for grief, being obliged to wear an old coat, that was caſt off by the king, his brother.

† Gervaſe of Canterbury ſays, that they cut great gaſhes in his fleſh with knives; after which, powdering it well with ſalt, they wrapp'd it up in tanned ox-hides, to avoid the ſtench, which was ſo infectious, that the man, who was hired to open his head, died ſoon after the operation.

Henry

1135. Henry was a prince, that had an uncommon mixture of good and bad qualities. He was remarkable for his courage, as well as his extenſive capacity, both in civil and military affairs; and his prudence, in the adminiſtration of the government, was chiefly conſpicuous, inaſmuch as, notwithſtanding his many journies to Normandy, he was never diſturbed by any domeſtick inſurrections, tho' there was a conſiderable number of diſſaffected perſons in England. He obſerved the ſtricteſt regularity in his diet; for it does not appear, that he was ever guilty of exceſs, in eating or drinking, except that one time, that proved the occaſion of his death. He was inexorable to all malefactors, being perſuaded, that the utmoſt ſeverity was abſolutely neceſſary, to put a ſtop to the licentiouſneſs, introduced in the late reign; and, tho' William Rufus was an entire ſtranger to letters, Henry had a learned education, and made great proficiency in his ſtudies; for which reaſon, he was ſirnamed Beauclerc, i. e. the ſcholar, becauſe, in thoſe days, none but eccleſiaſticks applied themſelves to books, and princes leaſt of all others. He retained, during his whole life, his taſte for the ſciences, which he had imbib'd in his younger years; and he even built a palace at Oxford, where he often retired, for the ſake of the company of the learned, His handſome face, his ſweet and ſerene aſpect, his free and engaging countenance, and his affable deportment and agreeable converſation, at firſt ſight, prepoſſeſs'd all the world in his favour; and he would have been, in all reſpects, an accompliſh'd prince, were it not that his excellencies were ſullied with many vicious qualities, eſpecially, cruelty, avarice, and an inordinate love of women. The firſt appeared, from his barbarous and unnatural uſage of his elder brother; the ſecond, from his exceſſive and too frequent taxes on the people; and the third, from the great number of baſtards he had by ſeveral miſtreſſes. I ſhall not ſtop, here, to make any remarks, on his uſurpation of the crown, ſince it may be objected, that Robert's right was not unexceptionable, on account of the diverſity of opinions, as to that point; but, for his cruel and unjuſt treatment of his brother, in not only depriving him of his dominions, but alſo detaining him in priſon, for 26 years, I apprehend, nothing can poſſibly be alledged, in his vindication. However, to make ſome attonement, for his miſdemeanors, he erected the epiſcopal ſees of Ely and Carliſle, and founded the abbies of Reading, Hyde, and Cheſter, with the priory of Dunſtable †; for this was a method of penance, very faſhionable, in thoſe days, which, as it is eaſy to be practiſed by the rich and powerful, has been all along, and is continued to this day.

The charter Henry granted his ſubjects, upon his acceſſion to the throne, is one of the moſt remarkable events of his reign, during which, the kingdom was happy, in a prodigious plenty of all things; ſeeing, for a ſhilling, as much corn might be bought, as would ſerve 100 men, a whole day; and, for a groat, which was likewiſe the price of a ſheep, as much hay and oats, as 20 horſes could eat, at the ſame time; tho', it muſt be owned, money was then much ſcarcer, than at preſent.

Henry left only one legitimate daughter behind him, viz. the empreſs, Matilda, and 12 natural ſons; the moſt illuſtrious of whom was Robert, earl of Glouceſter, as well becauſe of his perſonal merit, as for his inviolable adherence to the empreſs, his ſiſter, as the ſequel will inform us.

His iſſue.

1135. STEPHEN. HENRY imagined, that the triple oath, by which he had obliged the lords ſpiritual and temporal, would effectually ſecure the ſucceſſion to the empreſs, his daughter; at leaſt, it could not enter into his thoughts, that, altho' ſome of them ſhould make no conſcience of ſuch a ſolemn engagement, the body of the nation would follow their example; and yet, in ſpite of this obligation, thoſe, whom he leaſt ſuſpected, formed a project, even before his death, how to defeat all his precautions.

We may learn, from the three preceding reigns, with what partiality, riches, honours, and preferments were beſtowed upon foreigners, eſpecially, on thoſe, that were related to the royal family; for the three laſt kings, by excluding the Engliſh from their favours, whilſt they laviſhed them on the Normans, expected to ſecure the crown to their family. However, by heaping eſtates and honours on their relations, inſtead of gaining their children ſo many friends, they only created them ſo many rivals; and, in ſtrengthening the party of the foreigners againſt the Engliſh, they unexpectedly fomented the ambition of the former, and put it out of the power of the latter to ſupport the royal family, when it, moſt of all, wanted their aſſiſtance and protection.

Among the late king's favourites, Stephen, earl of Bulloign, his nephew, was the chief. Adela, his mother, daughter to William the Conqueror, had, by the earl of Blois, her huſband, four ſons; but Theobald, the ſecond, was his father's ſucceſſor, the eldeſt being render'd incapable, by ſome natnral defects. Stephen, the third ſon, was ſent over into Eng-

† He alſo built a magnificent palace at Woodſtock, to which he adjoined a large park, incloſed with ſtone, ſuppoſed to be the firſt in England; tho' the number of parks was afterwards ſo vaſtly increaſed, that it was computed, there were more in this ſingle kingdom, than in all the other parts of Chriſtendom.

1135. land, to the king, his uncle; and Henry, the youngeſt, was a monk in the monaſtery of Clugni. Stephen's good qualities ſoon procured him an intereſt, in the eſteem and affection of the king, who took a pleaſure in obliging him, judging it to be highly expedient to place his nephew in a condition to ſupport his family; and, therefore, he conferred on Stephen the lands, that were confiſcated from the earl of Mortaign; and, having ſent for Henry, he made him abbot of Glaſſenbury, and, in proceſs of time, biſhop of Wincheſter. The two brothers being, at length, raiſed to a great degree of credit and power, they formed ſo ſtrong a party in England, that they entertained thoughts of making the beſt uſe of prince William's ſudden death, for their own advantage. It is certain, that, when the late king expreſs'd his deſire of ſecuring the crown to Matilda, Stephen was the very firſt that ſwore allegiance to her; but it muſt be conſider'd, that he could not expect a diſpenſation, in that particular, and that this was an improper juncture, to diſcover his intentions. Perhaps, he had formerly flatter'd himſelf with hopes of being married to Matilda, the king's daughter; but, theſe apprehenſions, if it be true that he gave into them, proving deluſive, by the marriage of that princeſs to the earl of Anjou, he made it his principal ſtudy, to bring about his deſigns. He, by his ſecret emiſſaries, increaſed, the diſguſt this match had occaſion'd, among the nobility, and previouſly engaged in his intereſt thoſe, who were moſt capable of fixing him on the throne, after the king's deceaſe. However, he was ſo very cautious and circumſpect, in his proceedings, that his uncle did not, in the leaſt, ſuſpect his deſigns; nay, on the contrary, a little before his death, he promoted his marriage to Matilda, only daughter and heireſs to the earl of Bulloign, by which means he became more powerful, and in greater credit, than ever.

Stephen, Henry's nephew, aſpires to the crown, whilſt his uncle was alive.

As the king's laſt ſickneſs ſeemed, at firſt, to be attended with dangerous ſymptoms, Stephen, who was with him in Normandy, ſent an account of it to the biſhop of Wincheſter, his brother, that he might renew his intrigues, to procure him the crown. This prelate had already brought over to his party the archbiſhop of Canterbury and Roger, biſhop of Saliſbury, who had, both of them, a great influence over the clergy; for the laſt was the richeſt ſubject in England, having accumulated vaſt treaſures, during his adminiſtration of eccleſiaſtical and civil affairs, which were entirely entruſted to his management, by the late king. The occaſion of his riſe was ſomewhat extraordinary. When he was no more than curate of a pariſh in Normandy, Henry, who had not then the leaſt proſpect of ſucceeding to the crown, by accident, came into the church, where he was employed in ſaying maſs; but his careful and devout manner of celebrating that ſervice ſo captivated the prince, that he inſtantly deſired to have him, for his chaplain. Roger very readily accepted this unexpected honour; and, tho' he had but little of the ſcholar in him, he was naturally of ſuch a pliant and courtly diſpoſition, that he ſoon attracted the good graces of his patron, who loaded him with favours. Upon his acceſſion to the throne, his firſt care was, to advance his chaplain to the ſee of Salisbury; and afterwards he made him his prime miniſter. This exalted poſt gave him an opportunity of amaſſing immenſe riches; which he expended, not ſo much in acts of charity, as in building magnificent palaces, and in keeping an equipage, almoſt as ſplendid, as that of the king.

The riſe of Roger, biſhop of Salisbury.

These three biſhops ſecured to Stephen the ſuffrages of all the clergy; and the temporal lords, that were not in his intereſt, did not think it adviſable, to oppoſe a deſign, which was approved of and purſued by all the biſhops; inſomuch that not ſo much, as one, attempted to ſpeak, in behalf of Matilda. In the mean while, upon Henry's death in Normandy, Stephen directly ſet out for England, to ſecond his pretenſions to the crown, with his preſence; and he eaſily carried away the prize from an abſent princeſs, whoſe capricious and imperious temper had already prejudiced the people againſt her. If the nobility had, in reality, the regard they expreſs'd for religion, their repeated oaths to Matilda would have infallibly prevented Stephen's election; but they as thoroughly underſtood, as at this day, the art of evading the moſt ſolemn engagements, by equivocations and mental reſervations, which render the uſe of an oath entirely ineffectual. The archbiſhop of Canterbury alledged, that their oath to Matilda was null and void, as it was inconſiſtent with the antient cuſtoms of the Engliſh, who had never allowed a woman to reign over them; and the biſhop of Salisbury aſſerted, that they were releaſed from their obligation, becauſe Matilda was married to a foreigner, without the conſent of the barons, whoſe intent was, even when they ſwore allegiance, not to have a king, of a different race from that of William the Conqueror. In fine, to put the matter out of diſpute, Hugh Bigod, who had been high-ſteward to the late king, ſwore on the holy evangeliſts, that, Henry, before his deceaſe, had diſinherited Matilda, and nominated Stephen, for his ſucceſſor; which was plauſible enough, to varniſh over the diſloyalty of the barons. On this weak foundation, they rejected Matilda's right, tho' they had thrice ſworn to maintain it, and crowned Stephen, the 26th of December, 24 days after Henry's death; and, thus, the princeſs was deprived of the crown, by thoſe whom her father apprehended to be the moſt firmly attached to her cauſe; which ſufficiently ſhews, how little ſtreſs is to be laid on the precautions, that are the product of human prudence.

The clergy declare for Stephen.

He is crowned.

Stephen was, at this time, 31 years old, and highly eſteemed by the nobility; tho' his age and good qualities did not, in the leaſt, ſtrengthen his title to the ſucceſſion; inſomuch that, to ſupport it, he was conſtrained to promiſe the people more privileges, in his reign, than they had ever enjoyed, under the Norman kings, his predeceſſors, and, doubtleſs, more than he deſigned to perform; and, indeed,

He makes large promiſes to the barons.

1135. deed, this was the ſole motive of their being ſo active and forward, in his election. They amuſed themſelves with an expectation, that, on the account of his being indebted to them, for the crown, he would always give them ſome proofs of his gratitude; whereas they imagined, that Matilda, whoſe right was more conſpicuous, would not think herſelf to be ſo much obliged to them, on that ſcore. However, Stephen, willing to make the moſt ſpecious declarations, for the ſake of a ſceptre, engaged to reform all the abuſes, that had prevailed, in the three former reigns, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, his brother, aſſured the barons, that he would fulfil all his declarations; and, upon this, they made the beſt uſe of the preſent favourable juncture. When the oath was adminiſter'd to the new king, more being required of him, than any of the preceding kings, he ſwore, "that he would, within a li-

Stephen ſeizes on Henry's treaſure. The coronation being over, Stephen poſted to Wincheſter, to take poſſeſſion of the treaſure, Henry had laid up in that place, which amounted to 100,000 marks, beſides plate and jewels; and, with this money, he levied an army of Bretaigns, Picards, Flemings, and other foreigners, not having, as yet, any great confidence in his own ſubjects; and, at his return from Wincheſter, he went to meet the corpſe of the late king, which was brought from Normandy, in order to be interred at Reading, purſuant to his own directions.

1136. Stephen did not, hitherto, meet with the leaſt oppoſition; but yet he foreſaw it to be very likely, that Matilda and Geoffrey, her husband, would attempt to recover the crown; and, therefore, he judged it to be expedient, to gain an intereſt in the hearts of the people, by making it appear, that it was his real intention to obſerve his promiſes, with the utmoſt punctuality. With this view, he convened a general aſſembly at Oxford, and ſigned the charter he promiſed his ſubjects, in which he, firſt of all, "owns that he was elected by "the clergy and people. He ratifies all the "liberties, privileges, and immunities of the "church, and conſents that all eccleſiaſtical "cauſes and perſons ſhould be tried by the 1136. This charter would have proved very advantageous to the people, if it had been put in execution; but, as a certain author remarks, as the Eng- Malmſ.
liſh elected Stephen, merely, for their own intereſt, he granted their requeſts, rather to amuſe them, than to bind himſelf with fetters of parchment. The truth of this obſervation is evident, from the king's behaviour, a few Stephen ſeizes on the revenues of the ſee of Canterbury. Hunting. Paris. Malmſ.
months after; for, the ſee of Canterbury becoming vacant by the death of Corbet, the king ſeized on the revenues, and kept them in his poſſeſſion, above two years; moreover, as the archbiſhop died inteſtate, he ſeized on his effects, pretending that this proceeding was a branch of his royal prerogative. Indeed, in this, he only copied after the three preceding kings; but, tho' it ſhould be admitted, that he was poſſeſs'd of that right, yet, as he had ſo poſitively promiſed to reſign it, this ſtep muſt, of courſe, be conſidered, as an expreſs violation of his charter and oath.

The beginning of Stephen's reign was calm and peaceable; but this tranquillity was ſoon interrupted. His ſubjects, growing inſolent, over-rated their ſervices to the king; and ſome of them, being obliged to follow the multitude, only wanted an opportunity to wipe off the ſtain, the nation had contracted, by the breach of their oath to Matilda. The king, being ſenſible of the uncertain ſituation of his affairs, did all that was poſſible, to ſecure the allegiance of the people; and, with this view, he conferred titles of honour on ſeveral perſons, and alienated a great number of the crown-lands to ſuch, as, he apprehended, might be ſerviceable to his cauſe. In the interim, theſe, who received his favours, look'd upon them, as the reward of their merit; whilſt thoſe, that were neglected, reſented the king's partiality; which, proved, at length, very fatal to him. But his greateſt overſight was, in permitting the barons to fortify their caſtles, which put it in their power to revolt, when they pleaſed; and, in a little time, there were above a thouſand fortified caſtles, in different parts of the kingdom.

1137. The earl of Devonſhire revolts. The inſolence of Baldwin de Redvers, earl of Devonſhire, ſoon convinced Stephen of his imprudence, in this particular; for that lord, being diſguſted, on the account of the king's refuſing him a favour he asked, openly declared, that he would obey him no longer; and, accordingly, he fortified his caſtle at Exeter, where, acting as a ſovereign, he treated, in a tyrannical manner, all that were under him. This revolt was ſo much the more dangerous, The Welch make an irruption. as the Welch, at the ſame time, made an incurſion into the frontiers, from whence they carried off a great booty; but the king, taking Baldwin's affair to be the moſt important, 1137. went and beſieged Exeter, which held out a conſiderable time. However, having, at laſt, ſubdued the place, he purſued the earl, to the iſle of Wight; and, forcing him to retreat, from thence, he baniſhed him the realm, tho' he granted a pardon to all the other revolters; but this act of grace was of pernicious conſequence to Stephen, as it rendered the malecontents more daring and preſumptuous.

The earl is baniſhed.

The Welch defeat the Engliſh.

The Welch war was not concluded, with the ſame ſucceſs; for, in a battle fought, near Cardigan, the king's forces were ſo ſeverely uſed, that very few of them eſcaped with life; and, it is ſaid, the Engliſh ſoldiers were ſtruck with ſuch a pannick conſternation, that they were taken priſoners, even by the women.

The king of Scotland invades the north.

In the mean while, David, king of Scotland, made a deſcent into the northern counties of England, under the pretence of revenging the injury done to the empreſs, his niece; and, having made himſelf maſter of Carliſle and Newcaſtle, he advanced, as far as Durham. No ſooner was the Welch war over, than Stephen marched into the north, in order to ſtop the progreſs of the king of Scotland; but the particulars of this war, tho' of little importance, in themſelves, are variouſly related by the hiſtorians of both nations, who agree in nothing, except the event. They unanimouſly affirm, that it was ended by a treaty of peace, purſuant to which, the king of Scotland was to have Carliſle, and prince Henry, his ſon, the earldom of Huntingdon, for which he did homage to the king of England; and the reaſon of the ſon's being inveſted with it was, becauſe the father refuſed to accept it, on that condition, alledging that he had ſworn to own no other ſovereign in England, but Matilda, provided king Henry died without any male iſſue.

The king's illneſs, and its conſequences.

Stephen, directly upon his return from his northern expedition, was ſeized with a lethargy, which, it was generally believed, would carry him off in a few days; and the people were ſo full of this notion, that it occaſioned ſuch commotions, in England as well as Normandy, as were not eaſily appeaſed. The king's friends were diſcouraged, and Matilda's party gained ground, by the rumour that was ſpread of the king's death; whilſt, on the other hand, the Welch took this opportunity, for renewing the war. The earl of Anjou alſo entered Normandy, in order to ſeize on that part of the king his father-in-law's inheritance; but, for what reaſon I know not, this prince was, at preſent, ſo much deteſted by the Normans, that, on purpoſe to prevent his deſign, they called in Theobald, earl of Blois, Stephen's elder brother, who, falling in with their invitation, came to Liſieux, where the earl of Glouceſter delivered to him the keys of Falaiſe. This earl, remembering the laſt commands of the king, his father, in behalf of Matilda, had, with great reluctancy, ſwore allegiance to Stephen; yet, as he could not, alone, ſupport the empreſs's right, he thought it moſt adviſable, to diſſemble his ſentiments, till he met with a proper occaſion, to declare in her favour; but, the earl of Blois being introduced into Normandy, he imagined that, as he envied his brother's greatneſs, he would raiſe ſuch troubles there, as might turn to Matilda's advantage. 1137.

Stephen recovers Normandy from his brother, and expels him.

In the interim, Stephen, being perfectly recovered, found his affairs in the utmoſt confuſion; for the great men, who depended upon the king's dying, had already formed ſeveral factions, which, he apprehended, could not, without extreme difficulty, be compoſed; but, as Theobald, his brother, gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs, he reſolved to begin with him, before he ſhould enter into an alliance with the king of France, who, alone, was capable of ſupporting him. With this view, he went over into Normandy, taking with him large ſums of money, by which he prevailed on the principal Normans, to abandon the earl of Blois; but this revolution ought not to have ſurprized the earl, ſince they had only called him in, on the ſuppoſition that Stephen was either dead or dying, and to avoid ſubjection to the earl of Anjou.

He enters into a league with France,

It was very fortunate for Stephen, that the Normans had, thus, deſerted the earl of Blois; but, the more effectually to defeat all his hopes, he attempted, by valuable preſents, to gain over the king of France to his intereſt. This project anſwering his expectation, he put it out of the power of his enemies, to do him any prejudice; but, as Lewis could not, without ſome regret, ſee England and Normandy in the poſſeſſion of the ſame perſon, Stephen reſigned the latter to Euſtace, earl of Bulloign, his eldeſt ſon, who did homage to the king of France, for that dutchy. Theobald, finding that he was not in a condition to withſtand the two monarchs, judged it moſt convenient to retire; tho' he ſent word to the king, his brother, that, notwithſtanding his being obliged to give way, he did not quit his pretenſions both to England and Normandy. However, his actions did not, in the leaſt, ſuit this imperious meſſage; for, very ſoon after, he renounced his pretended title, for a yearly penſion of 2000 marks.

reſigns Normandy to his ſon, and accommodates matters with his brother, and the earl of Anjou.

The league between the two kings had the ſame effect on the earl of Anjou, whoſe claim was much ſtronger, on the account of his being husband to Matilda. It is certain, he made ſome attempts upon Normandy; tho, after he had endeavoured to gain it, by the force of arms, he accepted of a penſion of 5000 marks, as a favour.

1138. The king of Scotland makes a deſcent into England.

The affairs of Normandy being, thus, ſettled, Stephen was in hopes of enjoying ſome quiet in England, when he received intelligence, that the king of Scotland had invaded Northumberland; and it was even inſinuated, that he was invited by the Engliſh barons, to ſupport the pretenſions of the empreſs, which was, in reality, the ſtate of the caſe. Whilſt David was employed in ravaging the borders of the north, ſome Engliſh lords had ſeized on Bedford, deſigning, in all probability, to make a farther progreſs; but Stephen, upon this, directly embarqued for England, and, tho' it was in the midſt of winter, he went and laid ſiege to Bedford, which he continued, till, at 1138. at length, he became maſter of the place; and then he marched into Scotland, where David had retreated.

A general revolt of the Engliſh. Gervaſe, Chron. Dunelm. Malmſ.

But, in the mean time, he was obliged to return into England, by reaſon of an inſurrection of almoſt all the barons, and he was aſtoniſh'd at the news of it; tho', one would be apt to imagine, he ſhould not be ſo much ſurprized, becauſe the barons violated their oath to him, ſince this was no more than what he had done himſelf, with regard to Matilda. The male-contents alledged, that he had, in many reſpects, broke his promiſes to the people, as well as to the church; but this was only a pretence, to colour over their private reſentments; for the true cauſe of their diſguſt was, their not being rewarded, in proportion to their expectations. They had, from the very time of his acceſſion to the crown, inceſſantly teized him with their requeſts, tho' he had endeavoured by arguments, promiſes, and very frequently by actual grants, to ſatisfy the demands of the moſt importunate; but this was inſufficient, to ſecure their allegiance, which was entirely founded on the views they, all of them, had of enjoying the ſame honours, eſtates, and offices, which was a thing altogether impoſſible.

Robert, earl of Glouceſter, is the principal of the revolters.

Robert, earl of Glouceſter, was the author of this revolt, who artfully improved the preſent opportunity, to form a party, in the behalf of the empreſs, his ſiſter, that was ſtrong enough to place her on the throne; and, it is ſaid, he engaged in this undertaking, at the inſtigation of certain monks, who aſſured him, that he exceedingly endangered his ſalvation, in obeying an uſurper, in direct contradiction to the oath he had taken to Matilda. It appears from hence, that the monks were at the bottom of this conſpiracy, and that, in all likelihood, they had made the like remonſtrances to others, as well as to the earl of Glouceſter. Some hiſtorians farther add, that the earl acted, on this occaſion, in revenge of the king's having attempted to poiſon him; but, if Stephen had any ſuch deſign, it is highly probable, it was not till after the earl had revolted againſt him. However that be, no ſooner did Robert find, that he was ſeconded with a ſufficient force, than he waited on the empreſs, to inform her of his proceedings, in her favour; and he afterwards ſent an abuſive letter to Stephen himſelf, in which he reproached him, for the violation of his oath to Matilda, and accuſed him of having drawn him in, to be guilty of the ſame crime. To this letter he ſubjoined a manifeſto, wherein he treated Stephen, as an uſurper, and even declared war againſt him; but the king did not return him any anſwer, tho' he confiſcated all his great eſtates in England.

He takes poſſeſſion of Briſtol.

In the interim, Matilda's party becoming daily more numerous, by the acceſſion of the principal barons, the earl of Glouceſter, coming into England, took poſſeſſion of Briſtol; 1138. and other lords ſeized on ſeveral caſtles, which had been fortified by former kings, for the ſecurity of the crown, tho' they now put it in the greateſt danger. Stephen, being conſtrained to wage war with his ſubjects, retook and demoliſhed ſeveral of theſe caſtles; and, notwithſtanding this general defection, ſupporting himſelf with his army of foreigners, he continually gave proofs of an extraordinary courage, and an unalterable reſolution to loſe his life with his crown. He could never enough admire, that the very perſons, who were moſt zealous and active, in placing him on the throne, ſhould be among the firſt, to dethrone him *; and, as men are always apt to flatter themſelves, he could not imagine, that he had deſerved ſuch treatment, wholly aſcribing this revolt to the caprice and giddineſs of the barons, tho', it muſt be owned, that their complaints were not entirely groundleſs. The king had not only neglected punctually to obſerve his charter, but had remarkably diſtinguiſhed the foreigners, particularly, William of Ipre, from his own ſubjects, by his partial favours; and his ſeverity, on the firſt breaking out of the rebellion, in ſeizing upon the perſons and eſtates of ſome of the barons, on very ſlight ſuſpicions, ſerved only to inflame the fire, that was already too much kindled. In fine, the animoſities were arrived to ſuch a height, by mutual reproaches and acts of hoſtility, daily committed, that the male-contents ſent Matilda word, that they were ready to own her for their ſovereign, purſuant to the promiſe they had made to the king, her father.

Matilda is invited over.

The king of Scotland fomented theſe commotions, in favour of the empreſs, his niece, tho' he was likewiſe uncle to Stephen's queen †; and, as ſoon as he found that matters were brought to maturity, he again invaded Northumberland, making the moſt horrible devaſtations in that county, which uſually felt all the effects of the quarrels between England and Scotland. As Stephen could not, at this juncture, leave the heart of the kingdom, Thurſtan, archbiſhop of York, undertook to oppoſe the invaſion in the north; and, calling together the barons and gentlemen of thoſe parts, he told them, that, in this emergency, their only dependence muſt be upon themſelves, it not being in the king's power to aſſiſt them; which conſideration anſwering his purpoſe, they unanimouſly declared, that they would do all that was poſſible, to repulſe the Scots.

The war of the ſtandard.

In a little time after, each of them appeared with his troops, at the general rendezvous; and, ranging themſelves under the command of Walter de Speck and William of Albemarle, they advanced, as far as Alverton. Aibred, abbot of Rieval, has given us a particular account of the battle; but, as it is not, in my opinion, an affair of any conſequence, I ſhall only take notice of the reſult of it. The Scots, by far the moſt numerous, having attacked the Engliſh, in their intrenchments, were obliged to retreat, with the loſs of 12000 men; and tho' the king of Scotland and Henry, his ſon, gave the moſt ſurprizing proofs of their valour, they could not prevent their army, from being totally routed. It is reported, that the archbiſhop's harangue to the Engliſh, in which he promiſed heaven to all ſuch, as were ſlain in the engagement, did exceedingly contribute to the ſucceſs of that day.

The defeat of the Scots.

Stephen reduces the barons to obedience.

In the interim, Stephen diſplayed the terror of his arms, in the center of the kingdom; for the rebels, being forced to quit the field, allowed him time, to reduce their caſtles, one after another, without any reſiſtance. Theſe conqueſts and the victory over the king of Scotland, entirely confounded the earl of Glouceſter, as they baffled all his hopes and projects; but, when he perceived, that his party daily decreaſed, he thought it adviſable to go and ſollicit the empreſs to come into England, that ſhe might invigorate her friends, by her preſence.

The king, obtaining ſome reſpite, by the retreat of the earl of Glouceſter and other lords of his party, determined vigorouſly to carry on the Scotch war, which had ſuch an auſpicious beginning; and, accordingly, he marched towards the north, and, having taken, in his way, the caſtle of Leeds, he proceeded to Scotland, where David had retired, after his defeat. He deſigned to give him battle; but, as that prince ſtudiouſly avoided an engagement in his own country, to prevent it, he immediately ſued for peace. At another time, perhaps, Stephen would not have ſo eaſily complied with his propoſals; but, as the advantages he might have expected, from that war, bore no proportion to the evils his abſence might occaſion in England, he judged it to be expedient to accept them, at the preſent juncture. Purſuant to this treaty, prince Henry of Scotland was put in poſſeſſion of the county of Northumberland and earldom of Huntingdon; and David, in return, obliged himſelf, by an oath, never to concern himſelf, for the future, in the quarrel between Stephen and the empreſs, Matilda.

Upon this, the king returned into England, attended by the prince of Scotland, who, by his noble and generous carriage, ſo captivated Stephen's affections, that he loved him as much, as if he had been his own ſon; but his fondneſs for the young prince excited the jealouſy of the earl of Cheſter and ſome other lords, who, pretending that the king had placed him above them, at his table, retired from court. However, if Henry's extraction did not require that diſtinction, his merit juſtly claimed a particular reſpect; ſince all the hiſtorians are agreed, in giving him the character of an accompliſh'd prince; Stephen, notwithanding the envy of the Engliſh, continued to ſhew him marks of his affection, particularly, in a caſe, which demonſtrated his ſincerity. This young prince, who accompanied him to the ſiege of Ludlow, having approached too near the walls, was in great danger of being dragg'd from off his horſe, by an iron hook fixed at the end of a rope, if Stephen had not ventured his own life, to ſave him, in this extremity; which was an action, that redounded as much to the king's honour, as that of the prince, whom he preſerved. 1138.

The ſame year Alberic, the pope's legate in England, called a ſynod, in which Theobald abbot of Bec, was elected archbiſhop of Canterbury, to the great ſatisfaction of the Engliſh, after that ſee had been vacant, for two years.

Stephen's treaty with the king of Scotland, and his ſucceſſes over his domeſtick enemies, ſeemed to give him a fair proſpect of a laſting tranquillity; and, indeed, in all probability, it would have been uninterrupted, if, by imprudently falling out with the clergy, he had not hurled himſelf down, from the ſummit of his grandeur and glory, to the moſt deplorable condition, to which a ſovereign could poſſibly be reduced. The biſhops had been very inſtrumental, in placing him on the throne, and, from that time, their power increaſed to ſuch a degree, that it was no leſs dangerous for the king, to diſoblige them, now, than it had been advantageous for him, to have their friendſhip, at his election; yet ſuch was his jealouſy of their exorbitant power, that it deprived him of the exerciſe of his uſual prudence, and precipitantly hurried him, at once, to lower their greatneſs. Roger, biſhop of Salisbury, had two caſtles, as ſtrong as they were magnificent, one at the Devizes and the other at Sherburn, and he was building a third at Malmsbury. Alexander, his nephew, biſhop of Lincoln, having built one at Newark, openly declared, that he deſign'd it as much for the ſecurity, as for the dignity of his church; and Nigel, biſhop of Ely, who was alſo Roger's nephew, affected ſuch a magnificence, in his retinue as well as houſe, that attracted the envy of ſome, and the indignation of all. When theſe three prelates came to court, they had ſuch a number of armed attendants, that, one would have imagined, they rather intended to affront the king, than to pay him their reſpects; and, this pompous manner of living having raiſed them very many enemies, ſome of them inſinuated to the king, that he could not be ſafe on his throne, whilſt the biſhops continued to be ſo potent; and his ſuſpicions were ſtrengthened, by the rumour, that was ſpread, of Matilda's being prepared to come into England, where ſhe had a powerful party. Tho' the biſhop of Salisbury was principally concerned in Stephen's election; yet, fancying that he was in Matilda's intereſt, now, he formed a reſolution, to humble the pride of that prelate and his nephews; and he very ſpeedily found an opportunity. In a general

1139. general aſſembly at Oxford, the ſervants of the biſhop of Salisbury having pick'd a quarrel with thoſe of Alan of Bretaigne, earl of Richmond, it happened, that a knight, belonging to the earl, was killed, in the ſcuffle, and a great number of perſons were wounded, on both ſides; but the biſhop's attendants had the advantage being aſſiſted, by thoſe of the biſhops of Ely and Lincoln, as well as of the chancellor, who paſs'd for Roger's nephew, tho' he was, in reality, his ſon. The king, willing to catch at this occaſion, to mortify the whole family, ſummon'd them, all four, to appear at his court, and anſwer for the riot of his domeſticks; but, tho' this ſummons was according to law, the ſatisfaction, that he demanded, was illegal; for, not being contented with the mulcts enjoined, in the like caſes, he inſiſted on the ſurrender of all their caſtles, as ſo many pledges for their future allegiance. Theſe demands ſeeming to be unreaſonable, the prelates deſir'd time, to conſider on this affair; but whilſt the king waited for their anſwer, the biſhop of Ely, abſenting himſelf, retired to Roger his uncle's caſtle at the Devizes; and, his ſudden departure having prevented the adjuſting of matters, Stephen directly went and beſieged the caſtle, where was alſo Matilda, the wife or concubine of the biſhop of Salisbury. This being a place of great ſtrength, the king, to put an end to the ſiege, without loſs of time, order'd the biſhop of Sarum and the chancellor, to be conducted cloſe to the wall, and ſent word to Matilda, that, unleſs ſhe inſtantly ſurrender'd the caſtle, the chancellor ſhould be hang'd, on the ſpot, and the biſhop ſhould be ſtarved to death; but, theſe menaces proving effectual, ſhe deliver'd up the caſtle, in which he found 40,000 marks, in ready ſpecie. The biſhop of Lincoln obtained his liberty, by reſigning to the king his caſtle of Sleaford; and, ſoon after, Stephen was poſſeſs'd of the caſtles of Salisbury, Malmſbury, and Sherbourn. With the money he diſcover'd in theſe fortreſſes, where the biſhops ſecured their treaſures, he purchaſed the friendſhip of the king of France, and enter'd into an alliance with him; and this league was cemented, by the marriage of Euſtace, Stephen's ſon, to Conſtantia, ſiſter to Lewis the Young, who was the ſucceſſor of Lewis the Fat, his father.

Upon a quarrel at Oxford, the king ſummons them to appear at his court.

The diſcontents of the clergy.

The biſhop of Wincheſter is an advocate for the clergy, and cites the king to appear before the ſynod.

The king's ſevere treatment of the biſhops extremely incenſed the whole body of the clergy; for the archbiſhop of Roan, then in England, was the only one, that was not diſguſted, on that account. This prelate was perſuaded, that Stephen might deprive the biſhops of their fortified caſtles, which had no relation to their privileges, as church-men, without ſtriking at the immunities of the church; but the biſhop of Wincheſter, being lately made the pope's legate for England, was of a quite different opinion. He had, for ſome time, harboured a private reſentment againſt the king, his brother, for excluding him from any ſhare in the adminiſtration of affairs, eſpecially, ſince he had been ſo zealous and active, in placing him on the throne; but, finding there was no proſpect of his being concerned in the government, for the future, he joyfully embraced the preſent opportunity of creating him trouble, under the pretence of maintaining the rights of the church. With this view, he held a ſynod at Wincheſter, and ſummoned the king to make his appearance there, in order to give an account of his actions. At the opening of this aſſembly, he highly aggravated Stephen's proceedings againſt the three biſhops; and he exhorted the prelates to a vigorous defence of the rights of the epiſcopal dignity, and the privileges of the church. Upon which, he made a ſolemn proteſtation, that he would execute the decrees of the council, tho' it ſhould occaſion the loſs of the king's friendſhip, his own eſtate, and even of life itſelf. Stephen had ſent ſome lords to the council, with Alberic de Vere, a famous civilian; and, as ſoon as the legate had concluded his ſpeech, theſe lords demanded the reaſons, why the king was ſummon'd to appear before that aſſembly. The legate replied, it was to ſhew cauſe, why he impriſon'd the biſhops, and diſpoſſeſs'd them of their eſtates; a crime, that, he ſaid, was, hitherto, unheard of in the chriſtian world; but, Alberic ſmartly anſwer'd, that the prelates were not puniſhed, as biſhops, but as the king's ſubjects and ſervants. The biſhop of Salisbury, diſliking this diſtinction, told him, in ſo many words, that the biſhops could not, in any ſenſe, be conſider'd as the king's ſervants; and, the majority of the ſynod falling in with his ſentiments, the archbiſhop of Roan, who believed, that the epiſcopal dignity laid no foundation for an independent power, attempted to ſet, in a true light, the point in diſpute. He enquir'd of them, whether they could evidently prove, from the canons, that biſhops, as ſuch, had a right to fortified caſtles. "But, as he farther adds, tho' you could "make it appear, that you may be poſſeſſed "of fortreſſes, without the violation of the "canons of the church; yet what pretence can "you have, to refuſe the ſurrender of them "to the king, at a time when the kingdom is "threatened with an invaſion? Is it not the "king's province to provide for the ſafety of "the ſtate? and can ſubjects refuſe to admit "him into their caſtles, without incurring the "guilt of rebellion." However, theſe conſiderations did not prevail on the biſhops to deſiſt; for the legate propoſed to excommunicate the king, and ſend deputies to Rome, to repreſent their grievances to the pope; but, now, the lords, ſent by the king, thought it high time, to expreſs themſelves in plainer and more intelligible language. They freely declared, that, if the ſynod ſhould preſume to excommunicate the king, the biſhops would ſoon have reaſon to repent of their proceedings; and that, if any of them ſhould undertake to go to Rome, on that account, they would find their return to be a matter extremely difficult, if not impracticable. This declaration made ſuch an impreſſion on their minds, that they were unwilling, for the ſake of the legate, to incur the king's reſentment;

The legate propoſes to excommunicate the king.

1139. and accordingly, the ſynod, having reſolved on a deputation to the king, broke up, after they had ſate but three days. Purſuant to this reſolution, the legate and the archbiſhop of Canterbury waited on Stephen, and urgently importuned him, to prevent a rupture between the eccleſiaſtical and civil powers; which was, in plain Engliſh, to require him to make the clergy ample ſatisfaction, or otherwiſe a rupture was altogether unavoidable. It is not to be conceived, on what grounds, the clergy, at this time, laid claim to an independent power, unleſs it was, becauſe they were arrived to ſuch a height of power and grandeur, that they imagined, the king could do nothing, without them. During the monarchy of the Saxons, the biſhops eſteemed it to be an honour, to be ranked with the thanes, i. e. the king's ſervants; and, after the Norman conqueſt, William I. impriſon'd them, upon very ſlight ſuſpicions. He baniſhed ſome, and degraded others, at his pleaſure, without the leaſt oppoſition; and yet, in Stephen's reign, it was an unheard of crime, to deprive the biſhops of their fortreſſes, and even an unpardonable preſumption, to call them the king's ſervants; and, indeed, for ſome time paſt, the clergy had eſtabliſhed it, as a maxim, that the eſſence of religion conſiſted in ſtanding up for all the privileges and immunities of the church, which had been claimed by herſelf.

The people fall in with the clergy. Malmſ. Vital.

However that be, the people were as much alarmed, on this occaſion, as if the king had invaded their own rights and liberties; for the whole kingdom ſwarmed, in an inſtant, with male-contents, who only wanted a leader, to command them; and, in fine, the clergy's faction became ſo numerous, that moſt of the temporal lords came over to their party. The empreſs, reſolving to embrace the preſent opportunity, went into England, tho' ſhe had not above 140 men to attend her; but her chief dependence was on a powerful aſſiſtance from the revolters there; and ſhe took up her firſt quarters, in the caſtle of Arundel, which belonged to the queen dowager, being a part of her dowry. The earl of Glouceſter, who accompanied his ſiſter, thinking her to be out of all danger, in a place where ſhe was received, with all the reſpect due to her quality, left her and went to Briſtol; whilſt Stephen, who was beſieging Marlborough, being told of Matilda's arrival, directly raiſing the ſiege, marched towards Arundel. Upon the king's approach, the queen dowager repented of the reception ſhe gave the empreſs, fearing it might be the means of depriving her of her caſtle, with all the privileges ſhe enjoyed in England; tho', on the other hand, honour and honeſty would not permit her, to betray her gueſt into the hands of her enemy. To avoid both theſe extremes, ſhe ſent word to the king, that, if he perſiſted in demanding her to deliver up Matilda, ſhe was no leſs reſolved to protect her, till ſome of her friends came to her aſſiſtance; but, at the ſame time, ſhe aſſured him, that ſhe had not entertain'd her, as his enemy, but as his mother-in-law, the widow of a great emperor, whom ſhe was obliged to treat, in a manner becoming her rank and dignity; that it was not her intent to countenance any deſigns, ſhe might have againſt him, but only to preſerve her from any ill accident, whilſt ſhe was under her roof; in fine, ſhe propoſed to the king, that Matilda might be allowed to retire to ſome other place, where he might as eaſily beſiege her, as in Arundel caſtle; and that, by this generous action, he would lay an obligation on a queen, the widow of a great monarch, his uncle and benefactor, without the leaſt prejudice to himſelf. Whether Stephen was apprehenſive, that it was not in his power to take the caſtle, before it might be relieved, or whether it was in complaiſance to the queen, he promiſed that Matilda ſhould be ſafely conducted to Briſtol, which was, accordingly, performed; tho' he found too much reaſon, afterwards, to repent of his generoſity. Matilda, having continued, ſome time, at Briſtol, removed to Glouceſter; and, during her ſtay in theſe two cities, ſhe ſo artfully improved the diſcontents of the clergy and nobility, that ſhe brought them both over to her party, and, by their influence, almoſt the whole body of the people; for none adhered to the king, except a few barons and his foreign army, which, tho' they were poorly paid, ſerved him with fidelity.

1140. I ſhall not enter into the particulars of this civil war, which, like all others of the kind, affords more inſtances of deceit and cruelty, than of glorious actions; and, therefore, I ſhall only take notice of the principal events. During its continuance, the whole kingdom was divided; ſince there was not a city, county, or even individual perſon, that did not eſpouſe the cauſe of the king or the empreſs; and the lords, neareſt in neighbourhood and blood, had ſuch furious party-quarrels, that they ſet fire to the houſes, and pillaged the vaſſals of one another, ſo that a horrible confuſion was ſpread over the face of the kingdom. In this fatal anarchy, the barons, acting as ſovereigns, cruelly oppreſs'd the people, and even preſumed to coin their own money; whilſt, on the contrary, the king and Matilda connived at theſe proceedings, leſt, by calling their friends to an account, they ſhould diſguſt them. Beſides, the foreign ſoldiers, of whom Stephen's army entirely conſiſted, as he was not in a condition to pay them punctually, were ſuffered to plunder the poor people, who, tho' innocent, were moſt expoſed to the calamities of a cruel war.

A civil war.

The biſhop of Winchеſter returns to his allegiance.

In the interim, the biſhop of Winchеſter, being, at length, convinced of his indiſcretion, tack'd about to the king's intereſt; for he foreſaw, that he would certainly be involved in the ſame ruin with his brother; and, therefore, in order to regain Stephen's confidence, by ſome remarkable ſervice, having drawn to Winchеſter a conſiderable number of lords, friends to Matilda, he detained them as priſoners, until they ſurrender'd their caſtles to the king.

Stephen's ſteadineſs and reſolution.

Stephen, in ſpite of all his difficulties, preſerved an invincible firmneſs of mind, which ſecured the loyalty of many, who, doubtleſs, would 1140. would have abandon'd him, had they perceived the leaſt want of courage and reſolution; for this is always the caſe, when princes, in his circumſtances, diſtruſt their fortune or abilities. The king, inſtead of being intimidated, by the violent ſhocks and diſappointments he received, daily renewed his attempts, to remove, by his valour and conduct, the evils he met with; and he even hoped to put an end, at once, to this revolt of his ſubjects, and all the fatal conſequences of it, by attacking Wallingford, which was inveſted by the empreſs and the earl of Glouceſter; but, not being able to take this place, ſo eaſily as he imagined, he turned the ſiege into a blockade; and yet he was no ſooner retired, than the earl of Glouceſter, quitting the caſtle, went and took poſſeſſion of Worceſter; and the counties of Cheſter and Nottingham were ravaged by the barons of his party.

Matilda retires to Lincoln, where the king beſieges her; but ſhe eſcapes. Malmſ. Hunt. Paris.

In the interim, Matilda, who was cloſely pent up in Wallingford, eſcaping from thence, retreated to Lincoln; but ſhe was ſoon purſued by the king, who deſigned to have ſurprized her, being very ſenſible, that Lincoln, where he had a great number of friends, could not be defended by the ſmall handful of troops, that attended Matilda. Stephen would infallibly have taken his rival, in this place, which held out but a few days, had ſhe not found the means to make off, whilſt the articles of capitulation were drawing up; but, upon this diſappointment, he withdrew from the town, and did not ſo much as leave a garriſon in it, to prevent the impairing of the ſtrength of his army. However, he had no ſooner departed, than he was informed, that the earl of Cheſter, the earl of Glouceſter's ſon-in-law, came thither, with his wife and brother, in order to keep their Chriſtmas; and, as he was extremely deſirous of having theſe three perſons in his power, he returned, with ſuch expedition, that they had but juſt time to retire into the caſtle, which was immediately inveſted. Notwithſtanding this, the earl, eſcaping, went to the earl of Glouceſter, to intreat him to come to the relief of the beſieged, who were not in a condition to hold out long; and that lord, willing to ſuccour his own daughter, muſter'd all his troops together, and advanced towards Lincoln ſo ſpeedily, that he was upon the point of ſurprizing the king. Having forded the river Trent, which Stephen judged to be altogether impracticable, he ſo ſuddenly overtook the royal army, that neither of the parties could avoid an engagement. The two armies being drawn up, the battle began, which, for a great while, was fought, on both ſides, with equal bravery; but, at laſt, the king's horſe, compoſed of Flemings and Bretaigns, giving way, they were ſo briskly preſſed, that they could never rally again; and the earl of Glouceſter, inſtead of purſuing the flying horſe, who were utterly incapable of doing him any farther damage, attack'd the king's infantry, who, as they wanted the aſſiſtance of the cavalry, were obliged alſo to retreat.

The battle of Lincoln.

Stephen's army is routed.

In the mean time, Stephen, who could not bear the thoughts of an inglorious flight, was left almoſt alone, and on foot, in the midſt of the enemy, aſſaulted by multitudes, tho' he defended himſelf, againſt all their attempts, with an amazing valour; and if the horſe had rallied, at this juncture, he might have concluded the fight, to his immortal honour; but, being deſtitute of any aid, he was conſtrained, at length, to ſubmit. However, he held out, to the laſt extremity, in ſpite of the moſt powerful oppoſition; for, his battle-ax being broke, by the violence of his blows, he drew his ſword, and fought, for a conſiderable time longer, foaming with rage, to find himſelf ſo baſely abandon'd by his army. At the long-run, having performed more valiant exploits, than could naturally be expected from a ſingle perſon, in his circumſtances, his ſword being broken in pieces, and little more than the hilt remaining in his hand, he was knock'd down on his knees, with a ſtone; upon which, William de Kains, a knight, ſeizing him by the helmet, preſented his ſword to his throat, threatening to diſpatch him, unleſs he ſurrendered; yet, even then, he would not ſuffer himſelf to be taken priſoner by any, except the earl of Glouceſter, who chanced to be near him; but, no ſooner was the king in the earl's power, than he conducted him to the empreſs, who order'd him to be ſecured in the caſtle of Briſtol, where he was ignominiouſly laid in irons.

The king himſelf is taken priſoner, and laid in irons.

1141. In the mean while, Matilda improved the advantages ſhe had obtained by her arms; for all the kingdom had deſerted the impriſon'd king, except London and the county of Kent, where he had ſtill ſome adherents, by the means of his queen, Euſtace, his ſon, and William d' Ipre, his ſpecial favourite; and the lords, that continued in their allegiance, retreated to London, where they not only procured admittance, but engaged the citizens to enter into a confederacy with them, in behalf of the king. Normandy, at once, copied after the example of England; for no ſooner did the earl of Anjou receive the news of Stephen's impriſonment, than he repaired thither, in order to prevail on the Normans to acknowledge Matilda for their ſovereign, which he found to be an eaſy task; and, at the ſame time, the king of Scotland, in direct violation of the late treaty, invaded the northern counties, under the pretence of aſſiſting the empreſs, tho', in reality, with a view to his own intereſt.

Matilda makes a great progreſs.

The earl of Anjou ſeizes on Normandy. Malmſ.

The victory of Lincoln ſeemed to bid very fair, for placing Matilda on the throne; but there was yet a great obſtacle in the way, viz. the gaining over the biſhop of Wincheſter to her party. As this prelate was inveſted with the legatine power, he had a vaſt influence over the body of the clergy, whoſe example had a great ſway over the nobility and commons; and, therefore, ſhe apprehended it to be of the laſt conſequence, to attach him to her cauſe. Accordingly, ſhe went to him at Wincheſter, in order to try the vertue of her ſollicitations; but tho', at firſt, he was proof againſt her propoſals, upon her aſſuring him, that he ſhould have the diſpoſal of all the eccleſiaſtical 1141. cleſiaſtical preferments, he deſerted the king, his brother, and promiſed to exert himſelf, in bringing over the clergy to eſpouſe her cauſe. He even ſwore allegiance to her, before-hand; tho' with this limitation, that his oath ſhould oblige him no longer, than ſhe punctually obſerved her own engagements. The next day, he gave her a very pompous reception, in the cathedral-church, where he ſolemnly excommunicated all the king's abettors, and abſolved all thoſe that ſhould relinquiſh his party, and make their ſubmiſſion to Matilda. Soon after this, the archbiſhop of Canterbury took an oath alſo to the empreſs; but he previouſly obtained Stephen's conſent, which he asked of him in priſon.

The legate calls a ſynod at Wincheſter, which elects Matilda.

Matilda, now, in all appearance, wanted nothing, except the ſtamp of publick authority, to accompliſh her deſign of being queen of England; but, tho' ſhe could depend upon the conſent of the temporal lords, ſhe was apprehenſive, that the clergy would be more ſcrupulous, by reaſon of their oath to the king. The legate, having undertaken to remove this difficulty, convened a council at Wincheſter, where all the biſhops and abbots were preſent, with the archdeacons, as repreſentatives of the inferior clergy; and, the day before he opened the ſynod, he had a private conference with the biſhops, abbots, and archdeacons, each of them a-part. It is not known, what was ſecretly tranſacted in theſe ſeparate interviews; but it evidently appeared, on the morrow, that the legate made the beſt uſe of them, in favour of Matilda. As ſoon as the council was aſſembled, he made a long harangue, in which he attempted to prove, that Stephen's male-adminiſtration, injuſtice, and tyranny were the ſole cauſes of all the troubles in the kingdom. Indeed, he owned, that he had paſſed his word, that his brother ſhould govern them, according to the rules of equity, when the neceſſity of their affairs had, in a manner, forced the Engliſh to place him upon the throne; but that time and experience had convinced him, that he was deceived in the good opinion he entertained of the king; and that he was extremely concerned to find, that he was obliged to revoke his engagements for him. He inſiſted very largely on his former oath to Matilda, alledging, that it was highly reaſonable to prefer the orders of the Almighty, before the intereſt of the neareſt relation. He then proceeded to acquaint them, that he had done all that was poſſible, to bring Stephen to a ſenſe of his iniquitous conduct, and even cited him to appear before a ſynod; but that all his kind and brotherly admonitions were entirely diſregarded; that this obſtinacy might clearly demonſtrate to the Engliſh, to what calamities they muſt, of courſe, have been expoſed, under the government of ſuch a prince, if Divine Providence had not given ſentence againſt him, by permitting him to be impriſon'd; and that, in fine, ſince the Almighty was pleaſed to inflict his vengeance on the king, whom they had choſen, they were obliged to make attonement for their fault, by reſtoring the crown to the empreſs, to whom, of right, it belonged. He adds, "I have, therefore, cal- 1141.
"led you together, by vertue of the apoſtolick

"the means of appeaſing the commotions of "the ſtate. This affair was maturely debated
"yeſterday, in the preſence of the majority of "the clergy, who, doubtleſs, are principally Malmſ.
"concerned, in the election of kings; and "we have unanimouſly reſolved to acknow"ledge Matilda, daughter to the incompar-
"able Henry I. to be the queen and ſove-
"reign of England."

The greateſt part of thoſe that were preſent, and not in the ſecret, were exceedingly aſtoniſhed at the legate's ſpeech, and much more, to find an election ſo privately managed by the clergy, in a new and extraordinary method; yet, as they all remained ſilent, ſome being brought over, and others not daring to ſpeak their ſentiments, their ſilence paſs'd for an approbation. The legate farther informed the council, that he had ſummoned the magiſtrates of London, who had promiſed to ſend their deputies; and, accordingly, they arrived, the next day; but, inſtead of conſenting to the decree of the council, they declared, that they had orders from the city, and the barons that retired there, to petition for the king's liberty. The legate replied, that it was diſhonourable for the Londoners to countenance the barons, who had ſo ignominiouſly abandon'd their king in battle, and uſed all their efforts, to embroil the affairs of the kingdom; but this anſwer, ſo foreign to the point, not being ſatisfactory to the deputies, they demanded one, that was more direct and poſitive, tho' to no purpoſe; for the legate did not think it expedient to re-examine a thing, which, he pretended, was already decided. Before the riſing of the ſynod, a chaplain to Stephen's queen, offer'd a letter to the council, which he delivered to the legate; but, becauſe the prelate, having peruſed the contents of it, would not communicate it to the aſſembly, the chaplain bluntly ſnatch'd it out of his hand, and read it aloud; yet this letter, in which the queen earneſtly intreated them to ſet the king at liberty, proving ineffectual, the council broke up, having, firſt, excommunicated all Stephen's adherents.

The deputies from London, to no purpoſe petition for the king's liberty, as does alſo the queen.

Upon this, Matilda had nothing to do, except to procure the conſent of the Londoners, in order to her coronation; and, with this view, ſhe was conſtrained to enter into a negotiation with the city, which continued, for a conſiderable time. In the mean while, Matilda advanced, as far as Reading, where the governor of Oxford preſented her with the keys of his caſtle, and humbly beſought her to honour that city with her preſence. She, at once, fell in with his requeſt; and, after the inhabitants of Oxford, and the country round about it, had ſworn allegiance to her, ſhe removed to St. Alban's, where ſhe waited for the final reſolution of the Londoners. The city was, then, in a ſtate of diſtraction; for, ſome were inclined to adhere to the king, tho' a priſoner, whilſt others, giving into the faſhion of the times, recognized Matilda. Theſe laſt, at length, London declares for Matilda.

1141. length, becoming the moſt numerous, the empreſs came to London, where ſhe was magnificently received, in the midſt of the vaſt number of barons that attended her. The city of London having, thus, declared for Matilda, all the other parts of the kingdom followed their example; and, from this time, they began to make preparations, for the ceremony of her coronation.

Matilda's haughty and ungenerous treatment of the queen.

In the interim, Stephen's queen made application to the empreſs, in the behalf of the king, her husband. She repreſented to her, that, as ſhe deſpaired of ever ſeeing him on the throne again, ſhe deſired nothing more than his liberty. She promiſed, in the name of that unfortunate prince, that he would renounce the crown, and, to prevent all ſuſpicions, abandon the kingdom, and paſs the remainder of his days in a monaſtery. He even offer'd himſelf to take an oath, that he would never return, and to deliver up hoſtages, for the performance of his promiſes; but ſuch was the iniquity of thoſe times, that no ſtreſs could be laid either on words or oaths; and, accordingly, Matilda rejected all theſe propoſals, in a very haughty manner, forbidding the unhappy queen ever to come into her preſence, for the future.

She falls out with the biſhop of Wincheſter.

The biſhop of Wincheſter alſo interceded for his brother; but he had as little reaſon, to be pleaſed with her generoſity, as the queen. He imagined, his late ſervice to the empreſs deſerved a grateful return; and, therefore, he petitioned ſome favour, for Euſtace, his nephew, tho' he was haughtily repulſed. This imperious uſage was ſufficient to inſpire him with revengeful thoughts; for, inſtead of being guided by his direction, he plainly perceived, that ſhe conſidered him, as her enemy. His turbulent temper, from that inſtant, prompted him to form a plot againſt Matilda, and he impatiently longed for an opportunity of convincing her, that it was in his power to depoſe, as well as to place her on the throne; but, perhaps, after all, he would have met with great difficulties, in the execution of his ſcheme, if the empreſs herſelf, by her intolerable pride, which led her to treat her ſubjects, as ſo many ſlaves, had not forwarded his deſigns. This was a fatal piece of policy; for it raiſed her a vaſt number of enemies, at a time, when it was moſt adviſable for her, to endeavour to gain an intereſt in the hearts of the Engliſh, by the moſt gentle and popular proceedings. Accordingly, ſhe render'd herſelf odious to the Londoners, by denying them the only favour they requeſted, and which the king, her father, had poſitively promiſed them, viz. the mitigation of the ſeverity of the Norman laws, and the revival of thoſe of king Edward. This impolitick princeſs fancied, that ſhe was ſo far above all contradiction, that ſhe copied after her predeceſſors, giving her ſubjects the moſt ſpecious promiſes, at leaſt, till ſhe was more firmly eſtabliſhed on her throne; and her lofty carriage ſoon obliged the Engliſh to alter their ſentiments. They, now, plainly ſaw into the danger they were in, of being miſerable, under her government, unleſs timely precautions were made uſe of, to prevent the impending evils; and the biſhop of Wincheſter was very active and induſtrious, in fomenting theſe diſcontents, and, by his ſecret emiſſaries at London, excited the citizens, to reſent the contempt they had met with from Matilda. His meaſures were ſo ſucceſsful, that he prevailed on them to engage in a conſpiracy, to ſeize the empreſs's perſon; but, whatever care was taken, to conceal their intentions, the empreſs, receiving timely notice of it, departed from the city, in ſuch a hurry and conſternation, that ſhe left her palace and goods expoſed to the fury of the people. Tho' the legate was diſappointed, in this particular; yet he imagined, his project was, now, in a fair way of being compleated, as he had perſuaded the Londoners to declare againſt Matilda. Being aſſured of their aſſiſtance, he privately conſulted with the queen, his ſiſter-in-law, about the moſt proper and effectual means, to accompliſh their deſigns; and, upon this, he ſent word to Euſtace, to be in a readineſs to march at the head of the Kentiſhmen, and promiſed, that he ſhould be reinforced, in a little time, with a more conſiderable army. Having, thus, concerted his meaſures, and privately brought over ſeveral lords, that were incenſed againſt the empreſs, he ordered the caſtle of Wincheſter, and ſome other fortreſſes, that were at his diſpoſal, to be well ſtored with arms and proviſions.

1141. who engage in a conſpiracy to ſeize her perſon;

Matilda, having intelligence of theſe tranſactions, appeared at the head of her troops, attended by the earl of Glouceſter and the king of Scotland, who came into England, in order to be preſent at the coronation; and, as ſoon as ſhe approached near Wincheſter, ſhe acquainted the biſhop, that ſhe had ſomething of importance to communicate to him, and, therefore, deſired, that he would wait upon her; but the biſhop, ſhrewdly ſuſpecting, that ſhe was no ſtranger to his proceedings, look'd upon this invitation to be only an artifice, to enſnare him. Accordingly, inſtead of going himſelf, he ſent her an ambiguous anſwer, and, at the ſame time, ſlipp'd out of the town, at a gate on the other ſide, in order to draw his friends together, who only wanted his orders, to put themſelves in motion; and, upon his coming, they inſtantly were in arms. The Kentiſhmen having joined the Londoners, Stephen's queen, Euſtace, his ſon, and William d' Ipre commanding them, they marched to Wincheſter, with all expedition, and were upon the point of ſurprizing the empreſs, who had ſcarce leiſure to enter into the caſtle; but, as the inhabitants of Wincheſter ſeemed to be ſomewhat too zealous, in eſpouſing her cauſe, the prelate, in revenge, ſet fire to the city, tho' it was the capital of his dioceſe, and 20 churches, with a nunnery, named after St. Grimbald, were conſumed to aſhes in the flames.

The beſieged, for the ſame reaſon, were equally ſollicitous, for their own ſafety; and, when they perceived it to be impoſſible to hold out much longer, they reſolved upon hewing themſelves a paſſage, with their ſwords, and, at all adventures, to ſecure the perſon of Matilda. With this view, they marched out in good order, the empreſs and the king of Scotland being in the front, and the earl of Glouceſter in the rear; but they had no ſooner ſallied out, than the king's troops were at their heels, who attempted, by reiterated attacks, to retard their march, whilſt the reſt of the army advanced, in order to ſurround them. In all theſe little skirmiſhes, the earl of Glouceſter briskly oppoſed the enemy, giving the moſt ſignal proofs of his conduct and bravery; but, tho' his efforts were extremely ſerviceable to Matilda, as they gave her time to make off, they proved to be fatal to himſelf. As he neglected his own ſafety, for the ſecurity of the empreſs, he ventured to march, the laſt, through a narrow defile, where, his troops being vigorouſly preſs'd by the enemy, he had the misfortune to be taken priſoner; and William d' Ipre, to whoſe cuſtody he was committed, ordered him to be directly conducted to Rocheſter in Kent, in which place Stephen had more adherents, than in any other part of the kingdom.

She ſallies out with her troops, but is cloſely purſued.

The earl of Glouceſter is taken priſoner.

In the interim, Matilda, eſcaped with a few followers to the caſtle of Lutgerſhall, and from thence to the Devizes, where ſhe repoſed herſelf a little, fancying ſhe had time enough to reach Glouceſter; but no ſooner did ſhe purſue her journey, than ſhe was given to underſtand, that the road was lined with the king's ſoldiers. If we may believe a writer, much addicted to the marvellous, ſhe eſcaped, notwithſtanding their vigilance, by being carried in a coffin to Glouceſter, without the leaſt ſuſpicion; but, however that be, it is certain, ſhe found the means to avoid the preſent danger.

Prompt.

The king is exchanged for the earl of Glouceſter.

In the mean while, the legate and the reſt of the king's friends exerted themſelves, to diſengage the earl of Glouceſter from his ſiſter's party; but he was proof againſt all their ſollicitations, as well as the conſideration of the condition, in which he was involved. He inviolably perſiſted in the allegiance he had ſworn to Matilda, and would not even uſe the leaſt diſſimulation, on this occaſion, tho' it might have obtained his liberty; until, at length, after ſix months impriſonment, the empreſs, who had a tender affection for him, and with reaſon, not being ſo well able to manage her affairs, without him, conſented, that the king ſhould be exchanged for him. Some ſteps were taken, to promote an accommodation between Stephen and Matilda; but, as the prize, they contended for, was incapable of a diviſion, it was morally impoſſible to effect it; ſo that, an exchange of priſoners being the only point that could be gained, both the parties were left at their liberty to purſue the war.

When the biſhop of Wincheſter firſt enter'd into the reſolution of deſerting the empreſs, he wrote to the pope, to intreat him to authorize his proceedings, in favour of the king, his brother; and, as he had received no account of the tranſactions in England, but from his legate, he ſent him a pleaſing anſwer, tho' it did not come into his hands, till after Stephen was enlarged. The pope, in his letter, blamed the biſhop, for not having, hitherto, attempted the reſtoration of his brother, and enjoined him, for the future, to do all that was poſſible to bring it about, exhorting him to make the beſt uſe of the eccleſiaſtical as well as civil power, to that purpoſe. The prelate, being ſeconded with this authority, called a council at Weſtminſter, and read the pope's letter before them; and the king, who was there in perſon, ſharply inveighed againſt ſome of his ſubjects, who not only waged war againſt him, but had, for a long time, ignominiouſly detained him in priſon. Upon this, the legate, in a rhetorical harangue, endeavoured to vindicate his late conduct and the frequent violation of his oaths; but it would have been a difficult undertaking, had he not been befriended by the preſent poſture of affairs. He concluded his ſpeech, with excommunicating all Matilda's adherents, as ſo many enemies to the publick tranquillity; but, tho' the people were far from being pleaſed to find themſelves, thus, expoſed to excommunications, ſo directly repugnant to each other, at the humour and caprice of the legate, not ſo much as one of them had the courage openly to declaim againſt it, being ſenſible that their remonſtrances would be altogether ineffectual. However, a lay-agent, employed by the empreſs, purſuant to her order, accuſed the legate, to his face, of being the very perſon that invited her into England, and even told him, that it was, by his advice, that the king, his brother, met with ſuch ſevere uſage, during his impriſonment; but the prelate made no reply to theſe reproaches, being reſolved to compleat his revenge, by the entire ruin of Matilda's affairs.

A ſynod is called at Weſtminſter.

Upon Stephen's enlargement, the intereſt of that princeſs ſo viſibly declined, that the earl of Glouceſter was apprehenſive, it would utterly ſink, unleſs ſupported by foreign ſuccours; and, therefore, he went over to Normandy, to ſollicit the earl of Anjou, to maintain the right of the empreſs, his wife, which was, in effect, that of his ſon alſo; but the earl's own affairs were in too great confuſion, to put it in his power to ſend any conſiderable ſupplies into England. The Angevin nobility were diſpleaſed with him, and the Normans were not ſufficiently ſettled in their obedience, for him to venture to leave his country unprovided with troops; and, on theſe accounts, he only ſent a few forces to Matilda, together with Henry, his eldeſt ſon, to try, whether his preſence would be of any ſervice, to retrieve her affairs.

1142. The earl of Glouceſter applies to the earl of Anjou, for aſſiſtance.

During the earl of Glouceſter's abſence, the empreſs retired to Oxford, where ſhe expected to remain, in ſafety, till the arrival of the ſuccours from Normandy; but, the king taking this to be a favourable opportunity, reſolved to beſiege that city, in hopes of ſecuring the perſon of his rival, before the return of the earl.

1142. earl. The ſiege was carried on, on both ſides, with all poſſible vigour and diligence, and the approach of winter led the empreſs to hope, that the king would be conſtrained to retire; but, he being reſolutely determined to continue his attacks, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, ſhe was, at laſt, reduced to the neceſſity of a capitulation. As ſhe dreaded, above all things, the ſame fate ſhe inflicted on her enemy, whilſt ſhe amuſed the king, by demanding ſuch terms, as he would never conſent to grant, taking the advantage of a dark night, ſhe went out of the city, being clothed in white, to deceive the centinels, becauſe the ground was covered with ſnow; and ſhe paſſed over the Thames on the ice, walking about ſix miles on foot, tho' the ſnow beat in her face, all the way. However, in ſpite of all theſe difficulties, ſhe came to Abingdon, where ſhe took horſe and rode, the ſame night, to Wallingford. The king was amazed, when he found, that he was, thus, diſappointed; for he did not much value the taking of Oxford, ſince it did not put Matilda in his power. In the interim, prince Henry and the earl of Glouceſter, who were juſt arrived, being told of the empreſs's fortunate eſcape, went to her at Wallingford, where the ſight of her ſon, for a time, blotted out the remembrance of her misfortunes. The Hiſtory of William of Malmſbury concludes at this period, who was one of the moſt accurate and judicious writers of thoſe times, and whom, for that reaſon, I have principally followed, for my guide.

She makes a very narrow eſcape.

1143. In the beginning of the year 1143, the legate convened a council at London, at which the king was preſent. He made a long ſpeech, the deſign of which was, to perſuade the biſhops, that it was neceſſary for them to be more active and induſtrious, than they had, hitherto, been, in order to bring ſo deſtructive a war to a ſpeedy concluſion. He declared, that, for his part, he was ſtill ready to hazard his life, in the ſervice of the ſtate; but he farther aſſured them, that he could not flatter himſelf with any hopes of ſucceſs, without the aſſiſtance of his ſubjects; and, therefore, he required, that all, that were able to carry arms, would attend him, in his military expeditions, and that the reſt would ſupply him with money. This was, in particular, addreſs'd to the clergy, who, being entirely directed by the biſhop of Winchester, promiſed to grant him a ſubſidy, tho' upon the condition, that the church ſhould be more carefully protected, for the future; and, the king having ſolemnly promiſed, that the canons ſhould be ſtrictly obſerved, the council paſs'd two, relating to the times. The firſt enjoined, that he, that kill'd an eccleſiaſtick, ſhould not be abſolved by any, except the pope; and the ſecond ordained, that whoſoever inſulted an husbandman, actually employed in his vocation, ſhould ſuffer the ſame puniſhment, as they that committed the like outrages in a church or church-yard.

A ſynod is held at London, which grants the king a ſubſidy.

The other occurrences of this year are too trifling to be related; for we meet with nothing, except a dry and tedious account of the particulars of the civil war, which deſolated the kingdom. That I may not, therefore, fatigue my readers, with the recital of trivial events, I ſhall only obſerve, that, in this and the three ſucceeding years, Stephen's party viſibly gained the advantage; to which the death of the earl of Glouceſter, and of Milo, the earl of Hereford *, Matilda's chief couſnellor and moſt faithful friend, did not a little contribute. The empreſs, upon the loſs of theſe two lords, finding that ſhe was not in a condition to hold out much longer, retreated to Normandy, whither ſhe had before ſent the prince, her ſon, purſuant to the earl of Anjou's importunate deſire, who plainly perceived, that he, to no purpoſe, expoſed himſelf to continual danger, in his attempts againſt Stephen, who ſeemed to be too firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne.

Upon the departure of the empreſs, the king, being in peaceable poſſeſſion of his crown, began to project the means, to ſecure the ſucceſſion to Euſtace, his eldeſt ſon; and, with this view, he prevailed on ſome of the barons to ſwear allegiance to him, whereas his own experience might have taught him, how little ſtreſs is to be laid, even on ſuch ſolemn engagements.

1147. Stephen regains the poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom. Hunt. Gervaſ. Hoved.

About the latter end of the year 1147, he went to keep his Chriſtmas at Lincoln; where he could not be diſſuaded from putting on his crown, tho' it was foretold by a certain prophecy, that the kings, who appeared in that city, with their crowns on their heads, would infallibly meet with very great misfortunes.

Whilſt Stephen was reaping the fruits of the tranquillity, that was the conſequence of Matilda's retreat, the zeal of the chriſtians againſt the Saracens being revived, a new Croiſade was undertaken; in which Lewis the Young, diſtinguiſhed himſelf, by the vaſt numbers of troops he led in perſon to the Holy Land. He was accompanied, in this expedition, by Eleanor of Guyenne his queen, heireſs of the houſe of Poictiers, with whom he had, in dowry, the earldom of Guyenne with all its appurtenances, as well as all Poictou; but, during this journey, which laſted near two years, Lewis had ſuch a falling out with his queen, upon ſome ſuſpicion †, that he determined to divorce her, as ſoon as he returned home.

He, therefore, reſolved upon a journey to the king of Scotland, his great-uncle, in order to concert meaſures with him, how to compleat his deſign. David, being informed of his coming, met the prince in Northumberland; and, having conferred with him about his affairs, he knighted him, this ceremony being thought neceſſary, in thoſe days, for all that took upon them the profeſſion of arms. In the interim, Stephen, who was apprized of this interview, fearing that they had ſome views upon York, marched thither, with all expedition, in order to reinforce the garriſon; but, upon his approach, David returned to Scotland, and Henry to Normandy. He was ſcarce arrived at Roan, when Geoffrey, his father, departed this life, leaving him the earldom of Anjou, till his mother's death ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of Normandy, after which he was to reſign Anjou to Geoffrey, his younger brother.

1151. Lewis divorces his queen.

Lewis, upon his return to France, devorced his queen, tho' he generouſly reſtored to her Guyenne, Poictou, Saintonge, and, in general, all the dominions ſhe brought him in marriage, and alſo provided for the two daughters he had by her; but no ſooner was this divorce made publick, than Henry, who, with the conſent of his mother, had aſſumed the title of duke of Normandy, attempted to ſecure this wealthy heireſs for himſelf. This affair was ſo ſecretly tranſacted, that the firſt account, Lewis received of it, was, that the duke was gone to the queen at Bordeaux, where their nuptials were celebrated with extraordinary magnificence; and this news did not a little mortify the French king, who could not bear to ſee another enriched with his ſpoils, tho' he himſelf had freely relinquiſhed them. Moreover, he conſider'd, how formidable Henry would become to France, if he ſhould, one day, aſcend the throne of England, to which he had ſo fair pretenſions; and Stephen, on the other hand, was no leſs uneaſy at this match, as it was the means of increaſing his rival's power. The two monarchs, being, thus, alarmed, ſoon after, enter'd into an alliance, with a view of humbling the duke of Normandy. Lewis encouraged Geoffrey, his brother, to raiſe him troubles in Anjou, who imagined he had a right to that earldom, by vertue of his father's will; and, at the ſame time, he again inveſted Euſtace, Stephen's ſon, with Normandy, that Henry, being attack'd from two quarters, might allow the king of England time, to eſtabliſh himſelf on the throne; and, Stephen, likewiſe, did all that was poſſible, to deſtroy the duke's party in England, in order to cut off all his hopes of ever ſucceeding to the crown. With this view, he propoſed to have his ſon Euſtace crowned, before-hand; but, to his great ſurprize, the archbiſhop of Canterbury peremptorily refuſed to comply with his requeſt, aſſigning a reaſon for it, that was ſtill more offenſive than the refuſal itſelf; for he aſſured him, that the pope had expreſly prohibited him to crown the ſon of a prince, who, in contradiction to his oath, had uſurped the kingdom. If, in reality, the pope had given any ſuch orders to that prelate, his ſentiments were far from being the ſame with thoſe of his predeceſſor, Innocent II. but it is moſt probable, that this prelate, as well as the reſt of the biſhops, only made uſe of this, as a pretence, for the engagements they had already entered into with the duke of Normandy. However that be, the king, being exaſperated at the obſtinate denial of the biſhops, ordered all of them to be confined in one houſe, till they ſhould conſent to his propoſal; but this proceeding, as it was very extraordinary, was alſo ſucceſsleſs and ineffectual; for the archbiſhop, the houſe not being ſufficiently guarded, eſcaped and went over into Normandy, which entirely defeated Stephen's deſign.

Henry marries her.

Lewis and Stephen are jealous of Henry.

They enter into an alliance.

Stephen attempts to get his ſon crowned, but is diſappointed.

Stephen was extremely incenſed at the preſumption of the clergy, who claimed a power of making and depoſing kings, at their pleaſure; yet, as he did not doubt, but the duke of Normandy had attached the biſhops to his intereſt, not daring to attack them directly, he judged it moſt adviſable for him, to reduce them to allegiance, by ſeizing on ſome caſtles that were ſtill poſſeſs'd by the duke's friends, which would deprive them of their protection. At the ſame time, he ſent his ſon, Euſtace, into Normandy, to join the king of France, and invade that dutchy, expecting, by this means, to prevent Henry's coming into England, to aſſiſt his party in that kingdom; but he was deceived in his expectation. The duke, by his ſurprizing valour and conduct, forced out of Anjou Geoffrey, his brother, tho' he had already taken poſſeſſion of ſeveral fortified places; and then, returning to Normandy, he had the art to accommodate matters ſo far, with the king of France, by making him ſome ſatisfaction, that he enter'd into a treaty with him. Upon this, he eaſily expelled Euſtace out of Normandy, where, as yet, he had made no conſiderable progreſs; and that prince, being, thus, diſappointed in his deſign, came over into England, in order to aſſiſt his father, who was employed in laying ſiege to Wallingford, one of the ſtrongeſt places in the kingdom; and the king had been ſo long engaged in beſieging it, that the duke had leiſure enough to come to its relief, after he had ſettled his affairs in Normandy.

Henry comes into England, and is joined by ſome of the barons.

The young duke, being ſenſible of what importance it was, to ſuccour his friends in England, brought over with him thither ſuch a numerous army, that he animated his party, who, ſince Matilda's departure, ſeemed to be entirely diſpirited; and ſeveral barons, immediately joining him, ſurrender'd to him thirty fortified caſtles, upon which he reinforced their garriſons. After this, he poſted to the relief of Wallingford, which was very vigorouſly preſſed, 1152. preſſed, notwithſtanding the king's abſence, who was gone to London, in order to make freſh preparations. Henry, approaching with his forces, and perceiving it to be extremely difficult to attack the beſiegers, in their intrenchments, for the preſent, only ſecured the avenues, through which they were ſupplied with proviſions; but this precaution would have proved fatal to the enemy, if Stephen had not marched, with all expedition, to their aſſiſtance; for he advanced very near the duke, without any deſign of aſſaulting him, and reduced him to the ſame inconveniencies, to which, for a few days paſt, he brought the beſiegers.

Henry marches to Wallingford.

The two armies being juſt upon the point of engaging, the earl of Arundel prevails on the king to propoſe an accommodation.

It was next to impoſſible for the armies to ſeparate, without an engagement; and both the princes were preparing for battle, with equal ardours, when, by the prudent advice of the earl of Arundel, who was in the king's intereſt, they were prevented from coming to that extremity. He repreſented to Stephen the miſeries the kingdom would infallibly be expoſed to, by a battle, which muſt, of courſe, be very bloody, and would prove almoſt as fatal to the conquerors, as the conquered; and he farther told him, that it would be more chriſtian to accommodate matters by a treaty, which would reſtore tranquillity to a diſtracted and unhappy people. In fine, he, in ſo many words, aſſured him, that it was unreaſonable, that a whole nation ſhould ſuffer the greateſt calamities, on the account of two princes, who propoſed more the gratification of their own ambition, than the happineſs of the Engliſh. Whether theſe conſiderations had any influence over Stephen, or whether he apprehended that he ſhould be deſerted, if he obſtinately perſiſted in his reſolution of engaging the enemy, he conſented, that an accommodation ſhould be propoſed to the duke.

Henry, at length, conſents to it.

Prince Henry, who had put himſelf in readineſs for battle, was not eaſily prevailed on, to liſten to the king's propoſal; but, being very much importuned to it, by the Engliſh lords, he, at length, was brought to a compliance; and the two princes, in a conference they held, on the oppoſite banks of the Thames, which was pretty narrow, at that place, agreed upon a truce, in order to have time to ſettle the terms of the treaty.

A truce.

1153. Euſtace retires from the army.

This truce gave earl Euſtace the utmoſt uneaſineſs; for he apprehended, that it would introduce a peace, which muſt, of courſe, be prejudicial to his affairs; and, indeed, it was not to be imagined, that the duke, who was unconquered and at the head of a powerful army, would tamely give up his pretenſions to the crown. However, to prevent his being obliged to ſign the treaty, or, perhaps, to lay ſome obſtacles in its way, Euſtace abruptly left the army, and retired to Suffolk; where, ſoon after, as he was going to ſit down at a table, in the abbey of St. Edmundsbury, he was ſeized with a frenzy, which carried him off in three days, in the 18th year of his age. He was interred in the abbey of Feverſham, with the queen, his mother, who died a few months before him; and Conſtantia, his widow, daughter to Lewis the Fat, was, afterwards married to Raymond, earl of Tholouſe. 1153.

Stephen exceedingly lamented the loſs of his queen and ſon, which, in his opinion, portended ſome farther misfortunes; and, indeed, the nobility openly abandon'd him, and eſpouſed Henry's cauſe. As moſt of the lords had been guilty of diſloyalty, dreading the king's reſentment, they thought it neceſſary, for their own ſecurity, to put themſelves under the protection of the duke; and the caſe of the earl of Cheſter, the more effectually, confirmed their ſuſpicions. This earl, tho' he waited on Stephen with an offer of his ſervice, had been taken into cuſtody, and could not obtain his liberty, on any other condition, except the ſurrender of the caſtle of Lincoln to the king. However, it was not without a cauſe, that the king was on his guard, with reſpect to the earl, who ſecretly aſſiſted the duke of Normandy; ſince it appears from a charter, in the Collection of the publick Acts, that Henry promiſed to put him in poſſeſſion of certain lands. It is, therefore, probable, that Stephen had received ſome intelligence of theſe proceedings; but, whether he had omitted the publication of his reaſons, for confining the earl, or whether he could not fully convict him of his treachery, this action was interpreted by the reſt of the barons, as a preſage of their own fate, if they remained in Stephen's power; and, upon this account, ſeveral of them choſe rather openly to declare for Henry, having firſt entered into articles with him, than to lie at the king's mercy, by ſtaying at court.

The barons eſpouſe the duke's cauſe.

David, king of Scotland, dying this year, left only ſome grandchildren, by Henry, his ſon, who died before him. Malcolm and William, the two eldeſt, ſucceeded each other to the crown; and David, their brother, was earl of Huntingdon.

The death of David, king of Scotland.

The truce between Stephen and Henry was frequently renewed, becauſe of ſome difficulties that occurred, in the negotiation of the peace; but the chief obſtruction to it was, Stephen's deſire to ſettle the ſucceſſion on his ſon, William, to which Henry would, by no means, give his conſent. He was willing, that Stephen ſhould continue on the throne, during his life; tho' he inſiſted upon being his ſucceſſor, after his death; and he even imagined, that he very much receded from his right, in obliging himſelf not, in the leaſt, to interrupt his rival, who was not yet 50 years of age. However, Stephen, at laſt, conſidering the poſture of his affairs, and the almoſt inſuperable difficulties, that lay in his way, reſolved to purchaſe peace and tranquillity, at the expence of his deſign; for he knew, that the duke was poſſeſſed of ſeveral noble qualities, and had a title to the crown, which was powerfully ſupported; and the inclinations of his ſubjects gave him farther occaſion to apprehend, that they would not wait for his death, to place the prince on the throne. Theſe conſiderations induced Stephen to conſent to a treaty, even on Henry's terms; and it was no ſooner ſigned, than he performed

The king adopts Henry.

This agreement was concluded and ſigned at Wincheſter, in an aſſembly of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, that was convened, on that account; and, upon this, the two princes made their publick appearance together in the principal cities, and were received with extraordinary demonſtrations of joy; for the people were inexpreſſibly tranſported, at the reſtoration of peace and tranquillity, after ſo many years of trouble and confuſion. An hiſtorian tells us, that, in the very height of theſe rejoicings, Henry diſcovered a conſpiracy, that was formed againſt him, by William, the king's ſon; which would have been put in execution, if Henry had not accidentally fallen from his horſe and broke his thigh. This he takes to be the cauſe of the duke's ſudden departure, who, without diſcovering any ſigns of ſuſpicion, took his leave of the king and returned to Normandy; where he continued, till Stephen's death paved the way for his ſucceſſion to the throne. Another writer aſſerts, that Henry was Stephen's ſon, by the empreſs, with whom he carried on a criminal familiarity, before her ſecond marriage; but this aſſertion ſeems to be, to the laſt degree, improbable, ſince the author himſelf owns, it had no other foundation than common report.

He even ſet about the moſt proper means, to this excellent purpoſe; but his ſudden death prevented the the accompliſhment of his generous deſign. He departed this life, in the 50th year of his age, 11 months after the agreement with Henry; and he was buried, near his queen and Euſtace, his ſon, in the abbey of Feverſham, which was founded by himſelf.

Stephen's death.

If this prince's character be conſidered, in a general view, it may be affirmed, that he was worthy to live in happier times; and that his virtues exceeded his vices. However, it would not be an eaſy matter, to juſtify all the means he made uſe of, to procure the crown, particularly, the violation of his oath; for, tho' the conſent of the barons may appear to have ſome weight, in the caſe, ſeveral think, that, as it was gained by faction and cabal, he is, nevertheleſs, to be look'd upon, as an uſurper. His breaking his promiſes, on certain occaſions, tends, alſo, to ſully his reputation; but, perhaps, the circumſtances of the times and his own affairs hurried him on to run greater lengths, than his natural diſpoſition would, otherwiſe, have permitted; but, however, we cannot deny him the praiſes due to his valour, clemency, and generoſity. The firſt was very conſpicuous, in the battle of Lincoln, where he was taken priſoner; and that he was poſſeſs'd of the two other virtues will evidently appear, if we reflect, that, during his whole reign, there is not a ſingle inſtance of his ſeverity, tho' ſeveral of the barons, whom the fortune of war had put in his power, gave him too many provocations, to treat them in a rigorous manner. Indeed, ſome hiſtorians have done all that was poſſible, to ſtain his memory; but it muſt be conſidered, that moſt of them wrote, in the reign of Henry II. or his ſons. As for William of Malmsbury, who was contemporary with Stephen, it is notorious, that he was a creature of the earl of Glouceſter's, to whom he dedicated the laſt part of his Hiſtory; and this conſideration alone ſhould lead us to read, with caution, what relates to Stephen's diſadvantage. After all, it is extremely difficult to determine, whether the crown, of right, belonged to Matilda, or whether Stephen's election juſtly entitled him to the poſſeſſion of it; ſince, after the conqueſt, the Saxon laws were no longer obſerved, and we do not find, that the Normans had, hitherto, eſtabliſhed any ſtated rules, about the ſucceſſion. 1153.

The troubles of this reign gave the clergy a fair opportunity of raiſing the mitre above the crown; and the court of Rome, at this juncture, introduced new laws into England, which would, doubtleſs, have met with oppoſition from the Engliſh, at any other time. The canon law, compiled by Gratian, in 1151, by the authority of Eugenius III. was brought in, on the account of the conteſt between the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the biſhop of Wincheſter, about the legateſhip; upon which occaſion, the Italian canoniſts came into England, and, ſettling there, introduced, by degrees, the ſtudy of the canon law into the univerſity of Oxford, where Vacarius was the firſt profeſſor.

The canon law is received in England.

Stephen left behind him only one legitimate ſon, named William, who was earl of Bulloign, in right of the queen, his mother; and he had likewiſe one daughter, called Maria, who, tho' ſhe had put on the veil, was afterwards married to Philip of Alſace; but, upon the death of her husband, ſhe returned to the nunnery.

Stephen's iſſue.

Stephen had alſo a natural ſon, whoſe name was William, as well as the legitimate one; from whence ſome, being deceived by the ſimilitude of their names, conclude, that this prince left behind him only a baſtard ſon.

* This treaty is recited and confirmed by Stephen's charter, or declaration under his ſeal, directed to all the faithful people of England, in Brompton's Chronicle, p. 1037, 1038.

The

The ſtate of the church, from the reign of William the Conqueror, to the death of king Stephen.

The different character of the Saxon and Norman kings, with reſpect to the church.

THE Norman conqueſt introduced a new face of things into England, both in church and ſtate; and the pope and clergy, eſpecially, were conſiderable ſufferers, by this grand revolution. Inſtead of the devout and ſubmiſſive Saxon princes, who embraced all opportunities of augmenting the privileges and revenues of the church, they were, now, concerned with a race of Norman kings, of a quite oppoſite temper and diſpoſition; for ſo eagerly did they graſp at arbitrary power, that they challenged an equal authority over the clergy, as well as laity, placing them both on a level, as to the point of obedience. Notwithſtanding all the ſchemes of the court of Rome, to render the clergy independent of the regal power, in the reigns of the two William's, they wanted a proper occaſion, to put their deſigns in execution; becauſe the Normans, from a view to their intereſt, were inviolably attached to their ſovereigns, and the Engliſh were reduced too low, to be in a condition to promote the cauſe of the court of Rome; and had this always continued to be the caſe of England, the moſt vigorous attempts of the popes, to enlarge their authority, would have proved abortive. This, in all probability, was the reaſon, that obliged Gregory VII. in ſpite of his haughtineſs, to give way to William the Conqueror, who not only refuſed to do him the homage he demanded, but openly made a jeſt of the papal decrees. This monarch governed the clergy, as well as the reſt of his ſubjects, with an abſolute ſway; and, if he permitted the pope's legate to preſide at a council, it was only with a view of more eaſily removing certain biſhops, that gave him ſome uneaſineſs; for, when he perceived, that the very ſame ſynod ſcrupled to fall in with all his meaſures, he baniſhed or impriſoned thoſe prelates he did not like, at his pleaſure, without waiting for a canonical ſentence. On the other hand, whilſt the pope thunder'd out anathema's againſt the emperor, and forced him to ſubmit to a diſhonourable homage, William, without any interruption, enjoyed, in his dominions, the right of inveſtitures, the very ſubject of the quarrel between the emperor and the court of Rome. He rendered the church-lands liable to the ſame incumbrances with the lay-fees, and ſeized on the gold and ſilver laid up in the monaſteries, not ſparing even the conſecrated veſſels; nothing was tranſacted in the church, without his direction, nor were the ſynodical conſtitutions any longer in force, than during his will; and he exalted himſelf, in ſome meaſure, even above the popes, by prohibiting his ſubjects, without his leave, to receive their orders, or own their authority.

William Rufus was equally regardleſs of the church's immunities; for all the pope's menaces could not prevent him from keeping the vacant ſees and abbies in his own hands, and afterwards diſpoſing of them to the higheſt bidder. I do not propoſe, in the leaſt, to vindicate the conduct of theſe two monarchs, in this particular; it being my deſign only to to prove, from it, that the court of Rome entirely owes the progreſs and increaſe of its power to its own prudence and policy. The popes wiſely ſubmitted to princes of a reſolute and ſteady diſpoſition, tho' they induſtriouſly improved all advantages againſt ſuch, who were in no condition to oppoſe their proceedings. Accordingly, notwithſtanding her ſubmiſſion to the two William's, ſhe made uſe of all her efforts, for a long time, againſt Henry I. but, as ſoon as ſhe found that her endeavours were ineffectual, ſhe ſate down contented, with terms that ſhe would have diſdained, in the beginning of the conteſt; for ſhe conſented that the biſhops and abbots ſhould do homage to that prince, tho' ſhe obſtinately denied the ſame privilege to the emperor, whoſe affairs were not in ſo good a ſituation. As for Stephen, ſhe had the art to foment the commotions, in his reign, by the means of the biſhop of Wincheſter; for, being ever vigilant, ſhe, on this occaſion, appointed a legate, different from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, which ſhe durſt not have preſumed, at any other time. This incroachment ſeemed, at firſt, to be of no conſequence at all; yet, in proceſs of time, it had a mighty influence over the affairs of England. It was by the management of theſe legates, that ſhe, at length, obtained ſuch a degree of power, that ſhe not only trampled upon the necks of the kings, but the clergy too; ſince it is evident, that her view was, to humble the archbiſhops and biſhops, as well as the ſovereign princes.

The prudence and policy of the court of Rome, to enlarge her authority.

She deſigns to humble the clergy, as well as the kings.

The truth of this obſervation appears, from the imperious uſage archbiſhop Lanfranc, of Canterbury, met with from the court of Rome; for, tho' he was a prelate of diſtinguiſhed merit, and equally eſteemed by the king, the Engliſh, and the Normans, he could never procure a diſpenſation, for not waiting on the pope in perſon, to receive the pall from his hands. Hildebrand, then archdeacon of Rome, and afterwards promoted to the papal chair, under the name of Gregory VII. wrote him a letter, in which he attempted to ſoften this proceeding. He aſſured him, that, if there had been any precedent for it, he would not have had a refuſal of this favour; but either he was not well acquainted with the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England, or he imagined, that Lanfranc was ignorant of the pall's being ſent to Auſtin, Juſtus, and Honorius, who were, all three, archbiſhops of Canterbury; which ſhews, that this denial did not proceed proceed from a ſcruple to introduce a new cuſtom, but from a jealouſy, that the archbiſhops would, at length, forget their dependence on the pope. The ſequel of this hiſtory will inform us, that the Roman pontiffs often abuſed their exorbitant power over the clergy of England; but, in order to give a general view of the moſt remarkable eccleſiaſtical tranſactions, during the reigns of the Norman kings, it will be neceſſary to take notice of the riſe of the diſpute, between the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York; for this conteſt, which continued ſo long, is a very material article of the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England.

The riſe of the diſpute between the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York. Malmſ. Sax. Ann.

Whilſt Lanfranc was making preparations for his journey to Rome, Thomas, canon of Bayeux, one of William the Conqueror's chaplains, was nominated to the ſee of York, who, ſoon after, came to Canterbury, to receive his conſecration from that archbiſhop, according to cuſtom; but Lanfranc, inſiſting on his obliging himſelf, in writing, to perform canonical obedience to that ſee, he choſe rather to to depart, without being conſecrated, than to comply with theſe terms. This conteſt making a great noiſe, the king was deſirous of knowing the ſtate of the caſe, being apprehenſive, that Lanfranc had exceeded the bounds of his prerogatives; but after ſeveral Engliſh lords had convinced him, that he had cuſtom, on his ſide of the queſtion, William, without deciding the controverſy, fixed upon a proper expedient, to give ſatisfaction to the contending parties, viz. that Thomas ſhould go to Canterbury, and profeſs his obedience, in writing, to Lanfranc, as his ſenior, and that the arbitration of the rights of the two ſees ſhould be referred to the pope; and, this propoſal being agreed to, the prelates ſet out together for Rome, in order to receive the pall, and to put an end to this diſpute, as well as another about the juriſdiction over the ſees of Lincoln, Litchfield, and Worceſter; but no ſooner did Alexander II. who was then pope, ſee Lanfranc, than he roſe up from his chair to embrace him, declaring, at the ſame time, that he did not treat him, thus, on the account of his ſtation, but out of reſpect to his merit. Thomas was received, in a very different manner; for the pope annulled his election, pretending that, being the ſon of a prieſt, he was incapable of holding any eccleſiaſtical preferment. However, he was reſtored, a few days after, upon Lanfranc's mediation; but, as for the conteſt between the two archbiſhops, as he did not thoroughly underſtand the caſe, he referr'd it to the deciſion of the Engliſh biſhops and abbots.

The two archbiſhops, returning into England, as they were equally willing to have their cauſe finally decided, upon their arrival, waited on the king at Wincheſter, where moſt of the lords ſpiritual and temporal were aſſembled, on the occaſion of the Paſchal Solemnity; and the caſe was argued before him, with great warmth, by both parties. Lanfranc founded his pretenſions, on the following reaſons. 1. That the ſee of Canterbury was to be look'd upon the ſame, as if it had been fixed in the metropolis of the kingdom, ſince Gregory I. made a decree, to this purpoſe; 2. that the church of Canterbury, in regard to its antiquity, was the mother of all the reſt; 3. that the privilege, he claimed, was granted to his ſee, which he made appear, from the conſtitutions of ſeveral popes; 4. that the archbiſhops of Canterbury had actually exerciſed juriſdiction, within the province of York, ſeeing Theodore had even deprived ſeveral biſhops in Northumberland; and, laſtly, that the archbiſhops of York had profeſs'd the ſame canonical obedience, that Thomas refuſed, which he proved, from the inſtance of Ealdulph, who did not ſcruple to ſubmit to Adelard, in this very particular.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury's reaſons.

The archbiſhop of York, in his reply, acknowledged, that it was the deſign of Gregory I. to place the archiepiſcopal ſee at London, tho' without any view of giving that ſee any ſuperiority over York. To confirm his aſſertion, he cited the authority of Bede, who expreſly affirms, that Gregory decreed, that, upon Auſtin's death, the two archbiſhopricks ſhould be put upon a level, as to their privileges and independency; from whence he inferred, that, tho' the archiepiſcopal ſee had been fixed at London, it would not be of the leaſt ſervice to Lanfranc's cauſe. 2. He denied, that the church of Canterbury was the mother of that of York, ſince it was notorious, that the church of York was founded by the Scotch monks, who had no relation to the church of Canterbury; and, 3. as for Theodore's juriſdiction over Northumberland, he ſaid, that he only took the opportunity of the diſtractions in the church, at that time, to extend his authority over the kingdom; and that, as it was manifeſtly uſurped, it could not be advanced, as a precedent, in the caſe under conſideration. Lanfranc would have found it extremely difficult, to anſwer Thomas's argument, drawn from Gregory's regulations, about the independency of the two archbiſhops, if he could not have advanced the conſtitutions of ſeveral popes, in his favour. Beſides, he ſupported his claim by cuſtom, which gained him the teſtimony of the Engliſh, on his ſide of the queſtion; for, in their opinion, pope Gregory's ſucceſſors had a right to annul his decree; and, therefore, the king and the lords thought it reaſonable, that the archbiſhop of York ſhould make a profeſſion of canonical obedience to the ſee of Canterbury. The other controverſy, about the three biſhopricks, was alſo decided, in the behalf of Lanfranc, and Thomas acquieſced in both theſe ſentences; but, to prevent any conteſts, for the future, a writing was drawn up, in the name of the two archbiſhops, in which all matters between them were adjuſted. According to this agreement, Thomas was obliged to own, that he had unjuſtly diſputed Lanfranc's juriſdiction over the whole church of England; and he declared, that, as archbiſhop of York, he owed canonical obedience, not only to Lanfranc, as his ſenior, but to all the archbiſhops of Canterbury; and he likewiſe dropp'd his pretenſions to the three biſhopricks in queſtion. Lanfranc, on his part, gave gave up to the archbiſhop of York the juriſdiction over all the ſees, on the north ſide of the Humber, to the fartheſt parts of Scotland. It was alſo agreed on, that, in whatſoever part of the kingdom, the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould call a national ſynod, the archbiſhop of York and his ſuffragans ſhould be obliged to make their appearance; that, upon the deceaſe of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the archbiſhop of York ſhould repair to that city, and, with the aſſiſtance of the ſuffragans of that ſee, conſecrate the primate elect; and that the perſon, nominated to the ſee of York, ſhould come and receive his conſecration, within the province of Canterbury. In a word, Lanfranc omitted nothing, that might eſtabliſh the ſuperiority of his ſee over that of York; but, as for the oath, which Lanfranc required of Thomas, it is affirmed, in the agreement, that, at the king's requeſt, he freely diſpenſed with it; tho' he ſtill expreſly reſerved a right to demand it of thoſe, who, hereafter, ſhould be promoted to the ſee of York.

Articles of agreement between the two archbiſhops.

Thus, the famous conteſt, between the two metropolitan ſees, was determined, or, at leaſt, ſeemed to be decided; but yet, in proceſs of time, it was often revived; for, as this regulation was not made by a ſynod, being no more than articles of agreement between the two archbiſhops, authorized by the king, the archbiſhops of York took occaſion to renew the diſpute. They pretended, that as no ſynod had given ſentence againſt them, their right remained entire; and, in Anſelm's time, another Thomas, nominated to the ſee of York, refuſed to take the oath, tho', at length, he was conſtrained to a compliance.

Thurſtan revives the diſpute.

Notwithſtanding this, Thurſtan, who was elected archbiſhop of York, in the reign of Henry I. would not make this profeſſion of canonical obedience to the archbiſhop of Canterbury; tho' the king repreſented to him, that he muſt either comply, or renounce his archbiſhoprick; for, how diſagreeable ſoever it was to that prelate, he choſe the latter. However, he prevailed on the chapter of York, to ſend delegates to Paſchal II. to complain of the injury that was done to their ſee; and, in their remonſtrance, they declared, that the king had abuſed his power, in obliging Thurſtan to quit his election, merely, becauſe he would not ſubject his ſee to an obedience, that was never canonically enjoined. Upon this, the pope, in a letter, exhorted him to reſtore Thurſtan; and he ſaid, as to any controverſies between the archbiſhops, about privileges, he himſelf would impartially decide them. Paſchal dying, and Gelaſius II. ſucceeding him, the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſent his agents to Rome, to ſound the new pope's ſentiments, as to the point in diſpute; and, upon their return, they reported, that he deſigned to ſend a legate into England, to put an end to the conteſt; but he was prevented by death, as he was on the road to France.

Calixtus II. ſucceſſor to Gelaſius, being arrived at Rheims, in order to call a council there, Thurſtan obtained the king's leave to go thither; but upon the condition, that he ſhould not receive conſecration from the pope, or any other biſhop. However, the king, not placing an entire confidence in this prelate's promiſe, ſent a letter to the pope, in which he proteſted, that, if Thurſtan was conſecrated by any, except the archbiſhop of Canterbury, he ſhould never be permitted to return into England; but Calixtus himſelf, nevertheleſs, conſecrated Thurſtan, in the preſence of the council. The archdeacon of Canterbury would have oppoſed this proceeding, if the pope had not aſſured him, that he did not intend, in the leaſt, to injure the ſee of Canterbury; but Henry, finding that it was not in his power to prevent Thurſtan's conſecration, baniſhed him the kingdom with all his family. This prelate did not long continue in exile; for the pope, being fully reſolved to defend what he had done, threatened the king with excommunication, and his kingdom with an interdict *. The pope's reſolute conduct brought Henry, at length, to conſent, that Thurſtan ſhould be inſtalled, without paying the cuſtomary ſubmiſſions to the ſee of Canterbury; yet, in honour to the king, this prelate promiſed, that he would never perform any of his archiepiſcopal functions, out of the dioceſe of York. Thus, this ſee, in ſome meaſure, regained the ground it had loſt, tho', in proceſs of time, the former conteſt was frequently revived; but it is altogether unneceſſary to purſue this matter any farther, what has been ſaid being ſufficient to give the reader a view of the ſtate of the controverſy, between the two primates, and the grounds of their proceedings.

The ſee of Canterbury, at length, extends its juriſdiction over Wales.

However, before I leave this ſubject, it will be convenient to take notice of ſome other affairs, relating to the juriſdiction of the ſees of Canterbury and York. I have already obſerved, in the preceding book, that Gucan, a Welch prieſt, nominated to the biſhoprick of Landaff in Wales, was conſecrated by Dunſtan, archbiſhop of Canterbury, tho' the biſhop of St. David's exerciſed archiepiſcopal authority in that country; and, till then, the ſee of Canterbury had not any juriſdiction over thoſe of Wales; but, Gucan's ſucceſſors copying after his example, the archbiſhop of Canterbury claimed the ſame power over all the Welch biſhops, tho' his pretenſions met with great oppoſition. At length, in the reign of Henry I. Bernard, the queen's chaplain, being nominated to the ſee of St. David's, was conſecrated by Ralph, archbiſhop of Canterbury; upon which, as the chief of the Welch biſhops owned his juriſdiction, he pretended, that the reſt ought, of courſe, to ſubmit to his authority; but, Bernard, ſoon after, repenting of the falſe ſtep he had taken, a long controverſy commenced, which was never decided, till Wales was united to England, in the reign of Edward I.

The conteſt about the juriſdiction of York over Scotland.

Whilſt Ralph ſate in the chair of Canterbury, he received a letter from Alexander I. king of Scotland, in which he informed him of the death of Turgot, biſhop of St. Andrew's, and deſired that he would recommend a worthy ſucceſſor. He, at the ſame time, intreated him to conſider, that the archbiſhops of Canterbury were antiently poſſeſs'd of the right to conſecrate the biſhops of St. Andrew's, Lanfranc being the firſt that gave up that privilege to the ſee of York; and, therefore, he declared, that he deſigned to reſtore things, to their antient ſtate, and deſired the aſſiſtance of his advice, on this occaſion. However, Ralph, being apprehenſive, that Alexander only wanted a pretence, to fall out with the archbiſhop of York, would not intermeddle in this affair; and, indeed, Alexander's ſuppoſition, that the Scotch biſhops had any dependence on the ſee of Canterbury, was entirely groundleſs; for it is, on the contrary, very evident, that, for a long time, the popes had put the church of Scotland under the juriſdiction of the ſee of York, the agreement between Lanfranc and Thomas being founded on theſe antient papal conſtitutions. In proceſs of time, ſome Scotch biſhops refuſed to ſubmit to the archbiſhop of York, as their primate, which occaſioned ſeveral violent conteſts; but, at laſt, pope Paſchal II's bull, whereby he made them ſuffragans to the ſee of York, put an end to the diſpute.

* By vertue of which interdict, all divine ſervice muſt ceaſe, and no part of the ſacerdotal office be exerciſed, except the baptiſm of infants, and the abſolution of dying penitents.

Tho' the controverſy between the two archbiſhops, about their juriſdiction, does not ſeem to be of any great importance; yet I judged it neceſſary to give ſome account of the grounds of it, becauſe of the frequent alluſions to their differences, in the Hiſtory of England. I ſhall now proceed to matters, that relate to the church in general, of which the celibacy of the clergy ſtands in the front; for ſo many efforts were uſed to eſtabliſh it in England, and ſuch impediments were laid in its way, that it makes a very material article of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

The celibacy of the clergy.

I have already ſhewn, that Dunſtan and the partizans of Rome, were extremely zealous and active, in order to introduce the celibacy of the clergy, tho' the Daniſh wars, at length, obliged them to ſuſpend their deſigns; for, from that time to the Norman conqueſt, the Engliſh prieſts continued in a ſtate of marriage, in ſpite of all the attempts of the popes to prevent it. It is not, at firſt view, eaſy to apprehend, why the popes were ſo obſtinately intent upon this project, ſince it does not obviouſly appear, that the intereſt of the court of Rome was concerned in it; but our admiration at their proceedings will ceaſe, when we reflect, that it exceedingly promoted the execution of the ſcheme, they had formed, of rendering the clergy independent of the civil power. Whilſt the prieſts had children of their own, it was very difficult to withdraw them from ſome dependence on their princes, whoſe favour had ſuch a vaſt influence on the fortune of private perſons; but, being without families, they were more at liberty to adhere to the pope, who aſpired to be the ſovereign of the clergy. However that be, the popes had no ſooner engaged in this undertaking, than they did all that was poſſible to effect it. Gregory VII. who was advanced to the papacy, in the reign of William the Conqueror, purſuing this point with more zeal and activity, than any of his predeceſſors, held a council at Rome, which prohibited the clergy to marry, under very ſevere penalties; but, tho' the Italians, French, Spaniards, and Germans, after long ſtruggles, at length, ſubmitted, the Engliſh, believing, that a council, chiefly compoſed of Italian biſhops, had no power to make laws for all Chriſtendom, were not ſo eaſily brought to a compliance. Indeed, Lanfranc, either in complaiſance to Gregory, or becauſe he was perſuaded of the juſtice of the thing itſelf, attempted to introduce into England the decrees of the council of Rome, by convening a national ſynod at Wincheſter, in which this affair was debated; but he was ſo ſtrenuouſly oppoſed, that he was upon the point of dropping his deſign; yet, when he found, that he could not prevail on the ſynod, to prohibit the clergy, in general, from marriage, he, under ſome pretence, obtained a decree, that all the prieſts, who had cures in cities, ſhould divorce their wives, tho' thoſe, that had benefices in the country, were not treated with the ſame rigour. Nevertheleſs, to prevent, for the future, married prieſts from holding any cures, the ſynod, by Lanfranc's direction and influence, ordained, that none ſhould be admitted into holy orders, without taking an oath never to marry; but, this prohibition proving a diſcouragement to many perſons of merit, the church of England, in a little time, was in ſuch want of able miniſters, that they were conſtrained to mitigate their ſeverity, in this particular; for pope Paſchal II. in a letter he ſent to Anſelm, Lanfranc's ſucceſſor, declares, that, being given to underſtand, that the moſt of the Engliſh clergy were the ſons of prieſts, he was apprehenſive, it would be very prejudicial to the church, if the canons were rigorouſly put in execution. He, therefore, granted to the archbiſhop a diſpenſing power, in this caſe, when the intereſt of the church, and the untractable diſpoſition of the Engliſh, ſhould render it convenient; yet Anſelm, inſtead of making a proper uſe of this diſcretional power, being of an inflexible temper, called a ſynod, at London, in which the marriage of the prieſts was condemned, tho' even this ſentence did not entirely redreſs this pretended abuſe; but, doubtleſs, he would have purſued this affair much farther, if his intereſt with king Henry, and his death, which happened in 1109, had not obſtructed the execution of his deſign.

Reaſons for the pope's enjoining it.

To compleat the work, which was already ſo much forwarded by Lanfranc and Anſelm, Honorius II. ſent cardinal de Creme into England, with the character of legate, who held a council at Weſtminſter, in which he ſharply inveighed againſt the married clergy; and, among other things, he declared, that it was an abominable crime to riſe from the ſide of an harlot, and then to handle the conſecrated body of Chriſt; tho', the very ſame night, he was found in bed with a common whore. Hunting.

Baronius,

Baronius, in vain, ſeveral ages after, attempted to deſtroy the credibility of this fact, by negative proofs, which are of no weight at all againſt the poſitive teſtimony of the hiſtorians that relate it; but, notwithſtanding the legate's incontinence, the ſynod paſs'd a canon againſt the marriages of the prieſts, tho' it could not entirely prevent this pretended evil.

Five years after, Corbet, archbiſhop of Canterbury, convened another council, in which, the more effectually to gain their ends, they referr'd the execution of their canons to the king, who very willingly undertook it, tho', purely, with a view of increaſing his own revenues, by ſelling to the prieſts a diſpenſation to keep their wives; and, accordingly, it appears, that great numbers of the inferior clergy married in England, after the prieſts of other countries had ſubmitted to the pope's decree.

The pope's legates.

Celibacy was not the only point, by which the court of Rome incenſed the Engliſh clergy; for, to reduce them to an entire ſubjection to the pope, legates were frequently ſent into England; an expedient, tho', at firſt, not regarded, that, at the long-run, was of fatal conſequence. During the reigns of the Saxon and Daniſh kings, there are very few inſtances of the popes ſending legates into England; for, tho' the popes, in thoſe days, aſpired after an abſolute power in the church, they did not make uſe of this means, which proved afterwards ſo ſucceſsful. Perhaps, they were afraid of alarming the metropolitans, whoſe obedience it was neceſſary to procure, by other methods; and, beſides, the archbiſhops of Canterbury, as primates of the kingdom, were then eſteemed to be the natural legates of the popes, who, for the moſt part, entruſted them with the execution of their orders; but, as they had generally two oppoſite extreams to manage, viz. the intereſts of the church of England and the pope, which frequently interfered, they, on many occaſions, gave the preference to the former. For this reaſon, the popes greedily catched at every opportunity of ſending other legates, that might wholly conſult their advantage. Thus, Offa, king of Mercia, being deſirous of erecting Litchfield into an archbiſhoprick, as it was improper to commiſſion the archbiſhop of Canterbury, on that occaſion, ſince they deſigned to deprive him of a part of his juriſdiction, they, with eaſe, obtained the king's conſent to receive Italian legates; but this, however, was the only inſtance, till the time of Edward the Confeſſor, i. e. for above 250 years. In Edward's reign, Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, being under the church's cenſures, the pope ſent two legates into England, with a commiſſion that Stigand was incapable of diſcharging; and William I. ſent himſelf for legates, in order to preſide at a council, in which he propoſed to have Stigand and ſome other prelates degraded; ſo that princes, to gratify their paſſions, have been, all along, inſtrumental in promoting the papal power, without any regard to the conſequences of it. Moreover, Gregory VII. ſent a legate into England, named Hubert, in the reign of the Conqueror; but, as it was on a political account, the Engliſh did not imagine, this legateſhip could be prejudicial to them, tho' the pope had quite different ſentiment, of this proceeding. At length, theſe few precedents were taken to be ſufficient, to found a right of ſending legates, at the pope's pleaſure; tho' it lay dormant, during the reigns of the two William's, the reſolute temper of theſe princes giving them no proſpect of ſucceſs, in their endeavours to put it in execution.

Henry I. was ſcarce ſeated on his throne, when the pope ſent Guido, archbiſhop of Vienna, to reſide at London, with a legatine power over all Great-Britain; but the clergy of England conſider'd this commiſſion, as an incroachment on their privileges, nor would the king and council ſuffer him to exerciſe any part of his function in the kingdom. Alford the jeſuite, in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England, being at loſs how to reconcile this refuſal with the papal authority, will have it, that the legate's commiſſion was rejected, becauſe his powers were not penn'd with a non obſtante to the privileges of the archbiſhop of Canterbury; but, as he does not advance any proofs to eſtabliſh his aſſertion, it ſeems to be no more than a precarious ſuppoſition; and cardinal Baronius more artfully evades this difficulty, by entirely paſſing over this legateſhip in ſilence.

In the ſame reign, Paſchal II. ſent Cono, as his legate, into France; and this prelate called ſeveral councils, pretending that the biſhops of Normandy were obliged to give their attendance; but, becauſe they would not obey his ſummons, he excommunicated them. Henry, being exaſperated at the legate's preſumption, diſpatched the biſhop of Exeter to complain of it to the pope; and, in all probability, he received ſome ſatisfaction, ſeeing the hiſtorian, who relates this particular, does not take the leaſt notice of the ſucceſs of the embaſſy. Eadmer.

In 1116, during Henry's abſence in Normandy, abbot Anſelm, nephew to the archbiſhop of the ſame name, waited on him, and produced a commiſſion from the pope, as his legate into England; but the king would not permit him to go thither, in that character. The Engliſh prelates, whom the king conſulted, on this occaſion, unanimouſly declared, that this legateſhip tended to ſubvert the privileges of the church of England; and they intreated the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was moſt concerned in this affair, to preſent their anſwer to the king, and, provided the king thought it convenient, proceed to Rome, to make a remonſtrance againſt theſe incroachments. The archbiſhop, accordingly, ſet out for Rome; but being told, whilſt he was on the road, that the pope having been vigorouſly preſs'd by the arms of the emperor, was retired to Beneventum, he purſued his journey no farther, contenting himſelf with ſending a letter, in which he acquainted him with his intentions. The preſent poſture of pope Paſchal's affairs affairs would not allow him to inſiſt on his pretended right, as he, doubtleſs, would have done, at another juncture; but, as he was unwilling to diſguſt the Engliſh, ſo neither could he bear the thoughts of giving up the privilege of ſending legates, on proper occaſions; and, in this perplexity, he choſe rather to return an ambiguous anſwer, which, without laying him under any obligations, might, at the ſame time, give them a ſeeming ſatisfaction. However, this indirect and evaſive anſwer was far from being ſatisfactory to the biſhops; and the king, taking the advantage of the pope's unſettled circumſtances, underſtood it in a ſenſe the moſt favourable to the church of England, and would not ſuffer the legate to execute his commiſſion; but, as he plainly perceived, that the terms of the pope's anſwer were too general, to prove that he dropp'd his pretenſions, he demanded one, that was more expreſs and poſitive. Some time after, having an interview with Calixtus II. at Giſors, he very urgently ſollicited the pope, on this topick; tho' his final anſwer, notwithſtanding all his ſollicitations, amounted to no more than this, viz. that he would not ſend any more legates into England, except in a caſe of neceſſity.

Some years after, Honorius II. ſent cardinal John de Creme, as his legate, into England; but he met with great oppoſition, and was not received in that character, till after he had been obliged to wait, a long time, in Normandy. This legate convened a council at London, on the occaſion of the marriages of the prieſts, as I have already obſerved; and, in his ſummons to the biſhops, he, in ſo many words, declares, that the council was called by the order and concurrence of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, which evidently appears from a citation ſtill extant, directed to the biſhop of Landaff. Tho' the legate might eaſily diſcern, that his coming was not very acceptable to the Engliſh; yet his haughty carriage, in the exerciſe of his function, exceedingly heightened their diſlike. He preſumed to officiate in the cathedral of Canterbury, inſtead of the archbiſhop, tho' he was only a presbyter; and, in the council of London, he ordered his ſeat to be raiſed, like a throne, above thoſe of the two archbiſhops and all the nobility, that were preſent at the ſynod. This imperious behaviour highly diſguſted the Engliſh, who had not been accuſtomed to the ſight of ſuch lofty legates; and they openly expreſs'd their regret, for their condeſcenſions to him, being ſenſible, of what dangerous conſequence precedents were, in affairs relating to the court of Rome. However, Alberic, biſhop of Oſtia, was, notwithſtanding this, received, as a legate in England, in Stephen's reign; but then, it muſt be conſidered, that this prince was not ſo firmly eſtabliſhed on his throne, as to be in a condition to diſpute the pope's pretenſions.

Gervaſe.

In the ſame reign, the pope conferred the dignity of legate on the biſhop of Wincheſter, the king's brother, to the prejudice of Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury; which occaſion'd a conteſt between the two prelates, that greatly turned to the advantage of the court of Rome. The contending parties frequently appealed to that court, a thing but very ſeldom practiſed in England before; and, at laſt, after many and long diſputes, pope Celeſtine II. deprived the biſhop of Wincheſter of the legateſhip, and gave it to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, not as his right, but as the free gift of the holy ſee. Hence it appears, that the popes embraced every opportunity of enlarging their authority; and the courſe of this Hiſtory will ſhew, that there was reaſon for my inſiſting, ſo copiouſly, on the article of legates; ſince it was chiefly, by this means, that the popes raiſed, in England, a thouſand diſturbances, in the ſucceeding reigns.

The court of Rome would, doubtleſs, have carried her uſurpations higher, if the ſchiſms, very frequent in thoſe times, had not obliged her to give way; for, to gain or ſecure the ſubmiſſion of the chriſtian princes, the popes were often conſtrained to paſs over many things, which they would have ſtrenuouſly maintained, at any other juncture; but, tho' they could not avoid making conceſſions, to their own diſadvantage, they generally ſubjoined ſome ambiguous clauſe, which was capable of being explained, in their own favour, at a more convenient ſeaſon. I have given an inſtance of this, in Calixtus II. when he promiſed to ſend no more legates into England, except in caſes of neceſſity; for the popes themſelves were, afterwards, the judges, when it was neceſſary. If all the kings had been inſpired with the ſpirit of the two William's, they would have taken theſe ambiguous clauſes, in their own ſenſe; but ſuch was the weakneſs and ſuperſtition of ſome, and ſo frequently were others involved in troubles, that were more reſolute and ſteady, that the popes always made the beſt uſe of theſe advantageous occaſions. I ſhall, now, proceed to ſhew, how the four firſt Norman kings behaved, with reſpect to the pope, during the ſchiſms which fell out in their reigns.

The ſchiſms.

England had owned Gregory VII. who ſucceeded to the papacy, in thereign of William the Conqueror; but yet the antipope Clement III. was no ſooner elected, than William determined to ſtand neuter, till the affair was decided; and, on the occaſion of this ſchiſm, he prohibited his ſubjects from acknowledging any pope, without his leave. This neutrality of the Engliſh is evident, from Lanfranc's anſwer to cardinal Hugo Candidus, who ſollicited him to eſpouſe the cauſe of Clement III. The letter in Baronius runs, thus:

Baron. Ann. 1092.

" I received your letter; but I cannot, by " any means, approve of ſome of the contents.
" Your invectives againſt Gregory, whom you " are pleaſed to ſtile Hildebrand, and the un-
" couth names you give his legates, is what I " do not underſtand; and, on the other hand,
" your extravagant encomiums on Clement I " take to be launching out too far. It is writ" ten, that we are not to pronounce any man
" happy, before his death; nor ought we to " detract from our neighbour. The merit of " men is inviſible; and, therefore, we cannot " affirm any thing, with certainty, as to their " future condition. However, I am confident,

" that

" that the emperor would not have engaged, " in ſuch an important undertaking, without " ſolid grounds; and that he could not have " met with ſo great ſucceſs, without the ſig- " nal bleſſing of the Almighty. As for your " intended voyage into England, I would diſ- " ſuade you from it, unleſs you can firſt pro- " cure the king's licence; for, as yet, we have " neither wholly diſclaimed Gregory, nor de- " clared for his competitor; but, when the " cauſe of both parties ſhall be fully examined, " we ſhall be better able to come to a final " reſolution."

Gregory VII. had, for his ſucceſſor, Victor III. who died in 1087, about a year before the death of William the Conqueror, and Urban II. was elected in his room; and, ſoon after, William Rufus aſcended the throne of England, whilſt the ſchiſm ſtill continued between Urban and Clement. It may ſafely be aſſerted, that, for ſome years, the Engliſh were without a pope; ſince they would not recognize either of the two competitors. When Anſelm, by his own private authority, would have acknowledged Urban II. William oppoſed it, till, by a ſtratagem, that I ſhall mention hereafter, Urban brought him over to his obedience. This point being gained, England remained under the juriſdiction of this pope and his ſucceſſors, Paſchal II. Gelaſius II. and Honorius II. but, upon Honorius's death, a new ſchiſm aroſe, between Innocent II. and Anacletus, who were both elected; and their reſpective adherents divided all Europe. Innocent had occaſion for all the eloquence and intereſt of St. Bernard, to obtain his being owned in France, where he met with great oppoſition. It was a long time before this kingdom, as well as England, declared for either of the rivals; ſo very difficult was it to form a judgment, which of them had the beſt pretenſions; for, tho' each of them advanced his reaſons, they rather tended to confute the arguments of the contrary party, than eſtabliſh his own title to the papal chair. It is natural to conclude, that, whilſt the ſentiments of the people were ſo divided, about the true pope, they had recourſe to neither, which was, in reality, the caſe; tho' this makes a gape or chaſm, in hiſtory, that bears extremely hard upon thoſe who aſſert, that the church cannot poſſibly ſubſiſt without a pope.

If the popes were loſers by theſe ſchiſms, their loſs was amply repaired by the Cruſades, which exceedingly contributed to the increaſe of the papal power. It is foreign to my preſent purpoſe, to enquire into the right the chriſtian princes of Europe had to Paleſtine, which the Saracens had taken from the emperors of Conſtantinople; it is ſufficient to obſerve, that the project of conquering from the Infidels the land, bedewed with the blood of Chriſt, ſeemed to be ſo noble and meritorious, that all the princes of Chriſtendom were ambitious of promoting it with their arms and treaſure, and ſome even with their perſons. The people, copying after their ſovereigns, blindly engaged in this undertaking, upon Peter the hermit's * repreſentation of the miſeries, to which the chriſtians in the Holy Land were expoſed, under the empire of the Saracens. Urban II. was the projector of this ſcheme, and preached up, in 1095, the firſt Cruſade at the council of Clermont; and ſuch a wonderful impreſſion did his exhortations make on the minds of his audience, that, ſoon after, a prodigious army ſet out for Paleſtine, with ſeveral chriſtian princes at their head, the ſucceſs of which expedition is notorious; for, upon the expulſion of the Saracens, a chriſtian kingdom was erected, tho' it did not continue above 90 years. The Infidels, at length, recovering the country, the popes inceſſantly ſollicited the chriſtians, to regain what the church had loſt, in that quarter of the world; and this was the occaſion of ſeveral freſh Cruſades, which proved extremely advantageous to the court of Rome. In the firſt place, as the popes were the heads of theſe expeditions, they protected all that were willing to engage in them; and, thus, they had an opportunity of intermeddling in all affairs, as there were few of any conſequence, in which ſome of the Croiſes were not concerned. Secondly, as theſe expeditions could not be carried on without an immenſe expence, the popes made uſe of them, as a pretence, to lay taxes on the clergy, called tenths, which were ſolely at their diſpoſal. In the next place, as ſoon as they became poſſeſs'd of the privilege of publiſhing a Cruſade, whenever they pleaſed, they greatly improved it to their own advantage; for they alledged, that the extirpation of hereticks no leſs conduced to the glory of God, than that of Infidels; and, as they aſſumed to themſelves the power of determining the nature of hereſy, they, at once, pronounced ſuch princes to be hereticks, excommunicated, and even publiſhed Cruſades againſt them, as made the leaſt oppoſition to their incroachments; of which we ſhall meet with ſeveral remarkable inſtances, in the ſequel of this Hiſtory. It is, therefore, no wonder, that the popes were ſo active and induſtrious, in the behalf of Cruſades, as they were ſo directly conducive to their own intereſt; but, bleſſed be God, the blind and frentick zeal of chriſtians, on this account, has been extinguiſhed, for ſeveral ages.

The councils, during the four Norman reigns.

As the papal authority gained ground, the power of the biſhops, archbiſhops, and national ſynods, in proportion, viſibly decreaſed; becauſe their decrees and canons might be render'd null and void, at the pope's pleaſure; and this is the reaſon, why there are ſo few conſiderable councils, from the Norman conqueſt to the reſtoration of the Saxon line.

The ſynod of Winchester. Spond.

The firſt was covened at Wincheſter, in 1070, in which Hermenfred, biſhop of Ciſteron, John and Peter, cardinal prieſts, preſided, as the pope's legates; but, as nothing of any moment was tranſacted in this ſynod, except the deprivation of Stigand and ſome other prelates,

* He was a French prieſt, that had travelled, as a pilgrim, to the Holy Land, where he was exceedingly affected with the miſeries of the chriſtians; and he pretended, that our Saviour, appearing to him in a dream, commanded him to engage the weſtern chriſtians to undertake their deliverance, and, at the ſame time, aſſured him of ſucceſs.

I ſhall only remark, that, in thoſe days, a biſhop was ſuperior to a cardinal; ſince, in the acts of this council, the biſhop of Ciſteron is always named before the cardinals, his collegues.

The council of London.

In 1075, Lanfranc held a ſynod at London, in which it was ordained, that, for the future, provincial and dioceſan ſynods ſhould be held more frequently, than they had been, ever ſince the conqueſt; and the precedency of the biſhops was regulated by the decrees of the VIth council of Toledo and ſome others, every prelate being obliged to take place, according to the priority of his ordination. It was likewiſe agreed, that, at councils, the archbiſhop of York ſhould be ſeated on the right, and the biſhop of London on the left hand of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhop of Wincheſter next to the archbiſhop of York; and ſome canons were alſo paſſed, the principal of which are, as follows.

The Vth prohibits all perſons, biſhops and abbots excepted, to ſpeak in the council, without the preſident's leave.

The VIth forbids marriage to the ſeventh degree, on the authority of Gregory the Great; but I have already ſhewn, from the teſtimony of Bede, that this pope, in his anſwers to Auſtin's queſtions, limits the prohibition to the ſecond degree.

The VIIth is againſt ſimony; and this canon had, for ſome time, paſs'd in all the councils. In all probability, this irregularity was become very common; or, perhaps, it was with a view to prepare the clergy, to fall in with the prohibition againſt receiving the inveſtiture of benefices from the hands of laymen, to which ſimony, ſerved as a ſpecious pretence.

The VIIIth is levelled againſt ſorcery, divination, and the like ſuperſtitious practices.

By the XIth all eccleſiaſticks are prohibited to give their votes, to ſentence a perſon to death, or even the loſs of limbs.

In 1076, the ſame prelate called a ſynod, on the account of the prieſts marriages.

That of Rockingham.

In 1094, a ſynod was held at Rockingham, by reaſon of the conteſt between William II. and Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

A national ſynod at London.

In 1102, in the Reign of Henry I. Anſelm convened a national ſynod, to which the temporal lords were invited, in order to be witneſſes to the proceedings; and the moſt remarkable canons were.

The Iſt againſt ſimony.

The IVth, which forbids archdeacons, prieſts, deacons, and canons to marry, or to live with their wives; and this was the firſt general prohibition againſt the Engliſh prieſts keeping their wives, which was extremely diſagreeable to a great number of perſons.

According to the VIth, the ſons of prieſts were debarred from ſucceeding to their father's churches.

The IXth obliges the prieſts to have open crowns, that the tonſure might be the more viſible.

The XIIIth deprives the abbots of the privilege of making knights, which they had, hitherto, enjoyed.

The XIVth declares all promiſes of marriage, made without witneſs, to be null and void, provided either of the parties denied the engagement.

The XVth prohibits monks or nuns to be godfathers or godmothers.

The XVIIth ratifies the prohibition of marriage within the ſeventh degree.

The XVIIIth forbids the burial of the dead out of their own pariſh.

The XIXth denounces anathema's againſt thoſe that ſold men, like horſes; but, in ſpite of this canon, the lords of manors ſtill retained the right of villainage, i. e. of ſelling their villains, who were conſidered, as a ſort of ſlaves.

The XXth was againſt ſodomy; and it is remarkable, that there never were any canons made againſt this crime, till the clergy were reſtrained from marriage, it being ſcarce ſo much as heard of in England before.

I have, in another place, taken notice of the council, held in 1125, on the account of the marriages of the prieſts, in which cardinal John de Creme preſided.

The ſynod at Weſtminſter.

In 1127, William Corbet, archbiſhop of Canterbury, called a ſynod at Weſtminſter, in which he preſided, as the pope's legate; the principal canons of which are, as follows.

The IIId is againſt the taking of money, for the admiſſion of monks and nuns into religious houſes.

The VIth prohibits a plurality of archdeacons, under the penalty of excommunication.

The VIIth renders it unlawful, for eccleſiaſticks, to turn farmers.

The VIIIth enjoins the punctual payment of tythes, ſtiling them, the demeſnes of the moſt High.

In 1138, Alberic, the pope's legate, convened a ſynod, conſiſting of 17 biſhops and 30 abbots; but this, being only ſummon'd, in order to elect an archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſeveral others aſſembled, in Stephen's reign, on political occaſions, contain nothing in them of any importance.

Since, after the conqueſt, the names of ſome biſhopricks are diſuſed, and others occur, in their ſtead, that were unknown in the times of the Saxons, it will be convenient, to prevent obſcurity, that I give ſome account of theſe alterations.

The tranſlations of the ſees.

In 1075, the ſee of Sherbourn was tranſlated to Salisbury; that of Selſey to Chicheſter; and that of Litchfield to Cheſter.

In 1092, in the reign of William II. the ſee of Dorcheſter was removed to Lincoln; and that of Wells to Bath. The popes were far from being pleaſed with theſe removals, as they were made, without their leave; and Paſchal II. loudly complained of it to Henry I. but he durſt not purſue this point any farther, becauſe of the ſchiſm, that then prevailed in the court of Rome.

Ely is made an epiſcopal ſee.

In 1108, in the reign of Henry I. Ely-monaſtery was erected into an epiſcopal ſee, with the pope's approbation, as well as the conſent of the biſhop of Lincoln, who reſigned ſigned a part of his dioceſe to this new erection.

Carliſle is made an epiſcopal ſee.

In the ſame reign, Carliſle, termed by the Romans, Luguballia, was made a biſhop's ſee, Adelwalt being the firſt biſhop; and this dioceſe was taken from the biſhoprick of Durham.

A project for making Wincheſter an archbiſhoprick.

It appears, from Anglia Sacra and Rudburn's Hiſtory of the Church of Wincheſter, that, in 1144, pope Lucius ſent the pall to the biſhop of Wincheſter, brother to king Stephen, with a view to erect that ſee into an archbiſhoprick, and annex it to the ſeven dioceſes of Weſſex; but, as this proceeding was generally diſliked, the biſhop, being apprehenſive that he ſhould meet with inſuperable difficulties, deferred the execution of his project, till, at length, it was entirely defeated by Lucius's death.

Abbies.

Battle-abbey was founded by William the Conqueror. In 1101, Henry I. founded the monaſtery of Clarkenwell and the priory of St. John of Jeruſalem; and he was likewiſe the founder of the abbey of Reading.

New orders of monks.

Towards the end of the XIth or in the beginning of the XIIth century, were inſtituted the orders of the Carthuſians *, Ciſtercians †, and Præmonſtratenſes ‡, who afterwards ſettled in England; and to theſe we may add the regular canons, reformed by Ivo of Chartres, in 1198 ¶.

The diſpute concerning tranſubſtantiation.

Among the remarkable tranſactions in the church, during the four Norman reigns, the famous controverſy, about the holy euchariſt, is not the leaſt conſiderable; for tho' it did not make ſo much noiſe in England, as in France; yet as it is a diſpute, in which the whole church was, and ſtill is, not a little concerned, I think it will not be improper to preſent the reader, with a brief account of its riſe and progreſs.

Towards the concluſion of the VIIIth century, Paſchaſius Radbert, a monk of Corbey, publiſhed a treatiſe, in which he aſſerted, that the bread in the euchariſt was the ſame body of Chriſt, that was born of the virgin; and that the wine was the ſame blood, which was ſhed on the croſs. This opinion ſeeming to be entirely new to ſeveral learned men, they ſtrenuouſly and ſharply wrote againſt it; and Johannes Scotus, ſirnamed Erigena, i. e. of Iriſh extraction, Raban, archbiſhop of Mentz, and Bertram, the monk, were the principal adverſaries of Paſchaſius's doctrine; whilſt there were ſome, on the other hand, that undertook to defend it. Without entering into a particular examination of the arguments, on both ſides of the queſtion, I ſhall only make the two following remarks on this diſpute: 1. If chriſtians had, all along, been of Paſchaſius's ſentiments, it is not to be imagined, that ſo many perſons of learning would have conſidered his doctrine, as a novelty; and yet, 2. Paſchaſius's notion ſo exceedingly prevailed, after the VIIIth century, that, upon the revival of this controverſy, 200 years after, the contrary opinion was generally charged with the imputation of novelty.

This controverſy being, at length, dropped, either becauſe the people were weary of it, or diverted by other affairs, it lay dormant, for near 200 years; but, in 1035, Berengarius, archdeacon of Angers, who was highly celebrated for his learning, finding that Paſchaſius's doctrine daily gained ground, attempted to put a ſtop to its progreſs. He publiſh'd his own opinion, in direct contradiction to that of Paſchaſius, and was permitted to perſevere in it, for 12 or 13 years, without the leaſt oppoſition; tho' he was, at length, attacked by Adelman, a prebend of Liege, and afterwards Bedwen, biſhop of the ſame church, who exerted themſelves, to perſuade him to retract his ſentiments.

In the interim, Berengarius carried on a correſpondence with Lanfranc, then abbot of St. Stephen's in Caen; and the nature of the euchariſt was the principal ſubject of all their letters. Baſnage Hiſt. de l'Egliſe.

Lanfranc wrote in defence of Paſchaſius's opinion, and Berengarius, in vindication of the doctrine he had lately publiſhed; but, one of Berengarius's letters coming into the hands of pope Leo IX , he called a council, on that account. Berengarius was condemned for receding from the received opinion, and for advancing the ſame arguments, in his letter, that Scotus had formerly produced againſt Paſchaſius; and Lanfranc, being preſent at the ſynod, was obliged to purge himſelf of the ſuſpicion of holding too ſtrict a correſpondence with this pretended heretick; but, as Berengarius was condemned, unheard, the pope, convening another ſynod at Verceil, ſummoned him to make his appearance. He did not, however, appear in perſon, but ſent two eccleſiaſticks to defend him, who, according to Lanfranc, gave up his cauſe; and Berengarius was then condemned, a ſecond time, Scotus's book, from whence he had extracted his arguments, being likewiſe involved in the ſame ſentence; but, inſtead of acquieſcing in the deciſions of theſe two ſynods, Berengarius ſtill continued to juſtify Scotus, and dropp'd ſome ſatyrical invectives againſt Paſchaſius, the pope, and the church of Rome. His arguments

* So named from Chartreuſe in Grenoble, where they were firſt eſtabliſhed, by Bruno of Cologn, canon of Rheims, in 1086; they followed St. Bennet's rule, and are ſaid to ſettle in England, in 1180.

† Thus called from Ciſtercium or Citeaux in the dioceſe of Chalons, where they firſt aſſembled, under Harding, an Engliſhman, in 1097; and, St. Bernard being, ſoon after, a member of their ſociety, they received the name of Bernardines. They refined upon St. Bennet's rule, and came into England, in 1128, the abbey of Waverly, in Surrey, being the place where they firſt ſettled.

‡ They were founded by St. Norbert, of a noble family in Cologn, in 1120, at a place ſaid to be pointed out to him by the virgin Mary, from hence called Præmonſtratum, i. e. foreſhewn. They were introduced into England, in 1146, and ſettled at New-houſe in Lincolnſhire, following St. Auguſtin's rule.

¶ Theſe canons were diſtinguiſhed into regular and ſecular; for the former, reforming upon the latter, named them ſeculars, by way of reproach; they pretended to follow St. Auguſtin's rule.

 It was directed to Lanfranc in Normandy; but, as he was gone to Rome, it was tranſmitted by ſome adverſary to the pope.

ſeemed to be ſo ſolid and convincing, that ſeveral openly declared for his opinion, and even wrote, in his vindication; for an antient author obſerves, that all France was in a combuſtion, occaſioned by Berengarius, a great number of learned men arguing for and againſt him, both by word of mouth and in writing. Sigebert.

The doctrine of Berengarius muſt certainly have had a vaſt ſpread in ſeveral places; ſince Victor II. Leo's ſucceſſor, judged it neceſſary to call another council at Tours, on this very occaſion. Berengarius, as he could not avoid coming to this ſynod, which was aſſembled in his neighbourhood, it is reported, that he had not the courage to maintain his opinion, but ſubmitted to the deciſions of the two former councils; tho' it ſhould be remember'd, that this account is only given by his adverſaries. However, if he did recant, he afterwards repented of his recantation, perſiſting, as before, in the defence of his doctrine; upon which, he was cited by Stephen X. to a council held at Rome, in 1059. Berengarius made his appearance; and, if we may rely on the teſtimony of the hiſtorians that relate it, the moſt of whom were his avowed enemies, he durſt not engage in the defence of his cauſe. They even affirm, that he ſubſcribed a writing, in which he declared, "that the body of Chriſt "was handled, in a ſenſible manner, by the "prieſts, and ground by the teeth of the com-"municants"; and afterwards they conſtrained him, by their menaces, to burn, with his own hands, Scotus's book, from whence, they pretended, he had borrowed his erroneous notions. It muſt be remarked, that, tho' ſome have aſſerted, that he durſt not defend his doctrine, others aſſure us, that he diſputed, a conſiderable time, with Lanfranc and Alberic, a monk of Mount-Caſſin; and his ſigning the writing was not ſo much the effect of conviction, as his being overawed by the threatenings of his adverſaries. "You did not ſub-"ſcribe it, as Lanfranc tells him, in one of "his letters, for the ſake of the truth; but, "purely, to eſcape the death, with which you "was threatened"; and the ſequel proves, that his heart did not conſent to the ſubſcription of his hand, becauſe, notwithſtanding his many recantations, he retained his old opinion, to the day of his death.

*Or rather 1063.

In 1073 *, a council was convened at Roan, on the ſame account, and another at Poictiers, in 1075; and Berengarius, appearing at the latter of theſe, was in ſome danger of loſing his life, which only ſerved to give him a worſe opinion of the contrary party. At laſt, pope Gregory VII. reſolving, at once, to put an end to this controverſy, which was ſo often renewed, called a council at Rome, in 1079; and, before the ſynod was opened, he proclaimed a faſt, for 30 days, in order to beſeech the Almighty, that he would vouchſafe to grant this aſſembly his grace, to diſcover the truth. It is ſomewhat ſurprizing, that, after ſo many deciſions, in conformity, as they alledge, to the doctrine of the church in all ages, they ſhould ſtill be in ſuſpence, about their belief in this matter. Berengarius, being preſent at this ſynod, ſigned a recantation, fuller and more expreſs than any of the former, in which he declares, "that the bread and wine, in the ſa-"crament, are ſubſtantially changed, by the "miraculous operation of the words of our "Saviour, into the real, viſible, and living "body of Jeſus Chriſt;" but even this retractation was far from being a proof of the alteration of his ſentiments; which is evident from his being, once more, ſummoned to a council at Bordeaux, where he appeared and was condemned. He ſpent the reſidue of his days in retirement, near Tours, where he departed this life in peace, in 1088.

What has been ſaid furniſhes matter for various reflections. In the firſt place, if Berengarius's doctrine was manifeſtly repugnant to the faith of the univerſal church, ever ſince the time of the apoſtles, is it not amazing, that there ſhould be occaſion for ſo many councils, on this very account. Secondly, the calling ſuch a great number of councils clearly ſhews, that Berengarius's doctrine had a vaſt ſpread in the world, ſince ſo much induſtry was made uſe of, to put a ſtop to its progreſs Thirdly, there is no leſs cauſe for admiration, if we conſider, that neither Berengarius himſelf, nor any of the biſhops and other eccleſiaſticks, his adherents, were ever deprived. If Berengarius had ſincerely retracted, it would be eaſy to gueſs at the reaſon, why he met with ſuch favourable treatment from the popes and councils; but, as his frequent recantations render it highly probable, that the laſt was not more ſincere than the former, there are other very convincing proofs, that he died in the belief of his old opinion. Lanfranc look'd upon him, all along, to be a ſchiſmatick; an anonymous author, who wrote eight years after his laſt recantation, treats him as an heretick; and Baronius ſtiles him a rotten heretick. Indeed, Malmsbury affirms, that Berengarius died a catholick, i. e. in the faith of the church of Rome; but he was led into this miſtake, either by believing, that his laſt retractation was real, or from the honourable epitaph, Hildebrand, biſhop of Mans, who highly extols him, on the account of his learning and morals, made for him, after his deceaſe; and, doubtleſs, Malmsbury, who inſerts this epitaph in his Hiſtory, could not imagine, that a prelate would give one, that was actually an heretick, ſuch an excellent character. Remarks on this diſpute.

Laſtly, it is farther obſervable, that, altho' the account, we have of Berengarius, is given by his adverſaries, ſeveral of them could not forbear taking notice of the prodigious progreſs of his doctrine in Germany, Italy, and eſpecially in France. As for England, it is no wonder, that this diſpute did not ſo much prevail there, as in other countries; ſince the late revolution, introduced by the Norman conqueſt, engaged the attention of the Engliſh to other affairs. I ſhall conclude my obſervations with the following remark, viz. that Berengarius's frequent recantations were extremely prejudicial to his doctrine; for, in thoſe days, few perſons being capable of judging for themſelves, about ſo intricate a point, the minds of men men were more ſwayed by example and precedent, than knowledge and conviction. Now, it muſt be owned, to all external appearance, Berengarius ſeemed to be miſtaken; becauſe it was induſtriouſly given out, that he did not recant, before he was convinced of his error, whilſt they deſignedly paſſed over in ſilence the menaces, that extorted his recantations; and yet nothing was more certain, as is evident from the teſtimony of Lanfranc himſelf, which I, above, related.

The moſt famous eccleſiaſticks.

To finiſh my account of the State of the Church, in the reign of the firſt four Norman kings, I ſhall only briefly take notice of the moſt eminent biſhops and other eccleſiaſticks, during that period.

Aldred.

Aldred, archbiſhop of York, who crowned William the Conqueror, was a good and pious prelate. He had been formerly biſhop of Glouceſter, where he built the cathedral; and, having afterwards purchaſed ſeveral eſtates, he annexed them to his archbiſhoprick, being likewiſe a great benefactor to the abbey of Beverley.

Altho' the court of Rome pretended, that Stigand intruded himſelf into the ſee of Canterbury, and he was, therefore, ſuſpended by the pope; yet he performed the archiepiſcopal functions, during the reigns of Edward and Harold; and, if William the Conqueror refuſed to receive the crown from his hands, it was, merely to prevent a rupture with the court of Rome. When Stigand attended that prince into Normandy, he treated him, as a perſon of great diſtinction; and the Norman clergy, notwithſtanding the pope's cenſures, paid him all the reſpect due to his ſtation and quality. In proceſs of time, the Conqueror, being jealous of him, prevailed on the council of Weſtminſter to depoſe him; and no ſooner was he deprived of all his preferments, than he impriſon'd him, in order to force him to make a diſcovery, where he had conceal'd his vaſt treaſures; but, nothing being able to extort this ſecret from him, he continued in priſon to the day of his death; but, after his deceaſe, a little key was found about his neck, with a note that directed to the place, where his money was ſecured, which was all ſeized, for the uſe of the king.

Brompton.

Marianus Scotus.

Marianus Scotus, born in Scotland, in 1028, at 30 years of age, retired to a monaſtery at Cologn; and he was afterwards removed to the abbey of Fulde, where he wrote a general Hiſtory of Europe, from the creation to the year of our Lord 1082; and he departed this life, in 1086. The Scotch, at that time, met with a kind reception in Germany, where a prince of that nation, that had ſerved under Charlemain, was the founder of 15 monaſteries, all the abbots of which were to be natives of Scotland.

Wulſtan.

Wulſtan, biſhop of Worceſter, was very famous, for his piety, which ſome have carried too far; ſince they pretend, that he not only performed ſeveral miracles, whilſt alive, but even after his deceaſe. However, it is evident, that Lanfranc had a mean opinion of this prelate's merit; ſeeing he would have had him deprived by a ſynod, for inſufficiency and want of learning. This renders it ſuſpicious, that Wulſtan's principal excellency was his great plainneſs and ſimplicity, which they would have palmed upon us for an extraordinary ſanctity. Malmsbury, who has written his life, mentions a particular, that manifeſtly ſhews, this prelate had an extravagant conceipt of his own abilities; for, he tells us, that, when the monks, who were about him, a little before his death, expreſs'd great ſorrow for the loſs of him, he aſſured them, they ſhould find in him a more powerful patron and friend, after his deceaſe, than whilſt he was alive.

Lanfranc.

Lanfranc, whom I have had occaſion ſo often to ſpeak of, was born at Pavia; and, after he had compleated his ſtudies, he made choice of a monaſtick life, and retired to the abbey of Bec in Normandy, where he taught logick and acquired a great reputation. His frequent invectives againſt the reſt of the fraternity, on the account of their ignorance, paved the way for the firſt riſe of his fortune; for, the monks having preferr'd a complaint againſt him to William the Baſtard, then only duke of Normandy, he was obliged to go to court, to vindicate himſelf againſt their aſperſions; and, ſo highly was the duke charmed with the merit, that ſhined in his converſation, that, inſtead of puniſhing him, to gratify his accuſers, he advanced him to be abbot of St. Stephen's at Caen, and afterwards promoted him to the ſee of Canterbury. Lanfranc's credit, which was very conſiderable, in the Conqueror's reign, declined under William Rufus, tho' it was by his intereſt that he obtained the crown; and his death, ſoon after, in 1089, in all probability, delivered him from much future trouble and vexation. He rebuilt the church of Canterbury, which had been conſumed by the Danes, in archbiſhop Elphegus's time, and fixed the number of the monks of St. Auguſtin at 150, which before was unlimited; and he likewiſe gave them a prior, inſtead of a chorepiſcopus. A famous trial, in which he gained the cauſe againſt Odo, biſhop of Bayeux and earl of Kent, put him in poſſeſſion of 25 manors, which that prelate had ſeized. He was eſteemed to be a profound politician, as well as an able and learned divine. His Commentary on St. Paul's Epiſtles, and his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which is not now extant, were works that had a great reputation; but, of all his writings, his treatiſe againſt Berengarius, concerning the body and blood of Jeſus Chriſt in the ſacrament, was the moſt remarkable. However, in ſpite of this teſtimony of the conformity of his ſentiments to thoſe of the Roman church, Gregory VII. ſent him ſeveral ſummons, to come to Rome and give an account of his faith, and, at length, even threatened, that he would ſuſpend him, unleſs he made his appearance there, within four months; but Lanfranc never went, tho' he did not want time for ſuch a journey, ſince his death did not happen, till eight years after.

Anſelm.

Anſelm, who had been abbot of Bec, before his promotion to the ſee of Canterbury, the moſt famous of all the Engliſh biſhops, on the account of his diſputes with William Rufus and Henry I. but, as the firſt of theſe conteſts is of little or no conſequence, and I have already taken notice of all that is material in it, I ſhall only ſubjoin one circumſtance, which will give an inſight into pope Urban's addreſs, to prevail on the Engliſh to own his authority.

Clement, the antipope, being alive, when Urban II. was elected, England refuſed to ſubmit to either of the competitors; but, in the interim, Anſelm, falling out with William Rufus, openly declared for Urban, in direct contradiction to the king's will and pleaſure. As their quarrel increaſed, the king reſolved to humble this prelate; and, with this view, he acquainted Urban, that, provided he would ſend him the pall deſigned for Anſelm, ſo that he ſhould be obliged to receive it from him, he would procure his being acknowledged, for pope, in England. Upon this, Urban diſpatch'd the biſhop of Alba, to act, according to the king's deſire; tho' the nuncio, without the leaſt mention of his having brought the pall with him, only told him, that the pope was willing to comply with his requeſt, on the terms that were propoſed. The king, upon this aſſurance, prevailed on the Engliſh to own Urban's authority, and afterwards inſiſted on having Anſelm's pall at his diſpoſal; but the nuncio replied, that the thing was impracticable, ſince Anſelm refuſed to receive the pall from the hands of a layman; and he was conſtrained, at length, to agree, that the archbiſhop ſhould take it up himſelf from the altar, where the nuncio had laid it, by conſent. However, William, being, thus, impoſed on, never forgave the archbiſhop, who was obliged to go to Rome; after which, he retired to Lyons, where he continued, till the king's deceaſe.

The conteſt between Henry I. and Anſelm, about inveſtitures.

During Anſelm's ſtay at Rome, he was preſent at a council, which decreed, that, all eccleſiaſticks, who, for the future, received the inveſtiture of their benefices from the hands of laymen, ſhould be liable to excommunication; and, in conformity to this decree, the archbiſhop, after his return into England, by the ſollicitations of Henry I. refuſed to do homage to that prince, or conſecrate the biſhops that had been inveſted by him. This refuſal occaſioned a more important conteſt, than that he had with William Rufus, ſince the point in diſpute was a royal prerogative, that the kings of England had been poſſeſs'd, for many years; but Henry, being determined to proceed with caution, becauſe the court of Rome was, at this juncture, very formidable, as it had got the aſcendant over the emperor, conſented, that Anſelm ſhould ſend agents to Rome, whilſt he himſelf diſpatched ambaſſadors thither, to plead his own cauſe, and intreat the pope not to moleſt him in the poſſeſſion of his right. Paſchal II. gave him to underſtand, that it was not in his power to grant the king a privilege, which had been expreſly prohibited by ſeveral councils; but Henry exerted himſelf, notwithſtanding, in the preſervation of a right, that he had derived from his predeceſſors. He, therefore, commanded the archbiſhop not only to do him homage, but to conſecrate the biſhops that he had inveſted; and, upon Anſelm's declaring, that he could not comply with the king's order, unleſs he diſobeyed the pope and the decrees of the ſynod of Rome, to which he himſelf had given his vote, the king made the following reply: "What is "that to me, can the ſynod of Rome deprive "me of the prerogative of my anceſtors? "No, I will never permit any perſon, who "ſcruples to give me the ſecurities of a ſub-"ject, to enjoy eſtates in my dominions." Upon this, he order'd Anſelm to obey him, or depart the kingdom; but the archbiſhop anſwer'd, that he could do neither; but that he would retire to Canterbury, and there wait God's good pleaſure. This anſwer aſtoniſh'd the king and the lords of the council; and, having debated the point, the council was of opinion, that the king, regardleſs of Anſelm, or the pope himſelf, ſhould expel the one from his dominions, and ſhake off all dependence on the other. Henry, judging it inexpedient to carry matters to theſe extremities, without the concurrence of the eſtates of the realm, called a general aſſembly or parliament; and he repreſented to them the deſigns of the pope againſt the prerogatives of the crown, as well as the haughty carriage of Anſelm, who did not behave as a ſubject, but as an equal, or rather ſuperior. The aſſembly, upon this, agreed, that the archbiſhop ſhould be allowed more time, for deliberation; and that, in the mean while, ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent to Rome, to ſollicit the pope to deſiſt, in an amicable manner, from his pretenſions. The archbiſhop of York and two other biſhops were appointed for this ambaſſy; and they were accompanied with two agents, in behalf of Anſelm. The ambaſſadors received inſtructions to propoſe to the pope this alternative; either to give way, in the caſe of inveſtitures, or elſe expect the baniſhment of Anſelm, the revolt of the Engliſh from any ſubmiſſion to his authority, and the loſs of all the profits ariſing from thence. The prelates had no ſooner been admitted to their audience of the pope, than they laid before him the dangerous conſequences of refuſing to comply with the king's propoſals; but Paſchal replied, that he would not only loſe England, but even his pontifical dignity, rather than make the leaſt abatement, in this point. Anſelm's agents had alſo a ſeparate audience; and, at their departure, the pope gave them two letters; one for the king, in which he exhorted him to drop his claim to inveſtitures, and another for Anſelm, enjoining him to perſiſt in the defence of the cauſe of truth. The king, who was far from being pleaſed with his letter, did not think it proper to be communicated to the lords; but Anſelm procured his to be publickly read, in their hearing.

In the interim, the king's ambaſſadors and Anſelm's agents differ'd extremely, in their accounts, by word of mouth; for the biſhops affirmed, that the pope, at a private audience, aſſured assured them, that he was willing to indulge the king, in the affair of investitures, provided he would, in return, give him satisfaction in other particulars, tho' he durst not openly declare so much, lest other princes should demand the same privilege; whilst Anselm's agents, on the contrary, protested, that the pope had not made any declarations to that purpose, and appealed to the letter he had sent to the archbishop. Their allegations seemed to be so far the more probable, as the king had refused to produce the pope's letter; but yet the testimony of the archbishop of York and the other prelates could not be disputed, without charging them with falshood and gross prevarication. Anselm himself was somewhat at a loss, how to judge of this matter, since each of the parties appealed to the pope, for the truth of their assertions; and, therefore, he thought it convenient to prolong the time, till he should be farther informed about the pope's intention. In the mean while, he made an offer to communicate with the bishops, who were invested by the king, which he had, hitherto, refused, provided he should not be obliged to consecrate them, before he had heard from the pope; and, this peaceable overture giving the king and council some satisfaction, he was allowed time, to send fresh agents to Rome.

Before the return of the agents, the king, being impatient on the account of these delays, sent his orders to the archbishop, to consecrate the three bishops elect; but Anselm answer'd, that, tho' he was willing to consecrate one of them, who had refused his investiture from the king, he could not perform this office to the others, without the pope's consent. Upon this refusal, the king commanded the archbishop of York to celebrate this solemnity; but the bishops elect would not submit to his authority; which so highly incensed the king, that he confiscated all their estates.

As soon as Anselm's agents were arrived from Rome, the king went down to Canterbury, and desired the archbishop to satisfy his demands, unless he would provoke him to make use of other methods; but Anselm replied, that he had received a letter from the pope, not yet opened; that he was willing to open it in his presence; and that he would be guided by the pope's directions. Henry, exasperated to find, that the archbishop still continued to give the preference to the pope's orders, answer'd, that he was not sollicitous to know the pope's injunctions, not being, in the least, inclined to submit his prerogatives to his determination. However, the archbishop, after all, remained inflexible; and Henry, desirous of trying all imaginable gentle means, before he proceeded to severity, intreated Anselm himself to take a journey to Rome, to try if he could prevail on the pope to give way. He was not easily perstraded to engage in this undertaking; but, at last, he was prevailed on, by the sollicitations of the bishops and barons, who assured him, that this journey could not possibly do him any disservice.

When he arrived in Normandy, opening the pope's letter, he found a direct denial of all that the king's ambassadors had reported; yet he pursued his journey to Rome, where he was speedily followed by William de Warelwast, the king's ambassador, whom William Rufus had formerly sent to the court of Rome. The ambassador, obtaining an audience, represented to the pope the danger of persisting in his pretensions, assuring him, that the king, his master, was resolutely determined rather to lose his crown, than surrender the right of investitures. Paschal replied, "And I will sooner "lose my life, than suffer the church's privi- "leges to be, thus, usurped." This positive answer having entirely defeated the negotiation, the ambassador set out for England; but Anselm, not daring to return, retired to Lyons.

After this, Henry sent another ambassy to Rome, but to as little purpose; for it only incensed the pope, who excommunicated the earl of Mellent and some other lords of the council; and he even threatened Henry with the church's censures, tho' he declined the putting them in execution. In the interim, Anselm, finding the pope dilatory in his proceedings, was apprehensive, that, sooner or later, the pope and king might come to an accommodation, which might end in his utter ruin; and, therefore, he resolved to engage the pope so deeply in the affair, that it should be impossible for him to recede from it. With this view, he made a visit to Adela, countess of Blois, Henry's sister, and informed her, that, after much patience, he must now, at last, be forced to excommunicate the king, unless he would immediately desist from his pretensions. Adela, being extremely concerned at this menace, exerted herself to procure an accommodation. She desired the king, her brother, who was then in Normandy, to meet her at the castle of l' Aigle, where she brought Anselm with her, that they might confer about the affair in dispute; and, by the means of the countess's mediation at this interview, things seemed to have a very promising aspect. Henry, being overawed by the archbishop's threatnings, used him in a very obliging manner; and Anselm, in return, treated the king with more than usual respect. They had not been long in each other's company, before they perceived, that they were both equally desirous of concluding the contest, on honourable terms; and, no sooner had they mutually agreed upon an expedient to this purpose, than Henry sent William de Warelwast to the pope, to obtain his approbation. Paschal, being, at this juncture, vigorously press'd by the Germans, who, shortly after, forced him to fly for refuge into France, did not think it convenient to make a rupture with England; and, therefore, he consented to accommodate matters, on the following conditions. The king was obliged to renounce the right of investitures; and the pope granted the bishops and abbots leave to do homage to the king, for their temporalities. Thus, the pope and the king compromised this vexatious affair,

by a method as juſt as it was natural, and which ſhould been taken, at firſt, if they had acted upon fair principles; and this will manifeſtly appear, if we impartially enquire into the ſtate of the queſtion.

The ſtate of the queſtion.

To ſet this matter in a true light, I ſhall, firſt, obſerve, that, ever ſince the time of Charles the Great, ſovereign princes were poſſeſs'd of the right of inveſtitures to biſhopricks and abbies, by the delivery of the ring and paſtoral ſtaff; which I apprehend to be an undeniable truth *. Gregory VII. was the firſt, that attempted to deprive them of this privilege, about the end of the XIth century; and the popes, his ſucceſſors, were no leſs active in the purſuit of his deſign. It muſt be owned, that the popes had ſome reaſon to complain, that the kings had abuſed this prerogative; ſince, under the pretence that the biſhops and abbots were incapable of taking poſſeſſion of their benefices, till they were inveſted by them, they often publickly ſold the biſhopricks and abbies to the higheſt bidder; for tho' the elections ſeemed to be canonical, yet the princes over-ruled them, by refuſing inveſtiture to ſuch as were not agreeable to them. This alone was ſufficient to procure the election of thoſe, whom they recommended; becauſe no eccleſiaſticks were deſirous of being biſhops or abbots, without the temporalities; and, therefore, the king's conſent was neceſſary, in order to be elected, after which, even before conſecration, they received inveſtiture from him. But as ſimony was too frequently made uſe of, in theſe elections; ſo the princes, by not inveſting the eccleſiaſticks, in the ſame manner with the laicks, and even before their conſecration, ſeemed as if they aſſumed to themſelves the power of conveighing ſpiritual juriſdiction, which the popes repreſented, as a direct uſurpation of the privileges of the church; and, indeed, it muſt be confeſs'd, it had the appearance of it, by reaſon of the two characters in the prelate elect, which were confounded, viz. that of miniſter of the church, and that of temporal lord, which was annexed to his dignity. If the popes and kings had acted ingeniouſly, they would have carefully diſtinguiſhed between them; the want of which was the ſpring and original of all their conteſts about this affair; for both parties, by leaving them in this confuſion, only conſulted their own advantage. The princes, by this means, over-ruled the elections, and the popes took occaſion to diſpute the right, that was poſſeſſed by the ſovereigns; for the former declared, that they would not permit any man to enter into poſſeſſion of lands held of the crown, and the latter maintained, that it was unreaſonable for princes to intermeddle in elections, or to pretend to conveigh a character, which the church alone had power to confer; whereas it was very poſſible, that a man might be a biſhop or abbot, without enjoying the lands held of the crown, in which caſe, the kings were not at all concerned. On the contrary, it could not have been, in any reſpect, prejudicial to the princes, for any one to conveigh a ſpiritual character, without their conſent, ſince it was ſtill in their power to ſecure themſelves; but ſo ſtiff and reſolute was the temper of both parties, that they would not be brought to the true ſtate of the queſtion. From what has been ſaid it appears, that the accommodation, between pope Paſchal II. and Henry I. was made on very reaſonable terms, that were not, in the leaſt, injurious to the church's rights, or the king's prerogative; but, in all probability, this controverſy would not have been ſo happily concluded, if the pope's unſettled affairs had not obliged him to recede; for he could never be prevailed on to grant to the emperor the ſame privilege, he had, juſt before, given up to the king of England.

Anſelm's life and writings.

I have treated more largely on this part of Anſelm's life, becauſe it gives us an inſight into the character of this prelate, who was dignified with the title of ſaint, as all were, that zealouſly adhered to the court of Rome. He was born, in 1033, at Aoſt, a ſmall town in Italy, now belonging to the duke of Savoy; and, at the age of 27 years, he became a monk, in the abbey of Bec, of which Lanfranc was prior. Upon Lanfranc's advancement to be abbot of St. Stephens's at Caen, Anſelm was made prior, and afterwards abbot of Bec, from whence he was promoted to the ſee of Canterbury. He was the author of ſeveral treatiſes, of which father Gerberon publiſhed the largeſt edition, in 1676; and his writings, in the opinion of Mr. Du Pin, abound with metaphyſical queſtions, argued with a great appearance of logick; and he likewiſe obſerves, that his letters are written, in a leſs elaborate ſtile than his other works; and he is alſo the firſt that compoſed long prayers, in the form of meditations. He was eſteemed to be a very learned, as well as an holy prelate; and he has been highly applauded, for his ſteadineſs and reſolution, in his conteſts with William Rufus and Henry I. tho' this zealous attachment to the cauſe of Rome, which they gloried in, for ſo many centuries, would not, at preſent, meet with the ſame approbation. Anſelm departed this life, in 1109, and was canonized, in the reign of Henry VII. at the inſtance of cardinal Morton, then archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Gilbert, biſhop of London, was famous, in the reign of Henry I. principally, on the account of his learning; and he was, therefore, diſtinguiſhed by the name of univerſaliſt; for ſuch appellations were in great repute at this time, as a mark of honour, to thoſe that were remarkable for their skill in the ſciences. He wrote a Commentary on David's Pſalms, and an Expoſition on the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which are extant, in manuſcript, to this day.

* Sigebert of Gemblours, ad Ann. 773, ſays, that pope Adrian I. at a council of 143 biſhops and abbots, granted Charles the Great the privilege of electing the pope, and the right of inveſtitures; but Baronius and Peter de Marca deny the authority of this council, and aſſert that it was invented by Sigebert, in favour of the emperor againſt Paſchal II.

Oſmund

Oſmund, biſhop of Sarum.

Oſmund biſhop of Salisbury, a Norman, was earl of Dorſet and privy-counſellor to William the Conqueror, when he was made a biſhop; and as every dioceſe, in thoſe times, had a different liturgy, he undertook the correction of that which was uſed in his; and he render'd it more pure, than before, by ſtriking out a great number of barbariſms, and digeſting the whole in a more convenient method. This liturgy, Secundum uſum Sarum, was ſoon received in the other dioceſes, and, at length, became common to all the churches in the kingdom; tho' it is affirmed, that, after Oſmund's deceaſe, which happen'd in 1099, ſeveral interpolations were foiſted in, which are, by no means, approved of, at preſent.

Malachy. J. Hagulſt.

Malachy, archbiſhop of Armagh in Ireland, is famous for his prophecy, relating to the popes, that ſhould ſucceed to the papal chair, after his time; and theſe predictions are ſtill extant *, being a ſort of riddles, and endeavours are uſed to interpret their meaning. He died, in 1150, at the monaſtery of Clareval, in France; and St. Bernard has given us an account of his life.

Ingulphus.

Ingulphus was known to William the Conqueror, when, being then only duke of Normandy, he came into England, to have an interview with king Edward; and he attended him into Normandy, as his ſecretary; but, in proceſs of time, he quitted that office, and went a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem. At his return, he turned monk, in the abbey of Fontevraud; from whence he was invited over, and made abbot of Croyland, by William the Conqueror. He departed this life, in 1109, after he had written the Hiſtory of his monaſtery, which is inſerted in the Collection of the antient Engliſh hiſtorians, publiſhed by Dr. Gale †.

Joffrid. P. Bleſenſis.

Joffrid, abbot of the ſame monaſtery, who immediately ſucceeded Ingulphus, was, according to ſome, the firſt that erected ſchools at Cambridge; where he ſettled four of his monks, as profeſſors; but, if this be fact, that famous univerſity is far from being ſo antient, as is generally imagined ‡.

Godfrid.

Godfrid, prior of Wincheſter, was one of the beſt writers of his age, if we may give credit to William of Malmsbury, who aſſures us, that his writings were penn'd with great elegance and politeneſs; and he compoſed, among other things, a panegyrick upon the Engliſh primates; but his reforming the breviary, by purging it from all rude and barbarous terms, was a work of much greater importance, and Alford is of opinion, that he was principally concerned in correcting the liturgy of Sarum, tho' it went under the name of Oſmund (a).

* They were publiſhed by Arnold Wyon.

† Ingulphus was born at London, in 1030, being the ſon of one of Edward the Confeſſor's courtiers; and he was the firſt Engliſh hiſtorian, after the conqueſt. In his Hiſtory of Croyland, he has occaſionally related the ſtory of the kings of England, from 664 to 1091; but biſhop Nicholſon obſerves, that, being prejudiced in favour of the Conqueror, he is manifeſtly byaſs'd in the ill account he gives of Harold, his predeceſſor.

‡ He, about the year 1114, introduced a cuſtom, which was afterwards followed by all the monks, viz he ſtripped himſelf, every Good-Friday, to the waſte, before all the convent, and was ſeverely ſcourged; the deſign of which was to do penance for their ſins, and to make a deeper impreſſion of our Saviour's ſufferings.

Pictavienſis.

William Pictavienſis or of Poictiers, who, tho' a foreigner and chaplain to the Conqueror, has given ſuch an ingenuous account of the Norman revolution, that it has been well received by moſt of the Engliſh hiſtorians.

Florence of Worceſter.

Florence, a monk of Worceſter, wrote a Chronicle, which ended with his life, in 1119; tho' it was continued, 50 years lower, by another monk of the ſame monaſtery. He abridged or tranſcribed Marianus, adding a great number of judicious collections, from the Saxon Chronicle and other writers; but he is cenſured, for adhering ſo ſcrupulouſly to his authorities, as ſometimes to retain their miſtakes.

Eadmer.

Eadmerus, a monk of Canterbury, in his Hiſtoria Novorum, &c. publiſhed by Mr. Selden, has related the ſtory of the two William's, from 1066 to 1122, which, according to biſhop Nicholſon, is a work of great gravity and indiſputable authority; for, tho' he was intimately acquainted with Anſelm, he has given an impartial account of the famous conteſt, about inveſtitures. Selden obſerves, that his ſtile equals Malmsbury; but his matter and compoſure exceed him.

Vitalis.

Ordericus Vitalis was a monk of St. Eurole's in Normandy, where he lived 56 years. He wrote an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory in xiii books, in which he has taken notice of many particulars, relating to the Hiſtory of England; tho' he is ſaid to be extravagant, in the praiſe of his friends and the diſpraiſe of his enemies, and to inſiſt too copiouſly on trivial matters, whilſt he too ſlightly paſſes over things of importance.

Malmſbury.

William, monk and library-keeper of Malmsbury, in his treatiſe de Rebus Geſtis Anglorum, in five books, with an appendix in two more, entitled Hiſtoriæ Novellæ, has, with care and judgment, collected whatever he found recorded, from the arrival of the Saxons to the eighth year of Stephen's reign, in 1142. He is called elegant, learned, and faithful, by ſome of the moſt able criticks, in the Hiſtory of England; and Uſher ſtiles him the chief of the Engliſh hiſtorians.

The Saxon Chronicle.

The moſt noble monument of antiquity, extant, is the old Saxon Chronicle or Annals; which commences from the birth of our Saviour, and concludes with Stephen's death, in 1154, but, by the diverſity of ſtile and other infallible proofs, it is evident, that theſe Annals were compoſed at ſeveral times. They principally follow Bede, as to eccleſiaſtical affairs, to 731; but their account of the wars, between the Anglo-Saxons and Britons, is the moſt antient, of which we have any knowledge. Aſſerius's Hiſtory of Alfred and the Annals agree, in ſo many particulars, that the one ſeems to be no more than a tranſlation of the other; and, in a word, they have been the foundation of all the Hiſtories of England, to the Norman conqueſt. They were publiſhed at Oxford, in 1692, by Dr. Gibſon, the preſent biſhop of London, who, from all the manuſcripts, has render'd the text as entire and complete, as poſſible, with an elegant and proper verſion, free from affected ſtrains and unlucky miſtakes, which uſually abound in works of this nature.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK VII.

The Reſtoration of the Saxon Line: The Reigns of HENRY II. and RICHARD I. containing the ſpace of 45 years.

5. HENRY II. ſirnamed Plantagenet.

1154. THE Engliſh had been too great ſufferers in the civil wars, that had ſo long embroiled the kingdom, to be deſirous of renewing them; and, therefore, tho' Stephen's death gave them an opportunity of raiſing freſh commotions, they patiently waited for the duke of Normandy, tho' he did not arrive in England, in leſs than ſix weeks after he received the intelligence of the deceaſe of the late king. Prince William, Stephen's ſon, was a prince of very little merit; and beſides, as moſt of the barons had been concerned againſt the king, his father, they were apprehenſive, that, if they eſpouſed his cauſe, they ſhould only put it in his power to be revenged on them. Moreover, Henry was not only powerful abroad, but had a numerous party in England, and all the fortreſſes were poſſeſs'd by his adherents; and, conſequently, tho' William ſhould have made an attempt upon the crown, he would have wanted the neceſſary aſſiſtance, to bring about his deſign.

Henry ſucceeds to the crown, without oppoſition. Gervaſe. Brompt. R. Diceto.

1155. Henry, after his landing, having muſter'd together his attendants, that had been diſperſed by a ſtorm, came to Wincheſter, where ſeveral of the great men waited on him and ſwore allegiance; and he was crowned *, the day after his arrival, purſuant to the agreement made with Stephen, of which all the barons in the kingdom were guarantees. The Engliſh, with the greateſt ſatisfaction, beheld a prince on the throne, that was, by his mother, ſprung from their antient kings, who gave the crown of England a brighter luſtre than ever; for he added to it, as ſo many jewels, Poictou, Guienne, Saintonge, Maine, Anjou, Touraine, and Normandy. In the mean time, England, the chief of his dominions, had ſuſtained ſuch violent ſhocks, in the late reign, that it was in the utmoſt want of ſome reſt, in order to recover its former ſplendor; and the moſt effectual means, to this purpoſe, was to prevent the factious, from creating new troubles. Henry, making this his principal ſtudy, in the firſt place, demoliſhed all the caſtles, that were fortified, in Stephen's reign, which proved only ſo many ſanctuaries for robbers and diſturbers of the publick peace, except a few, built by peaceable men, that he reſerved in his own hands; and the biſhop of Wincheſter alone had ſix of the moſt conſiderable, which he forfeited, for departing the kingdom, without leave. This proceeding demonſtrated to the lords, that the king was reſolved to ſecure their obedience; and it was followed by another that was equally conducive to the good of his ſubjects, viz. the disbanding the foreign troops, that were entertained by Stephen.

Diceto, M. Paris, and M. Weſtminſter. But Gervaſe tells us, that he landed the 8th, and was crowned the 17th, Eleanor, his queen, being crowned with him; and Diceto ſays, that the archbiſhop of York was not preſent at the coronation.

1155. These ſoldiers, whom the Engliſh hiſtorians ſtile Brabanſons, and the French, Routiers or Cotteraux, were a mixture of people from ſeveral parts of Europe, but eſpecially Germany and the Low-Countries; and, as they did not profeſs ſubjection to any prince, in particular, they made no ſcruple of ſerving any that would employ them, provided it was likely to turn to their advantage. Not to be punctually paid, they conſider'd as an inſtance of good fortune; ſince furniſhed them with a pretence for plundering the friends, as well as enemies, of thoſe that entertained them; ſo that, generally, theſe auxiliary troops were a burthen to the very princes, whom they aſſiſted, as the Engliſh had often found, from their own experience. Henry, being deſirous of eaſing his people of this dead weight, did not ſuffer ſo much as one of theſe foreigners to remain in the kingdom; and William of Ypres, their general, perceiving from the cold reception he met with at court, that his abſence would be very acceptable, embarqued, at once, without waiting for orders to depart *.

He revokes all Stephen's grants. Brompt.

M. Paris.

The new king, as yet, ſeemed entirely to conſult the welfare and tranquillity of his ſubjects; but, when he, ſoon after, revoked all the grants made by his predeceſſor, and ſeized on all the lands, that had been alienated from the crown, it evidently appeared that he acted upon other motives. The poſſeſſors were exceedingly mortified, and loudly complained, that it was extremely unreaſonable to deprive them of the rewrad of their ſervices; and thoſe, in particular, that had eſpouſed the cauſe of the king and the empreſs, his mother, were highly exaſperated, to find themſelves, thus, confounded with Stephen's adherents. The laſt, on the other hand, affirmed, that, in ſerving the late king, who was actually poſſeſs'd of the crown, they had only performed the office of faithful ſubjects; and that, in depriving them of their eſtates, a precedent was eſtabliſhed, that might hereafter be of dangerous conſequence to the prince on the throne. Several of the lords even refuſed to comply; but, upon Henry's approach with an army, they were in no condition to make any reſiſtance; and Hugh Mortimer, by preſuming to defend one of his caſtles againſt the king, occaſioned the loſs of all his others. William of Blois, Stephen's ſon, meeting with no better treatment than the reſt, was diſpoſſeſs'd of the caſtle of Norwich, and all that was given him by the king, his father; and Henry left him nothing, except the lands that belonged to his family, before Stephen's acceſſion to the crown. This proceeding directly contradicted the agreement Henry had made with the late king; but alas! of what vertue are treaties, againſt breach of faith ſeconded with power? Thus, the nobles, enriched by the bounty of king Stephen, or the empreſs Matilda, were, on a ſudden, reduced by Henry's policy, who had often remarked, that their riches render'd them arrogant and imperious; and he alſo acted from a principle of revenge, in depriving the barons, whom Stephen had created, of their honourable titles, under the pretence that they were conferred on them, on the account of their adherence to an uſurper.

William, Stephen's ſon, is diſpoſſeſs'd like the reſt. G. Neub. M. Weſt.

Henry, after theſe and the like precautions, choſe a council, conſiſting of the chief perſons of the nobility and clergy; the principal members of which were Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Becket, archdeacon of the ſame ſee, lately made chancellor, and Robert earl of Leiceſter, chief juſticiary of the realm; and, at the head of the cabinet-council, was Matilda, his mother, whom long experience had render'd wiſe, at her own expence. Theſe two councils being ſettled, Henry called an aſſembly-general or parliament, at Wallingford, where he obliged the barons to ſwear fealty to William and Henry †, his ſons, the former of which died, a few days after; and, before the aſſembly broke up, he conſented, that the laws of Edward ſhould be in force, and, of his own accord, ratified the charter of his grandfather, Henry I. Theſe firſt ſteps of the new king invigorated the hopes of the honeſt and peaceable, whilſt they terrified the wicked and injurious, who were under a neceſſity either of abandoning the kingdom, or amending their manners; for they evidently perceived, that he was reſolutely determined to root out the licentiouſneſs, introduced in Stephen's reign.

M. Weſtm. affirms, that he was ſprung from a noble family, in the territory of St. Alban's; and he was a brisk and enterprizing pope; for tho' he only ſate in the papal chair, four years, Brompton aſſures us, that he put the city of Rome under an interdict, for inſulting one of his cardinals, and excommunicated William, king of Sicily.

Remarks on the ſtrength of the king of France.

When Hugh Capet uſurped the crown, from the houſe of Charles the Great, to attach the nobility to his intereſt, he granted to them and their heirs the provinces, of which they were only governors, by the name of fiefs; and he confirmed theſe grants by authentick charters, ſtipulating, that the fiefs ſhould devolve to the crown, in default of heirs, and reſerving alſo the right of confiſcating them, for rebellion and other crimes, ſpecified in the ſaid charters. By the means of this immenſe bounty, France became, at once, ſtock'd with vaſt numbers of powerful lords, or rather ſovereigns, who held their lands, by an hereditary right; ſo that nothing was left to the crown, except the governments Hugh Capet was poſſeſs'd of, before his acceſſion to the throne; tho' even theſe demeſnes, with the addition of ſome other vacant governments, were very conſiderable, the power of his family being exceedingly increas'd, upon the decline of the houſe of Charles the Great. I am not inſenſible, that ſome authors deny, that Hugh Capet was the firſt that changed the governments into fiefs, making this alteration to be more remote; whilſt others aſſert, that it was made by ſome of the firſt kings of that line; but, beſides, that the opinion I have followed is the moſt probable, the difference of a few years, more or leſs, is of no conſequence, with reſpect to a general view of the ſtate of France, which is all that I propoſe, at preſent.

Some of theſe fiefs, on the account of their great extent, were called peerdoms; and of this ſort there were ſix eccleſiaſtical, and ſix lay; but it is unneceſſary to mention the former of theſe, as they have very little relation to the Hiſtory of England *. Of the ſix lay peerdoms, three were dukedoms, viz. Burgundy, Normandy, and Guienne; and three, earldoms, namely, Flanders, Tholouſe, and Champagne; and each of theſe peers had vaſſals, which held their lands of him, as he himſelf held his peerdom of the crown. For example, the duke of Normandy had, for his vaſſal, the duke of Bretagne, by the conceſſion of Charles the Simple, who annexed this right to the grant made to Rollo; and from hence it appears, how naked the crown of France was, now, in compariſon of the ſtate of its revenues, in future times. To the reign of Lewis VII. ſirnamed the Young, who was king of France, when Henry aſcended the throne of England, the kings of France had not united any of the great fiefs to the crown; and, therefore, it plainly follows, that Henry, who held the two principal peerdoms, beſides many other provinces, was in poſſeſſion of as much or more lands in that kingdom, than the king of France himſelf; but this prince was, notwithſtanding, very potent, by reaſon of the aids he received from his vaſſals. When the kingdom was engaged in a war, with the advice and conſent of the ſtates, each vaſſal was obliged to furniſh him with a certain number of troops; and then it was, that the king appeared at the head of a formidable army; but, when he declared war, of his own accord, or for his private advantage, the vaſſals might allow him, or refuſe, their quota of troops, at their pleaſure. Nay, they imagined they might lawfully take up arms againſt him, in the caſe of oppreſſion, or even for the bare denial of juſtice; and, this being the nature of the French conſtitution, it is no wonder, that their kings have ſometimes marched with a handful of forces, whilſt, at other times they have have been at the head of numerous armies. However, when ſome of theſe large demeſnes, granted in fee, came afterwards to be united to the crown, the ſovereigns, by degrees, aboliſh'd the diſtinction between a neceſſary and unneceſſary war; and, without any regard to the conſent of the ſtates, continually confounding the private views of the king with the intereſt of the publick, they obliged their vaſſals to ſupply them with aids, on every occaſion. They even employed ſome of their vaſſals, as their inſtruments, in oppreſſing the reſt; and this, with the opportunities they had, of courſe, to unite ſeveral provinces to the crown, in default of heirs, ſo greatly increaſed their ſtrength, that, at laſt, they were able to keep the great men in awe; but it was a long time, before they arrived at this height of power.

Henry wages war with his brother Geoffrey.

Henry's chief deſign, in going over to Normandy, was to recover Anjou, which his brother, Geoffrey, had ſeized, upon the following pretenſions. Geoffrey Plantagenet earl of Anjou, their father, by his laſt will and teſtament, left to Henry, his eldeſt ſon, the poſſeſſions of Matilda, their mother, including Normandy and her title to England; to Geoffrey, his ſecond, he bequeathed Anjou, Touraine, and Maine; and to William, his third ſon, he only gave the earldom of Mortagne. But, as it was unreaſonable, that the empreſs, his wife, ſhould be deprived of her poſſeſſions, during her life, or Henry continue, without any inheritance, till her death, he ſubjoined another clauſe in his will, viz. that Henry ſhould enjoy, whilſt the empreſs lived, the three earldoms aſſigned to Geoffrey, reſerving, however, to the latter the cities of Lodun, Chinon, and Mirebel, until the former ſhould reſign to him the paternal eſtate, upon his being poſſeſſed of Normandy; and he obliged the barons ſolemnly to ſwear, that they would not ſuffer his body to be buried, until Henry had taken an oath to put his laſt will in execution, tho' he was not eaſily prevail'd on to comply with their demands; but, at length, rather than his father's corpſe ſhould lie, unburied, he was brought to a compliance. His mother, Matilda, having, in proceſs of time, ſurrender'd Normandy to Henry, Geoffrey imagined, that he had a right to take poſſeſſion of Anjou; but we have already ſeen, that Henry expelled him. No ſooner was his brother ſeated on the Engliſh throne, than Geoffrey renewed his pretenſions; and the Anjevins eſpouſed his cauſe, chuſing rather to have a private earl, than to be de-

When the earl of Anjou made his will, Stephen was in flouriſhing circumſtances; and, therefore, he looked upon the crown to be, indeed, a thing to which he might juſtly aſpire, tho' the proſpect of it was very remote and diſtant. That he might not be wholly unprovided for, during his mother's life, was the ſole motive of leaving him the three earldoms; and, therefore, if we fix our thoughts only on the intent of this will, it is manifeſt, that, upon his being in poſſeſſion of Normandy and England, he ought to have reſigned Anjou to Geoffrey, eſpecially, as he had taken an oath to that purpoſe. The king pretended, that the will was null and void, ſince his father could not deprive the firſt-born of the patrimony received from his anceſtors; and, as to his oath, he, on eaſy terms, obtained a diſpenſation from the pope, which, at once, removed all his ſcruples, on that account. Upon this, he immediately reſolved on a war with his brother; and, having done homage to the king of France, he marched towards Poictou, and took from Geoffrey the cities of Mirebel, Chinon, and Lodun; and then, proceeding to Anjou, in ſpite of his brother's reſiſtance, he ſubdued all the fortified places, and forced him out of the country *.

The affairs of Bretagne.

This unhappy prince would have been left in a forlorn and wretched condition, had not the inhabitants of the earldom of Nantz voluntarily ſubmitted to his government; but, as this unexpected event was attended with very remarkable conſequences, I ſhall endeavour briefly to ſet it in a clear light. Conan the Groſs, duke of Bretagne, had a ſon, called Hoel, and a daughter, named Bertha, married to Eudo, earl of Pontievre, her relation, by whom ſhe had a ſon, ſtiled Conan, from his mother's father; but, ſome ſuſpicions inducing Conan the Groſs to diſinherit his ſon, Eudo, Bertha's husband, obtained Bretagne, after the death of his father-in-law, notwithſtanding Hoel's efforts, who had only the city of Nantz from him. Bertha dying four years after, Conan, her ſon, ſirnamed the Little, pretending that it was his mother's inheritance, aſſumed the title of duke of Bretagne; upon which, there aroſe, between the father and ſon, a war, which laſted many years, till, at laſt, Eudo, being entirely defeated, was obliged to fly, for refuge, to the court of France.

Conan the Little was no ſooner poſſeſs'd of Bretagne, than he undertook to reduce to his ſubjection the city of Nantz; which, ever ſince the death of Conan the Groſs, was a ſeparate ſtate, under Hoel's dominion. When the citizens of Nantz made their ſubmiſſion to Hoel, they acted upon a principle of juſtice, believing that his father had greatly injured him, in depriving him of his right; but, finding afterwards, that they were miſtaken, in their opinion of this prince, they expelled him, thinking him to be incapable of defending them againſt Conan, who was making preparations againſt them; and, from this time, there is not the leaſt notice taken of Hoel, in hiſtory. In the interim, the inhabitants of Nantz, not being able to come to a reſolution of ſubmitting to Conan, own Geoffrey, brother to the king of England, for their ſovereign; and, thus, he was made earl of Nantz, juſt after his expulſion out of Anjou, tho' he did not continue long in the poſſeſſion of this earldom. 1156.

Henry, having reduced Anjou, returned to England; and, upon his arrival, Malcolm, purſuant to a treaty, ſurrender'd to him Carliſle, Newcaſtle, and Bamborough-caſtle, contenting himſelf with the earldom of Huntingdon, which prince Henry, his father, had enjoyed. This reſtitution was, doubtleſs, very reaſonable; ſince David, Malcolm's grandfather, had obtained them by treaties, at a time when Stephen conſulted his own intereſt, more than that of the publick; but, in all probability, Henry's great power was the principal cauſe of the king of Scotland's moderation †.

Henry recovers Northumberland. M. Paris.

It is extremely ſurprizing, that the Welch, tho' Henry was become ſo formidable, ſhould, without any provocation, preſume to make incurſions into his frontiers; but the king, being highly incenſed, on the account of their ravages, reſolved to be ſeverely revenged on them; and, marching into Wales with a numerous army, he deſtroyed all before him, with fire and ſword. Upon the king's approach, the Welch retreated to their mountains, which were altogether inacceſſible; and his vanguard, running, one day, into a narrow defile, were entirely routed. This accident intimidated the reſt of the Engliſh troops; and their terror was increaſed by the raſh conduct of Henry de Eſſex, hereditary ſtandard-bearer of England. Upon a rumour, that was ſpread through the army, that the king was ſlain, he threw down the ſtandard and fled, crying out, the king is dead; but this imprudent action, for which he was afterwards confined in the monaſtery of Reading, and had his eſtate confiſcated, ſo diſpirited the Engliſh, that, had not the king ſhewn himſelf, to revive their drooping ſpirits, he would have hazarded the loſs of his whole army. However, the Welch being given to underſtand, that Henry had order'd a fleet to be in readineſs, to invade them by ſea, joyfully received the news, that Henry, weary of ſuch a vexatious war, was willing to enter into a treaty with them; by which, he reſerved to himſelf the liberty of cutting large roads through their woods, which might open for him a paſſage to their country, on any occaſion; and he likewiſe obliged them to ſurrender certain caſtles ‡, that they had taken, during the troubles of the late reign. 1157.

At this laſt ſolemnity, the king and queen, coming to the oblation, laid their crowns on the altar, and made a vow never to wear them more; and, from this time, the cuſtom of the kings wearing their crowns, during the great feſtivals, was, by degrees, diſuſed; at leaſt, there are but few inſtances of it, in the following reigns. About the ſame time, Henry order'd a new coinage, the current money of the kingdom being exceedingly adulterated, in Stephen's reign.

The death of Geoffrey, the king's brother.

Theſe peaceable employments being altogether unſuitable to Henry's martial diſpoſition, his brother Geoffrey's death, which fell out ſoon after, furniſhed him with an opportunity for action; for no ſooner was this prince laid in his grave, than the duke of Bretagne ſeized the city of Nantz, with the whole earldom, for which Henry deprived him of the earldom of Richmond in England; but Henry laid claim to it, as his brother's heir, and paſſed over into Normandy, with a powerful army, to make good his pretenſions. Whilſt he waited for ſeaſonable weather, to enter upon his expedition, he made a viſit to the king of France, in order to gain his intereſt, or, at leaſt, to prevail on him to ſtand neuter; for he very well knew, that, if Lewis continued quiet, the duke of Bretagne could not give him much diſturbance; and ſo dextrous was he in his addreſs, that, before they parted, a marriage was concluded between Henry's eldeſt ſon, who was but five years of age, and Margaret, the French king's daughter, an infant no more than five or ſix months old. Having, thus, ſecured France, he marched, at the head of his army, to Nantz, reſolving to take it by force, if Conan refuſed peaceably to reſign it; and Conan was conſtrained to give way to his ſuperior power; but the conqueſt of Nantz was not the only advantage Henry procured by this expedition. Before he left Bretagne, he made a treaty with Conan, purſuant to which, he obliged himſelf to give his daughter, Conſtance, in marriage to Geoffrey, Henry's ſon, who was yet in his cradle; and, by vertue of this marriage, celebrated five years after, Geoffrey, upon the death of his father-in-law, notwithſtanding his youth, became duke of Bretagne.

Argentre, l. 2. c. 15.

Henry's large dominions, with the late acquiſition of the earldom of Nantz, and the proſpect of being hereafter maſter of all Bretagne, could not ſatisfy his ambition; and, therefore, he was reſolved to revive his queen's title to the earldom of Tholouſe, which was of a vaſt extent. His alliance with Lewis the Young led him to hope, that he would permit him to extend his frontiers, on the ſide of Languedoc, as well as Bretagne; but he was diſappointed in his expectations. I ſhall firſt clear queen Eleanor's title to Tholouſe; and then proceed to enquire into the ſucceſs of that expedition.

1159. Henry's deſign upon Tholouſe. M. Weſt.

William IV, earl of Tholouſe, contemporary with the Conqueror, had an only daughter, named Philippa, who was married to William VIII, earl of Poictiers, Eleanor's grandfather; and, by this marriage, the earldom of Tholouſe was to fall, one day, to the houſe of Poictiers, which was alſo poſſeſs'd of Guienne; but William, Philippa's father, imagined, that he could ſecure it to his own family, by ſelling it to Raymond of St. Giles, his younger brother. This ſale, whether real or pretended, would have been inſufficient to deprive the counteſs of Poictiers, of her father's inheritance, if certain accidents had not concurred in favour of Raymond, who continued in poſſeſſion of the earldom of Tholouſe, after his brother's deceaſe; for the deſign of the earl of Poictiers, Philippa's husband, mortgaging his demeſns to William Rufus, in order to defray his charges to the Holy-Land, being fruſtrated by William's death, he made application elſewhere, and, at length, raiſed the money, by mortgaging his revenues for ſeveral years. The expences of his undertaking, and the loſs of all his equipage, obliged him to return home, where he had no reaſon to expect any ſupplies; but Raymond of St. Giles, falling in with this juncture, offered him a conſiderable ſum, to renounce his right to the earldom of Tholouſe. The earl of Poictiers, in his extremity, readily embraced this propoſal; in conſequence of which, Raymond kept poſſeſſion of the earldom, which his poſterity enjoyed after him, without any moleſtation from the earl of Poictiers, or his ſon, William IX. William dying, Lewis the Young, who married Eleanor, his only daughter and heireſs, revived the pretenſions of the houſe of Poictiers to the earldom of Tholouſe, maintaining that earl William's ſale to Raymond was a mere fiction; that Raymond, impoſing upon the earl's eaſy temper, had purchaſed his right, at too cheap a rate; and that he had not even paid the whole of the covenanted ſum. From theſe conſiderations he inferr'd, that the bargain was null and void; and that, of courſe, Eleanor ought to poſſeſs the earldom, in the right of Philippa, her grandmother, upon repaying to the earl of Tholouſe the money that the earl of Poictiers had received. Raymond V, then earl of Tholouſe, to no purpoſe, pleaded preſcription; which, tho' it is ſometimes of weight, in private affairs, was ineffectual againſt a prince, that was able to break through it by force of arms. However, at laſt, the affair was compromiſed, by a marriage between earl Raymond and Conſtance, Lewis's ſiſter, and widow Eleanor's ſecond marriage again embarraſſed Raymond's affairs; for Henry, being poſſeſs'd of the ſame rights the king of France had relinquiſhed, laid claim to the earldom of Catel. Pol. Virg. Tholouſe; but Raymond pleaded, as before, the ſale made to his grandfather, the reſignation of the houſe of Poictiers, and, beſides, a long poſſeſſion, which exceeded the term of a legal preſcription; and, therefore, he reſolved to defend his title to the earldom. As this caſe, then, was to be decided by arms, Henry enter'd into an alliance with Raymond, earl of Arragon and Barcelona, and engaged the king of Scotland to lend him a powerful aſſiſtance *; and no ſooner was his army in readineſs, than he marched towards Languedoc, taking Cahors in his way, and laid ſiege to Tholouſe.

1160. Henry beſieges Tholouſe. M. Weſt. Lewis the Younger, being jealous of Henry's greatneſs, arrived at Tholouſe, a few days before; and the large extent of that city, with the French king's ſuccours, rendered the ſiege ſo difficult, that Henry, deſpairing of ſucceſs, raiſed it, and returned into his own dominions; tho' Mezerai affirms, that he might have eaſily taken the city, if he had not made Fitz-Steph. a conſcience of beſieging his ſovereign; but he did not ſeem, on other occaſions, to have ſuch a veneration for the king of France. However that be, he marched back to Normandy, leaving the cuſtody of Cahors to Thomas Becket, his chancellor; and, in his return, he went, into le Beauvoiſis, where he commited great ravages, in revenge of Lewis's diſconcerting his meaſures. At the ſame time, Simon, earl of Montfort, ſurrendered to him his caſtles, in the neighbourhood of Paris, which cut of all communication with Orleans; ſo that the king of France was obliged to propoſe a ceſſation of arms, which was agreed upon for a year. During the truce, the two monarchs concluded a peace, which ratified the treaty of Paris, without the leaſt mention of Tholouſe; inſomuch that Henry preſerved, whilſt he was alive, his pretenſions to that peerdom, and left them, at his death, to his ſucceſſor, who was pleaſed to reſign them.

The laſt peace, between the kings of France and England, was no more than a confirmation of the treaty of Paris, in which a marriage was agreed upon, between Henry's eldeſt ſon and Margaret, Lewis's daughter, who was to have, for her dowry, the city of Giſors and part of the Vexin, which were to remain in the cuſtody of the knights templars †, till the marriage was ſolemnized. Purſuant to this treaty, chancellor Becket was ſent to Paris, with a magnificent retinue, to demand the young princeſs, who was to be educated in England, till ſhe became marriageable; but Henry, ſoon after her arrival at London ‡, ordered the nuptials to be celebrated, tho' the bridegroom was but ſeven, and the bride no more than three years old. Upon this, the knights templars, believing that he had ſufficiently made good his engagement, put him in poſſeſſion of Giſors; but this precipitant proceeding renewed the war between the two kings. Lewis complained, that Henry had bribed the grand maſter of the temple; but Henry alledged, that, by taking poſſeſſion of Giſors, he had not, in the leaſt, injured the king of France, as he had punctually performed his part of the treaty. However, this war was ſoon ended, by the mediation of Alexander III, lately arrived in France, who ſent two of his legates before him, to pave the way for an accommodation; upon which, the two kings went together, to receive the pope at Toroy upon the Loire; and no ſooner had they approached him, than they both alighted, and, each of them holding a rein of his bridle, conducted him to the lodgings prepared for his reception.

All theſe occurrences, the conqueſt of Nantz, the ſiege of Tholouſe, the marriage of prince Henry, and the war with France, happened, between the years 1159 and 1163; and I have ſuſpended my judgment, as to the preciſe dates of each, on account of the diverſity among hiſtorians, on that point; and, perhaps, this was the reaſon, why a famous modern author has comprized all theſe particulars, within the compaſs of eight or nine lines.

1163. his ſubjects, viz. Thomas Becket, raiſed a ſtorm which created him a thouſand vexations, and was not allayed, at laſt, without the loſs of his honour. He was the ſon of Gilbert Becket, a citizen of London, by Matildis *, a Syrian woman, and ſpent his youth in the ſtudy of the law; and he became ſo famous at the bar, that he was removed from thence, and made archdeacon of Canterbury †. In the beginning of this reign, he was concerned in the management of certain affairs at court, which introduced him to the king's acquaintance; and ſuch an high opinion did Henry entertain of his merit, that, in a little time, he gave him a ſenſible mark of his eſteem, by conferring on him the dignity of high-hancellor, upon the recommendation of Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury. In the diſcharge of this exalted office, Becket behaved towards all the world, in ſuch an arrogant and imperious manner, that he was extremely troubleſome to his equals, but altogether inſupportable to his inferiors. Above all things, he was fond of pomp and pageantry, having ſilver bits in his horſes bridles; and he exceeded any peer of the realm in his expences. It is ſaid, that, in the war of Tholouſe, where he attended the king, he maintained, at his own charge, 700 knights and 1200 foot; but tho' his carriage was haughty to all others, he, on all occaſions, ſeemed to be ſo obſequious and entirely devoted to the king's will, that he was perſuaded, that he would be always ready to ſacrifice every thing to his ſervice. In the interim he received the news, in Normandy, of the death of Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and, taking this to be a proper juncture, for the execution of certain premeditated ſchemes, he determined to promote Becket to that dignity, as a perſon that might be very ſerviceable in bringing about his deſigns. How little reſpect ſoever the monks of St. Auguſtin's had for Becket, whom they conſidered as too much a courtier; yet the king's recommendation of him, was ſo preſſing, that he was elected, and conſecrated, a little before that prince's return, after the ſee had been vacant one year, a month, and 14 days. As ſoon as he found himſelf fixed in that eminent ſtation, he ſent the great ſeal to his benefactor, when he leaſt expected it; and, ſuddenly changing his manner of living, he wore a monk's habit with ſackcloth, next to his skin, retaining only a few domeſtick ſervants in very plain clothing. By theſe and ſeveral other inſtances of the like nature, it evidently appeared, that he was either reſolved on a thorough reformation of his life, or had ſome great deſign in view; tho' his intentions were concealed, till, at length, it was diſcovered, that, on all occaſions, he aſpired after an independent power.

He ſends the great Seal to the king, and changes his manner of living.

I have already obſerved, in ſeveral places, how much the power of the clergy was increaſed, to the prejudice of the regal authority; and Henry, who had perceived the fatal effects of it, in Stephen's reign, enter'd into a reſolution, at his acceſſion to the throne, to reduce it within proper bounds; and, therefore, he began with the nobility, that their union with the clergy might not obſtruct his meaſures. The affairs, which employed him, ſome years, in France, obliged him to defer the execution of his project; but, this obſtacle being removed, he determined to ſet about it, immediately after his return into England; and this was the very reaſon of his ſo warmly recommending Becket to be archbiſhop of Canterbury. The matter in agitation was the regulation of ſeveral abuſes extremely prejudicial to the ſtate, but, at the ſame time, very advantageous to the clergy; and, conſequently, could not ſo well be reformed, unleſs the biſhops themſelves contributed their aſſiſtance; for the utmoſt addreſs and the concurrence of the archbiſhop of Canterbury were neceſſary, in ſuch a nice and tender point. Henry, with this view, placed Becket in that ſee, as a perſon inviolably attached to his intereſt, and whom he had loaded with favours; but his returning the great ſeal convinced the king, that he was deceived in his conjectures; and, perhaps, his reſentment of this proceeding was the cauſe of the cold reception he gave that prelate, at his arrival into England. In all probability, Becket, whilſt chancellor, was privy to the king's intentions, and even diſpos'd to approve them; but, upon his promotion to the primacy, he alter'd his ſentiments, and, in ſpite of his obligations to Henry, was reſolved to oppoſe him, in the purſuit of his projects; for he flatter'd himſelf with the hopes of immortal glory, in a reſolute defence of the cauſe of the clergy, which they affected to ſtile the cauſe of God.

Becket is reſolved to thwart the king's meaſures.

One of the greateſt grievances, to be redreſs'd, was the remiſſneſs in puniſhing prieſts convicted of any crime; for, when a clergyman was accuſed, he was tried in the eccleſiaſtical court, from whence there was no appeal; but theſe trials were carried on with ſuch indulgence, that the moſt enormous offences were puniſhed only with degradation, and others with a ſhort ſuſpenſion or eaſy confinement. The laity loudly complained, that they ſhould be liable to the utmoſt ſeverity of the laws, for crimes that only expoſed the clergy to ſome ſlight corrections; and, on the other hand, the churchmen, being ſure of impunity, daily committed outrages upon the laity, which they durſt not repel, leſt they ſhould incur a ſevere puniſhment. This abuſe was already increaſed to ſuch a degree, that it was made appear, in the king's preſence, that above 100 murders were committed by eccleſiaſticks, ſince his acceſſion to the throne; and yet not ſo much as one of the murderers was even degraded, the penalty enjoined, in the like caſes, by the canons. It was matter of ſtill greater aſtoniſhment, that the biſhops themſelves gloried in this their indulgence; for they imagined,

that

1163. that they could not give any more evident proofs of their zeal for religion and the ſervice of God, than by vigorouſly maintaining theſe pretended immunities of the clergy, and, conſequently, all the diſorders ariſing from them.

The firſt riſe of the quarrel between the king and Becket.

This being the ſtate of things, at the king's return, it fell out ſoon after, that a clergyman of the dioceſe of Sarum * committed a murder; and, the affair being brought into the archbiſhop's court, it was decreed, that the murderer ſhould be deprived of his benefice, and confined to a monaſtery †. The king, upon this, very warmly expoſtulated with the archbiſhop, for pronouncing ſo mild a ſentence, on a crime that was death by the laws of the land; but Becket, taking this expoſtulation to be entirely groundleſs, boldly aſſerted the immunities of the church and the privileges of the clergy, and even affirmed, that an eccleſiaſtick ought not to be capitally puniſhed, for any crime whatſoever. Henry anſwered, that, as he was appointed by God, to adminiſter juſtice to all his ſubjects, without any exception, he could not apprehend, that theſe pretended immunities ſhould ſcreen any malefactors from the puniſhments they deſerved; that it was not to be ſuppoſed, that the Almighty ſhould authorize offences in his miniſters, who ought rather to be puniſhed with more rigour than the laity; and, then, he declared, that, to prevent theſe abuſes, his intent was, that heinous offences, viz. murder, robbery, and the like, ſhould be tried in his own courts. Becket replied, that he would, by no means, allow, that clergymen ſhould be tried in the civil courts, but that the ſtricteſt care ſhould be taken to puniſh them, according to the canons; that, if after condemnation, in the eccleſiaſtical courts, to be degraded, they were guilty of other crimes, the kings might proceed againſt them, as the law directed; but that it was unreaſonable to puniſh them twice for the ſame offence. This diſpute being managed with great warmth, by both parties, they parted, extremely diſſatisfied with each other's ſentiments; nay, Becket, without any regard to the king's violent paſſion, preſumed even to reproach him, for unjuſtly depriving him of the caſtle of Rocheſter, and thereby notoriouſly violating the privileges of his archbiſhoprick; and he likewiſe demanded Saltwood and Hethe, as belonging to his ſee, and the lands of William de Ros. Beſides, he ſummon'd the earl of Clare to do him homage, for the caſtle of Tunbridge, which he claimed as a fief of the ſee of Canterbury, without giving the king the leaſt notice of his pretenſions; but the earl anſwered, that he held his caſtle of the king, by knight's ſervice, which had no relation to the archbiſhoprick ‡. If, from Becket's temper, we may form a judgment, his claim to the caſtle was very precarious; ſince he, at once, dropp'd the affair; but, this attempt being defeated, in order to extend his juriſdiction, he collated one Lawrence, a prieſt, to the rectory of Aineſford, in direct violation of the patron's right of preſentation. The patron, who was a baron of the realm, being unwilling tamely to give up his right, would not ſuffer Lawrence to take poſſeſſion of the benefice; and the archbiſhop, conſidering this, as an heinous offence, excommunicated him, upon which he applied to the king. Henry was extremely incenſed, at Becket's preſumptuous proceeding; for, ever ſince William the Conqueror, it was a branch of the royal prerogative, that no tenant in capite ſhould be excommunicated, without the king's knowledge. But this was the very point Becket intended to diſpute; and, perhaps, his view, in the late ſtep, was, purely, to introduce the queſtion.

The king propoſes to have the clergy tried in the civil courts. Diceto. M. Paris. Becket oppoſes him. Hoved.

Henry undertakes to reduce the power of the clergy.

Henry was exceedingly mortified, to find that he had not the leaſt proſpect of putting his project in execution; for he was ſenſible, that it would be in vain to expect any compliance from the clergy, whilſt the archbiſhop of Canterbury, on all occaſions, ſo vigorouſly oppoſed him; and, therefore, he reſolved to take other more effectual meaſures. However, he was willing, firſt, to try gentle methods, by cauſing the archbiſhop to be reminded of the many favours he had received from his ſovereign, as well as the dangerous conſequences of his obſtinacy, both to the church and kingdom; but, theſe remonſtrances proving abortive he determined to execute, in ſpite of that prelate's oppoſition, what he deſigned to have accompliſh'd, with his aſſiſtance. To this end, he convened the principal lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, to conſult about ways and means to redreſs the grievances of the ſtate; and, he repreſented to them, that unleſs ſpeedy care was taken to curb Becket, who was a haughty and enterprizing prelate, he would, at length, uſurp all the prerogatives of the crown, under religious pretences, as evidently appeared from his late proceedings. The majority of the temporal lords joyfully embraced this opportunity, to humble the archbiſhop; and, beſides, they deſired nothing more, than to have it in their power to clip the wings of the clergy, who made uſe of their utmoſt efforts to ſoar above the reſt of the nation. Henry, upon this, moved a regulation, which, he aſſured them, was abſolutely neceſſary to the welfare and tranquillity of the kingdom; and this regulation conſiſted of five articles, which the king called rhe cuſtoms of Henry I. his grandfather, becauſe they were obſerved in his reign. The I. was, that none ſhould appeal to Rome, without the king's licenſe. II. That no archbiſhop or biſhop ſhould go to Rome, upon the pope's ſummons, without the king's leave. III. 1163. king's conſent. IV. That all clergymen, accuſed of capital crimes, ſhould be tried in the king's courts. V. That the laity, whether the king or others, ſhould hold pleas of churches, tythes, and the like. Theſe articles were readily agreed to by the temporal lords; but the biſhops and abbots refuſed to ſubſcribe them, unleſs this clauſe, which render'd them ineffectual, was added, viz. ſaving the rights and privileges of the clergy and the church*. The king, reſenting this refuſal, ſuddenly left the aſſembly, and went to Woodſtock, having, firſt, intimated to the chief of the eccleſiaſticks, that he would make uſe of effectual meaſures to reſtrain their pride †; but this menace ſtruck ſuch a terror into the prelates, that, before the aſſembly broke up, they came to a reſolution of ſending deputies to the king, to implore his pardon, and aſſure him of their readineſs to comply with his will. Becket, for a long time, oppoſed this propoſal; tho', at laſt, yielding to the importunate ſollicitations of his brethren, he conſented, that the articles ſhould be admitted, without the ſaving clauſe. The king ſeemed to be highly ſatisfied with this deputation, eſpecially, as it was tranſacted with their unanimous conſent, and it is ſaid, that Becket himſelf waited upon the king, at Woodſtock, on this occaſion; yet Henry, fearing that the archbiſhop would recede from his word, under the pretence that this convention was not ſufficiently authorized to enact laws of this ſort, reſolved to have them ratified by an aſſembly-general or parliament. He, therefore, called a parliament at Clarendon, and propoſed the ſame articles, that were ſubſcribed by the former aſſembly; and, as they were ratified by all the temporal lords, they durſt not openly oppoſe them; but Becket and his party ſtill ſcrupled to ſign them. The archbiſhop even ſwore, that he would never ſubſcribe, tho' he had before accepted them; and it was not without great difficulty, that he was, at laſt, at the inſtances of the other biſhops, brought to a compliance ‡.

The parliament of Clarendon.

The pope condemns the conſtitutions of Clarendon.

How unwillingly ſoever Becket ſigned theſe articles , it was very ſatisfactory to the king; for he was confident, that the pope would readily conſent to laws, that were approved by the biſhops themſelves. Accordingly, he reſolved to have them confirmed by a bull, in order to prevent the prelates from recanting; but the pope no ſooner ſaw the articles, than he refuſed to give them the ſanction of his authority; nay, he condemned them, as very deſtructive of the church's privileges. Becket, ſoon after, publickly declared, that he repented of ſigning the conſtitutions of Clarendon, and that he could only hope for the pardon of ſuch an heinous offence from the pope's mercy; and, therefore, retiring to Wincheſter, he ſuſpended himſelf, as unworthy to perform the archiepiſcopal functions, till the pope, who was then at Sens in France, ſhould be pleaſed to give him abſolution; but, this being eaſily obtained, he reſumed his functions, upon the pope's aſſurances, that he would ſupport him. In the interim, Alexander, willing to amuſe Henry, ſent the archbiſhop of Roan, with propoſals for an accommodation; but the king would not receive any of the pope's propoſals, unleſs he would ratify the conſtitutions of Clarendon. 1163.

The king proſecutes Becket.

Henry, finding that the archbiſhop, proud of the pope's protection, grew daily more obſtinate and incorrigible, involved him in ſeveral vexatious law-ſuits, which, after all, were incapable of obliging him to deſiſt from his pretenſions ††. Among other actions, that were enter'd againſt him, there were two of great importance; the firſt of which related to a certain manor in his poſſeſſion, that, John, the king's marſhal, alledged, was unjuſtly detained from him. Becket, ſtanding trial, was caſt and fined 500 l. and, being convinced by this ſentence, that he ſhould loſe all the ſuits commenced againſt him, he reſolved not to plead, for the future, chuſing rather to be condemned, for non-appearance, than by a peremptory decree. The king did not ſeem, as yet, to deſign to make him feel the whole weight of his reſentment; but, in a little time, it appeared, that he was reſolved upon his utter ruin. With this view, he ordered him to be accuſed of two capital crimes, in a great council held at Northampton, October the 13th; firſt, for converting to his own uſe the revenues of the ſee of York, of which he had the cuſtody, whilſt he was chancellor ‡‡; and, ſecondly, for embezzling 30,000 l. ſterling of the king's money. Inſtead of clearing himſelf from theſe accuſations, he replied, that, upon his being made archbiſhop, prince Henry, the king's ſon, and Richard de Lucy, his juſticiary, had acquitted him of all accounts; but, if this had not been the caſe, he ſaid, that he was not obliged to anſwer before laymen, as he was the principal eccleſiaſtick in the kingdom. The former part of his reply was certainly to his diſadvantage; ſince the prince, who acquitted him, was no more than ſeven or eight years old, tho' he was ſtiled guardian of the realm, in the abſence of the king, his father. Beſides, one would have imagined, that a perſon of his 1163. ſacred character ſhould have been always prepared to give an account of his adminiſtration; even tho', from an exceſs of complaiſance, thoſe that governed had diſpenſed with it. As for the latter part of his anſwer, he himſelf had cut off that plea, by ſubſcribing the conſtitutions of Clarendon; but to this he replied, that they were condemned by the pope, whoſe ſentence was of greater validity than all the laws of the land. How pertinent ſoever this reply was, to ſecure an intereſt in the pope, it could be of no ſervice to him in the king's court, where judgment was to be given, purſuant to theſe conſtitutions; and, accordingly, he was conſidered not only as contumacious, but as a rebel againſt the authority of the laws. The utmoſt endeavours were uſed, to prevail on him to own the juriſdiction of the court, but to no purpoſe; for he even refuſed to wait on the king, pretending to be ill of the cholick, tho' he ſent for him, in order, by diſcourſing with him in perſon, to do all that was poſſible, to bring him to ſome temper *.

Becket is accuſed of two freſh crimes.

Upon this refuſal, the king accuſed Becket a-freſh, firſt, for abſconding from juſtice on frivolous excuſes; and, ſecondly, for diſobedience to his authority; and, having denied to plead to theſe accuſations, all his moveable goods were confiſcated; but, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of this ſentence, it did not fully ſatisfy Henry's reſentment. As he perceived, that the charges was ſo formed, as not to reach Becket's perſon, he had him accuſed of perjury and treaſon, for the violation of his oath of allegiance, and refuſing the ſubmiſſion that was due to his ſovereign; and, tho' this proceeding made the archbiſhop ſenſible, that the king was reſolved to compleat his ruin, it only confirmed, him in his obſtinacy and perverſeneſs. Perhaps, this was the effect of his proud and ſtubborn diſpoſition; or rather, it was done with a view to immortalize his name by an invincible firmneſs, which, in his opinion, ought to entitle him to a place among the moſt famous confeſſors in the church. The court, at laſt, pronounced him guilty of perjury; and the biſhops ſent him word, that they would no longer regard him, as their primate, nor even hold communion with him; but, after all, remaining ſtill inflexible, he look'd upon the ſentence, paſs'd againſt him, to be void and, regardleſs of the king's diſpleaſure, continued his functions.

The court of peers ſeem to have avoided giving ſentence, on the charge of treaſon, which was death by the law, purely, to leave him, room to come off, by ſubmitting to the king; but, finding that he was incorrigible, they convened, once more, to conſult about means to ſubdue his obſtinate temper. Becket was no ſooner inform'd, that the barons were aſſembled, in the king's preſence, than he went to church, and ordered theſe words of the ſecond Pſalm, to be ſung: "The rulers 1163. "take counſel together againſt the Lord, "and againſt his Anointed" †; and then, with his croſs in his hand, without being ſummoned or asking leave, and tho', ſentence being paſs'd upon him, he had not right to be there, he intruded into the room, where the king and lords were aſſembled. The archbiſhop of York ſeverely reprimanded him, for coming into the royal preſence, in that manner, which he aſſured him, amounted to no leſs than an open defiance of the king; and, he deſired him to conſider, that his weapon was not ſo ſharp as that of his ſovereign. Becket anſwered, "that, indeed, the king's ſword "could kill the body; but his deſtroyed the ſoul and ſent it to hell." This reply ſo exaſperated Henry, that he ordered the lords to paſs ſentence directly, on the new crime he had juſt committed; and the court, after a long debate, declared, that he ought to be impriſon'd, and puniſh'd according to law, for inſulting the king and coming into the aſſembly, in ſuch a ſeditious manner. Upon this, the earls of Cheſter and Cornwall were ſent to ſummon him to appear and receive his ſentence; but he refuſed to come, declaring that the peers were not authorized to judge him; and that he appeal'd to the pope. The earls repreſented to him, that, by this refuſal, he incurr'd the guilt of treaſon; to which he anſwer'd, that, were it not for the reſtraints of his character, he would vindicate himſelf, in ſingle combate, againſt thoſe that ſhould dare to accuſe him of that crime, and force them to repent of their calumny. However, he did not think it expedient to wait for the reſult ‡, but privately departed that very night, attended only by three perſons, and went to Lincoln; from whence, in diſguiſe and under the name of Dereman, he travelled thro' bye-ways, till he came to Sandwich, where he embarqued for Flanders **.

1164. The king of France, hoping that Becket, being ſupported, would embarraſs the affairs of his ſovereign, which might turn to his advantage, made an offer to him of his protection; but Henry diſpatched Gilbert, biſhop of London, and William, earl of Arundel, as his ambaſſadors, to acquaint Lewis, that it was very unbecoming in a ſovereign prince to protect perſons guilty of high-treaſon. Lewis replied, that he was under indiſpenſable obligations to afford ſanctuary to the unfortunate, in his dominions; and that he muſt, of courſe, conſider Becket, as ſuch, till he was condemned by the pope. Thus, his jealouſy and paſſion prevented him from reflecting, that, by urging the pope's authority, in the preſent caſe, he only wounded Henry thro' his own ſides; but ſuch was his deſire to diſtreſs that prince, that it led him to overlook all other conſiderations; and he even ſollicited the pope, to eſpouſe Bec-

1164. ket's cauſe againſt Henry, whoſe intereſt, in good policy, he ought to have ſtrenuouſly maintained.

The pope, who was ſtill at Sens, was eaſily gained; for he knew, that this might be a means of enlarging his authority; and, beſides, he foreſaw, that, if he abandon'd the archbiſhop, none of the clergy, for the future, would be zealous, in the defence of the rights of the church; and, therefore, he no ſooner heard, that Becket was condemned and obliged to fly, like a criminal, than he threatened to make Henry and the barons of England repent of their raſhneſs. In the interim, Henry, in order to prepoſſeſs the pope in his favour, ſent ambaſſadors, to give him an account of all particulars, and intreat him to ſend legates into England, with full powers, finally to decide the conteſt; and the archbiſhop of York, the chief of the ambaſſy, ſpoke, with great vehemence, againſt Becket. He charged him with want of reſpect to the king's perſon, and even threatening to excommunicate him; and he aſſerted, that he was guilty of high-treaſon, in refuſing to ſubmit to the judgment of the court of peers, under the ridiculous pretence, that it was indecent for a father to be judged by his ſons. Becket, who was preſent at this audience, in his own defence, declared, in the firſt place, that he could not anſwer in a civil court, without a direct violation of the canons of the church; and, ſecondly, that, even tho' he could have owned their authority, he would not have ſubmitted to their judgment, ſince he was aſſured of their reſolution to condemn him; and, laſtly, that he could not apprehend, that he was guilty of any crime, in appealing to the pope, who was, doubtleſs, the moſt proper judge, from whom he expected an impartial ſentence. Upon this, addreſſing himſelf to the pope and cardinals, he deſired them to conſider, that his caſe was not ſo much a conteſt between a ſubject and his ſovereign, as the cauſe of the univerſal church; ſince it was evidently the king's intention to deprive the clergy of their privileges. The ambaſſadors, perceiving that he was reſolved to engage the whole church in his quarrel, inſiſted more ſtrenuouſly on the king's requeſt, to ſhew, that he could not have any deſigns againſt the church, becauſe he deſired that the affair might be tried, in England, by the legates of the holy ſee; and the pope had no other way, to evade this reaſonable demand, than by declaring that he would take cognizance of the matter himſelf; adding, that, in imitation of the Almighty, "he would not give his glory to another." The pope declined to ſend legates, leſt they ſhould be capable of bribery; and, in the mean time, he deferred the trial, not having leiſure, at the preſent juncture, to examine a cauſe of ſuch importance. Beſides, he was impatient to return to Rome, where he was recalled, upon the death of Victor; but the ſchiſm was ſtill continued by the cardinals of the oppoſite party, who elected another pope, who aſſumed the name of Paſchal III.

The pope refuſes to ſend legates, to decide the conteſt between the king and Becket. Hoved.

Henry, extremely reſenting Alexander's proceedings, prohibited, under the ſevereſt penalties, all appeals to Rome; and he gave expreſs orders for the impriſonment of all, that were related to thoſe who went away with Becket, or joined him, ſince his departure. He afterwards ſequeſter'd, in the hands of the biſhop of London, the revenues of all the eccleſiaſticks, that openly eſpouſed his cauſe; and he enjoined the magiſtrates to puniſh, as traitors, upon the ſpot, all that ſhould be apprehended, either with the pope's or archbiſhop's mandates or letters about them, importing the excommunication of any private perſon, or an interdict upon the kingdom. He likewiſe order'd the revenues of the ſee of Canterbury and all Becket's effects to be ſeized; that Peterpence ſhould be collected, but not ſent out of the kingdom; and, in fine, not content with forbidding prayers for him in the church, he baniſhed all his family, not ſparing even the moſt diſtant relations. 1165.

Henry's proceedings againſt the pope and Becket. Gervaſe. M. Paris.

Theſe rigorous methods only tended, ſo much the more, to incenſe the archbiſhop, who excommunicated all that adhered to the conſtitutions of Clarendon, and, in particular, ſome lords of the council, tho' they deſpiſed his cenſures; and, at length, finding that the king was reſolutely determined to maintain his ground, ſent him a threatening letter, which it will not be improper to inſert, as it gives an inſight into the character of that prelate.

THOMAS, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to the KING of ENGLAND.

'I Have moſt earneſtly deſired to ſee you; and tho', in this, I had a view to my own, yet your intereſt lay neareſt my heart. I entertained hopes, that, at the ſight of me again, you would recollect the many ſervices I had done you, with all imaginable regard and affection; for the truth of which, I appeal to the Judge of all mankind, when they ſhall appear before his tribunal, to be rewarded according to their actions. I flatter'd myſelf, that my unhappy caſe would have excited your compaſſion, who am forced to beg my bread in a ſtrange land, tho', by the grace of God, I am plentifully ſupplied with all things neceſſary for my ſubſiſtence. In the mean time, I receive great conſolation from the words of the apoſtle, "They that live in Chriſt ſhall ſuffer perſecution;" and alſo from the ſaying of the prophet, "I never ſaw the "righteous forſaken, nor his ſeed begging "their bread." As to what relates to you, I am, of courſe, ſenſibly affected with it, for three reaſons; becauſe you are my liege-lord, king, and ſpiritual ſon. As my liege-lord, I owe and offer you my beſt advice; yet ſuch as is due from a biſhop, ſaving the honour of God and the head of the church. As my king, I owe you a profound reſpect, and am likewiſe obliged to admoniſh you; and, as my ſon, it is my duty to correct and exhort you. Kings are anointed in the head, the breaſt, and the arms, which denote glory, holineſs, and power; and it appears from ſeveral inſtances in the ſcriptures, that Pharaoh, Saul, Solomon, Nebuchadnezzar, and 1165. ‘ and many other kings, that deſpiſed the commandments of the Lord, were deprived of ‘ glory, underſtanding, and might; whilſt ‘ David, Hezekiah, and others, that humbled ‘ themſelves before God, received not only a ‘ larger meaſure of grace, but in greater perfection. Take, then, my liege-lord, the ‘ advice of your vaſſal; attend, my king, to ‘ the admonitions of your biſhop; and ſubmit, ‘ my ſon, to the corrections of your father, ‘ leſt you be perverted into ſchiſm, or prevailed on to hold communion with ſchiſmaticks. It is notorious, with what profound ‘ veneration you have received the pope; how ‘ zealous and active you have been, in ſupporting the church of Rome; and what ‘ grateful returns the church and pope have made you. Remember, therefore, your declaration, which you even laid upon the altar, at your coronation, that you would protect the church of God in all her immunities. ‘ Reſtore the church of Canterbury, from which ‘ you received your authority, to its former ‘ ſtate, under your predeceſſors and mine; or ‘ elſe be aſſured, that you will expoſe yourſelf ‘ to the wrath and vengeance of the Almighty.

1166. Henry guards againſt the pope's attacks. Gervaſe.

It is not to be ſuppoſed, that this letter could pacify the incenſed king, or that the writer penn'd it, with any ſuch view; and, in the interim, Henry, being ſenſible that the king of France fomented the diſcord between him and the court of Rome, levied a numerous army, as well to prevent any revolt that his holineſs might occaſion, in his dominions, as to be in a readineſs to withſtand Lewis, in caſe of oppoſition. This precaution, doubtleſs, hinder'd Alexander from purſuing his deſigns, with ſo much vigour as he intended; and, indeed, a prince, that is ſupported with a powerful army, may always render himſelf formidable to thoſe, that are armed with no other than ſpiritual weapons. In the mean time, the biſhop of London and the reſt of the ſuffragans of the province of Canterbury wrote to the archbiſhop, on the account of his letter to the king, and reminded him of his pride, in addreſſing his ſovereign, without the cuſtomary ſalutations, as if he had written to an inferior; and they repreſented to him his ingratitude to a prince, that had raiſed him, from a mean condition, to ſuch a height of grandeur, and his arrogance, in preſuming to threaten a mighty monarch; and, laſtly, they aſſured him, that they appealed to the pope, from all his proceedings againſt them or the kingdom, and appointed Aſcenſion-day, to produce their reaſons.

The pope ſends legates to the king.

The king of England's army exceedingly alarmed the pope, who was apprehenſive, that Henry would, at length, enter into an alliance with the emperor, and ſo deprive him of the king of France's protection; and, therefore, in order to divert Henry from ſuch a deſign, when he leaſt expected it, Alexander diſpatched Gratian, nephew to the late pope Eugenius, and Vivian, advocate of the court of Rome, as his legates, into England, to determine the affair in diſpute; but they were ſcarce ſet out, before he clogg'd their powers with reſtrictions, that prevented them from giving a deciſive ſentence. The legates, upon their arrival at London, met with another unexpected obſtacle in their way; for Becket refuſed to ſubmit to their judgment, unleſs the king would firſt reſtore all that had been taken from him or his friends, and revoke all his orders, ſince the beginning of the conteſt; i. e. unleſs he would previouſly condemn himſelf. The archbiſhop's refuſal put a ſtop to the proceedings of the legate; which plainly convinced Henry, that his holineſs only deſigned to amuſe him; and Becket's own friends, dreading the king's reſentment, adviſ'd him to give ſome ſatisfaction to his ſovereign. He replied, that he was ready to obey the king's will, “ ſaving his honour, the church's poſſeſſions, his “ own and the right of others”; but theſe ſalvo's made it manifeſt, that he was not, in the leaſt, diſpoſed to recede. Upon this, thoſe very perſons, who fondly imagined, that he would ſacrifice his private intereſt to the peace of the church, deſired to know, whether he would conſent to reſign his archbiſhoprick, provided the king, on that condition, would give up the conſtitutions of Clarendon? but he anſwer'd them, in plain terms, that he could not renounce his archiepiſcopal dignity, without betraying the cauſe of God and the church; whereas the king was obliged, in conſcience, to repeal his new laws. This anſwer, and the limited powers of the legates, entirely defeated Henry's expectations; but, in order, to perplex the archbiſhop, as much as poſſible, he ſent word to the abbot of Pontigni, who had, for two years, entertained Becket in his monaſtery, that, if he harboured him any longer, he would baniſh his dominions all the monks of his order *, and ſeize on all their eſtates; but, Becket, tho' he was conſtrained to quit the abbey, was, ſoon after, admitted by the king of France into Sens, where he often reſided, and for a great while together, being handſomely furniſhed with all neceſſary accommodations; and his frequent converſations with that monarch, doubtleſs, exceedingly contributed to heighten his former jealouſy and animoſity againſt the king of England.

Becket refuſes to ſubmit to their judgment.

About the latter end of this year, queen Eleanor was delivered of a fourth ſon, named John; and, in a little time after, the empreſs Matilda, the king's mother, departed this life, in the 67th year of her age †, who left very conſiderable legacies to the poor and the churches, and bequeathed a large ſum, for finiſhing the bridge of Roan, of which ſhe had laid the foundation.

1167. Matilda's death.

† Sandford affirms, that ſhe was buried, aged about 64 years, in the abbey of Bec in Normandy, with funeral pomp and ſolemnity; but Gabriel du Moulin aſſures us, that ſhe was interred in the church of Notre Dame du Pre, in the ſuburbs of Roan; and M. Paris tells us, that, by reaſon of her being the daughter of a king, wife of an emperor, and mother to a king, ſhe had the following lines engraven on her tomb:

“ Ortu magna, viro major, ſed maxima partu; Great born, match'd greater, greateſt brought to bed, “ Hic jacet HENRICI filia, ſponſa, parens.” Here HENRY's daughter, wife, and mother's laid.

1167. In the mean while, Becket, deprived of his revenues, languiſhed in a melancholy exile, whilſt the pope received no profits from England; and his holineſs foreſaw, that, unleſs ſome vigorous methods were made uſe of, his authority, in all probability, would not only be deſpiſed in England, but in other parts of Chriſtendom. Alexander was of a very haughty and imperious temper, being the ſame pope, that, ſome years after, treated the emperor Frederick Barbaroſſa ſo ignominiouſly, at Venice, as even inſolently to tread on his neck, after he made his ſubmiſſion to him; and, therefore, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that he would ſuffer Henry to get the aſcendant over him, without long and violent ſtruggles. Accordingly, no ſooner were his affairs, in ſome meaſure, ſettled, than he expreſs'd an extraordinary regard for Becket, and confirmed to him all the privileges enjoyed by his predeceſſors, on purpoſe to inſult the king; tho' there was no occaſion for this proceeding, whilſt the archbiſhop was in exile; but Henry, to be even with him, order'd a rumour to be ſpread abroad, that he deſigned to diſclaim Alexander's authority, and recognize Paſchal III. and, indeed, he proceeded ſo far as to acquaint ſome of the princes of Germany, that he was juſt upon the point of taking this reſolution. It is highly probable, that the king would, at once, have reſolved upon it, had there been any proſpect of bringing over the nation to this change, and eſpecially the clergy; but, a few prelates excepted, all the reſt of the Engliſh clergy ſecretly eſpouſed the pope and Becket's cauſe, tho' they durſt not openly declare for them. Alexander, being no ſtranger to their ſentiments, was ſo much the more daring and reſolute, in his behaviour; and, to demonſtrate that he was entirely regardleſs of the king's menaces, he ſent a letter to the biſhop of London, in which he commanded him boldly to admoniſh Henry, and enjoin him, in his name, to reſtore the archbiſhop to his ſee, and diſannul the conſtitutions of Clarendon. The biſhop executed his commiſſion, tho' with more diſcretion and temper than the pope had directed; and he afterwards wrote to his holineſs, to give him to underſtand, that the king's conduct could not, in juſtice, be blamed, ſince he only copied after his predeceſſors, and was willing to ſubmit to the judgment of the church, provided his cauſe was tried in the kingdom.

The pope orders the biſhop of London to admoniſh the king. Hoved. Diceto.

1168. Henry's conference with Becket, before the king of France.

Notwithſtanding the advantage the king had, hitherto, gained; yet he was extremely deſirous of putting an end to this vexatious affair, not only as it prevented the execution of his project of conquering Ireland, but as he foreſaw, that, at laſt, this conteſt would prove very prejudicial to him and his ſubjects. He, therefore, deſired the king of France to appoint a place, where they might have an interview with Becket; and, Lewis conſenting to this propoſal, the archbiſhop made his appearance, before the two kings. Becket being asked, whether he would own, that it was his duty to obey his ſovereign; he replied, that he was ready to obey him, in all things, "ſaving the honour of God"; but Henry repreſented to the king of France, that, by this ſalvo, he reſerved a power, to pronounce whatever diſpleaſed him, contrary to the honour of God; and, therefore, he adds, I will make this propoſal to him, which cannot be ſuſpected of a double meaning: "There have been "kings in England leſs potent than my ſelf, Gervaſe. "and archbiſhops that have been both great "and holy; if he will only pay me the ſame "regard, that the greateſt of his predeceſſors "paid the leaſt of mine, I will reſt content-"ed." Becket, however, rejected this fair offer; for he very well knew, it was not an eaſy matter to juſtify his pretenſions, by any former precedents; and he alledged, that, as the affair was referred to the pope, he could agree to nothing, without his conſent. The king of France, notwithſtanding his partiality for Becket, freely acknowledged, that the archbiſhop's perverſeneſs was the ſole obſtacle to a peace; and this confeſſion quaſhed, in a great meaſure, the report, that was ſo induſtriouſly ſpread in the world, that he deſign'd to aboliſh the privileges of the Engliſh clergy; tho' it made no impreſſion on Becket, who was aſſured of the pope's approbation and aſſiſtance.

1169. Becket excommunicates the Engliſh prieſts.

Alexander, ſoon after, ſent Henry notice, that he was indiſpenſably obliged to grant the archbiſhop a power to revenge the injuries, offered to the church and his own perſon, with the ſword of excommunication; and no ſooner was he authorized by the pope, than he excommunicated ſo many of the clergy, that he ſcarce left a ſufficient number to officiate in the king's chapel; and, tho' moſt were, in their hearts, inclined to his cauſe, he charged them with groſs prevarication, in not openly eſpouſing it. Henry, exaſperated at theſe proceedings, appealed to a future council, and acquainted the pope, that, unleſs he directly diſpatched legates, with full powers to determine the diſpute, he would take other more diſagreeable meaſures; and this menace exceedingly perplexed Alexander. On the one hand, he dreaded an union between the king and the emperor; and, on the other, he could not deſiſt, without great prejudice to the holy ſee; but, in this extremity, he had recourſe to the uſual methods always, to purpoſe, practiſed by the court of Rome, on the like occaſions. To amuſe Henry, he ſent legates into Normandy; but, as they were making preparations to wait on the king, they received new inſtructions, not to pronounce a definitive ſentence, without imparting it to the archbiſhop of Sens; and none had a greater averſion to a ſudden peace than that prelate.

Henry threatens the pope, upon which he ſends legates.

Another conference between the king and Becket, to no purpoſe. M. Paris.

Some time after, at the pope's deſire, Henry went to Paris, and had another conference with Becket, in the preſence of the king of France, but to as little purpoſe as any of the former; for the archbiſhop, who would not, in the leaſt, give way, inſiſted on an entire reſtitution, before the treaty was begun; which Henry refus'd, without knowing, firſt, the terms of their agreement. Becket could have expected no other compenſation, if he himſelf had ſubmitted to make any conceſſions; but to pretend, that the king ſhould repair

Diceto.

1169. repair his loſſes, without any advances on his part, was, in other words, to declare againſt a reconciliation. The only proof, he gave of his inclination to peace, was, that he would ſtand to the judgment of the French divines; and, this propoſal being rejected, the negotiation was broke off, tho' to the king's advantage, as it more conſpicuouſly diſcovered his peaceable diſpoſition.

It is impoſſible to compoſe a quarrel with the clergy, without anſwering all their demands; for, as they pretend, that their cauſe is the cauſe of God, they take it be ſinful to make any conceſſions. Purſuant to this principle, the archbiſhop of Sens ſollicited the pope, to excommunicate Henry, as an obſtinate heretick, and lay his kingdom under an interdict; upon which, the king iſſued out a new edict, prohibiting all his ſubjects to receive any orders from the pope, or Becket, and declaring, that all thoſe, that ſubmitted to an interdict, ſhould inſtantly be hanged, as traitors to their king and country. He likewiſe commanded all abſent clergymen to repair to their churches, on pain of the forfeiture of their revenues, and ſuſpended the payment of Peter-pence, till farther orders; by which vigorous proceedings, he obliged the pope to defer the execution of his deſign, to a more favourable opportunity.

Gervaſe.

The king's proceedings againſt the pope.

1170. In the interim, Henry, who had continued near four years in France, returned home, in order to regulate ſome diſorders, occaſioned by his abſence; for the adminiſtration of juſtice was ſo ſcandalouſly neglected, that, upon his arrival, he ſent commiſſioners into all the counties of the kingdom, with full powers, to enquire into the miſdemeanours of the magiſtrates and puniſh the guilty.

Henry returns to England.

This and ſome other neceſſary regulations being made, to the people's ſatisfaction, he called an aſſembly-general, at which were preſent the biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, ſheriffs, bailiffs, and aldermen of the principal cities in England; and he cauſed Henry, his eldeſt ſon, to be crowned, before them, by the archbiſhop of York, aſſiſted by the biſhops of London and Durham; and, the next day, all the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the magiſtrates of the cities and counties, ſwore allegiance to the young king. Henry himſelf, in honour to his ſon's coronation, carried up the firſt diſh, at the feaſt on this occaſion; and, ſpeaking to his ſon, ſaid: "No "monarch was ever ſerved in a more honoura- "ble manner"; but the young king, inſtead of returning his compliment, being of a very haughty temper, turning to the archbiſhop of York, who ſtood near him, ſpoke in a low voice: "It was not ſuch a great inſtance of "condeſcenſion, for the ſon of an earl to "ſerve the ſon of a king."

Henry's eldeſt ſon is crowned.

The young king's pride.

Becket is mortified.

Henry, by the means of this coronation, performed with univerſal applauſe, not only ſecured the crown in his own family, but exceedingly mortified Becket, who pretended, that the celebration of this ſolemnity was an office annexed to the dignity of archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The king of France being diſguſted, becauſe his daughter was not crowned with the prince, her ſpouſe, and on other accounts, declared war againſt Henry; but it was almoſt as ſoon ended as begun, by a treaty of peace.

1170. Lewis renews the war with Henry.

Henry was, quickly after, ſeized with a violent fever, at Domfront in the province of Maine; and, deſpairing of a recovery, he made his will. He left England, Normandy, Maine, and Anjou to Henry, his eldeſt ſon, and to Richard, his ſecond, Guienne and Poictou; but Geoffrey had only Bretagne, to be enjoyed after the death of duke Conan, his brother-in-law, and John, his fourth ſon, he recommended to the care and proviſion of his eldeſt brother.

Henry, falling ſick, makes his will.

The near view of death raiſed ſuch ſcruples in the king's mind, that he reſolved, at any rate, to be reconciled to Becket, in caſe he recovered; for he thought, that the archbiſhop had been ſufficiently puniſh'd by a ſix years exile; and he was deſirous of a ſolid repoſe, which the pope threatened to interrupt, by thundering the church's cenſures againſt him. Accordingly, as ſoon as his health permitted, he had an interview with the king of France at Montmirail, in Becket's preſence; and Henry was then diſpoſed to ſatisfy almoſt all the archbiſhop's demands. However, the articles of the treaty being ſettled, Becket, juſt as he was going to give the king the kiſs of peace, was pleaſed to ſay, that he was about to ſalute him to the honour of God; but Henry, ſuſpecting his ſincerity, and believing there was ſome hidden myſtery couched in that expreſſion, refuſed to receive his ſalute. The archbiſhop inſiſted upon uſing this form of ſalutation; ſo that this conference, after all the pains taken to accommodate matters, proved ineffectual, by reaſon of the over-ſcrupulous nicety of both parties. Henry, at length, willing, on any terms, to put an end to this affair, held another interview at Amboiſe, where the king of France met him, attended by ſeveral princes and lords; and here, at laſt, all difficulties were ſurmounted. Henry was ſincerely reconciled to Becket, and ſwore he would reſtore him to his former ſtate, before his baniſhment, and likewiſe make reſtitution to all his friends and relations.

He reſolves upon a reconciliation with Becket, and has an interview with him at Montmirail. M. Paris.

But, tho' Becket obliged the king to pardon all thoſe that offended him, he did not himſelf act in the ſame generous manner; for having obtained the pope's licenſe, before he left France, to ſuſpend the archbiſhop of York, and excommunicate the biſhops of London, Durham, and Exeter, who appeared the moſt openly againſt him, he executed theſe orders, the very moment after his arrival in England. He entirely diſregarded the intreaties of the young king, who ſent meſſengers to diſſuade him from his deſign; and yet, notwithſtanding this affront, he determined to pay his reſpects to that prince, at Woodſtock, where he reſided; tho' ſome ſay, that his main view, in that viſit, was to make a triumphant entry into London, through which he was to paſs, in his way to that place. However that be, he lodged in Southwark, deſigning to ſet 1170. out for Woodſtock, the next day; but he received a letter from the young king, ordering him to repair, forthwith, to Canterbury. Tho' this order extremely mortified the archbiſhop, in compliance with it, he proceeded to the capital of his dioceſe, where he made his entry, with the acclamations of the meaner ſort of people; whilſt the more conſiderate were concerned to find, from his triumphant appearance, that his long exile had only render'd him more haughty and imperious; and of this they had, ſoon after, more particular proofs, when Becket, mounting his archiepiſcopal chair, on Chriſtmas-day, ſolemnly excommunicated Nigel de Sackvil, for unjuſtly detaining a manor belonging to his ſee, and Robert Broc, for cutting off the tail of a horſe, that was carrying proviſions to his palace; and, indeed, if the archbiſhop had intended to keep up a good underſtanding with the king, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that he would have excommunicated, for ſuch trifles, two immediate vaſſals of the crown, which was one of the articles, that occaſioned the late diſpute.

He excommunicates two barons.

In the interim, the ſuſpended and excommunicated prelates went to the king, who was ſtill in Normandy; and, being admitted into his preſence, they complained, that the treaty, made with Becket, only redoubled the terrors and perplexities of thoſe, that had ſacrificed themſelves to his ſervice; and the archbiſhop of York added, that, during Becket's life, it was impoſſible for England to enjoy any tranquillity. Henry, highly incenſed by theſe complaints, and weary of being inceſſantly teized with the inſolence of a ſubject, whom he had raiſed from the duſt, vented the following words, with a loud voice: "I am very miſerable, that, "among the numbers I maintain, there is not "a man that will dare to revenge the inſults, "I continually receive from a deſpicable prieſt." Theſe expreſſions were no ſooner uttered, than Reginald Fitz-Urſe, William Tracy, Richard Britton, and Hugh Morvill, four of the king's domeſticks, entered into a combination, to free him from this enemy; and, coming to Canterbury, the archbiſhop being, one day, at the cathedral with a few attendants, they went, armed, up to the very altar, where he was ſtanding. They firſt outrageouſly upbraided him, for his pride and ingratitude; but, as the deſign of their coming was not, merely, to reproach him, upon his reſolute anſwer, they fractured his skull, with their clubs *, in ſuch a violent manner, that his blood and brains flew all over the altar. Upon which, without any interruption, they peaceably retired; but, being afraid of returning to the king, they remained, a whole year, at Knaresborough-caſtle in Yorkſhire; and ſome relate, that they went to Rome, for abſolution, and were ordered to go to Jeruſalem and do penance on the Black-Mountain, for life †. Becket's zeal and reſolution, in recommending to God, with his dying breath, the cauſe of the church, and the time and manner of his death, aggravating the guilt of the murderers, gained him more friends, than ever, after his deceaſe. 1171.

The king's raſh expreſſions.

1171. Four of his domeſticks combine againſt Becket, and murder him at the altar.

This was the fate of that famous archbiſhop, whom ſome have conſidered, as a moſt illuſtrious martyr; whilſt others have ſcrupled to give him the character of an honeſt man and a good chriſtian. About 50 years after his death, it was the ſubject of a publick diſpute, in the univerſity of Paris, whether Becket was in heaven or hell; for ſome aſſerted, that, for his extreme arrogance, he deſerved damnation; tho' others maintained, that, the miracles, performed at his tomb, were unexceptionable proofs of his ſalvation. It muſt, indeed, be confeſs'd, that this prelate ſuffered marytrdom; but, whether it was, in reality, for the cauſe of God and religion, or only for that of the pope and clergy, may be made a queſtion. I ſhall leave this affair to the reader's own reflections, and proceed to relate the conſequences of Becket's death, which are, to the full, as remarkable as the incidents of his life; for, as he had ſpilt his blood, in defence of the church, he was thought worthy to be canonized, within two or three years after his deceaſe; but, notwithſtanding this monument of the pope's gratitude to ſuch a faithful ſervant, to convince the world of his ſaintſhip, it muſt be proved, that the cauſe, for which he died, was approved by God. Miracles were the moſt proper arguments, to infuſe this belief into the minds of the people; and, accordingly, ſuch multitudes of miracles were inſtantly wrought at this martyr's tomb, that, in any other age, their number and nature would have render'd the truth of them very ſuſpicious; for neither Chriſt, nor his apoſtles, perform'd the like, or ſo many, in confirmation of chriſtianity, as this new ſaint did, to authorize the privileges and immunities of the clergy. He not only raiſed dead men to life, but even the very beaſts; and it was reported, for fact, that, being expoſed to view in the church, before his burial, he roſe out of his coffin, and lighted the wax-candles, that were extinguiſhed; and that, after the funeral ceremony was over, he held up his hand to bleſs the people. To theſe many other miracles were added, equally unworthy of the majeſty of God; tho' they were ſpread, with ſuch confidence, that there was not ſo much as a ſingle perſon, that preſumed to call them in queſtion. The pope's legates, who were ſent, ſome time after, on purpoſe to examine this affair, found

* Gervaſe and Brompton affirm, they only made uſe of ſwords.

† Gervaſe of Canterbury and Edward Ryme, both eye-witneſſes of the fact, give a large account of the circumſtances of Becket's death; and the latter's arm was almoſt cut off, by receiving the firſt blow that was made at the archbiſhop's head, occaſioned by his calling Fitz-Urſe a pimp. A manuſcript relation of Becket's life and ſufferings, written in a hand of that age, is preſerved in the library of the Royal-Society. He was, according to Gervaſe and Brompton, aſſaſſinated in the 53d year of his age, on the 30th of December, 1171, reckoning the beginning of the year from Chriſtmas-day; and ſome chroniclers obſerve, that all, who were concerned in Becket's murder, died miſerably, within three or four years, as M. Weſtm. affirms; but this muſt, of courſe, be falſe, ſince William Tracy retired, 23 years after the fact, to Mort in Devonſhire. Vid. Camb. in Devonſhire.

1171. the people at Canterbury ſo firmly perſuaded of the truth of all theſe facts, that, upon this publick evidence, his holineſs canonized Becket, by the name of St. Thomas of Canterbury. His tomb, at firſt, had very few ornaments; but, 50 years after his deceaſe, his body was laid in a ſhrine, adorned with a prodigious quantity of precious ſtones; and the pope ordered a jubilee to be celebrated, every 50th year, in the church where he lay. From this, time, miracles were ſo frequently wrought at his tomb, that the fame of them attracted votaries, from all parts of Chriſtendom, to Canterbury, to obtain his interceſſion; and, in 1420, an account was kept of no leſs than 50,000 foreigners, of all ages and ſexes, that came in pilgrimage, this year, to viſit that renowned tomb.

He is a canonized.

That I might not interrupt the narrative of the famous conteſt, between the king and Becket, I have omitted the mention of certain events, which happened in that interval; the principal of which are, as follows.

Matilda, the king's daughter, is married to the duke of Saxony.

In 1165, whilſt this diſpute was at the height, the archbiſhop of Cologn came into England, to conduct Matilda, the king's daughter, to the duke of Saxony, to whom ſhe was betrothed; but, as all the German princes had declared for the antipope Paſchal, they were looked upon, as ſchiſmaticks, in all places that owned Alexander; and, therefore, after that prelate's departure, all the churches, in which he, or the prieſts, his attendants, officiated, were reconſecrated, Henry being in no condition, at that juncture, to oppoſe this reſolution.

Some German hereticks are condemn'd at Oxford.

In 1166, about 30 hereticks, headed by one Gerhard, arrived in England, from Germany; tho' it is not preciſely known, wherein their hereſy conſiſted; and, in all probability, opinions, which they did not embrace, were fathered upon them, by ſtrain'd inferences. However that be, they were ſummoned before a council at Oxford, convened on that account; where they were condemned and delivered over to the ſecular power. The king, unwilling to incur the pope's diſpleaſure, ordered them to be branded in the cheek, with a hot iron, and prohibited his ſubjects to give them any relief; upon which, all theſe wretches were ſuffered to periſh with hunger, and they did not, in the leaſt, complain of their unhuman treatment; but it generally fares the worſt with thoſe, whom the court of Rome ſtigmatizes for hereticks, when princes are at varience with the pope.

Malcolm's death. Brompt.

Malcolm, king of Scotland, died, much about this time, being ſucceeded by William, his brother.

Eleanor's marriage.

The marriage of Eleanor, Henry's daughter, with Alphonſus, king of Caſtile, was concluded, in 1169, a little before Becket's return into England.

Conan, dies, and is ſucceeded by Geoffrey, Henry's ſon.

Conan the Little, duke of Bretagne, dying, in 1171, prince Geoffrey, who married his daughter, was his ſucceſſor; but, by reaſon of his minority, the king, his father, as his guardian, went, in perſon, into Bretagne, to receive the fealty of the barons.

Theſe are the moſt remarkable occurrences, during the conteſt between the king and the archbiſhop of Canterbury; I ſhall now proceed to relate what followed, upon that prelate's deceaſe. 1171.

Henry is charged with Becket's murder.

Henry, being rid of this troubleſome enemy, expected to enjoy ſome quiet; but Becket, tho' dead, created him no leſs diſturbance, than when alive; for the king of France and the archbiſhop of Sens accuſed him of being the author of Becket's murder, and did all that was poſſible, to excite the pope to revenge the death of his faithful ſervant. Tho' it was no eaſy matter to prove, that Henry was concerned in the aſſaſſination; yet Alexander was willing to believe him guilty, in order to humble a prince, that had, all along, vigorouſly oppoſed him, for which he had, now, ſo fair an opportunity; and, therefore, he threaten'd him with excommunication, and to put England under an interdict, unleſs he diſcovered ſigns of a ſincere repentance. Had not Henry acted, on this occaſion, with the utmoſt addreſs and reſolution, he could never have extricated himſelf out of this intricate and dangerous perplexity; but his ſteady and reſolute behaviour, his preſents to the cardinals, and his repeated proteſtations, to ſubmit to the ſentence, that ſhould be pronounced in England, averted this terrible and impending tempeſt.

Henry's project for the conqueſt of Ireland,

Whilſt this affair was in agitation at Rome, the Iriſh, having taken ſome Engliſhmen priſoners, and ſold them for ſlaves, furniſhed Henry with a pretence, for undertaking the conqueſt of Ireland, which he had formerly projected; but his real motive was the deſire of enlarging his dominions, by the addition of an iſland adjacent to England; and two favourable circumſtances, at this time, concurr'd, to facilitate his deſign. He was not only at peace with all his neighbours; but, Adrian IV. then pope, being a native of England, he apprehended, that it would not be difficult, to procure his approbation. Tho' the outrages, committed by the Iriſh upon his ſubjects, might be one reaſon of his intended expedition; yet the glory of God and the ſalvation of ſouls, much more noble and plauſible motives, but which ſeldom move princes to projects of this nature, were the arguments he advanced, to prevail upon Adrian; to which he ſubjoined another, and no leſs powerful conſideration, viz. the enlargement of the juriſdiction and revenues of the holy ſee. He alledged, that, as the Iriſh were ſchiſmaticks and bad chriſtians, it was neceſſary to reform them, and oblige them to own the papal authority, which they had, hitherto, diſregarded; and that the moſt probable means, to attain this end, was to bring them into ſubjection to the crown of England, which had ever been devoted to the holy ſee. This appears from the bull that Adrian ſent him, on this occaſion; in which we may farther obſerve, what power the popes aſſumed, and how attentive they were to any ſcheme, that tended to increaſe their authority.

ADRIAN,

Servant of the Servants of GOD,

To his Son, in CHRIST JESUS, HENRY, king of England; ſends greeting and apoſtolical benediction.

Adrian's bull. Gir. Cam. Diceto. M. Paris.

'THE deſire your magnificence expreſſes, 'to advance the glory of your name 'on earth, and to obtain eternal happineſs 'in heaven, doubtleſs, deſerves the high- 'eſt commendations; for, as a good ca- 'tholick prince, you are very ſollicitous to 'enlarge the borders of the church, propa- 'gate the knowledge of the truth among the 'barbarous and ignorant, and pluck up vice 'by the roots, in the field of the Lord; and, 'with this view, you apply to us, for counte- 'nance and direction. We are, therefore, 'confident, that your undertaking will be 'crowned with ſucceſs; ſince whatever is un- 'dertaken, from a principle of faith and reli- 'gion, never proves abortive. It is certain, 'that, according to your own confeſſion, 'Ireland, as well as all other iſlands, that have 'embraced the doctrines of chriſtianity, is un- 'queſtionably St. Peter's right, and belongs to 'the juriſdiction of the Roman church; and, 'for this reaſon, after mature deliberation, 'we have concluded it to be expedient, to 'plant, in that iſland, colonies of the faithful, 'who may be acceptable to God.

'You have given us to underſtand, moſt 'dear ſon in Chriſt, that you intend an ex- 'pedition into Ireland, in order to reduce it 'into ſubjection to juſt laws, and to extirpate 'vice, which has long been triumphant there; 'and you promiſe to pay us, out of every 'houſe, an annual acknowledgment of one 'penny, and to maintain the rights of the 'church, without the leaſt detriment or di- 'minution. Upon this promiſe, we readily 'conſent and allow, that you may make a de- 'ſcent into that iſland, to enlarge the boun- 'daries of the church, to reform the manners 'of the natives, and to promote the growth of 'virtue and the chriſtian religion; and we ex- 'hort you to do whatever you apprehend to 'be proper, to promote the honour of God 'and the ſalvation of the people, whom we 'charge to own you for their ſovereign lord; 'provided always, that the Peter-pence be 'punctually paid, and the rights of the church 'inviolably preſerved. If, then, you put your de- 'ſign in execution, labour, above all things, to 'improve the natives of Ireland in virtue, and 'uſe both your own and the endeavours of 'thoſe you ſhall judge worthy to be employed 'in this work, that the church of God and 'true religion may flouriſh in the country, the 'honour of God and the ſalvation of ſouls, in 'ſuch a manner, advanced, as may entitle 'you to an everlaſting reward in heaven, and 'an immortal fame upon earth."

Reflections on this bull.

It is not an eaſy matter, from the peruſal of this bull, to form a judgment, whether Henry, or the pope, was guilty of the greateſt diſſimulation; for the former made uſe of falſe pretences, to varniſh over his ambition, whilſt the latter pretended to believe him, for the ſake of a country to which he had no right, and with a view of transferring it to a prince, who was not, in the leaſt, entitled to take poſſeſſion of it; but it is not very difficult to penetrate thro' all theſe diſguiſes. Ireland had not, as yet, owned the papal authority; and this was the immorality to be rooted out of the field of the Lord. Submiſſion to the biſhop of Rome was the ſeed, to be ſo induſtriouſly ſown and cultivated, that the Roman church might reap a plentiful harveſt; or elſe what can poſſibly be meant by ſpreading the light of the truth, where chriſtianity had been, ſo long before, believed and publickly profeſſed? However, Henry, being ſupported by the pope, reſolved to embrace the preſent opportunity; but, before I proceed to give an account of the ſucceſs of this expedition, it will be neceſſary to take notice of the ſtate of that iſland, which was, ſoon after, united to the Engliſh monarchy. 1171.

The ſituation, extent, and advantages of Ireland. Cambden. Gir. Cam. in Topog. Hiberniæ.

Ireland is ſituated on the weſt of Great-Britain, being parted by an arm of ſea, called St. George's channel, in ſome places, not above 3 leagues broad; and the iſland is, from ſouth to north, about 300 miles in length, and, from eaſt to weſt, 200 in breadth. There is not, in all Europe, a more temperate climate; becauſe the extreams of heat and cold are generally qualified, by the vapours ariſing from the ſurrounding ſea. The ſoil, eſpecially ſouthward, is very fertile; and they, who affirm, that no wheat grows there, doubtleſs, mean the northern parts, where the inhabitants commonly live upon oaten bread; for, in all other parts of the iſland, there is a plenty of wheat, ſufficient for the ſubſiſtence of the natives; tho' it moſt abounds with paſture-grounds, its principal wealth conſiſting in a great breed of cattle. The ſea is ſo well ſtock'd with fiſh, that, if the Iriſh were deſtitute of all other food, that alone might ſuſtain them; but the chief advantage of Ireland is its convenient ſituation, for trade and commerce, not only with all Europe, but other parts of the world, having a great number of excellent ports, which facilitate the exportation of its commodities. For theſe reaſons, the Engliſh, ever ſince the conqueſt of the iſland, have conſidered it, as a dangerous rival, as to commerce; and, therefore, it is no wonder, that a country ſo fertile, and well ſituated, and ſo near England, ſhould attract the envy of Henry II, a prince of boundleſs ambition.

Its firſt inhabitants.

The original inhabitants of this iſland, according to ſome Iriſh hiſtorians, muſt be traced beyond the flood; but others, more unprejudiced, in this particular, aſſert, that, from the third age of the world, Ireland was inhabited with Scyths, whoſe number, in the fourth, was conſiderably augmented by colonies of Spaniards; tho' they have not explain'd, what they mean by the third and fourth ages of the world. Theſe two nations, at length, not only peopled Ireland, but the Hebrides alſo; from whence part of them removed and ſettled in North-

1171. North-Britain, as we have obſerved, in the introduction to this Hiſtory.

Its various names. The natives called this iſland Erin; from which the names Ierna, Juverna, Iouernia, Overnia, and Hibernia are plainly derived. The Britons ſtiled it Yverdon; the Romans, Hybernia; and the Saxons, Iren-landt, i. e. the country of Iren or Erin. The etymology of the word, Erin, is not certainly known; but Cambden, and with great probability, conjectures, that it comes from an Iriſh term, ſignifying weſt, becauſe it is the moſt weſtern iſland of Europe; and Bochartus derives Hybernia from Ibernæ, a Phœnician word, denoting the fartheſt habitation. Iſidore and Bede ſtile it Scotia, with reſpect to the inhabitants, who generally came from Scythia, and were, therefore, named Scots, and alſo Scotia Major, to diſtinguiſh it from North-Britain, inhabited by the ſame nation; but others term it Britannia Parva, to diſtinguiſh it from Great-Britain, pretending that all the iſles, in thoſe parts, ſhould be called the Britannick iſlands. The original of the Iriſh language is ſtill more uncertain; ſince it differs in all reſpects, even in the very form of its letters, from thoſe of the neighbouring nations.

Ptolem.

Its language differs from all others.

The converſion of the Iriſh. Ninnius. Pope Celeſtinus I was the firſt, that undertook the converſion of the Iriſh, by ſending Palladius, to preach the goſpel among them; but, upon their firſt biſhop's untimely death, Patrick, St. Germanus's diſciple, was ſent in his ſtead, who converted moſt of the natives; and their poſterity have, all along, regarded him, as their apoſtle, having, to this day, the greateſt veneration for his memory. Ireland abounded with monks, who were, for the moſt part, ſo famous, for their ſanctity, that, on their account, it was called the Iſland of Saints; and, from hence, great numbers of learned and zealous men came forth, who exceedingly promoted the converſion of the Albin-Scots, Picts, and Anglo-Saxons; ſuch were Columbanus, Aidan, Finan, Colman, Kilian, and many others, taken notice of elſewhere.

The fame of the firſt monks.

Ireland is expoſed to many invaſions. Gir. Cam. Religion and learning *, which flouriſhed in Ireland, were expell'd by foreign invaſions, to which it was often expoſed. Egfrid, king of Northumberland, ſent a powerful army thither, which ravaged the country in a terrible manner; as did afterwards the Norwegians, for above 30 years together, under Turgeſius, who was, at length, cut off by an ambuſcade. This devaſtation was quickly followed by an invaſion of the Eaſtmanni, or men of the eaſt, being certain people from Germany; and, ſoon after this, Edgar, king of England, ſubdued Ireland, if a charter, bearing his name, may be credited, in which he mightily glories in that conqueſt; but that iſland received ſtill greater damages, by means of its inteſtine diviſions. The Iriſh were ſcarce freed from the invaſions of foreigners, and particularly the Danes, when a civil war broke out among them, which ended in the partition of of Ireland into ſeveral petty kingdoms; which, tho', at firſt, very numerous, were, at length reduced, to ſeven, viz. Connaught, Cork, Leinſter, Oſſery, Meath, Limerick, and Ulſter †. The king of Connaught, being the chief of theſe petty ſovereigns, kept the reſt in a ſort of dependence, with much the ſame authority the Anglo-Saxon monarchs enjoyed, during the heptarchy; and the Iriſh Annals ſtile Roderic, king of Connaught, in the time of Henry II, monarch, tho' there were other kings in the iſland. A quarrel between two of theſe kings, the weakeſt of whom invited the Engliſh to his aſſiſtance, occaſioned the Iriſh to loſe their liberty; and the like cauſe has often produced the like effect. An imprudence of the ſame nature rendered the Moors maſters of Spain, and the Anglo-Saxons of England; which ſhews, of what dangerous conſequence it is to invite foreigners into a kingdom.

The king of Leinſter applies to Henry. Gir. Cam. Dermot, king of Leinſter, was, at preſent, one of the moſt conſiderable kings, by reaſon of the extent of his dominions; but, by his tyrannical and arbitrary government, from his acceſſion to the throne, he was become extremely odious to his ſubjects; tho' he deſpiſed their diſaffection, as he was at peace with the neighbouring princes. However, he afterwards cauſed a rupture, by debauching and carrying off the wife of O-Rorick, king of Meath; for O-Rorick, in revenge, levied an army, and, being joined by Roderic, king of Connaught, attack'd Dermot, who, finding that his ſubjects deſerted him, was conſtrain'd to leave Ireland; and, as none of the princes, his neighbours, would engage in his quarel, he implored the protection of the king of England, who was then in France, promiſing to own him, as his ſovereign lord, if he would reſtore him to his crown. This propoſal was, doubtleſs, highly grateful to Henry, who had, ſo long before, projected the conqueſt of Ireland; but, his war with France not being over, he could not immediately aſſiſt the fugitive king; yet taking it to be his intereſt, to perſuade Dermot to begin a war, which might turn to his advantage, he adviſed him to go into England, in order to obtain what ſupplies he could from the Engliſh barons, in expectation of a greater re-inforcement from himſelf, as ſoon as he had leiſure, for that purpoſe. Dermot, upon this, went to England; where Robert Fitz-Stephen and Richard de Clare, ſirnamed Strong-bow, earl of Pembroke, entered into an agreement with him, on certain conditions. The former was prevailed on, from the proſpect of advancing his fortune in Ireland; and the latter, who had large poſſeſſions in England and Wales, was gained over, by Dermot's aſſuring him, that he ſhould have his only daughter in marriage, and ſucceed him on the throne.

Henry promiſes to aſſiſt him.

Two Engliſh lords enter into an alliance with him.

Theſe lords having raiſed ſome troops, among their friends and vaſſals, Fitz-Stephen,

* Cambden obſerves, that the Saxons formerly flock'd to Ireland, as to the great mart of learning; and Bede and other Engliſh authors frequently take notice of the Saxons ſending their ſons thither, for education.

† They were afterwards reduced to four large provinces, Ulſter, Leinſter, Connaught, and Munſter, as at this day; which four provinces are divided into 32 counties, four archbiſhopricks, and 18 epiſcopal ſees.

1171. who was firſt in readineſs, accompanied Dermot into Ireland, with 400 men; and, landing near Waterford; the king of Leinſter led them before the city of Wexford, which, being ſoon taken, was given to Fitz-Stephen, who planted there a colony of Engliſh, the firſt of that nation that ſettled in Ireland; where they remain to this day, retaining ſtill their antient garb, and much of the old Engliſh language, with a mixture of Iriſh. Upon this exploit, the adventurers re-inforcing their little army, to the number of 3000, being joined by the natives *, march'd againſt the king of Oſſery; but this prince, being ſurprized and in no condition to make reſiſtance, was obliged to ſubmit to their own terms.

They, upon their arrival in Ireland, take Wexford, and ſubdue the king of Oſſery.

In the mean time, Roderic, the monarch, convening the ſtates of the iſland, perſuaded them to reſolve on a war with Dermot and the Engliſh; and, indeed, it was evident, that their views were not limited to the aſſiſtance of the king of Leinſter; but, as the adventurers were, now, grown very formidable, he thought it moſt adviſable, firſt, to try if he could prevail on them, by fair means, to depart the iſland. He, firſt of all, offered Fitz-Stephen a conſiderable ſum, to retire; but, this propoſal being refus'd, he applied to Dermot, promiſing to reſtore him to his kingdom, provided he would engage to ſend back the Engliſh. Dermot, at once, complied with this offer; but, when they came to the point of performing their conditions, miſtruſting each other, they could neither agree upon the time nor the place. In the mean while, the earl of Pembroke arrived, with 1200 men; and, taking Waterford, he put all the inhabitants to the ſword. This conqueſt breaking off the negotiation between the two kings, the earl of Pembroke married Dermot's daughter, and, ſoon after, took poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Leinſter, upon his father-in-law's death, whom the Iriſh ſirnamed Ningal, i. e. the ſtranger's friend.

The king of Connaught, in vain, tries to ſend back the Engliſh.

The earl Pembroke arrives, and, on Dermot's death, ſucceeded him.

After Dermot's deceaſe, the adventurers, perceiving that the terror of their arms was ſpread over Ireland, made farther advances, ſubduing Dublin and ſome other places; and it is almoſt incredible, that ſuch an exceeding populous nation, as the Iriſh, ſhould ſo feintly oppoſe the progreſs of a handful of foreigners; but this is imputed to their great dread of the Engliſh croſs-bows, the uſe of which, before this juncture, was altogether unknown to them.

The Engliſh take Dublin.

Henry entertained hopes, that, by this time, the adventurers would have wanted his aſſiſtance, and ſo furniſhed him with a pretence, to come into Ireland, in perſon, and make a conqueſt of the iſland; but, their extraordinary ſucceſs rendering his aid unneceſſary, he was afraid they would become maſters of the whole country, which he deſigned for himſelf. In order, therefore, to oblige them to have recourſe to him, he prohibits the exportation of proviſions, or ammunition, to Ireland, and commands all his ſubjects to return from thence, pretending that the adventurers had engaged in this expedition, without his leave; upon which, the earl of Pembroke and Fitz-Stephen ſent deputies, to aſſure him of their obedience, and that all their preſent and future conqueſts ſhould be at his diſpoſal. This ſubmiſſion gave the king entire ſatisfaction; and, ſome time after, Henry entered into an agreement with them, that all the ſea-ports ſhould be his, and the reſt be enjoy'd by the conquerors, to be held of him and his ſucceſſors. This affair being, thus, ſettled, Henry went over to Ireland himſelf, with a formidable army, and landed at Waterford; upon which, the whole iſland voluntarily ſubmitted to his authority; for, during his ſtay at Waterford, all the kings of Ireland arrived at his court, and ſtrove with emulation, who ſhould be foremoſt, in ſwearing him allegiance.

Henry is jealous of the adventurers.

1172. Henry paſſes over into Ireland, which ſubmits to him.

Thus, Henry, without ſpilling one drop of blood, ſubdued Ireland, in leſs time than was ſufficient to travel over it; and, having placed freſh garriſons in Waterford, Wexford, and ſome other maritime towns, he proceeded to Dublin, where he made regulations, for the government of his new conqueſt; and, quickly after, he embarqued for England, leaving Hugh Lacy at Dublin, to govern the iſland, in his name, with the title of juſticiary of Ireland.

If they, who are acquainted with the extent and importance of the kingdom of Ireland, are ſurprized, that it ſhould be ſo eaſily conquer'd by the Engliſh, they will have equal cauſe for admiration, when they ſhall find, in the courſe of this Hiſtory, how extremely difficult it was, to keep it. Some, conſidering the blood and treaſure, that were ſpent, to ſecure the poſſeſſion of it, have not ſcrupled to affirm, that it would have been better for the Engliſh, if that iſland had been buried in the bottom of the ſea; and, indeed, their keeping it, to this day, is not ſo much for the profit accruing from thence, as to prevent its becoming ſubject to a foreign power, which would be vaſtly prejudicial to the commerce of England.

Henry could not ſtay any longer in Ireland, being in haſte to go to Normandy, in order to meet Theodinus and Albertus, the pope's legates, that were ſent to examine into Becket's murder; and four entire months were employed, in this affair. Tho' the legates had orders to give the king abſolution; yet they took depoſitions, from all hands, with a view of proving him guilty, to magnify the favour, he was about to receive from his holineſs; and, after many difficulties and delays, he was, at laſt, allowed to purge himſelf by a ſolemn oath, that he neither commanded, nor conſented to Becket's aſſaſſination. He publickly declared, that he was heartily ſorry for being the occaſion of it, by dropping ſome imprudent expreſſions, and that he would willingly ſubmit to whatſoever penance the legates ſhould enjoin; and, upon this oath and declaration, he was abſolved

1172. from his pretended crime, on terms importing more the pope's favour, than his innocence. To obtain this abſolution, he obliged himſelf, 1. never to oppoſe the pope's will, whilſt he was treated, as a catholick prince. 2. Not to hinder appeals to the holy ſee. 3. To lead an army to the Holy-Land, againſt the Infidels, and continue there, at leaſt, three years ſucceſſively; tho' he was left at liberty to ſend thither only 200 men, if he choſe rather to go, in perſon, againſt the Saracens in Spain. 4. To recall all that were baniſhed, on Becket's account, and reſtore them to their eſtates and revenues. 5. And, laſtly, to aboliſh all laws and cuſtoms, lately introduced, to the prejudice of the church of Canterbury, or any other church in England. To theſe, which were made publick, was added a ſecret article, by which Henry bound himſelf to go, bare-foot, to the archbiſhop's tomb, and receive diſcipline from the monks of St. Auguſtin. Thus, ended this vexatious affair, which, in ſpite of Henry's reſolution, at firſt, turned, at length, to the pope's advantage, and exalted the papal authority to a greater height, than ever; and, indeed, from this inſtance, all other ſovereigns had reaſon to dread the formidable power of the court of Rome, which had treated, with ſuch indignity, one of the moſt potent princes in Europe.

1173. Gervaſe. In the beginning of 1173, Roger, abbot of Bec in Normandy, was elected archbiſhop of Canterbury, after the ſee had been vacant, a little more than a year; but, upon his refuſal of it, Richard, prior of Dover, was choſen, in his room.

A great conſpiracy againſt the king. Henry, having ſurmounted ſo many difficulties, expected to ſpend the remainder of his days, in uninterrupted tranquillity, amidſt the grandeur and glory that ſurrounded him; but he ſoon found, that his hopes were deluſive. During his abſence, a conſpiracy was formed againſt him, ſo much the more dangerous, as his queen and his own ſons were the authors of it; and it was countenanced by ſome of the chief barons of the realm, as well as ſeveral foreign princes. Queen Eleanor was prompted to it, by her extreme jealouſy, for which the king had given her but too juſt cauſe; yet, among his many miſtreſſes, fair Roſamund, the lord Clifford's daughter, being his moſt beloved favourite, gave her the greateſt uneaſineſs; and ſhe could not forbear threatening, that ſhe would make her feel the weight of her reſentment. Henry imagined, that he had ſecured her, beyond all poſſibility of danger, in a labyrinth, at Woodſtock, contrived for that very purpoſe; but, notwithſtanding his precautions, the queen, in his abſence, found the means to diſpatch her deteſted rival *; and, deſpairing of ever regaining the king's affection, in purſuit of her revenge, ſhe ſpirited up her ſons to a revolt. Henry, the eldeſt, being a very haughty young prince, could no longer bear the regal title, without the authority; and Richard, naturally turbulent and impatient, was uneaſy under the king's diſcipline, becauſe, tho' he had made him earl of Poictou, he had not inveſted him with the poſſeſſion of it; and Geoffrey had ſtill more reaſon to complain, than his brothers, as he was deprived of the government of Bretagne, under the ſpecious pretence of a guardianſhip, for which, he imagined, there was no longer occaſion. Several Engliſh barons were eaſily drawn into this conſpiracy, from the hopes of having greater credit and authority under the young king, than his father; and the king of France, who was continually jealous of Henry's proſperity, not only engaged in the project of dethroning him, but cauſed the earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois, his vaſſals, to enter into the league againſt him. William, king of Scotland, alſo encouraged this undertaking, with a view of recovering the dominions his brother, Malcolm, had reſigned to England; and this confederacy ſuddenly broke out, when Henry leaſt expected it. Normandy, Guienne, and Bretagne were all, at once, attack'd by the arms of the confederates; and the king of Scotland invaded Cumberland. England was divided into two parties, one for the young king, and the other for his father; but, before I deſcend to particulars, I ſhall firſt take notice of the ſteps that were taken, by Henry's enemies, in order to ſurprize him.

1173. The queen puts Roſamund to death.

Henry, after the conqueſt of Ireland, deſigning to go to Normandy, paſſed through England, to take his ſon along with him, being altogether ignorant of the plots, that were formed, in his abſence; and, upon his arrival at Roan, he received a letter from the king of France, in which he intreated him to permit his daughter and ſon-in-law, to come and ſpend a few days at his court. The young prince, obtaining leave, directly repaired to Paris, and concerted proper meaſures with his father-in-law, that all the confederates might act, at the ſame time; but, as he deferred his return, under various pretences, Henry began to be uneaſy. Perhaps, he had received ſome hints of what was in agitation; or was jealous, that, by too long converſing with Lewis, he might be infected with ill impreſſions. However that be, he ſent for the young king, who durſt not Brompt.

* Tyrrel obſerves, that all the hiſtorians are ſilent, as to this point; ſo that the ſtory of the queen's forcing Roſamund, to drink poiſon, has no other foundation than the old Engliſh ballad. It is certain, that ſhe did not live long; but yet it is evident, that ſhe did not die, in 1173, nor was poiſoned by the queen; for Brompton, in ſo many words, declares, that, after the queen's impriſonment, Henry was guilty of adulterous practices, and publickly kept, for a long time, Roſamund, as his miſtreſs. She was buried in the church belonging to Godſtow-nunnery, near Oxford, where her epitaph, according to the ſame author, was to be ſeen, in his time, and is, as follows:

Hic jacet in tumba, Roſa mundi, non Roſa munda;
Non redolet, ſed olet, quæ redolere ſolet.
This tomb doth here encloſe, the world's moſt beauteous Roſe:
Roſe paſſing ſweet 'ere while, now nought but odour vile. Speed.

There are not the leaſt remains of her labyrinth, at this day; but her monument has been lately repaired and beautified.

1173. disobey his orders, to prevent any suspicion of the conspiracy; and, upon his return, the king accompanied by his son, went to Montferrand, a small town in Auvergne, to hold a conference with Hubert, earl of Maurienna, Alphonso, earl of Arragon and Barcelona, Gerard, earl of Vienne, and Raymond, earl of Tholouse. He treated with the earl of Maurienna, about a marriage between John, his fourth son, and Alice, daughter to that lord; but, as this affair could not be ended at Montferrand, Hubert attended the king to Limoges, where he press'd him to declare, what he would do for the prince, his son, to promote this match. Henry offered to settle on John the cities of Lodun, Chinon, and Mirebel; but the young king, who was present, alledged, it was extremely surprizing, that his father should assign an appenage to his youngest son; whilst he refused the same, during his life, to the eldest, who was honoured with the regal title, tho' he was possess'd of nothing, to support that dignity. This opposition created a great misunderstanding between the father and son, which was farther increased, by the latter's demanding Normandy, till he should succeed to the crown of England; but his view, in this proceeding, was only to find a pretence for complaining, in order to open the scene he had projected with the king of France.

The king suspects his eldest son. Gervase.

From this time, Henry, being persuaded, that his son was corrupted by Lewis, order'd him to be very narrowly watched, to prevent his escape; and the young prince was no less sollicitous, to avoid the impending danger; and, therefore, he privately withdrew from court, and posted to the king of France. This fully confirmed Henry's suspicions; tho' he was still ignorant of the true nature of his son's design. The queen, who resided at London, was no sooner informed of the king her son's arrival at Paris, than she sent thither also Richard and Geoffrey; and, thus, Henry found himself, on a sudden, abandon'd by his own family, tho', he could not, as yet apprehend the tendency of all these proceedings. The weight of his indignation, his sons being out of his power, fell upon the queen, whom he caused to be closely confined; tho' the only benefit, he reaped from it, was the gratification of his revenge; for, presently after, the confederate princes attacking him, in several places, he had occasion for all his resolution, and especially for all his prudence, to withstand so many powerful enemies. Richard was the author of a revolt in Guienne; Geoffrey put himself at the head of an insurrection he raised in Bretagne, designing to seize on the government of that dutchy; Normandy was attacked by the king of France, assisted by the earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois; the king of Scotland made a descent into the northern parts of England; and the earl of Leicester landed at Southampton, with an army levied in France, expecting that the greatest part of the English would join him, against the king. Thus, Henry was surrounded, on all hands, with hostile armies; whilst, at the same time, he was in no condition to make any resistance.

1173. In the interim, young Henry, who continued at Paris, as if he had been sole king of England, received the homage of the vassals, made grants and donations of the crown-lands, assigned pensions out of the publick revenues, and had a seal different from that of his father; nor would he suffer any to attend him, that did not swear allegiance to him, exclusive of the old king. The young prince, now, looked upon his father's ruin, as inevitable; and Lewis, to encourage him in this belief, affecting, on all occasions, satyrically to jest upon old Henry, would scarce allow him to be called king, in his presence. Indeed, the affairs of this monarch seemed, at present, to be in a desperate situation; but his heroick virtues never shined with more lustre, than at this critical extremity. The prospect of the impending danger invigorated his courage; and he exerted so much steadiness, prudence, and dexterity, that, in spite of the difficulties, that continually occurr'd, from all quarters, he obtained, at last, a glorious advantage over all his enemies. The king of France was forced to abandon Verneuil, after a tedious siege; Henry's army of Brabanfons, which he sent into Bretagne, vanquish'd the rebels, upon which, they returned to their duty; and the earl of Leicester was defeated in England, and taken prisoner, by Humphry Bohun, general of the English army, who, taking the opportunity of the truce made with the king of Scotland, gave that lord battle, at Fornham near St. Edmundsbury in Suffolk; in which engagement, 10,000 Flemings were slain. Upon the expiration of the truce, William renewed his ravages in Northumberland; but, being too intent upon his plunder, he unfortunately, or rather imprudently, suffered himself to be surprized by the English general, who put his army to the rout, and took him prisoner. The Scots affirm, that this was transacted, during the truce; but, however that be, the king was first imprisoned in Richmond-castle, and afterwards conveigh'd, from thence, into Normandy.

1173. Henry the son, acts as sole king.

The earl of Leicester is taken prisoner; and also the king of Scotland.

Henry's success in France.

In the mean time, Henry was employed in France; and he managed his affairs so well, that, in a few months, either by himself or his generals, he subdued the principal places in Guienne, Saintonge, Anjou, Poictou, and Bretagne, that had revolted; which successes entirely disconcerted the measures of his enemies, and dissipated the fears that justly seiz'd him, in the beginning of the war.

The young king detained by contrary winds.

The king, his son, whilst he was embarass'd in France, having mustered an army of Frenchmen and Flemings, putting himself at their head, marched towards Gravelin, designing to embarque for England, in order to join the king of Scotland and earl of Leicester, who were, not, as yet, defeated; and, had the wind been fair, at that juncture, he would, doubtless, have been master of England? but he waited so long for a favourable gale, that the king, his father, having had time to settle his affairs in France, embarquing at Barfleur, safely arrived in England. Henry, landing at South-

1173. Southampton, ſet out directly for Canterbury, to do penance at Becket's tomb, purſuant to the terms of his abſolution; and he no ſooner came in ſight of the town, tho' it was yet three miles diſtant, than he pull'd off his boots and walked, bare-foot, in extreme pain, to the ſacred tomb. Having reſted there a while, he was ſcourged by the prior and monks of St. Auguſtin, and ſpent the night in prayer, in the cathedral, lying on the cold pavement; and, the next day, after he had aſſiſted at a ſolemn proceſſion found the tomb, he departed for London. The victory Henry's arms obtained over the king of Scotland, falling out, the very day he left Canterbury, it was obſerved, that he owed it to the interceſſion of the bleſſed St. Thomas; and it was farther affirm'd, that the king himſelf publickly return'd him thanks, on that account, thereby acknowledging, that he was fully convinced of the truth of his ſanctity.

He reduces the rebels in England,

After the earl of Leiceſter's and the king of Scotland's defeat, young Henry's party, being diſpirited, retired to their fortreſſes and caſtles; but the king, impatiently deſirous of entirely reducing them, quickly after his arrival at London, march'd with an army, in order to beſiege them. The greateſt part ſurrender'd, upon his approach; and the reſt did not hold out many days. In the interim, the king of France, upon the defeat of the confederates, recalling his troops from Gravelin, laid ſiege to Roan, in expectation of taking it, before Henry could come to its relief; but the brisk defence of the inhabitants baffled his deſign; and Henry, upon the firſt notice of this ſiege, was ſo expeditious, in his proceedings, that he arrived in Normandy, with a conſiderable body of troops, before Lewis had made any remarkable progreſs. Henry's ſudden arrival ſo intimidated the enemy, that he retreated, in the utmoſt confuſion, leaving all his baggage behind him; nay, ſome aſſert, that he could not retire, but by the means of a treaty, which he afterwards very little regarded.

and forces Lewis to raiſe the ſiege of Roan. Hoved.

1174. Henry's proſperity.

Henry's affairs were, now, in a more flouriſhing condition, than ever; for he was abſolute maſter of England, whilſt Scotland was dejected, by the impriſonment of her king. Ireland continued in obedience; the Welch remained quiet, within their own bounds. Normandy, Guienne, and the other provinces abroad were entirely reduced, except a few caſtles in Poictou, that were ſtill in the hands of prince Richard; and, therefore, it is no wonder, that Lewis, now above 60 years of age, deſpaired of accompliſhing what he, at firſt, projected. He found, that the confederacy had only more firmly eſtabliſh'd Henry on the throne; and, beſides, he was apprehenſive, that, if he ſhould die, during the war, Philip, his ſon, who was no more than 10 years old, would not be able to maintain it; and, on theſe accounts, he was inclinable to peace. Henry gave into the ſame ſentiments, being extremely deſirous of depriving his ſons of the protection of France, their only refuge; but Richard, his ſecond ſon, oppoſed theſe pacifick meaſures; tho' neither his brothers, nor the king of France, judged it expedient to carry on the war, purely, for his ſake. Accordingly, they conſented to a truce, during which, they obliged themſelves not to aſſiſt him; and Henry made the beſt uſe of this juncture, to reduce Richard to his duty; who, at laſt, finding himſelf entirely abandoned, ſubmitted to his father, and implored his pardon. This prince met with a more gracious reception, than he expected, and attended Henry to the place appointed by the two monarchs, to treat, in perſon, about the terms of peace; which ſoon were ſettled, to their mutual ſatisfaction. Henry granted a general pardon to all the revolters, without any exception; and the young king promiſed obedience, for the future, and that he would ſuffer prince John, his brother, to enjoy his appenage, without the leaſt interruption. Geoffrey and Richard either were, or ſeem'd to be, contented with what their father had allotted them; and the king of France agreed to reſtore to Henry the caſtles he had taken, in the beginning of the war. To ſtrengthen the reconciliation between the two kings, a marriage was concluded on, between Richard and Alice, Lewis's daughter; and the princeſs, being very young, was committed to Henry's care, to be educated in England, till ſhe became marriageable; but he abuſed his truſt, as the ſequel will inform us. 1174.

The king of Scotland is releaſed, on hard terms.

It was farther ſtipulated by this treaty, that all the priſoners, on both ſides, ſhould be releaſed; but, to exclude the king of Scotland, and, perhaps, him only, of all that were impriſoned, Henry inſerted a clauſe, importing, that none, whoſe ranſoms were already treated on, ſhould receive the benefit of that article. However, William was ſo impatiently deſirous of liberty, that, in order to obtain it, he ſolemnly ſwore, that he would make reſtitution of all that he had taken from England, and do homage for his kingdom to that crown. Henry, upon the ſettlement of his affairs in France, repair'd to York, attended by the king, his ſon, and a numerous train of nobility; where, before the barons of both realms, William did homage to the two kings of England, for Scotland, in general, and the county of Gallaway, in particular; which was confirmed by the ſolemn oaths of the Scotch barons, who ſwore, that, if their king did not perform his engagement, they would withdraw their allegiance, and even conſent, that the kingdom of Scotland ſhould be laid under an interdict. Nevertheleſs, Henry, for his farther ſecurity, put himſelf in poſſeſſion of the caſtles of Roxborough, Berwick, Sterling, and Edinburgh; and, this affair being over, the young king returned to France, where he ſpent three years, in improving himſelf, in all the exerciſes of body and mind, that were requiſite for the accompliſhment of a prince.

1175. Henry ratifies king Edward's laws.

Peace, which had been long baniſh'd from England, being, at length, happily reſtored, Henry enacted new laws, and reviv'd others that were neglected. The laws, which are advantageous to ſovereign princes, are, for the moſt part, very ſtrictly obſerv'd, becauſe they 1175. they generally take care to ſee them put in execution; whilſt they, too often, are apt to overlook thoſe, that are beneficial to their ſubjects. Indeed, by this practice, they continually enlarge their authority; but, then, it often occaſions rebellions, ſometimes more prejudicial, even to themſelves, than the laws they neglect or evade. This was lately Henry's caſe, with reſpect to the Engliſh nation; and his three ſons, who had given him ſo much diſturbance, were alive and in health; and their diſpoſition, in all probability, was ſtill the ſame, notwithſtanding his treaty with them. He was, therefore, of opinion, that, to guard againſt them, for the future, it was his intereſt to gain the people's affections, by reviving the laws of Edward the Confeſſor; and, as theſe laws were advantageous for the ſubject, in compariſon of thoſe of the Norman kings, which only tended to augment the prince's revenues, and ſtretch the royal prerogative, all degrees of perſons ardently deſired to have them reſtored. They even made ſome attempts, in the preceding reigns, to this purpoſe, tho' they proved ineffectual; and, indeed, the king's preſent condeſcenſion was no more than a mere flouriſh, conſiſting only of ſome publick orders, which were never put in execution.

1176. The inſtitution of itinerant judges.

About the ſame time, Henry divided England into ſix parts or diſtricts, aſſign'd to ſo many judges, who were obliged to go, at certain ſeaſons, and hold the aſſizes, i. e. miniſter juſtice to the people; which cuſtom continues, to this day.

Henry razes the caſtles.

He alſo demoliſhed all the fortified caſtles, that were ſtill in the poſſeſſion of private perſons, which were a mighty cheque to the power of the ſovereign.

The princeſs Joanna's marriage to the king of Sicily.

In the mean while, William the Good, king of Sicily, demanded Joanna, Henry's daughter, in marriage; and, the match ſeeming to be for the advantage of that princeſs, he diſpatched ambaſſadors into Sicily, to ſettle the articles, and afterwards ſent her away, with a ſplendid retinue.

The king deſigns to erect Ireland into a kingdom for prince John.

Prince John, his fourth ſon, being 11 years old, he reſolved to erect Ireland into a kingdom, in order to beſtow it on his darling ſon; and he ſent ambaſſadors to Rome, to procure the pope's conſent; but this was not obtained, till ſome years after, when it was out of his power, to make uſe of that favour.

1177. Lewis viſits Becket's tomb. Mezerai.

About this time, the king of France, on the account of his declining age, propoſed to have his ſon, Philip, crowned, according to the cuſtom of his predeceſſors; but a violent diſtemper, ſeizing the young prince, prevented his 1179. deſign, and led him almoſt to deſpair of his life; for Lewis was ſo deeply affected with his ſon's danger, that he went in pilgrimage to Becket's tomb, for the ſake of that ſaint's interceſſion, in behalf of his ſon. Henry, meeting him at Dover, conducted him to Canterbury; where they both offered up their prayers; and the king of France, at his departure, beſtowed conſiderable preſents * to the church, where the ſaint was interr'd.

The aſſizes of Northampton.

I have ſlightly paſſed over the events of the three laſt years †, as being of little conſequence to foreigners; tho' they deſerve the notice of the Engliſh reader. For example, the aſſizes, or parliament, of Northampton is a very material article; which was a revival of the conſtitutions of Clarendon, except thoſe that related to the clergy. Henry likewiſe, during this interval, made ſeveral regulations, for the adminiſtration of juſtice and government of the ſtate; but, for the reaſon above-mentioned, I take it to be needleſs, to deſcend to particulars; yet I cannot forbear to mention one occurrence, which highly redounds to Henry's glory.

Henry is umpire between the kings of Caſtile and Navarre.

Alphonſo, king of Caſtile and Sanctio, king of Navarre, having had great diſputes, about certain caſtles and territories, ſent ambaſſadors, to intreat Henry to be their umpire, promiſing to acquieſce in his arbitration; and this prince, being deſirous of acquitting himſelf, with honour, and impartiality, in an affair of ſuch importance, convened, at London, all the barons and judges of the realm, for the ſake of their advice; and, upon mature deliberation, he paſſed a judgment, to the ſatisfaction of both parties.

1180. Lewis, dying, is ſucceeded by Philip, his ſon.

There is, in the Collection of the publick Acts, an agreement between Henry and Lewis, to accompany each other, in a pilgrimage to the Holy-Land; but, as this record is without date, we cannot be preciſely certain, as to the time; tho', in all probability, it was made, whilſt Lewis was at Canterbury. The death of that monarch, in 1180, prevented their intended expedition; and Philip, his ſon, ſirnamed the Auguſt, ſucceeded to the crown of France.

1181. Pope Lucius.

Pope Alexander III. died in 1181, and had, for his ſucceſſor, Lucius III.

The ſame year, Henry ſent juſticiaries into all parts of England, ordering all his ſubjects, both poor and rich, to provide themſelves with arms, at their own charge **.

1182. The diſorders in the Engliſh court.

Notwithſtanding the appearance of tranquillity at the Engliſh court, ambition, love, jealouſy, and all the turbulent paſſions, which affect the hearts of men, reigned over the royal family. Young Henry was far from being

* He offered, at the tomb, a maſſy cup, of pure gold, and gave to the monks 100 modii, i. e. 7200 gallons of wine yearly, freeing them alſo from all toll or cuſtom, for whatſoever they ſhould buy in his kingdom; which he confirmed by a charter, under his ſeal. Hoved. Brompt.

† The earl of Flanders, in 1177, had an interview with Henry at Canterbury, and went in pilgrimage to Becket's tomb; and, ſoon after, he ſet out for Jeruſalem, accompanied by William de Mandevill, earl of Eſſex, Henry de Lacy, &c.

 His regulations, about this affair, were, as follows. I. Whoſoever hath a knight's fee ſhall have a coat of mail, an helmet, a ſhield, and a lance; and ſo in proportion to the number of their knight's fees. II. Every free layman, that hath, in goods or rent, to the value of 16 marks, ſhall have a coat of mail, &c. as above. III. Every free layman, that hath, in goods, 10 marks, ſhall have an iron gorget, an iron cap, and a lance. IV. All burgeſſes, and the whole community of freemen, ſhall have a Wambais, i. e. an horſeman's coat, an iron cap, a lance, &c. Hoved.

1182. satisfied with the regal title, without the authority; and the king, his father, who was naturally of an amorous complexion, tho' he was now 50 years old, had not ſubdued his laſcivious deſires, which, thro' all the various ſcenes of his paſt life, had the aſcendant over him. He was enamour'd with Alice of France, the intended wife of his ſon Richard; and the hiſtorians are, for the moſt part, agreed, that her regard for this monarch exceeded the bounds of her diſcretion. Richard demanded leave to conſummate his marriage; but this was rather to furniſh him with matter for complaint, than any paſſionate inclination to marry a princeſs, who was generally ſuſpected to be guilty of a criminal familiarity with the king. Geoffrey, being 24 years of age, was weary of being under the guardianſhip of his father, and thought it high time for him to be put in poſſeſſion of Bretagne; and John was uneaſy to find himſelf deſtitute, whilſt all his brothers were ſo well provided for. However, as that prince was his father's darling, it was very probable, that he would make a proviſion for him, before his death; but queen Eleanor, in ſpite of the interceſſion of her children, was ſtill kept in confinement.

The king ſows diſſention among his ſons.

Henry, tho' he was no ſtranger to the ſentiments of his three eldeſt ſons, induſtriouſly concealed his apprehenſions; yet, to prevent their deſigns, he judg'd it to be expedient to ſow diſcontent among them, leſt their union might prove fatal to him; and, with this view, he inſinuated to the young king, that his brothers ought to do him homage, for the lands they held, or, at leaſt, made a pretence of holding. This prince, joyfully receiving the hint, reſolved to put it in execution; tho' his brothers were not, in the leaſt, inclined to pay him homage. Richard alledged, and with juſtice, that the dutchy of Guienne was not a fief of the crown of England; but Geoffrey had not the ſame reaſon to diſpute this point; ſince he could not but know, that Bretagne was dependent on the dutchy of Normandy; but, as the king had not reſigned Normandy to his eldeſt ſon, he had no right to inſiſt on that homage. Geoffrey, therefore, advanced this, as an argument, to elude his brother's demand; and, in the interim, he behaved with great outward reſpect to his father, tho' he ſecretly carried on a correſpondence with Richard, who was in the ſame circumſtances with himſelf. The young king ſoon perceived his father's policy, in engaging him in the quarrel; but, as he was a perfect maſter of the art of diſſimulation, tho' he openly expreſs'd a reſentment againſt his brothers, he privately concerted meaſures with them, to dethrone his father, having, for a long time, aſpired after his crown and dignity. Nevertheleſs, Providence defeated all his unreaſonable hopes; for he was carried off by a diſtemper, in the 28th year of his age. This prince, after he had reached Guienne, deſigning to excite the Gaſcoigns to a rebellion, was ſeized with a lingering fever, and obliged to ſtop at the caſtle of Martel in Quercy; and, when he found, that his life was deſpaired of, he diſcover'd great ſigns of a ſincere repentance, for all his undutiful proceedings againſt the king, his father. Before his death, he had the ſatisfaction of receiving a ring from Henry, as a token of his pardon; upon the receipt of which, he ſhed a flood of tears; and, a little before his laſt gaſp, he gave orders, that he ſhould be clothed in ſackcloth, with a rope about his neck, and laid on aſhes, in which poſture, he gave up the ghoſt.

1183. Young Henry's death.

The young king's death revived his father's affection for him; for, tho' his ſon's conduct had juſtly provoked him, he ſeemed to be extremely concerned at his loſs; tho', in all probability, his ſorrow was not of a long continuance. 1184.

It muſt be owned, that this prince was adorned with many excellent qualities; and, perhaps, his father's exceſſive fondneſs of him, when a child, did not a little contribute to the corruption of his manners; whilſt, on the other hand, the reſtraints under which he was kept, after his coronation, led him to engage in ſeveral conſpiracies, to dethrone him. His wife, Margaret of France, by whom he had one ſon, who died, in his infancy, was ſent back to her brother, king Philip, who, ſome time after, diſpoſed of her in marriage to Bela, king of Hungary.

The death of young Henry delayed the troubles, that were ready to break out, and embroil the royal family; for Richard, tho' of an impetuous diſpoſition, continued quiet, for a while, to try how the king would treat him, upon his becoming the preſumptive heir of the crown.

The patriarch of Jeruſalem asks the king's aid.

In the interim, Heraclius, patriarch of Jeruſalem, came to the Engliſh court, to ſollicit the king, in the behalf of the chriſtians of the Holy-Land; and he preſented him with the keys of Chriſt's ſepulchre and David's tower, as a proof that the chriſtians were deſirous of ſubmitting to his authority, as the grandſon of Foulke of Anjou, who was king of Jeruſalem. Henry, before he would return him an anſwer, convened an aſſembly of the lords at Clerkenwell, near London, where the patriarch, in a pathetick ſpeech, repreſented to them the miſeries, to which the chriſtians in Paleſtine were expoſed; and he afterwards attempted to ſhew, that the king had an unexceptionable right to the crown of Jeruſalem; whereas it was notorious, that Foulke, Henry's grandfather, enjoyed that crown, in right of his ſecond wife; and Geoffrey, Henry's father, was his ſon, by a former. The patriarch afterwards read the pope's letter, directed to all chriſtian princes, in which he exhorted them to aſſiſt their brethren in Paleſtine; and the king having conſulted the lords, upon the patriarch's propoſal, they were of opinion, that, without hazarding his perſon, in ſuch an expedition, it was ſufficient to ſupply him with money. Henry, falling in with this advice, furniſhed Heraclius with a conſiderable ſum, and gave his ſubjects leave to take up the croſs; tho' he did not himſelf engage in that undertaking. Upon this permiſſion, the archbiſhop of Can-

1184. terbury, ſeveral earls, barons, knights, and a vaſt multitude of the meaner ſort of people prepared for a voyage into the eaſt; but the patriarch, at his departure, was ſo complaiſant, as to aſſure the king, that he ſhould have preferred his preſence, alone, to all the Engliſh that had taken the croſs.

1185. Prince John is made king of Ireland.

The pope, being diſpleaſed at Henry's declining to enter upon the Cruſade, refuſed him ſome favours, that otherwiſe, in all probability, he would have conferr'd upon him; yet, leſt he ſhould puſh his reſentment too far, he not only allowed him to declare his youngeſt ſon, prince John, king of Ireland, but ſent him a crown of Peacock's feathers, interlaced with gold, reſerving to the holy ſee the Peter-pence on every houſe in Ireland, with ſeveral other privileges. As ſoon as the king received the pope's anſwer, he knighted prince John, and ſent him, as governor, into Ireland; but he did not venture to crown him, leſt Richard ſhould, from thence, claim the ſame indulgence in England. John was, at firſt, eſteemed and reſpected by the Iriſh; but, ſuffering himſelf to be directed by the advice of ſome young perſons, that attended him, he ſo alienated their affections, that the king was conſtrained, at length, to recall him.

III.

Pope Lucius dying, in this year, he was ſucceeded by Urban III, who appointed Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury, to be his legate in England. This prelate, a Ciſtercian monk, was ſucceſſor to Richard, whoſe death happened, in 1184.

Richard raiſes troubles in Guienne.

The affairs of Ireland were far from being ſo vexatious to Henry, as his ſon Richard's inflexible temper; for, tho' he had remained quiet, ever ſince his brother Henry's death, he was now weary of a ſtate, that was ſo oppoſite to his reſtleſs diſpoſition. He went to Guienne, where he aſſum'd an abſolute authority, without any regard to his father's orders; in which, he was ſuported by the Gaſcoigns themſelves, who choſe rather to have a ſovereign of their own, than be dependent on the crown of England. After Richard had laboured, for ſome time, to gain that province to his intereſt, muſtering ſome troops together at Poictou, he made war with the Bretons, who had diſguſted him; but Geoffrey, his brother, then in Bretagne, being ſurprized at this ſudden attack, ſpeedily levied a ſmall army, and gave him battle; yet, as his forces were inferior, in number, he was eaſily defeated. Richard would have purſued his deſign, if the dread of his father, who was making preparations againſt him, had not obliged him to retire into Poictou, where he pretended to ſtand, in his own defence; tho' Henry, who was ſenſible, that his ſon's perverſeneſs could not be ſubdued, without force, had prepared an army, ſufficient to cut off all his hopes of reſiſtance. However, the king, before he proceeded to extremities, acquainted him, that it was his abſolute will and pleaſure, that he ſhould no longer concern himſelf with the affairs of Guienne, which he could not enjoy, till after the death of the queen, his mother; but that, if he deſiſted, he would leave him in poſſeſſion of Poictou; yet that, upon his refuſal, he would compel him to it, and alſo diſinherit him of the crown of England. Richard being terrified at theſe menaces, and the king's mighty preparations, was brought to a compliance; but it, ſoon after, appeared, that his ſubmiſſion was altogether involuntary. The example of William the Conqueror, who preferred his ſecond before his eldeſt ſon, ſeem'd, in ſome meaſure, to authorize the king's treatment of Richard; and the young prince could not avoid being uneaſy, as he was apprehenſive, that he ſhould be ſupplanted by one of his brothers. However, he kept a fair underſtanding with his father, and attempted to reſtrain the natural violence of his temper; but he was freed, in part, from his fears, by the death of his brother Geoffrey, at Paris, where he went to aſſiſt at a tournament. The Engliſh hiſtorians affirm, that, being flung from his horſe, he was unfortunately trampled to death, before he could be taken up; but the French writers, more probably, relate, that he died of a fever. This prince, who had a daughter, named Eleanor, left Conſtance of Bretagne big with child, who, ſoon after, was delivered of a ſon, called Arthur.

The affairs of Bretagne.

Henry, extremely deſirous of having the guardianſhip of theſe infants, for a pretence to keep Bretagne, went thither, in order to obtain the conſent of the ſtates; but Conſtance, his daughter-in-law, vigorouſly oppoſing it, alledged, that, as ſhe was mother of the children, it was her province, to take care of their education. Beſides, ſhe aſſerted, that they could have no title to any thing, till after her deceaſe, ſince their father was duke of Bretagne, only in her right; but Henry pretended, that, as he was their grandfather, he ought to be their guardian. The ſtates of Bretagne were greatly perplexed, on this occaſion, being more overawed by the king's power, than convinced by his arguments; but, at laſt, they found an expedient, that pleaſed both parties. They decreed, that the dutcheſs ſhould have the guardianſhip of her children, and that all orders and publick acts ſhould run jointly, in her and her ſon's name; but with the proviſo, that nothing of conſequence ſhould be tranſacted, without the advice and conſent of the king of England. Before he left Bretagne, he obliged the ſtates to ſwear fealty to young Arthur, as their ſovereign; for he was apprehenſive, that, if Conſtance ſhould marry a ſecond husband, and have children by him, ſhe would give them the preference to thoſe by the former.

Philip's deſigns againſt Henry.

Henry, perhaps, would not ſo eaſily have accommodated matters with the Bretons, had he not been afraid of the king of France's interpoſal, who, tho' very young, was intently employed, in forming ſome grand projects; for Philip could not conceal his uneaſineſs, that ſo many French provinces ſhould be poſſeſſed by the Engliſh. Ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne, he had reſolved to embrace every opportunity that offered, to deprive them of theſe dominions; and the diſſention, between Henry and his ſon, Richard, he apprehended to be a favourable 1186. favourable juncture. In this belief, he made extraordinary preparations, under ſpecious pretences, deſigning to ſurprize both the father and ſon, by ſudden attacks; and he was no ſooner in readineſs for action, than he ſummoned Richard to come and do him homage, for Poictou, and required Henry to reſtore the Vexin, the dowry of Margaret, widow to his eldeſt ſon. However, in ſpite of all his precautions, he was, for once, miſtaken in his politicks; for Henry and Richard, uniting for their common advantage, kept him ſo cloſely engaged, the one in Normandy, and the other in Guienne, that he was conſtrained to ſue for a truce, which was granted him, for two years.

1187. Philip ſeduces Richard.

Philip, finding that, to accompliſh his end, it was neceſſary to foment the diſcord between Henry and Richard, contrived his affairs ſo, that Richard made him a viſit at Paris, where he gave him, in all outward appearance, a very cordial reception, and even admitted him to his bed; and theſe careſſes inſenſibly impreſſed the mind of the Engliſh prince, with ſuch ſtrong ſentiments of affection, that he imparted to him all the motives, that induced him to fall out with his father. Philip, artfully improving this openneſs, ſeemed to wonder, that the king, his father, ſhould treat him ſo roughly; and that, ſince he had crowned his elder brother, in a leſs advanced age, he ſhould deny him the ſame favour. He farther added, that it was highly probable, that he deſigned to place John, his youngeſt ſon and darling, on the throne; and, of courſe, he inferred, that it was neceſſary to prevent ſuch an unreaſonable proceeding; and all theſe affectionate expreſſions were received, with ſo much attention and confidence, that Philip entertained great hopes of ſucceeding in his deſigns.

Richard's complaints againſt his father.

In the mean while, Richard's long ſtay, at Paris, gave the king, his father, the utmoſt uneaſineſs, who inceſſantly ſent for him; and he was, ſoon after, convinced, that his ſuſpicions were not without a foundation. As the time of the truce was about to expire, Richard, continuing ſtill at the French court, openly complained of his father's preventing the conſummation of his marriage; and, leſt Henry ſhould recall him, under the pretence of ſolemnizing the nuptials, he had another excuſe in readineſs, viz. that he was privately given to underſtand, that the king intended to confine him, in order to fix his younger ſon, with the more eaſe, on the throne. Upon this, Henry, to bring over his ſon from Philip's intereſt, ſecretly diſpatched a truſty meſſenger, to convince him of the danger in which he had imprudently plunged himſelf, by his credulity; ſince the ſole view of that prince, in fomenting a miſunderſtanding between him and his father, was to make the beſt uſe of it, for his own advantage; and Richard, being prevailed on by theſe remonſtrances, ſuddenly left the court of France, and returned to England. 1187.

Jeruſalem is taken by the Saracens.

The truce being expired, the two monarchs began to renew their hoſtilities; but, before they made any progreſs, their animoſity was ſuſpended, for a while, upon the melancholy news, that the city of Jeruſalem was taken by Saladin, ſultan of Babylon; and that Guy de Luſignan, the laſt that reigned in that kingdom, was in the hands of the Infidels. As the union of the Chriſtian princes firſt occaſioned the conqueſt of the kingdom of Jeruſalem; ſo their diſſention was the means of its deſtruction, after it had ſubſiſted, near a century. This news, which alarmed all the princes of Europe, was particularly fatal to pope Urban III, who died with exceſſive grief; and he was ſoon followed by Gregory VIII. his ſucceſſor, who, after he had ſate in the papal chair, only three months, was ſucceeded by Clement III.

Philip and Henry take the croſs. Mezerai. M. Par.

The kings of France and England, as they were deeply affected with the late loſs of the chriſtians in the eaſt, dropping their private quarrel, for the cauſe of God, for ſo it was called, in thoſe days, held an interview at Giſors, to conſult about proper methods, to redreſs this great misfortune; and, having renewed the truce, the two monarchs, as well as the earl Flanders, who was preſent, took the croſs, diſtinguiſhing themſelves by three different colours. Philip choſe a red, Henry, a white, and the earl a grey croſs; and ſuch of their ſubjects, as enter'd upon the the Cruſade, obſerved the ſame diſtinction of colours *.

1188. The quarrel between Richard and the earl of Tholouſe.

But the zeal of the two kings gave way to an animoſity, ſo much the more ſurpriſing, as the occaſion of it was very trifling and inſignificant; for prince Richard, who was engaged in the expedition to the Holy-Land, came to Poictou, to raiſe money, for that purpoſe; but one of the officers of Raymund, earl of Tholouſe, paſſing through his territories, and diſguſting him, he committed him to priſon. Raymund, reſenting this proceeding, order'd, by way of repriſal, two Poictevin gentlemen to be apprehended, as they were paſſing by Tholouſe, in their return from a pilgrimage to St. James of Compoſtella. Theſe violent ſteps cauſing a very warm quarrel between the two princes, Richard revived the pretenſions of the houſe of Poictou to the earldom of Tholouſe; upon which, he penetrated that earl's country, with a numerous army, and ſubdued Moiſſac and ſeveral other places. Raymund, being perſuaded, that the king of England was the author of this war, demanded the aſſiſtance of France; and, tho' Philip was very ſenſible, that Richard might poſſibly undertake this war, without his father's knowledge, under the pretence of aſſiſting the earl of Tholouſe, his vaſſal, he made a diverſion in Berri, and took Iſſoudun; which renewed the rupture between the two monarchs, when they ſeemed

* Gervaſe complains, that, during the year 1188, the whole kingdom was grievouſly oppreſſed, about the tenths or the tax for the Cruſade; and Hoveden ſays, that the Engliſh paid above 70,000 l. towards it, and the Jews in England 60,000 l.

1188. to be reſolved on nothing leſs, than the death and utter ruin of the Infidels.

Richard goes over to the king of France.

It will be ſufficient to give an account of the conſequences of this war, as the beginning of it was not attended with any remarkable incidents; but, whilſt it was vigorouſly purſued by both parties, when Henry leaſt expected it, his ſon, Richard, deſerting him, went over to the king of France. In all appearance, this was brought about by Philip's intrigues, tho' the hiſtorians have not taken notice of them; but, however that be, Richard alledged two cauſes of complaint againſt the king, his father. The firſt was, that he detained from him the princeſs Alice, and had even propoſed to Philip, who preſs'd him to conſummate the marriage, to marry her to prince John, on more beneficial terms; and, whether this was really the caſe, or Philip had invented this falſity, to prejudice him againſt Henry he believed, or, at leaſt, ſeemed to believe that a project was formed to place his youngeſt brother on the throne. The other occaſion of complaint was, that Henry had refuſed to conſent to a truce, offered by Philip, alledging that it was more expedient to conclude a peace, and adjuſt their reſpective pretenſions, before they entered upon their expedition to the Holy-Land; becauſe, in conſequence of ſuch a treaty, he would have been obliged to reſtore what he had conquered from the earl of Tholouſe, whereas, by a truce, theſe conqueſts would have ſtill remained in his poſſeſſion.

1189. Henry in vain negotiates a peace. Hoved. Gervaſe.

Richard's defection, as it embarraſs'd the affairs of his father, was, for that very reaſon, extremely agreeable to Philip; but Henry, finding that, by this means, ſome of his provinces in France had abandoned him, and that he was, on that account, almoſt diſabled from carrying on the war, did all that was poſſible to forward the concluſion of a peace, and held a conference with the king of France concerning it; but Philip propoſed ſuch rigid conditions, as could not at all be reliſhed by the king of England. He inſiſted, that the marriage between Richard and Alice ſhould be conſummated; and that the prince ſhould be crowned, before the death of his father. Henry's paſſion for Alice would not ſuffer him to accept of the former of theſe articles, and, perhaps, there were other weighty reaſons, againſt his reſigning her to Richard; and, as for the latter, his own experience, at his expence, had too well inſtructed him, how imprudently he had acted, in crowning his eldeſt ſon, Henry, to be willing to run the ſame riſque for Richard, who ſeem'd to be no leſs dangerous than his brother. This firſt attempt proving abortive, Henry made another overture for a peace; but Philip, now more untractable than before, farther demanded, that Henry ſhould take prince John along with him to the Holy-Land, leſt, in Richard's abſence, he ſhould ſeize on the crown, if their father ſhould die in the expedition. Henry, incenſed at Philip, for thus intermeddling in the affairs of his family, broke off the negotiation; which confirmed Richard's ſuſpicions, that his father deſigned to deprive him of the crown, and give it to his younger brother. 1189.

Philip receives Richard's homage.

In the mean time, Philip received homage from Richard, for all the provinces of France belonging to the crown of England, pretending that Henry was guilty of rebellion, in waging war againſt his ſovereign.

Henry is perplexed.

Upon this proceeding, the effuſion of chriſtian blood was renewed, with greater fury than ever; and the zeal againſt the Infidels inſenſibly abated. Henry, in the courſe of this war, was expoſed to the greateſt perplexities; for moſt of his ſubjects in France had joined his ſon againſt him; inſomuch, that, when he kept his Chriſtmas at Saumur, he had the mortification to find himſelf attended with no more than three or four nobles. His vexation was farther increaſed, by the ill ſucceſs of the next campaign; and his troops, being every-where defeated, were, at length, reduced to ſo ſmall a number, that he was in no condition to continue the war. In this extremity, he deſired the pope to interpoſe, in order to procure a peace, but to no purpoſe; for, tho' the pope ſent his legates into France, who threatened Philip with excommunication, if he prevented the king of England from performing his vow, theſe menaces did not anſwer the end propoſed by them. The French king fiercely replied, that his holineſs had no right to concern himſelf with the affairs of the kingdom; eſpecially, when the matter in hand related to the chaſtiſement of a vaſſal, who had audaciouſly rebelled againſt his authority. He added, with an inſulting air: "He did not "doubt, but that the ſmell of the king of "England's ſterlings made the legates talk in "that ſtrain;" and ſome ſay, that Richard would have run one of the legates thro', with a ſword, if he had not been prevented. Henry, dreading the conſequences of this unfortunate war, was obliged, at length, ſince the pope could do him no ſervice, to conſent to Philip's own terms, the principal of which were, as follows: M. Paris.

The articles of peace.

That all Henry's ſubjects, both French and Engliſh, ſhould ſwear fealty to Richard; and that thoſe, who had eſpouſed the ſon's cauſe, ſhould not return to the father, till within one month before he ſet out for the Holy-Land.

That the two monarchs, with prince Richard, ſhould meet at Vezelay in le Nivernois, in order to begin their journey.

That all the king of England's ſubjects, ſhould have a free paſſage, all over France, paying only the old cuſtoms.

That Henry ſhould pay the king of France 20,000 marks, for the damages ſuſtain'd in the war.

That all the Engliſh barons ſhould ſwear, that, upon Henry's violation of the treaty, they would aſſiſt the king of France againſt him.

That the cities of Tours and Mans ſhould be poſſeſſed by Philip, till the king of England performed all theſe articles.

Henry's lofty ſpirit could not, without extreme reluctancy, ſubmit to ſuch hard conditions; and the remembrance of the advantages 1189. tages he had, all along, gained over France, before this fatal war, only added an accent to his misfortunes. This mortification was ſucceeded by another, which he could not reſiſt; for he, at laſt, diſcovered, that prince John, his darling ſon, during the late war, held a treacherous correſpondence with Philip, and was concerned in all his brother's plots, to dethrone a father, that had always expreſs'd the moſt tender regard and affection for him. His grief, on this occaſion, threw him into ſuch a furious paſſion, that he curs'd the very day of his birth, and utter'd imprecations againſt his ſons, which the biſhops then preſent could never prevail on him to revoke. Preſently after, he was taken ill at Chinon; and apprehending that he was near his end, he ordered, that he ſhould be carried into the church before the altar; where, after he had confeſs'd himſelf, and ſhewn ſome ſigns of repentance, he gave up the ghoſt. His eyes were no ſooner cloſed, than he was deſerted by all his domeſticks; and ſome of them had even the inſolence to ſtrip him, and leave him quite naked in the church. His corpſe was afterwards removed to Fontevraud; and he was interr'd in the choir of the nunnery, which he himſelf had founded there, purſuant to his own orders. It is extremely remarkable, that, upon his ſon Richard's approach, who came to meet the funeral pomp, in order to attend the corpſe of his father to the grave, the blood, in great abundance, guſhed out of the mouth and noſtrils; the ſight of which, tho' that prince was naturally very hard-hearted, ſo deeply affected him, that he burſt out into tears, and openly accuſed himſelf, of being the occaſion of his father's death.

The character of Henry II. Brompt.

Thus, died Henry II, one of the moſt illuſtrious heroes of his age, as well for the greatneſs of his genius as the extent of his dominions; but ſuch was the mixture of his vices and virtues, that it is exceedingly difficult to give him a general, and, at the ſame time, a juſt character. He was valiant, prudent, mild, generous, politick, ſtudious, learned, and of an exalted genius *; whilſt, on the contrary, he was a prince of exceſſive haughtineſs, boundleſs ambition †, and inſatiable luſt. Being never ſatisfied with love, or empire, he ſpent his whole life, in the purſuit of new conqueſts, in both; for he attempted the chaſtity of all that came in his way, not excepting the princeſs deſigned for his own ſon; but theſe failings, in a great meaſure, balanced all his other noble endowments. In the beginning of his reign, he was as much feared and reſpected, as any king in Europe; and he was eſteemed to be the happieſt prince in the world, before Becket's affair interrupted his felicity; but that fatal conteſt, which created him ſo many troubles, being followed by diſſentions in his own family, the remainder of his life was a continued ſeries of misfortunes. However, all theſe misfortunes center'd in himſelf; for the kingdom had never been in ſuch flouriſhing circumſtances, as in the reign of Henry II. Upon his acceſſion to the throne, England became one of the moſt powerful ſtates in Europe, and began to be on a level with France, to which before it was very much inferior; and, beſides the large and rich provinces, which he annexed to the crown of England, the conqueſt of Ireland adds a great luſtre to his reign, and ought to endear his memory to the Engliſh. He died, on the 6th of July, in 1189, in the 57th year of his age, after a reign of 34 years, 8 months, and 12 days. 1189.

His legitimate iſſue.

He had five ſons, by Eleanor of Guienne, his wife, but Richard and John only ſurvived him; Geoffrey, his third ſon, left a ſon and daughter, of whom I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. Matilda, his eldeſt daughter, eſpouſed to the duke of Saxony ‡, died immediately after him; Eleanor was married to Alphonſo, king of Caſtile; and Johanna, to William II, ſirnamed the Good, king of Sicily.

His ſpurious iſſue.

Henry had alſo two natural ſons, by Roſamond Clifford; William, ſirnamed Long-Sword, who was earl of Salisbury, and Geoffrey, who was archbiſhop of York. Henry had likewiſe another natural ſon, named Morgan, who, being elected biſhop of Durham, could not obtain the pope's confirmation, becauſe he refuſed to take the name of his mother's father.

The corpſe of king Arthur was found in this reign. Brompt.

Some hiſtorians relate, that, in this reign, a grave was found, in the church-yard of Glaſſenbury-abbey, containing three bodies laid one upon another, each of them in a diſtinct coffin. The firſt was ſuppoſed to be Guinever, ſecond wife to the great Arthur; the ſecond, Mordred his nephew; and the third, Arthur himſelf, diſtinguiſhed by a leaden croſs, with this inſcription: "Here lies the illuſtri-" ous king Arthur in the iſle of Avalon." What is farther added, that his legs were thrice longer than thoſe of the largeſt men, and that there was the diſtance of a ſpan between his eye-brows, renders the whole relation ſomewhat ſuſpicious; but, whether this diſcovery was real or fictitious, it was of uſe to undeceive ſome weak people among the Welch, who ſtill expected the return of their heroe.

* He only impriſoned thoſe that hunted in his foreſts, ſo great was his lenity; and he was very liberal to widows and orphans. During a famine in Mans and Anjou, in 1176, he ſupplied 10,000 people, with food out of his ſtores; and he never laid any heavy tax or tribute upon his ſubjects. Brompton, Diceto.

† He declared, in his proſperity, "The whole world was no more than ſufficient for one great man."

‡ From Henry, duke of Saxony, ſon-in-law to Henry II, by his wife, Matilda, is lineally deſcended his preſent majeſty king GEORGE.

6. RICHARD I. ſirnamed Cœur de Lion.

1189. Richard's former complaints now appear to be groundleſs.

HENRY was no ſooner laid in his grave, than it evidently appeared, that Richard's complaints were only pretences, to varniſh over his rebellion. He had preſſingly ſollicited for leave, to conſummate his marriage with Alice of France, and complained of the king his father's great injuſtice, in obſtructing his felicity; and yet, when this pretended happineſs was in his own power, he was altogether unconcerned about it. His jealouſy, on the account of prince John, his brother, alſo vaniſhed, on a ſudden; for he continued, above a month in France, after Henry's death; whereas he would, doubtleſs, have embarqued for England, with all poſſible expedition, had he been apprehenſive of any danger, from that quarter. His firſt care was to make a viſit to Philip, in order to do him homage, and thank him for his protection; upon which, that monarch reſtored to him all the places he had conquered, during the late war. Richard, after this, went and received the ducal crown of Normandy, and was girt with the ſword of that dutchy, at Roan; where he remained, for ſome time; and, indeed, ſo far were the Engliſh from taking the advantage of his abſence, to diſpute his title to the crown, that his orders were obſerved, with the ſame punctuality, as if he had been actually inveſted with it. He, firſt of all, order'd his mother, queen Eleanor, to be releaſed, who languiſhed in priſon, for 16 years; and he likewiſe entruſted her with the adminiſtration of the government, during his abſence, allowing her to ſet at liberty what priſoners ſhe pleaſed. The queen, being taught, by her own misfortunes, to pity thoſe of others, took a particular pleaſure, in relieving the miſerable; and, during the reſidue of her days, cheerfully embraced all opportunities of exerciſing her charity to ſuch as were debarred from the ſweets of liberty.

He baniſhes, from his preſence, all his adherents againſt his father.

Eleanor's compaſſion for priſoners was very natural; but Richard's treatment of thoſe, that, for his ſake, had incurred his father's reſentment, is extremely ſurprizing. Inſtead of rewarding them, in proportion to their expectations, he forbade them his preſence, and affected to diſtinguiſh, by his favours, all that were proof againſt his ſollicitations; which ratifies what has been often remarked, that they, who make uſe of unjuſt means, to accompliſh their deſigns, deteſt, in their hearts, the inſtruments they employ, and approve of the ſteady conduct of ſuch, as are not to be ſeduced from their integrity.

He is crowned at London.

Richard, having ſettled all his affairs in France, came over to London; where he was ſolemnly crowned by Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who adminiſter'd to him the uſual oath; which had been taken by all the kings, ſince the Norman conqueſt, tho' not ſo much as one of them made a conſcience of performing it. The archbiſhop freely reminded Richard of this, conjuring him, at the ſame time, not to preſume to accept of the royal dignity, unleſs he reſolved inviolably to obſerve the vows and oaths he had juſt then made; to which Richard replied, that, by the aſſiſtance of God's grace, he would punctually perform them all, without any exception. 1189.

Some Jews are ſlain. G. Neubrig.

The ceremony of the coronation was ſomewhat interrupted, by the maſſacre of ſome Jews, who, ſtriving too eagerly to get into the church, to ſee the ſolemnity, were expoſed to the rage of the rabble, who killed ſeveral of them, before their fury could be reſtrained; but, the king ordering ſtrict inquiſition to be made, the authors of this diſorder were deſervedly put to death.

The ardor of the chriſtians for the Cruſade.

If it ſhould ſeem aſtoniſhing, that the people ſhould treat the Jews, with ſuch cruelty, on ſo ſlight an occaſion, it is to be conſider'd, that, ſince the news of the taking of Jeruſalem was ſpread over Europe, nothing but vengeance was breathed againſt the enemies of Chriſt; and that, though the Jews were not at all concerned in the late revolution in the eaſt, their not being chriſtians was, alone, ſufficient, to render them odious; and, at this juncture, they would infallibly have met with ſtill worſe uſage, if the preparations for the Cruſade had not, at length, turned the edge of the people's fury againſt the Saracens. This zeal, eſpecially in France and England, was ſo ardent, that the number of the Croiſes was prodigious; for every one gloried, either in enliſting himſelf to go, in perſon, againſt the Infidels, or in contributing money, for the ſupport of the war. Richard made a vow, that he would engage in this expedition, before his father's deceaſe; which he renewed, at the late interview between him and Philip, when both theſe monarchs agreed to join their forces, and proceed to Paleſtine, in order to relieve the chriſtians. Richard was ſcarce ſeated on the throne, when Philip put him in mind of his promiſe; but there was no need of many ſollicitations, to prevail on this prince; for ſo far was he from having any thoughts of declining his journey, that his mind was wholly employed in making preparations for it, and, on this very account, he neglected all his other affairs. Whether his chief motive to this undertaking was a pure principle of zeal and devotion, or an eager deſire of acquiring fame, I will not preſume to determine; tho', from Richard's character, one would be apt to conclude, that he was prompted to it, more by glory than religion.

Richard's ways and means for raiſing money.

As the king of England deſigned to lead a very numerous army into Paleſtine, it was neceſſary to raiſe vaſt ſums, for its maintenance; and, 1189. accordingly, this engroſs'd all his time and care, till he enter'd upon his voyage. The late king left, in his coffers, above 100,000 marks; and Richard procured little leſs from the treaſurer and others, who had the management of the revenues, in the preceding reign; but, theſe ſums being inſufficient, he uſed all imaginable methods, to increaſe them. He ſold almoſt all the crown-lands to the higheſt bidder; and, as the dignitaries, among the clergy, had the moſt ready money, they improved this opportunity, more than others. The biſhop of Durham purchaſed the earldom of Northumberland; upon which the king jocoſely ſaid, "He had made a young earl of an "old biſhop"; but ſuch was this prelate's ambition, that he, moreover, gave 1000 marks, to be juſticiary, during his abſence. The king of Scotland alſo, on this occaſion, offered Richard 10,000 marks, provided he would reſign Berwick and Roxborough, and give up his pretenſions to the ſovereignty of Scotland; and, Richard readily accepting this propoſal, ſurrendered the two places, and, by an authentick charter, diſcharged the king of Scotland, and his ſucceſſors, from the homage extorted from him by Henry II.

Many of his ſubjects were highly diſguſted, at theſe alienations; and ſome of them took the freedom to repreſent to the king, that they were of dangerous conſequence; but Richard ſilenced their clamours, with the following reply: "I would ſell London itſelf, could I meet "with a chapman able to purchaſe it". The ſums, amaſs'd by theſe extraordinary means, not yet anſwering to the vaſtneſs of his projects, as multitudes had inconſiderately taken the croſs, he obtained from the pope a power to diſpenſe with thoſe that repented of their vow; and this new expedient brought him in abundance of money. Having made the beſt uſe of theſe general methods, he proceeded to exact money from the richeſt of his ſubjects, and borrowed of thoſe that led an unblameable life; but, as for thoſe, over whom he had the leaſt advantage, he threatened to call them to a ſtrict account, and conſtrained them to prevent it, by valuable preſents. Thus, he forced Glanville, a wealthy lawyer, whom he had impriſoned, to purchaſe his liberty, with 15000 l. ſterling; and tho' he was reſolved to entruſt Longchamp, his favourite, lately made chancellor, with the great-ſeal, in his abſence, he demanded of him 3000 l. to continue him in that poſt. In the mean time, the clergy exerted themſelves, to ſupply him with ſoldiers; the pulpits reſounded with the great merit of ſerving in the holy war; and all the penances, enjoined by the confeſſors, tended to promote this grand deſign. The army, by theſe means, quickly became very numerous, and ſo far better accommodated with all things, as every officer, and even private man, provided themſelves with neceſſaries.

Richard's uneaſineſs, on the account of his brother.

Tho' the king expreſs'd a ſingular ſatisfaction, in ſeeing the preparations for his voyage in ſuch forwardneſs; yet the apprehenſion of his brother John's ſeizing on the crown, in his abſence, which would, in all probability, be long, gave him uneaſineſs. He could have heartily wiſh'd 1189. to have had his company with him; but, as John ſeemed to have no fancy to the voyage, he would not oblige him to it, by an involuntary vow. However, being a ſtranger to his ambition, he determined to heap favours on the young prince, imagining that they would engage him to make a grateful return; and, with this view; he inveſted him with the earldoms of Cornwall, Dorſet, Somerſet, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaſter, giving him alſo in marriage Aviſa, heireſs to the houſe of Glouceſter. The archbiſhop of Canterbury prohibited this match, by reaſon of their being too nearly related, as Henry I. was great grandfather to them both; but, at preſent, there was a ſort of neceſſity for it. The late earl of Glouceſter, Aviſa's father, for ſome private reaſons, made prince John his heir; which would infallibly have occaſioned a great law-ſuit; and there was ſome danger of the prince's being caſt, and of his raiſing diſturbances, on that account. The death of his wife, daughter to the earl of Mortagne, naturally paved the way, for the reconciliation of the parties, by joining them in marriage; and, therefore, tho' the archbiſhop's prohibition was founded on the canons, it, for once, gave way to reaſons of ſtate; for they were married at Marlborough, and John became alſo earl of Glouceſter, in right of his wife. After all, tho' Richard had, in a manner, ſhared his kingdom with his brother, he would not allow him to have any concern in the government, during his abſence, leſt it ſhould render him too powerful; nay, he cauſed him to ſwear, that he would go and remain in Normandy, tho', before his departure, he releaſed him from his oath; but he committed the regency to Longchamp, jointly with the biſhop of Durham. Longchamp was a Norman of mean extraction, who, by his intereſt with the king, was promoted to be biſhop of Ely, high-chancellor, and the pope's legate over all England; and theſe dignities, together with the regency, made him the moſt powerful ſubject, that had ever been in the kingdom; for which reaſon, a certain author very juſtly ſtiles him the prince and pontiff of the Engliſh, ſince all the power, ſpiritual and temporal, was united in his perſon. Brompt.

He enters into an alliance with the king of Scotland.

After Richard had taken all neceſſary precautions, for the government of the ſtate, to ſecure its tranquillity, he was deſirous of renewing his alliance with the kings of Scotland and Wales; and, accordingly, he invited both theſe princes into England, in order to adjuſt their reſpective pretenſions, and ſo prevent any interruption of the peace of his ſubjects. The king of Scotland, meeting Richard at Canterbury, entered into a ſtrict alliance with him; and, as ſome relate, ſent his brother, David, with 1000 Scotchmen, to attend him in his voyage. Griffin, king of Wales, ſent Rees, his eldeſt ſon, into England; but, ſome difference, in point of ceremony, ariſing, that prince returned in a paſſion, without ſeeing the king; yet, as Richard's affairs with the Welch were of no great importance, that accident did not occaſion him to delay his journey. 1190. Richard, going over into France, joins Philip, at Vezelai.

Every thing being, now, in readineſs for his departure, Richard paſſed over into France, with all his troops, and marched for Marſeilles, where his fleet had orders to meet him; and the French and Engliſh joined at Vezelai, according to agreement. The two monarchs, upon their arrival, renewed their alliance, obliging themſelves to protect and defend each other, on all occaſions; and, beſides, they both agreed, that all quarrels between their ſubjects, whilſt they were abroad, ſhould be ſuperſeded, till their return; and the biſhops, who thus far attended them, promiſed to excommunicate all, that ſhould preſume to diſturb the tranquillity of either of the kingdoms. The two kings, having concerted the neceſſary meaſures, to compleat their deſigns, they marched together, as far as Lyons; but here they parted, Philip taking the way of Genoa, but Richard that of Marſeilles, where he waited, ſome time, for his fleet, to no purpoſe. A violent tempeſt had ſo diſpers'd his ſhips, that they could not, as yet, be rejoined; and, part of them being driven, by ſtreſs of weather, into Portugal, the king of that country employed the aſſiſtance ſent him by Providence, for the relief of the city of Santaren, that was beſieged by the Miramolin or emperor of Africa. The fleet being, thus, prevented from arriving at Marſeilles, ſo ſoon as the king expected, impatient to be at Meſſina, the place appointed for a general rendezvouz of the Croiſes, he hired ſome veſſels at Marſeilles; and, with part of his troops, he embarqued for Sicily. Richard being forced by ſome accident, to come to an anchor, at the mouth of the Tiber, the pope ſent the biſhop of Oſtia, to invite him to ſpend a few days at Rome, for a refreſhment; but he refuſed the invitation. Quickly after, the fleet arrived, with the reſt of the army, and, continuing his courſe, the 20th of September, he reached Meſſina; but the ſight of ſuch a great armament raiſed no leſs admiration in the Sicilians, than jealouſy in the king of France, who was uneaſy to find the forces of his vaſſal ſuperior to his own.

The affairs of Sicily.

Tancred, then on the throne of Sicily, was natural ſon to king Roger, who left behind him William, a legitimate ſon, ſirnamed the Bad, and a daughter, called Conſtantia, a nun at Palermo. William the Bad had, for his ſucceſſor, William the Good, who, marrying Johanna of England, Richard's ſiſter, died, without iſſue; and, on his death, Clement III, then pope, pretended, that Sicily, as a fief of the church, was devolved to the holy ſee. In the interim, Tancred prevailed on the Sicilians to elect him, under the pretence, that Sicily wanted a king, to defend her againſt the Saracens, who were already poſſeſſed of part of the iſland. Clement dying, at this juncture, Celeſtine III, who ſucceeded him, maintaining the ſame pretenſions, treated Tancred, as an uſurper, reſolving to do all that was poſſible, to deprive him of the crown; but, apprehending that he could not, alone, execute this deſign, he applied to the emperor Henry VI. of the houſe of Swabia, and made over the kingdom of Sicily to him, as a gift, provided he could conquer it; and, that he might have another title, beſides that of donation, he cauſed the princeſs Conſtantia to be taken out of the nunnery of Palermo, and, diſpenſing with her vow, married her to Henry, tho' ſhe was 50 years of age. However, Conſtantia proved to be with child, in her 52d year; and, to put the truth of it out of queſtion, ſhe was publickly brought to bed, in a tent, of a ſon, named Frederick. The queen dowager of Sicily being, probably, too far concern'd in the pope's meaſures, Tancred committed her to priſon; but, upon Richard's arrival, ſhe was releaſed, and ſent to the king, her brother, who was not contented with ſuch a ſlight ſatisfaction. He demanded for the queen, his ſiſter, the dowry aſſigned her by king William II, her husband, and threatened to make uſe of compulſive methods, on Tancred's refuſal; upon which, the king of Sicily conſidered Richard, as his real enemy. Richard, perceiving Tancred to be backward in anſwering his demand, and, perhaps, ſuſpecting ſome treachery, for his own ſecurity, ſeized on a caſtle and monaſtry, near Meſſina, where he lodged his ſtores, under an able garriſon; but the king of Sicily, who was of a jealous temper, taking it for granted, that Richard was come, at the pope's inſtance, in order to dethrone him, ordered the inhabitants of Meſſina, by reaſon of ſome diſorders in their city, to expel all the Engliſh; which, of courſe, was attended with the effuſion of blood. The king of England, exaſperated at this outrage, reſolved, at once, to attack Meſſina; but, upon Tancred's proteſtations, that he had no hand in the riot and would puniſh the authors of it, he deferred the execution of his deſign. However, as the Meſſinians ſtill continued to refuſe to open their gates to the Engliſh, and Tancred delayed the promiſed ſatisfaction, he, at length, determined, to enter it, by force. Accordingly, he aſſaulted the city, in ſuch a furious manner, that he took, it in the firſt attack; and he directly ordered his banners to be diſplayed on the walls, even in the part of the town that was allotted to the French; for the two monarchs agreed, that, to prevent any diſputes among the ſoldiers, each of the nations ſhould have one half of the city to themſelves, for their neceſſary occaſions. It was, therefore, evident, that Richard, by ſetting up his banners in the French diviſion, violated his agreement with Philip; and this prince ſo highly reſented it, that it would have occaſioned an entire rupture between the two kings, had not the affair been adjuſted, by the mediation of the great men of both nations. Richard, at length, removed his banners, and proteſted, that, without any view of affronting Philip, he only intended to force the king of Sicily to give him ſatisfaction, for the injurious treatment of the Engliſh; and, to demonſtrate his ſincerity, he reſigned the cuſtody of Meſſina to the templars, till the quarrel between him and Tancred ſhould be decided. Upon this, Tancred, who till now remained at Palermo, came to Richard at Meſſina, and entered into a treaty with him; by which he obliged

A match was likewiſe agreed on, between Arthur duke of Bretagne, Richard's nephew, and Tancred's daughter; and Tancred alſo promiſed to fit out ten gallies and ſix large ſhips, for the ſervice of the Croiſes. Upon theſe advantageous terms, Richard gave up all his other pretenſions, and ſubjected his dominions to the pope's cenſures, if he ſhould violate his oath; and, theſe two princes ſeeming to be thoroughly reconciled, Richard made a preſent to Tancred of king Arthur's ſword, named Caliburn by the Britons.

1191. Tancred ſows ſedition between Richard and Philip.

Tancred, after all, could not digeſt a treaty, which force alone had compelled him to ſign; and he exerted himſelf, to engage the king of France in his quarrel againſt Richard; but, this project failing, he reſolved to be revenged on both the monarchs, at once, by creating a diſſention between them. Accordingly, he privately inſinuated to the king of England, that Philip had formed evil deſigns againſt him; and he even ſhewed him a letter, as he pretended, from the duke Burgundy, to prove the truth of his inſinuation. Richard, giving credit to this information, expoſtulated with the king of France, who accuſed him of being ſollicitous to find out pretences, to diſſolve their union; and, at length, they came to an open rupture. Philip ſent Richard word, that, unleſs he conſummated his marriage with Alice, purſuant to his promiſe, he ſhould regard him, as his mortal enemy; and Richard replied, that he could, by no means, marry a princeſs that had a child by his father, propoſing to prove it by ſeveral witneſſes then on the ſpot; but Philip thought it improper to purſue an affair, which, he was perſuaded, might be prejudicial to his ſiſter's honour. After ſeveral conferences, he conſented, that Richard ſhould have liberty to marry whom he pleaſed; whereas that prince had already concluded a marriage with Berenguella of Navarre. Tho' Philip's moderation ſeemed to reſtore a good underſtanding between the two monarchs; yet ſuch were the prejudices that Richard imbibed againſt him, by the means of Tancred's late information; and, on the other hand, Richard's allegations againſt Alice ſo highly incenſed Philip, that they never afterwards were cordial friends; nevertheleſs, they made preparations, for the continuation of their voyage.

Hoved. An Engliſh hiſtorian affirms, that, whilſt they were preparing for their departure, Richard, touch'd with remorſe for his ſins, made a general confeſſion of all his exceſſes, which was attended with a very viſible reformation and amendment of life; but it could be wiſh'd, that this author had given us a more particular account of the fruits of his repentance; for it is extremely ſurprizing to find no other effect of it, than his deſire to confer with one Joachim, a Ciſtercian abbot. Joachim, all over Italy, was eſteemed to be a prophet; and, in all probability, Richard ſent for him, purely, to gratify his curioſity. It is ſaid, that, preaching on a certain day before the king, he aſſerted, that antichriſt was already born and at Rome, that he would be placed in the papal chair, and exalt himſelf "above all the "gods"; i. e. above all the princes of the earth. Soon after this, the emperor and empreſs received, on their knees, the imperial crown from the hands of the pope, who, having ſet it on their heads, kick'd it off with his foot, to ſhew his ſuperiority; which action furniſhed ample matter for reflection, to ſuch as were prepoſſeſſed in the abbot's favour; and they maintained, that his prediction was accompliſhed by the pope's proceeding. 1191.

The two kings having ſpent the winter at Meſſina, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year permitted, Philip put to ſea; but Richard ſtaid a while longer in Sicily, to wait for the arrival of Eleanor, his mother, with the princeſs of Navarre, his bride; and both theſe princeſſes arrived, a few days after Philp's departure; but Eleanor returned home immediately, leaving Berenguella with her daughter, the queen dowager of Sicily, who accompanied her brother to the Holy-Land. Upon this, Richard embarqued directly, with a fleet of 150 ſail, 52 gallies, 10 large ſhips of burden laden with proviſions, and many ſmall veſſels, for the ſervice of the fleet. It does not particularly appear, what forces were ſhipped off, on this occaſion; but, from the number of ſhips employed in the expedition, it is natural to conclude, that the Engliſh army muſt have been vaſtly numerous. Whilſt the fleet was rowing between the iſlands of Cyprus and Rhodes, a ſudden and violent tempeſt aroſe, which diſpers'd the ſhips, and drove part of them on ſhore, on the coaſt of Cyprus; which iſland was then ſubject to Iſaac of the Comnenian race, who, from being only a governor under the emperor of Conſtantinople, had uſurped the ſupreme power, and aſſumed the imperial title. He was a covetous and brutiſh man, that, by reaſon of his cruelties and extortions, was deteſted by his ſubjects, who waited for a proper opportunity, to free themſelves from his tyranny; which they now met with, by the arrival of the Engliſh fleet, ſooner than they expected. This inhuman prince, inſtead of relieving the Engliſh, that were ſtranded, near the port of Limiſſo, impriſoned thoſe that eſcaped, and ſeized their effects; and he would not ſuffer the ſhip, that had the princeſſes on board, to enter the harbour, but left them expoſed to the wind and the waves. The ſcattered fleet rejoining again, on the coaſt of Cyprus, Richard was extremely incenſed, when he received the news of Iſaac's barbarity to the Engliſh; yet, being unwilling to retard his voyage, he only demanded the priſoners and what had been ſeized; but, upon Iſaac's inſulting anſwer, he made a deſcent into the iſland, and compell'd him to abandon the ſhore, after he had ſeen a dreadful ſlaughter among his troops. The Engliſh, improving this advantage, attacked the city of Limiſſo, of which they became maſters, by the firſt, aſſault, and took Iſaac and his only daughter priſoners; but, a few days after, this pretend-

However, not being able to find any place of refuge, he, at laſt, choſe to make a voluntary ſurrender of himſelf to the king of England, whom he earneſtly intreated not to put him in irons; and Richard, granting his requeſt in a literal ſenſe, commanded him to be bound with fetters of ſilver *.

Richard becomes maſter of the iſland.

Richard, on the taking of Limiſſo, reſolved to undertake the conqueſt of the whole iſland of Cyprus; and the Cypriots, at once, ſubmitted to a prince, whom they conſidered, as their deliverer, who ratified all the privileges they were poſſeſs'd of, under the emperors of Conſtantinople. In the mean time, Guy of Luſignan, king of Jeruſalem, who procur'd his liberty, by delivering up the city of Aſcalon to the ſultan, waited on the king of England in order to implore his protection; and he was attended by Geoffrey, his brother, Raymond of Antioch, Boamond, his ſon, and other princes and lords of Paleſtine. Richard likewiſe conſummated his marriage with Berenguella, in Cyprus, and not at Meſſina, as ſome have related; and, before he left this iſland, he ſent Iſaac, his priſoner, to Tripoli in Syria, to be confined there; but, as for his daughter, he took her with him to Paleſtine. Such was his regard for this beautiful princeſs, that it was ſuſpected, compaſſion was not the ſole motive of his keeping her near him; and this ſuſpicion received confirmation, when it was obſerved, that his affection to his new queen gradually abated; but theſe particulars are more proper for a romance than a hiſtory.

The troubles in England.

Notwithſtanding Richard's ſucceſſes abroad, his Engliſh ſubjects were ſufferers, by his abſence; for he had no ſooner croſs'd the ſea, than the two regents, diſagreeing, came, at length, to an open rupture. Longchamp had very much the advantage over his collegue, not only on the account of his dignities, but by his extenſive abilities; and, accordingly, under the pretence that their diſſention was extremely prejudicial to the affairs of the ſtate, he had the policy to exclude him, by degrees, from his ſhare in the adminiſtration, and aſſumed the whole power to himſelf. This arbitrary proceeding might have been varniſh'd over, with the neceſſity of the king's ſervice, had it been made by one of another character; but it was notorious, that Longchamp was of an imperious temper and boundleſs ambition, which led him to look upon all his high poſts to be inferior to his merit. He affected to appear in publick with a retinue more numerous and ſplendid than that of a king; for an hiſtorian affirms, that it uſually conſiſted of 1500 perſons, beſides the guards in his houſe, tho' he was originally no more than a farmer's ſon; and it is farther related, that, when he lodged, but a ſingle night, in a monaſtery, he conſumed the revenue of three years. He treated all degrees of men, with intolerable inſolence, exerting his power, in ſuch a haughty manner, as could ſcarce be tolerated in a ſovereign; nay, a certain author obſerves, that the laity found him to be more than a king, and the clergy, than a pope. Beſides, he was a Norman and very partial to the foreigners; which alone was ſufficient to render him odious to the Engliſh. The biſhop of Durham gave an account of his caſe, in a letter to the king, who, receiving his complaints at Marſeilles, ſent him his letters patent, appointing him juſticiary, from the Humber to the confines of Scotland; but, upon the receipt of them, that prelate was ſo imprudent, as to put them into Longchamp's hands, who, under the pretence of examining their contents, refuſed to reſtore them; and he, moreover, order'd the biſhop to be apprehended, and detained him in priſon, till he reſigned certain caſtles, which gave him too great power in the northern parts of the kingdom. 1191.

He deſpiſes the counſellors appointed by the king, who complain to prince John.

Richard had appointed ſix lords, for counſellors to the regent; but Longchamp, inſtead of conſulting their advice, treated them, on all occaſions, with the utmoſt contempt; inſomuch that, at length, together with the biſhop of Durham, they carried their complaints to prince John, who was ſtill ſtiled earl of Mortagne, as well as during his firſt marriage. The young prince, rejoicing at this opportunity, to interpoſe in the adminiſtration, readily promiſed them his protection; and, from that time, he managed the diſcontents of moſt of the great men againſt the regent, with ſo much dexterity, that each of them aſſured him of their aſſiſtance; ſo that nothing was wanting, to compleat the ruin of Longchamp, except a pretence, which, ſoon after, came in his way.

The occaſion of Longchamp's ruin.

Some time before Richard's departure, Geoffrey, his baſtard-brother, was elected archbiſhop of York; but, whether his conſent was not asked, or he deſigned that ſee for another, this election was ſo diſpleaſing to the king, that, in his paſſion, he reſolved to impriſon Geoffrey; yet, upon his proteſting that he would not inſiſt on his election, he forgave him, on condition that he would never apply to the pope, for his confirmation, enjoining him alſo to remain in Normandy, till the expedition to the Holy-Land was concluded. However, in the king's abſence, Geoffrey demanded and obtained the pope's bull, to confirm his election; and, without acquainting the regent, intended to repair into England and take poſſeſſion of his dignity. Longchamp, receiving intelligence of it, ſent orders to Dover, to have him apprehended; and Geoffrey had but juſt time, upon his arrival, to take ſanctuary in a church; yet, notwithſtanding this precaution, he was dragg'd from the altar, and confined in Dover-caſtle. Prince John made the beſt uſe of this outrage, to the diſ-

1191. advantage of Longchamp; and being ſupported by all the lords, he ſent him abſolute orders, to releaſe the archbiſhop. Longchamp, by refuſing to comply with them, furniſhed John with the pretence he wanted; and, a few days after, the regent was ſummoned to appear before an aſſembly of the Lords ſpiritual and temporal, convened at London, in St. Paul's church. Longchamp was now, on a ſudden, abandon'd by all the world, and conſtrained to make his appearance before the aſſembly, who were reſolved upon his ruin; and he was accuſed of exceeding the bounds of his commiſſion, in ſeveral particulars, but principally in uſurping the authority, which ſhould have been ſhared between him, his collegue, and the ſix counſellors. The archbiſhop of Roan and the earl of Pembroke likewiſe complained, that, having received a patent from the king, appointing them joint commiſſioners with Longchamp in the government, that prelate would not ſuffer them to have any concern in the adminiſtration; but ſome authors aſſert, that they durſt not ſhew their patent to the regent, leſt he ſhould detain it, as he did that of the biſhop of Durham. However that be, upon theſe accuſations, Longchamp was turned out of the regency, which was lodged in the hands of the archbiſhop of Roan, till the king's pleaſure was known concerning it; and they deprived him of the cuſtody of the tower of London and Windſor-caſtle; and, his enemies, not contented with this ſeverity, forced him, by their menaces, to lay down his legate's croſs, in the church of Canterbury, after which, he was committed to priſon. Some days after, he made his eſcape; but he was taken again, on the ſea-ſide, diſguiſed in a woman's habit, with a bundle of linnen under his arm; and, in this dreſs, he was carried to Dover-caſtle, with a great mob at his heels. Nevertheleſs, prince John, dreading the pope's reſentment, releaſed him, and permitted him to retire into Normandy, where he was no ſooner arrived, than he ſent complaints of his uſage, both to the pope and the king. The king received this account very late; but the pope's letter came to his hands much ſooner, who was ſo highly exaſperated at Longchamp's treatment, and the contempt that was ſhewn to his legatine character, that he directly ſent orders to the biſhops, to excommunicate prince John, on that account. The prince, being terrified by the pope's menaces, would have reſtored Longchamp, were it not for the biſhops themſelves, who dreaded to be again ſubject to the authority of that haughty prelate; and, by this means, the pope's orders were rendered ineffectual, and the late regent durſt not return into England.

The pope orders the biſhops to excommunicate prince John, but they refuſe to do it.

Prince John projects means to ſecure the crown.

The preſent ſituation of affairs giving John an opportunity of being more concerned in the government, than the king, his brother, intended, he made the beſt uſe of it, to pave his way to the crown; and, if he did not deſign to aſcend the throne, during his brother's life, it is, at leaſt, certain, that he was reſolved to ſecure the ſucceſſion, if the king ſhould die, whilſt abroad. He very well knew, that Arthur, duke of Bretagne, his nephew, who was the ſon of Geoffrey, his elder brother, had a better title than himſelf; and, therefore, he was the more ſollicitous to have this point ſettled, before-hand, to prevent the competition of ſuch a dangerous rival. With this view, he did all that was poſſible, to render himſelf popular to the Engliſh, and eſpecially the Londoners, whoſe rights and privileges he cauſed to be confirmed by an aſſembly-general; and, by this, he ſo firmly attached the hearts of the citizens to his intereſt, that, when they ſwore allegiance to the king, they voluntarily made a ſolemn promiſe, to own him for their ſovereign, provided the king died, without iſſue. Thus, the prince gained ground, by degrees, and, at the ſame time, by ſecret practices, raiſed a party, capable of ſupporting him againſt his nephew; and which afterwards he would have employed, even againſt the king, his brother. In the mean time, Richard render'd his name immortal by his valiant exploits, and inſpired the Saracens with a dread of the approaching diſſolution of their empire; but, before I deſcend to particulars, it will be proper briefly to deſcribe the preſent ſtate of the Holy-Land, and likewiſe to take notice of what was tranſacted there, ſince the recovery of it by the chriſtians. 1191.

The affairs of the kingdom of Jeruſalem.

The kingdom of Jeruſalem, conſiſting of Paleſtine and part of Syria, taken from the Saracens, was erected by the chriſtians, Godfrey of Bulloigne being the firſt king, who was crowned with a crown of thorns; and, having reigned, about a year, he was ſucceeded by Baldwin, his brother, who, after a reign of 18 years, left the crown, by his death, to his couſin Baldwin II, who enjoyed it 13 years. Foulke, earl of Anjou, by marrying his daughter, became king of Jeruſalem, after his deceaſe, and ſate on the throne 11 years. He had, by his firſt wife, Geoffrey, earl of Anjou, father to Henry II. king of England; but, by his ſecond, he had two ſons; and Baldwin the eldeſt enjoyed the crown of Jeruſalem, for 24 years, being ſucceeded by his brother, Almeric, who reigned 12 years. Baldwin IV, his ſon and ſucceſſor, deſpairing of any iſſue, nominated Baldwin, his nephew, the ſon of his eldeſt ſiſter, Sibyl, by William of Montferrat, to be his heir; who, dying, after a reign of 12 years, left the guardianſhip of young Baldwin V, and the regency of the kingdom, to Raymond, earl of Tripoli. In the interim, Sibyl, the king's mother, married Guy of Luſignan, who, in right of his wife, claimed the guardianſhip of the king and the government of the ſtate; and the earl of Tripoli, to no purpoſe, inſiſted on the late king's will againſt him; for Guy, ſupported by his wife, ſeized on the regency, and, ſoon after, aſcended the throne, upon the death of Baldwin, tho' it was ſuſpected, that he diſpatched him, by poiſon, to pave the way for his ſucceſſion. The earl of Tripoli made preparations, in order to dethrone Guy, whom he conſidered, as an uſurper and the murderer of the late king; but Guy applied to Saladine, ſultan of Egypt, for aſſiſtance, which ſtep proved to be very fatal to the chriſtians

1191. ſtians of Paleſtine. The Infidel prince, rejoicing at ſo fair an opportunity, to recover the dominions of his anceſtors, under the pretence of aſſiſting the king of Jeruſalem, enter'd Paleſtine with a formidable army, and directly took Acres or Ptolemais, Aſotus, Berytus, and ſome other places; but, at length, putting off the maſque, he made it evident, that he deſigned to expel the chriſtians. Guy, being convinced of his error, when it was too late, ſhut himſelf up in his capital; but, for want of proviſions, it was impoſſible for him to hold out, above a month, or prevent his falling into the hands of the enemy. He was afterwards obliged to ſurrender Aſcalon to the ſultan, to obtain his liberty; and, thus, Saladine, at once, deſtroyed both the competitors to the crown of Jeruſalem.

For the recovery of this kingdom, the kings of France and England had engaged in the preſent expedition, with powerful armies, conſiſting of all the nations in Europe, but chiefly of the French and Engliſh; and, before Philip's arrival, Guy of Luſignan, Conrade, marqueſs of Montferrat, and ſeveral other princes and lords, with ſome German, Flemiſh, and Italian troops, had begun the ſiege of Acres, which had now laſted, a whole year. The king of France no ſooner landed his men, than he encamped round the city, and continued the ſiege, tho' with little ſucceſs; but Richard, arriving afterwards, with freſh troops, ſo vigorouſly purſued it, that, at laſt, Saladine ſurrendered the place, by capitulation *.

Among the occurrences of this famous ſiege, there was one, tho' trifling in itſelf; yet, attended with ſuch remarkable conſequences, and ſo very prejudicial to the king of England, that it deſerves to be related. In an aſſault made by the chriſtians, Leopold, duke of Auſtria, taking one of the towers, ordered, that his banner ſhould be inſtantly erected; but Richard, apprehending this action to be injurious to the two monarchs, that commanded in chief, ſent ſome of his men, to pull it down and trample it under their feet. Leopold was highly incenſed at this indignity, tho' he concealed his reſentment, till he ſhould meet with a proper opportunity to diſcover it; but, unfortunately for Richard, it offered, when he leaſt expected it, and the duke of Auſtria was but too ſucceſsful, in his revenge, as the ſequel will inform us.

1192. A diſſention between the two kings.

The two monarchs, being maſters of Acres, had encouragement to purſue their conqueſts; but, juſt as the chriſtian army expected to march to Jeruſalem, a diſſention between the two commanders defeated their expectations. Richard had gained a certain ſuperiority, which extremely mortified the king of France; for the number and good condition of his forces, his perſonal valour, of which he had given ſeveral proofs, at the ſiege of Acres, and the very taking of that city had attracted the particular eſteem and reſpect of the whole army. Philip, however, not daring openly to complain, that his rival was more reſpected than himſelf, made uſe of pretences, to diſguiſe his reſentment; and, in the firſt place, he demanded of Richard half the iſle of Cyprus, alledging that they had agreed to ſhare all their conqueſts. Richard replied, that their agreement was limited to what was conquer'd from the Infidels; and that Philip underſtood it, in that reſtrained ſenſe, ſeeing he had appropriated to himſelf what belonged to the earl of Flanders, who died at the ſiege of Acres, without the leaſt thoughts of giving him a ſhare. This was attended with another occaſion of quarrel; for, the crown of Jeruſalem being in diſpute between Guy of Luſignan and Conrade, marqueſs of Montferrat, Richard eſpouſed Guy's cauſe; whilſt Philip publickly declared for the marqueſs. The grounds and reaſons of their reſpective pretenſions were briefly, as follows. 1192.

The ſtate of the diſpute between Guy of Luſignan and the marqueſs of Montferrat.

Almeric, king of Jeruſalem, had, by his firſt wife, of the houſe of Courtenay, Baldwin IV, his ſucceſſor, and a daughter, named Sibylla; and, by his ſecond wife, niece to Emanuel, emperor of Conſtantinople, he had a daughter, called Iſabella. Sibylla was firſt married to William of Montferrat, by whom ſhe had Baldwin V, heir to Baldwin IV, his uncle; but her ſecond husband was Guy of Luſignan, by whom ſhe had ſeveral children, who all died before their mother. Iſabella, Sibylla's ſiſter, by a ſecond venter, had alſo two husbands, the firſt being Humphrey de Toron, who refuſed the crown offered him by the barons of Jeruſalem, after the death of Baldwin V; and her ſecond husband was Conrade, marqueſs of Montferrat, who claimed the title of king of Jeruſalem, in right of his wife, whoſe eldeſt ſiſter was lately deceaſed, without iſſue. The point in debate, therefore, was, whether Guy of Luſignan ought to retain the title of king of Jeruſalem, after the death of his wife, Sibylla, or reſign it to the marqueſs of Montferrat, whoſe wife was now ſole heireſs of the kingdom. Indeed, the conteſt was about an empty name, ſince Saladine was maſter of the capital and almoſt all the country; but yet this title would prove to be of conſequence, when the kingdom ſhould be reſtored by the arms of the Croiſes. Philip was in the intereſt of the marqueſs of Montferrat; and, perhaps, on that very account, Richard ſupported the pretenſions of Guy of Luſignan; for ſcarce a day paſs'd, but ſomething contributed to inflame their mutual animoſity. If Philip was jealous of Richard's glory, the other, in his turn, complained, that the king of France, through ſpite and envy, obſtructed the progreſs of the arms of the chriſtians; but, in the height of theſe conteſts, they were both ſeized with the ſame

* It is ſaid, that this ſiege laſted above two years; and the author of Richard's travels to Jeruſalem aſſures us, that 300,000 pilgrims periſhed in it. Among theſe were Conrade, duke of Servia, and ſeveral foreign earls; Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Ralph de Glanville, chief-juſtice of England, William de Mandeville, William, earl of Ferrers, and ſome whoſe poſterity flouriſh, to this day; viz. Ingelram de Fiennes, from whom the lord Say and Seal is deſcended; the lord Dacres; Theophilus Clinton, earl of Lincoln, whoſe arms retain the badge of the holy war, ſtars, creſcents, and croſſes; as alſo St. John, Minthul, Tilney, Scrope, Pigot, Laiburne, Mowbray, Talbot, Malet, &c. diſtemper, 1191. distemper, which endangered their lives, tho' they escaped, with the loss of their hair.

1192. Philip returns to France.

After their recovery, Richard seem'd to be, more than ever, desirous to pursue the conquests over the Infidels; but Philip resolved to return to France, being so weak after his late illness, that he was scarce able any more to enter upon action; tho', perhaps, his principal reason was his extreme impatience, to take possession of Artois, which fell to him, by the death of the earl of Flanders. He imparted this resolution to Richard, who was exceedingly surprized at it, being afraid, that Philip, upon his return, would attack his dominions in France; and, therefore, as one of the articles of their agreement was, that neither of them should desert the cause, without the other's consent, he insisted upon Philip's continuing the Croises, till they were masters of Jerusalem. However, as he could not force him to stay, he left him at his liberty, upon his taking a solemn oath, in the presence of the bishops and the principal officers of both armies, that he would not attack any place belonging to Richard, either in France or England, till within forty days after that prince's return into his own dominions. Philip, when he quitted Palestine, left 10,000 men under the command of the duke of Burgundy, and publickly gave them orders, to pay the same obedience to the king of England, as to himself; but, in all probability, they received other secret instructions; and this Mezerai does, in effect, acknowledge, when he tells us, that Richard would have become master of Jerusalem, if the duke of Burgundy's jealousy had not prevented his designs.

Richard and Saladine kill their prisoners.

Presently after Philip's departure, Richard and Saladine exhibited a spectacle of horror, in the view of their armies, by commanding the prisoners, on both sides, to be put to death; but it is not easy to determine, which of the two princes was the first author of this barbarity. Some historians charge it upon Saladine, whilst others accuse the king of England; yet the last seem to have the best grounds for their opinion. The Saracen monarch refused to perform the articles of the surrender of Acres *; whereas no other reason is assigned for his cruelty, than his natural fierceness, tho' he appears, on other occasions, to be a prince of great generosity. The duke of Burgundy, copying after Richard, likewise ordered the Turkish captives in his hands to be beheaded; but, tho' I will not presume to fix the limits of the law of arms, with respect to prisoners, whose sovereign refuses to perform the articles of a capitulation, or the extent of reprisals; yet I think it may be safely affirmed, that whosoever acts up to the very height of his power, on such occasions, is in danger of committing a very great injustice. However that be, instances of the like cruelty seldom occur in history.

The siege of Ascalon is resolved on by the Croises.

Richard afterwards held a great council of war, which came to a resolution about the siege of Ascalon; and, in pursuit of this project, he marched along the sea-side whilst his fleet, freighted with stores, rowed, in sight of the troops, and supplied them with necessaries. Saladine, apprized of the design of the Croises, with an army of 300,000 men, posted himself, to advantage, in their way; but Richard, notwithstanding, resolved to attack him. He was sensible, that, if he could defeat that army, the taking of Ascalon would be the fruits of his victory, and that it would even facilitate the siege of Jerusalem; whilst, on the other hand, if he declined an engagement, such a numerous army of Infidels would, on all occasions, obstruct the progress of his arms. He, therefore, having drawn up his forces, advanced towards the enemy, in a resolute manner, James d' Avesnes commanding the right wing, the duke of Burgundy the left, and himself the main body; but Saladine, as he had concealed part of his army, from the view of the christians, behind some hills, without stirring from his advantageous post, waited to receive the attacks of the enemy. 1192.

A description of the battle.

The right wing of the Croises beginning the fight, the Saracens made so vigorous a defence, being supported by the superiority of their number, that they put them into great disorder; and it was some time, before they could recover themselves. James d'Avesnes was slain, in attempting to revive the drooping spirits of his frighted troops; whilst, at the same time, the duke of Burgundy furiously attack'd the right wing of the Saracens; but, these retreating as they fought, pursuant to the general's orders, the duke, with more courage than conduct, advanced, a considerable distance beyond the body of the army. Saladine, upon this, ordered the troops that lay in ambush, to move forward, who, surrounding the wing commanded by the duke of Burgundy, made a terrible slaughter.

Richard obtains a glorious victory.

The honour of repairing the loss of the christians was reserved for the king of England, who, on his side, in spite of the brave resistance of the enemy, constrain'd them to retreat in disorder; and he was in pursuit of them, when he received the news of the ill state of his right wing and the danger of his left. Upon this, directly marching to the duke of Burgundy's relief, he fell upon the victorious troops of Saladine, performing such surprizing acts of valour, as excited the admiration of those who envied him most; and some relate, that, being personally engaged with Saladine, he dismounted him, and would have taken him prisoner, were it not that the Saracens, using their utmost efforts, rescued him out of his hands. However that be, Saladine was obliged to reinforce his right wing, with the victorious troops of the left; and, as this could not be done, without some disorder, the right wing of the christians finding that they were not so vigorously pressed, as before, quickly rallied and so furiously attacked the Saracens, who opposed them, that they compelled them, at length, to betake themselves to flight.

* Saladine refusing to redeem the heads of the Turkish captives, by the payment of a certain sum, according to the articles, it is probable, that Richard began with beheading the prisoners in his power, to the number of 5000, according to Hoveden; but Vinisauf reckons no more than 2500.

1192. In the interim, Richard maintained the fight, on the left, with a firmneſs that ſeemed to be ſupernatural, tho' he was in danger of being overpowered by numbers, all the forces of the enemy being employ'd againſt him, had not his right wing come to his aſſiſtance; but the Saracens, perceiving that they were attacked, in their flank, by the freſh troops, broke their ranks, with ſuch confuſion, that it was impoſſible for Saladine to rectify this diſorder. The chriſtians, making the beſt uſe of this advantage, preſs'd them ſo furiouſly, that, at laſt, they entirely routed that prodigious army; and, thus, Richard, by his courage and conduct, obtained a compleat victory over the Infidels, 40,000 of whom lay dead in the field of battle; whilſt James d' Aveſnes was the only officer of diſtinction, that was ſlain, on the ſide of the chriſtians.

He repairs the cities that Saladine had diſmantled.

Upon this memorable victory, Richard proceeded to the maritime cities of Aſcalon, Joppa, and Cæſarea, which Saladine, having demoliſhed their walls, was pleaſed to abandon; but it was of the laſt conſequence to the Croiſes to repair theſe cities, and erect magazines for the army, when they ſhould be farther advanced into the enemy's country. This, probably, was the ſole motive of Richard's ſtay at Joppa, tho' ſome have cenſured him, for not improving his victory, by marching directly to Jeruſalem. However, I cannot apprehend, that he is to be blamed, upon their authority; for ſo very few are qualified to judge rightly of theſe matters, eſpecially, when the circumſtances are but imperfectly known, that I take it to be imprudent to paſs a verdict.

Richard's great deliverance.

Whilſt Richard remained at Joppa, an unfortunate accident befel him, from which he was almoſt miraculouſly delivered; for, on a certain day, being fatigued with hunting, as he lay aſleep under a tree, having only ſix perſons about him, he was rouzed, by the ſudden approach of ſome Saracen horſe. As they were but few in number, without the leaſt dread, he inſtantly mounted his horſe and purſued them; upon which, feigning a retreat, they drew him into an ambuſcade, and he found himſelf, on a ſudden, ſurrounded by a whole ſquadron. He defended himſelf, for a long time, with an aſtoniſhing bravery; but, at length, four of his attendants being ſlain, he was upon the point of being killed, or taken, when William Deſpreaux cried out, in the Saracen language, "I am the king "of England." Theſe words were no ſooner uttered, than thoſe, that were upon Richard, left him, to have ſome concern in the taking of Deſpreaux, whom they ſuppoſed to be the king; and, by the means of this device, Richard had leiſure to make his eſcape, whilſt the Saracens, contented with their ſucceſs, conducted their priſoner to Saladine. Deſpreaux had the policy to conceal his artifice, till he was brought before the ſultan; but then he ingenuouſly own'd to this prince what he had done, to ſave his maſter. Saladine applauded his fidelity, and highly honoured him; yet, as he was confident, that Richard would, at any rate, ranſom a captive, that had been ſo ſignally ſerviceable to him, he demanded and obtained ten Emirs or Saracen princes, in exchange for this faithful ſervant. 1192.

Prompt.

He takes a great Babylon-caravan.

The maritime places being ſufficiently repaired, Richard marched to Jeruſalem, in order to beſiege it; but, in his way, he fortunately met the Babylon-caravan, carrying to that city a prodigious quantity of rich merchandizes and all ſorts of proviſions. The caravan was guarded by 10,000 horſe, who, perceiving themſelves to be near the chriſtian army, would have immediately retreated; but Richard, with 5000 horſemen, attacked them ſo furiouſly, that he put them to flight, and had the caravan, as the prize of his victory. He took, on this occaſion, 3000 loaded camels and 4000 horſes or mules, with an ineſtimable booty, all which he order'd to be diſtributed among his ſoldiers. Upon this ſucceſs, continuing his march to Jeruſalem, he arrived at an high hill, from whence he had the pleaſure of ſurveying that famous city, the taking of which was the principal end of his expedition; but, the country adjacent being deſtitute of forage, he was conſtrained to defer the ſiege, to the ſpring; which gave his enemies and thoſe, that envied his glory, a pretence to deſert him. The duke of Auſtria led the way; and the duke of Burgundy quickly followed his example, who conſider'd Richard, as the king of France's rival; and tho' he died, at Acres, juſt as he was upon the point of embarquing, it did not prevent the French forces from returning to Europe. The retreat of the Germans and French; the marqueſs of Montferrat's refuſal to aſſiſt, with the Italian troops, in a conqueſt which he claimed himſelf, and yet was deſigned for another; the accounts he received of the ſtate of his affairs in England; his apprehenſions that Philip would, in his abſence, declare war againſt him; the decreaſe of his troops, by ſickneſs as well as battles; all theſe reaſons, taken together, were abundantly ſufficient to juſtify his truce with Saladine, notwithſtanding the many rude and falſe aſperſions caſt upon Richard, by the French hiſtorians, for deſerting the cauſe, when in ſight of Jeruſalem. It is obvious, that, with the few troops that remained, it was impoſſible for him to take that city; for, during the winter, it was ſupplied with all manner of ſtores, and the garriſon was little inferior to the chriſtian army. Saladine, being informed that Richard entertained thoughts of retreating, to haſten his departure, offer'd him a three years truce; and all the chief officers of the chriſtian army joyfully embraced the propoſal. Richard, therefore, agreed to the truce, which was propoſed, on theſe conditions: That the city of Aſcalon ſhould be diſmantled, and not fortified again, by either party, during the truce; that the chriſtians ſhould ſtill enjoy Joppa or Jaffa and Acres or Ptolemais, with the other cities they were poſſeſs'd of in Paleſtine; and that they ſhould be allowed to go in pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, without any charge, and have free commerce over all Saladine's dominions.

1192. nions. The treaty being concluded, Richard sent Saladine word, that he might depend upon another visit from him, to attempt, once more, the recovery of the Holy-Land; to which the sultan, tho' a Barbarian, returned a polite answer, viz. "If it must be my fate to lose "that part of my dominions, I would rather "it should be to the king of England, than to "any other monarch in the world." This was the result of the famous Crusado, which had drained France and England, both of men and money; and, whilst, it was of very little service to the eastern christians, it almost ruin'd those of Europe, by reason of the prodigious sums expended upon it; and, besides, it occasioned a destructive war between France and England, as we shall see hereafter.

The marquess of Montferrat is chosen general of the christians in Palestine, and is assassinated. Hemingford.

Richard, being apprehensive that Saladine would break the truce, in his absence, assembled the principal officers of the army, to elect a general for the troops designed to be left in Palestine; and the marquess of Montferrat was chosen, tho' the king of England had openly declared against him; yet he gave his consent, and sacrificed his private resentment to the publick good of the christians. The marquess, presently after, was stabb'd by two villains, belonging to the Old Man of the Mountain, who was the head or master of a sort of ruffians, that inhabited near Antioch, stiled Chassins, or by some such name; and these, being entirely devoted to his will and pleasure, he dispatched into all parts of the world, upon the like occasions; for which reason, the French call him the prince of the Assasins, or, perhaps, the term, Assasin, is derived from the name of the people in his service *. Richard, at first, was suspected to be the author of this murder; but the marquess himself was so far from being of this opinion, that, just before he expired, he order'd his wife to resign to the king of England the city of Tyre, which he had in his possession. Upon the decease of the marquess, by Richard's management, the earl of Champagne, his as well as the king of France's nephew, was elected in his stead; upon which, he caused him to marry Isabella, the deceased's widow, who brought him, for her dowry, the titular kingdom of Jerusalem. As for Guy of Lusignan, in lieu of an empty title, he actually put him in possession of the kingdom of Cyprus, tho' he had before sold it to the templars; for, upon the repeated complaints of the Cypriots, of the insupportable tyranny of their new masters, Richard imagined, that he had a right to revoke the sale. Whether this proceeding was strictly just is, at present, a needless enquiry; since it is sufficient to observe, that the kingdom of Cyprus, for near 200 years, continued in the family of Guy of Lusignan.

Richard, in his return home, unhappily enters the duke of Austria's dominions.

The affairs of the east being, thus, settled, Richard, embarquing at Ptolemais, sailed to Corfu, an island situated at the mouth of the Adriatick gulph; and, probably, he intended to land at some port, in the bottom of the gulph, and so proceed, by land, through Germany; tho' some affirm, that he was driven, by stress of weather, into these parts. However that be, he was forced, by a violent tempest, on the coast of Istria, and, from thence, between Aquileia and Venice, where the galleot, he was on board, split against a rock; and tho' it was with exceeding difficulty, that he escaped this danger, he, at once, rushed into another, by entering the dominions of the duke of Austria, and taking the road to Vienna. If this was not the effect of his ignorance of the country, it will be next to impossible, to dive into his design; for it was not only entirely out of his way to England, but he hazarded his person, in the territories of a prince, whom he had mortally affronted, at the siege of Acres. Nevertheless, he continued his journey, disguised like a pilgrim; but, by reason of his profuse expences, and the imprudence of some of his attendants, a rumour was soon spread abroad, that the king of England was in the country. The duke of Austria, receiving intelligence of it, ordered the pretended pilgrim to be so narrowly watched, that he was seized at a small village near Vienna; but the emperor Henry VI. afterwards demanding this royal captive, the duke delivered him into his hands, upon an assurance of having a large share of his ransom. Thus, Richard, 1193. whose glorious actions had exalted him above all the princes of his time, deprived of his liberty, was in the power of a most sordid and avaricious monarch.

The effects of his imprisonment, in England.

The news of Richard's imprisonment presently flew over Europe, and particularly into England; but queen Eleanor, his mother, instantly, made use of all possible precautions, to prevent its being the cause of a fatal revolution. She represented to the principal barons, that the best method, of proving their loyalty to their sovereign, was to exert themselves, in opposing prince John's attempts upon the crown, to which they were no strangers; that this step ought to be, first of all, taken, to preserve the peace of the realm; and that afterwards other affairs might demand their care. The queen's exhortations, the king's unhappy condition, and the fame he had acquired in the east concurr'd to secure the allegiance of the barons; and, therefore, they entered into an association, to exclude prince John from the government, at a time when he resolved to have the sole administration of publick affairs. It did not a little mortify his ambition, to find other regents appointed, during the king's imprisonment; tho' he still endeavoured to dissolve an association so prejudicial to his designs. He declared, that his only view was to guard against the pretensions of his nephew, the duke of Bretagne, if Richard should die in prison; but all his proceedings evidently shewed, that he rather intended to obstruct the king's return, if he should be so fortunate, as to obtain his liberty.

1193. liberty. He made uſe of the utmoſt efforts, to become maſter of the fortified towns, and to bring over the governors to his intereſt; and it is no wonder, that, at this juncture, he prevailed with ſome; but he generally met with ſo great oppoſition, that, at length, he deſpaired of ſucceſs, without the king of France's aſſiſtance. He, therefore, went over to that kingdom, in order to have an interview with Philip; and, as he paſſed through Normandy, he ſpent ſome days at Roan, in trying, by all poſſible means, to corrupt the loyalty of the Normans; but, being diſappointed, he repaired to Paris, where he entered into a treaty with Philip, who joyfully embraced this opportunity of embroiling Richard's affairs.

Hoved. Brompt.

Some hiſtorians tell us, that John obliged himſelf to marry the princeſs Alice, whom Richard refuſed, and to do homage to the crown of France, for the kingdom of England; but yet it is certain, that the treaty, itſelf, which is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, is ſilent about it; nor is it probable, that John, who was already married, ſhould promiſe to eſpouſe another wife. It ſeems to be, therefore, more likely, that Philip, as the treaty imports, was contented with John's doing homage, for all the provinces of France belonging to the crown of England.

John had no ſooner diſpatch'd his buſineſs in France, than he returned to England, in order to ſollicit the king of Scotland, to eſpouſe his cauſe; but William, ſtill retaining a grateful ſenſe of Richard's generous uſage, was entirely deaf to all his ſollicitations. As neither the Normans nor the king of Scotland could be gained over to his party, having cauſed a rumour to be ſpread, that Richard died in priſon, he demanded the crown; but, as there was no other advice of the king's death, the Engliſh would not take this raſh ſtep in his favour. However, their refuſal furniſhed him with a pretence to ſeize on ſome fortified places, and he attempted to ſubdue, by force, what he could not obtain by other methods; but his party was ſo inconſiderable, that it was impoſſible for him to make any remarkable progreſs.

Philip attacks Normandy.

In the mean time, Philip, believing that John's pretenſions, at home, would give ſuch employment to the Engliſh, as to render them incapable of ſending any ſuccours abroad, in direct contradiction to the oath he took, upon leaving Paleſtine, made himſelf maſter of Giſors, Evreux, and all le Vexin, and then beſieged Roan, which he was in hopes of ſurprizing; and the taking of it would, of courſe, have put him in poſſeſſion of the reſt of Normandy; but the earl of Leiceſter, who had thrown himſelf into the city, ſome days before, after an aſſault, repulſed the French, with great loſs, and compell'd Philip to raiſe the ſiege.

Eleanor in vain applies to the pope.

Queen Eleanor, having guarded againſt the ambition of her younger ſon, made the king's releaſe her next and principal ſtudy; and, as the emperor had nothing, that was plauſible, to alledge againſt him, ſhe flattered herſelf, that the pope's mediation might be of ſignal ſervice, in the preſent extremity. She, therefore, frequently wrote to his holineſs, to intreat him to undertake the cauſe of the king, her ſon; but, finding that all her ſollicitations were ineffectual, ſhe, at laſt, in an expoſtulatory letter, plainly declared, that ſhe was provoked at his indifference. She complained, that he would not take the leaſt ſtep, in behalf of the impriſoned king; that he refuſed to ſend a nuncio to the emperor, tho' he had often ſent legates to all the chriſtian princes, on much leſs important occaſions; that this behaviour was ſo far the more aſtoniſhing, as it would not, in the leaſt, diſparage his pontifical dignity, ſhould he go, in perſon, and ſollicit the releaſe of ſo great a monarch, who had lately hazarded his life in the ſervice of the church; that the many kind offices, for which the holy ſee ſtood indebted to the kings of England, merited ſome return; and, in a word, that the ſervices done the popes, during the ſchiſms, could not be forgotten, without ingratitude; but all theſe inſtances could not prevail on the pope, to engage in the behalf of an unfortunate prince, leſt he ſhould diſguſt the king of France, who preſs'd him, on the other hand, not to interpoſe, on the preſent occaſion. 1193.

Richard is brought before the diet of the empire, and accuſed of ſix particulars.

In the interim, the emperor, who wanted a pretence for his injuſtice, ordered Richard to be brought to Haguenaw, where the diet of the empire was aſſembled; and the deputies ſent by the queen and council to the king, met him on the road, ignominiouſly conducted, like a criminal. This piercing ſight drew tears from their eyes, at which the king himſelf could not forbear weeping; and, after they had, in the moſt affectionate terms, expreſs'd their concern for his misfortune, they aſſured him of the fidelity of his ſubjects, in general, and gave him an account of his brother's attempts and his ſtrict alliance with the king of France; and Richard found, from theſe informations, that it would be extremely improper for him to diſpute with the emperor, upon the terms of his freedom. When the king was brought before the aſſembly of the German princes, the emperor laid ſix articles to his charge; of which only one could concern himſelf, but none the German nation, in particular. I. He accuſed Richard, of joining in a league with Tancred, to ſupport that uſurper on the throne of Sicily. II. He alledged, that, by his conteſts with the king of France, he had prevented the conqueſt of Jeruſalem. III. That he unjuſtly invaded Cyprus, and employed the arms of the Croiſes, in dethroning a chriſtian prince. IV. That he affronted the duke of Auſtria, at the ſiege of Ptolemais. V. That he was concerned in the murder of the marqueſs of Montferrat. VI. And laſtly, the emperor repreſented the truce he concluded with Saladine, as a very heinous crime, and charged him with holding a correſpondence with that Infidel prince, that was extremely detrimental to Chriſtendom.

His defence.

Tho' neither the emperor nor the princes of Germany had any right to ſit, as judges, upon the king of England, Richard did not think it proper to call in queſtion their authority; for he was unwilling to give occaſion for delays 1193. delays, which would have been of dangerous conſequence; and, in all probability, that was the ſole view of the emperor. He, therefore, was ſatisfied with briefly declaring, that, tho' he conſider'd himſelf, as accountable to none, for his actions, he was ready to vindicate himſelf, before that illuſtrious aſſembly; becauſe it highly concerned his honour, to convince the world of his innocence. He then proceeded to make his defence againſt the emperor's allegations; and, to the firſt, he anſwer'd, that his treaty with Tancred had no relation at all to the emperor; and that he treated with him, as with a king in actual poſſeſſion of the crown. To the ſecond, he replied, that the king of France's jealouſy was the ſole cauſe of the ſmall progreſs that was made, in the conqueſt of the Holy-Land, upon whom the whole blame ought to be charged, ſince he firſt deſerted the cauſe. To the third, relating to the conqueſt of Cyprus, he made anſwer, that the prince, whom he deprived of that kingdom, was both an uſurper and a tyrant, and, by his cruelty, had juſtly provoked his vengeance; that he had demonſtrated, that he did not act, in this proceeding, from a principle of avarice or ambition; ſince he voluntarily reſigned the iſland to Guy of Luſignan, to repair his loſs of the kingdom of Jeruſalem. As for the fourth, he only ſaid, that the duke of Auſtria had already ſufficiently revenged on him an affront, for which he might have demanded ſatisfaction, in a more honourable manner; and, as for the murder of the marqueſs of Montferrat, he declared, with ſome emotion, that all his paſt actions were ſo many proofs of his being utterly incapable of uſing ſuch infamous means, to gratify his revenge; and he farther added, that the marqueſs himſelf cleared him, before his death, in ordering his wife to put into his hands the city of Tyre. He ſpoke more fully to the laſt article, concerning his maintaining a good underſtanding with Saladine; and he took notice, tho' with great modeſty, of the ſhare he had in the victory obtained over that prince. He accuſed the duke of Burgundy of deſerting him, merely, out of jealouſy, when he was juſt upon the point of beſieging Jeruſalem; and, in fine, he ſaid, it was obvious, that, in making a truce with the Saracens, he had no ſordid views; ſince, of all the booty he acquired, by taking the Babylon-caravan, he reſerved nothing to himſelf, except the ring on his finger.

The German princes intercede for Richard.

This defence, which exceedingly confounded the emperor, excited the compaſſion of the German princes; and they were ſo convinced of the injurious treatment of Richard, that they unanimouſly ſollicited the emperor, to uſe him, in a more generous manner; but all their intreaties could not prevail on that covetous prince, to releaſe his priſoner, before he had extorted an exorbitant ranſom; and he was the more unreaſonable, in his demands, as the king of France had ſent the biſhop of Beauvais, to offer him a large ſum, to keep Richard in perpetual impriſonment. The captive king, therefore, to obtain his liberty, was conſtrained to promiſe the payment of 150,000 marks of ſilver, a third of which the duke of Auſtria was to have, for his ſhare; and the emperor farther required, that this ſum ſhould be brought into Germany, at Richard's peril and charge; that he ſhould releaſe the emperor of Cyprus and his daughter, and give his niece, Eleanor of Bretagne, in marriage to the duke of Auſtria's eldeſt ſon. Some tell us, the emperor likewiſe obliged him, to make an abſolute reſignation of the kingdom of England; tho' he preſently reinveſted him with it, to hold it of him, by the annual tribute of 5000 l. ſterling. Indeed, this fact is not altogether improbable, conſidering Richard's unhappy condition; but yet it is ſcarce credible, that ſuch an illuſtrious prince, tho' a priſoner, ſhould ſtoop to perform ſuch a mean and unworthy action. Beſides, it does not appear, that the emperor ever laid any claim to England, by vertue of this pretended reſignation; and, therefore, the ſame hiſtorians, who relate this particular, add, that Henry, before his death, renounced all his pretenſions to that kingdom. To render their account more probable, the emperor's donation of the kingdom of Arles to Richard is urged, which, they alledge, was given him, in return for the ſovereignty of England; but, from this very gift, it may be preſumed, that Richard's homage for Arles is confounded with that for England; and, indeed, it is evident, from the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Henry conferred the title of king of Arles on Richard, who, doubtleſs, did him homage, for that imaginary kingdom, which had not been enjoyed by the emperors, for many years.

Money, for the king's ranſom, is raiſed in England.

The treaty was no ſooner ſigned, than Richard acquainted the queen, his mother, with it, intreating her to do all that was poſſible, to raiſe the money for his ranſom; but this was a vaſt ſum, at that time, in England. Richard himſelf, when he went to the Holy-Land, almoſt drained the kingdom of all the coin; and the Croiſes alſo carried away great ſums. However, ſuch was the zeal of the juſticiaries, that they raiſed 100,000 marks, by taxes, and by borrowing a year's wooll of the abbies of the Ciſtercians and the religious houſes of the order of Sempringham *; to which was added the plate belonging to the churches, upon the queen's promiſe to reſtore it, after the king's return.

1194. As ſoon as Philip received the news of Richard's agreement with the emperor, he ſent John word, "to take care of himſelf, ſince "the devil was like to get looſe"; and this threw the prince into the greateſt conſternation. All his hopes, at once, vaniſhed; and he was upon the point of falling into the hands of a juſtly incenſed brother. His only remedy, in this perplexity, was to ſtrengthen his alliance with Philip; and, accordingly, theſe two princes, having one common intereſt, agreed to join together, in their attempts, to engage the emperor, by advantageous offers, to detain Richard in priſon. The biſhop of Beauvais was again diſpatched, to make Henry the following propoſals: That, provided he would promiſe to

* This order was firſt inſtituted, at Sempringham in Lincolnſhire, now a ſeat of the Clinton's, earls of Lincoln, in 1148.

1194. detain Richard, till Michaelmas, Philip would pay him down, at once, 50,000, and John 30,000, marks; that, after the expiration of that term, they would remit him, monthly, 1000 l. ſterling, during Richard's impriſonment; that, if he would put him into their power, they would pay the whole ranſom of 150,000 marks; and, in fine, if this offer was rejected, the ambaſſador was commiſſioned to tender him the ſame ſum, to keep him priſoner, only one year. Theſe propoſals made ſuch an impreſſion on the ſelfiſh emperor, that he deferred the king's deliverance, till the ſucceeding diet, which was to be held at Spires, in a few months; tho' Eleanor was arrived at Worms, with 100,000 marks and hoſtages, for the payment of the remainder. It is natural to conclude, that Richard was, to the laſt degree, aſtoniſhed, at the receipt of this unwelcome news; and, indeed, his caſe being now, in all appearance, deſperate, the interval, till the next diet, was the moſt melancholy and diſconſolate part of his whole life; for the emperor had actually determined to comply with the king of France's offers, and ſacrifice his honour to his inſatiable avarice. The diet being aſſembled at Spires, in February, the emperor addreſſed himſelf to the German princes, in terms which evidently declared, that he had no regard for his agreement with the king of England; but they, being ſurprized at this proceeding, in ſo many words, aſſured him, that, as they were pledges of the treaty, they could not, in honour, ſee it violated, and even intimated, that he ſhould not break it, with impunity. Whether Henry was overawed by their menaces, or ſhame had ſome influence over him, he releaſed his priſoner, upon receiving the 100,000 marks and hoſtages, for the 50,000 that remained; and Richard, directly leaving Germany, repaired to the Low-Countries, proceeding on his journey to England, with all poſſible expedition; which was abſolutely neceſſary, becauſe the emperor, repenting of his releaſe, ſent after him, in order to have him ſeized, but to no purpoſe, as it was too late. The king embarqued at Antwerp, and ſafely arrived at Sandwich, on the 20th of March, 1194, after a four years abſence, 15 months of which he ſpent in a priſon.

Richard is releaſed.

The proceedings of the emperor and the duke, with reſpect to the reſt of the ranſom.

Before I finiſh what relates to Richard's impriſonment, I ſhall here take notice of ſome particulars, concerning the payment of the reſidue of Richard's ranſom, both with reſpect to the emperor and the duke of Auſtria; the latter of whom, having frequently ſollicited Richard, to ſatisfy his demand, ſent Baldwin of Betune, one of his hoſtages, to acquaint him, that he would come upon thoſe he had in his power, if the treaty of Haguenaw was not ſpeedily put in execution. Richard, who was no ſtranger to the cruel diſpoſition of that prince, immediately ſent Baldwin back with the princeſs Eleanor, that the ſtipulated marriage might be conſummated, till the remainder of the ranſom was paid; and it is highly probable, that the emperor, keeping the 100,000 marks, turn'd over the debt of the 50,000 to the duke of Auſtria; but, however that be, Eleanor and Baldwin found, upon their arrival at Vienna, that the duke was dead, by a fall from his horſe. Before he expired, he made his will, 1194. in which he ordered the king of England's hoſtages to be releaſed; confeſſing that he had unjuſtly detained him, and could not, in conſcience, demand a ranſom. Nevertheleſs, the prince, his ſon and ſucceſſor, would ſtill have kept them in his cuſtody, if the biſhops had not oppoſed his deſign; for they declared, that they would not ſuffer his father's corpſe to be buried, till his laſt will was performed; and the pope alſo aſſured him, in a letter, that he had given orders to the archbiſhop of Saltzburg, to excommunicate him, if he did not directly releaſe the hoſtages. The young prince, being terrified by theſe menaces, ſet the hoſtages at liberty; and, having no great inclination for the princeſs of Bretagne, he ſent her likewiſe back into England. As for the emperor, his quarrel with the pope, and the war he deſigned againſt France, convincing him, that he might have occaſion for the king of England, he ſent a biſhop to beg his pardon, and aſſure him, that he intended to reſtore what had been extorted from him; but he died, ſoon after, at Meſſina, before he performed his promiſe.

Richard reduces prince John's party.

Richard was received by his ſubjects, with ſuch demonſtrations of joy and affection, that he forgot his late ignominious captivity. He, firſt of all, diſcharged his vow, to offer to God the rich ſtandard of Cyprus, in St. Edmund's church; and then he marched to reduce ſome caſtles, that were ſtill poſſeſſed by John's adherents, Nottingham-caſtle being the only one, that held out a ſiege of ſome days. In the interim, he ordered the prince, his brother, then in France, to be ſummoned to appear, within 40 days, and anſwer the accuſations exhibited againſt him; but, John not appearing, within the limited time, the king cauſed a ſentence to be paſſed againſt him, confiſcating all his lands, and declaring him incapable of ſucceeding to the crown.

He is crowned.

This affair being over, Richard was crowned again, leſt his impriſonment might have raiſed any ſcruples in the minds of his ſubjects; and William, king of Scotland, as earl of Huntingdon, carried the ſword of ſtate, before the king. This deference and his inviolable attachment to Richard, whilſt a captive, entirely gained his affection, who gave him all poſſible proofs of his friendſhip. Indeed, he did not reſign Northumberland to him, which he very urgently demanded, upon a dubious title, that was even renounced by his predeceſſor; yet, to ſoften, in ſome meaſure, his refuſal, he granted him a charter of certain honours and privileges to be enjoyed by the kings of Scotland, whenever they came into England.

Act. Pub.

1195. Richard prepares for a war with France.

Richard had too reſolutely determined to be revenged on the king of France, to deny himſelf any longer that ſatisfaction; for the forgiveneſs of injuries is a virtue too rare among men, to be found in a prince, who was not one of the moſt ſcrupulous, in the point of religion. To this end, a powerful army was neceſſary, which could neither be raiſed nor maintained, without an extraordinary charge; whereas the kingdom, in its preſent ſtate, was ſcarce able to furniſh him with the neceſſary ſupplies. However, 1195. However, money muſt be had, by all poſſible means; and, for this purpoſe, ſeveral diſhonourable ways were put in practice. In the firſt place, he revoked all the alienations of the crown-lands, made before his departure to the Holy-Land; pretending that the purchaſers had ſufficiently reimburſed themſelves, tho' they had enjoyed theſe eſtates, but a very few years. Moreover, the great-ſeal, which he carried with him, being loſt, during his voyage, he ordered another to be made, and obliged all, that had any patents or commiſſions, to have them renewed and ſealed with the new ſeal; and his ſole view, in this, was, to extort money from private perſons, for the renewal of their charters. Beſides theſe methods, the king invented two more; the firſt of which was to prohibit tournaments, and then grant the nobility a licenſe to hold, or be preſent at them, for a certain ſum, in proportion to their rank. The ſecond was, to reſtore to his favour Geoffrey, his natural brother, and put him in poſſeſſion of the ſee of York; and the biſhop of Coventry, one of John's zealous adherents, who, as well as the prince, was condemned, received a pardon; but the former purchaſed this favour with 2000 marks, and it coſt the latter no leſs than 5000.

Philip lays ſiege to Verneuil.

The forces, Richard deſigned againſt France, being in readineſs, he was informed, as he ſat at table, that Philip was engaged in the ſiege of Verneuil; which ſo highly incenſed him, that he ſwore, he would not turn his face, till he came within ſight of the enemy; and, to keep his oath, he cauſed part of the wall of the room, where he was, to be pulled down, and, paſſing through the opening, he embarqued immediately with his troops, which waited for him, on the ſea-ſide, and ſafely arrived in Normandy. Upon his approach, Philip raiſed the ſiege, juſt as he was on the point of taking the city; and ſome ſay, that he was forced to it, by his own army, who, being ſeized with a pannick conſternation, made the beſt of their way, leaving their tents and baggage in the camp.

Richard pardons the prince, his brother.

Some time after, Richard being at Roan, the queen, his mother, introduced Prince John, who, throwing himſelf at his feet, implored his pardon; which the king, purſuant to his promiſe to the queen, was pleaſed to grant, tho' he plainly intimated, that he was not convinced of the ſincerity of his repentance: "I forgive you, ſays he, raiſing him up, and I "wiſh I could as eaſily forget your offences, as "you will my pardon."

The continuation of the war. 1195-9.

As the particulars of the war, between the two monarchs, are not very material, I ſhall only obſerve, that it laſted five years, and was often interrupted by truces, conſtantly broken by both parties, without any poſſibility of knowing, which of them ought to be blamed. The hiſtorians of the two nations were ſo ſollicitous, in the vindication of their reſpective kings, that it is manifeſt, they were too much ſway'd by their prejudices or inclinations; but, however that be, the contending monarchs met with frequent occaſions, to ſignalize their conduct and bravery; tho' ſuch was the various ſucceſs of their arms, during the war, that both of them may be ſaid to be loſers by it. Philip, among others, ſuſtained an irreparable loſs of all the antient records of the crown, which were taken, with all his baggage, in an action near Blois; for it was cuſtomary, in thoſe days, for the king to carry with him, wherever he went, the archives of the kingdom; and Mezerai, with concern, obſerves, that, on this occaſion, the hiſtory of France received a remarkable prejudice, with reſpect to the events before that engagement. 1195-9.

A truce between the two kings.

The two kings, at length, agreed upon a truce, in order to a peace; and ſome affirm, that Philip propoſed to Richard, to decide their quarrel, by five combatants of each of the parties; and that Richard gave his conſent, provided the two kings were of that number. If this was really the caſe, which, however, is ſuſpicious, the propoſal, in all probability, was not ſeriouſly made; but yet it is certain, that, tho' the two monarchs had ſeveral interviews, to negotiate a treaty, they, at laſt, parted, without any determination.

The princeſs Alice is reſtored to her brother.

The princeſs Alice, at one of theſe conferences, was reſtored to the king, her brother, who gave her in marriage to the earl of Ponthieu; for Richard, at his departure to the Holy-Land, had committed her to the cuſtody of the ſeneſchal of Normandy, who had refuſed to deliver her, without his maſter's expreſs order, tho' ſhe was often demanded by the king of France.

The queen of Sicily marries the earl of Tholouſe.

At the ſame time, Johanna, Richard's ſiſter, widow to the king of Sicily, married the earl of Tholouſe; and, on this occaſion, the king, her brother, reſigned all right and title to that earldom, as heir of the houſe of Poictiers.

The biſhop of Beauvais is taken priſoner.

During this war, Philip de Dreux, biſhop of Beauvais, who was nearly related to the king of France, being in a battle, was taken priſoner by the Engliſh; and, by reaſon of his quality and character, but, principally, ſome injurious expreſſions, in ſpeaking of Richard, his ranſom was rated ſo high, that he applied to the pope, for his protection. His holineſs earneſtly interceded, in the behalf of his dearly beloved ſon, as he called him, in a letter to the king; but Richard, in anſwer, ſent the biſhop's armour, all over bloody as it was, and asked him, whether he knew his ſon's coat? The pope, being convinced of that prelate's martial temper, by this evident proof, deſiſting from his ſollicitations, declared, that, ſince he quitted the warfare of Chriſt, for that of the world, in juſtice, he ought to ſuffer the conſequences of his choice; and, upon this reply, the biſhop, deſpairing of any aſſiſtance from the court of Rome, compounded for his ranſom, for which he was obliged to pay 2000 marks.

The French hiſtorians, in their accounts of this war, inſiſt very copiouſly on Philip's advantages, whilſt they ſlightly paſs over his loſſes; and the Engliſh, on the other hand, taking little notice of ſeveral engagements, in which the former pretend, that Richard was worſted, highly extol his great ſucceſs. Among others, they magnify a victory the king of England 1195-9. land obtained, between Courcelles and Giſors, which the French repreſent, as a trifling event; for they affirm, that Philip, advancing with 500 horſe, to view the enemy, was in danger of being ſurrounded, and compelled to retreat to Giſors, with ſome precipitation; and they farther ſay, that, the bridge of that city falling under him, he very narrowly eſcaped with his life. However, it is certain, that Richard ſent a letter to England, concerning this action, which is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, wherein he boaſts of gaining, that day, a glorious victory; and it is very unlikely, that Richard would have expreſs'd himſelf, thus, had he only routed 500 horſe. Some Engliſh writers even aſſert, that, on occaſion of this victory, Richard added to the arms of England, "Dieu & mon Droit;" but I can ſcarce believe this motto to be ſo antient, or that it owes its original to that occurrence.

A five years truce.

The two monarchs having, at length, ſufficiently tired each other, finding that all their advantages were inconſiderable, joyfully embraced an opportunity that offer'd, to put an honourable end to the war; and that was, by complying with the pope's exhortations, who ſent his legate into France, to promote a reconciliation between them. The view of his holineſs was to engage them in a freſh Cruſade, for the recovery of Jeruſalem; but they were both too much diſcouraged by the firſt, to entertain any thoughts of a ſecond expedition. Nevertheleſs, the legate's arrival procured a truce, for five years, which, in ſome meaſure, put a ſtop to the calamities of their ſubjects; and, by this truce, which was concluded at a conference, it was agreed, that each of the kings ſhould keep what was, at preſent, in their poſſeſſion.

John vindicates himſelf from Philip's accuſation.

At this interview, Philip, pretending a friendſhip for Richard, ſhewed him ſome papers, from which it appeared, that prince John had formed ſome evil deſigns againſt him; and Richard, too raſhly giving credit to him, diſpoſſeſſed his brother, once more, of all his eſtates. However, John openly vindicated his innocence, in ſending two knights to the court of France, who offered to prove, by arms, that the prince was falſly accuſed; and, upon Philip's refuſing the challenge, Richard reſtored prince John to his poſſeſſions.

A ſedition at London.

During Richard's abſence in France, the city of London was, on a ſudden, in a great combuſtion, by means of a ſedition raiſed by William Fitz-Osbern, commonly ſtiled William Long-Beard, from the length of his beard; and, by affecting, on all occaſions, to be an advocate for the poor, he had gained the hearts of the populace, who held him in extreme veneration. He, at length, made uſe of this advantage, to excite a ſedition in the city, on account of a tax, the burden of which, he alledged, would entirely fall on the meaneſt of the people; and Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, then juſticiary of the realm, could not appeaſe the tumult, without obliging the principal citizens to take up arms; but, Long-Beard, finding that he was vigorouſly preſs'd, fled, for refuge, to the church of St. Mary le Bow, where he was apprehended, and afterwards hang'd in chains, with nine of his accomplices *. 1195-9.

Robin Hood.

About this time alſo lived the famous Robin Hood, with his companion Little John, who, it is ſaid, infeſted Yorkſhire with their robberies. Some will have it, that he was ſprung from a great family, and reduced to that courſe of life, by his extravagance; that he never hurted any perſon of either ſex, and, ſparing the poor, robb'd only the rich; but, a proclamation being iſſued out againſt him, he fell ſick, at the nunnery of Berkely, and, deſiring to be let blood, was betrayed and bled to death.

Richard, upon his truce with France, had an opportunity of returning to England, to enjoy ſome repoſe, after all his fatigues, ſince his acceſſion to the crown; and, beſides, his preſence in that kingdom was neceſſary, to reform ſeveral abuſes, that were occaſioned by his abſence. Accordingly, he reſolved upon it; but an unexpected accident defeated his deſign. A Limoſin gentleman, finding in his eſtate a treaſure, which had been hid there, for many ages, the king alledged, that, as it was found in a country, that held of the dutchy of Guienne, of which he had the ſovereignty, it belonged to him. The gentleman agreed to compound the matter, by giving him a part; but Richard, inſiſting on the whole, he applied to Vidomar, viſcount of Limoges, for protection, who ſheltered him in the caſtle of Chaluz; but the king, being highly incenſed, marched directly into le Limoſin, in order to beſiege the caſtle. When he came nigh it, he went round it, in order to take a view of the place; yet, approaching too near, Bertram Gordon, an archer, who was upon the walls, ſhot him with an arrow, in the ſhoulder, cloſe to his neck. The wound was not mortal, in itſelf, tho' made ſo by the unskilfulneſs of the ſurgeon that dreſs'd it; and it is reported, that the king's intemperance did not a little contribute to inflame it. However that be, the wound gangrened; and he died of it, on the eleventh day, after he had endured a great deal of pain and miſery; and the caſtle being taken, before his death, and the perſon, that wounded him, brought into his preſence, the king ask'd him, why he ſought his life? Bertram anſwer'd, with an aſtoniſhing boldneſs, that it was in revenge of his father and brother, whom the king had ſlain, with his own hand; and that he gave God thanks for his ſucceſs, being ready to ſuffer, with pleaſure, the moſt ſevere torments, ſince he had the good fortune, to free the world from ſuch a tyrant. Tho', one would

The occaſion of Richard's death.

* R. de Diceto tells us, that, his body being ſtolen away and buried, his followers pretended, that miracles were performed, at his grave; but, guards being ſet at the place, and thoſe, that came thither to pray, ſoundly beaten for their pains, the cheat was diſcovered, and the people ſoon left off their devotions to that pretended ſaint. In 1197, there was a great famine and mortality in all parts of England; during which, Richard, finding ſhips at St. Valeri, laden with Engliſh corn, he order'd all the men, belonging to theſe veſſels, to be hanged. 1199. have thought, this reply would rather have exaſperated the dying prince; yet he not only forgave him, but order'd him to be releaſed, with a preſent of 100 ſhillings; however, immediately after, Marchard, general of the Flemings, cauſed the miſerable wretch to be flead alive.

Richard makes prince John his heir.

Richard, before he expired, made his will, leaving his kingdom, with all his other dominions, and three parts in four of his money, to his brother, John, reſerving the remainder for the poor and his domeſticks; tho' he had formerly, at Meſſina, appointed his nephew Arthur, duke of Bretagne, to be his heir; which is evident from his letter, from thence, to the pope, now to be ſeen, in the Collection of the Publick Acts. In all probability he altered his ſentiments, purely, to prevent commotions in his dominions; for no other reaſon can be aſſigned, for his nominating his brother to be his ſucceſſor, to the prejudice of his nephew, who had as juſt a claim as prince John to the crown. In his laſt will, he ordered his body to be interr'd at Fontevraud, at the feet of his father, to teſtify his ſorrow, for the many troubles he created him, during his life; and his heart was to be carried to Roan, as a proof of his affection to the Normans; but his bowels were to be ſent into Poictou, to ſhew the little regard he had for the Poictevins, with whom he was diſguſted. He left behind him only a natural ſon, named Philip, to whom he bequeathed the lordſhip of Cognac, in the dutchy of Guienne *.

His character.

This was the end of Richard the I. king of England, ſirnamed Cœur de Lion, on the account of his great courage; and, except his valour, which ſomewhat reſembled a brutal fierceneſs, it does not appear, that he was adorned with any other virtue, to furniſh matter for his panegyrick. As for his bounty and magnificence, which ſome have advanced, as encomiums in his character; it ought to be conſidered, that, if he was liberal and ſplendid, it was at the expence of his ſubjects, from whom he extorted vaſt ſums, by diſhonourable means; but, on the contrary, we find in him a great number of vices, and ſome of the moſt enormous. His unnatural rebellion, againſt his own father, is a blemiſh, that may be juſtly caſt upon his memory; and it is even evident, that the Almighty was pleaſed to puniſh him, for it, by a continued ſeries of troubles, during a reign of ten years, and eſpecially by a captivity of 15 months. He was likewiſe remarkable, for an inſatiable avarice, which was the occaſion of his death; and ſuch was his pride, that he treated his equals, with contempt, and his inferiors, as ſlaves. In a word, if the report of certain hiſtorians be true, an unbridled luſt hurried him, not only to neglect the queen, his wife, in order to abandon himſelf to an infamous debauchery, but even to ſins againſt nature; for it is affirmed, that a poor hermit upbraided him, for that deteſtable crime, before his whole court, and conjured him, in the name of God, to reflect on the deſtruction of Sodom. However that be, all the authors, that have written his life, agree, that pride, avarice, and luſt were his reigning vices; and it is related, that being admoniſhed by Fulke, curate of Neville, a man famous, for his zeal, to throw off thoſe wicked habits, commonly called his three daughters, he jocoſely replied, that it was his deſign; and that, accordingly, he would reſign the firſt to the templars, the ſecond to the monks, and the third to the biſhops.

1199.

Richard was tall and well made, his eyes being blue and ſparkling, and his hair of a yellow colour, inclining to red. It may be ſaid, that England, where he never was, above eight months, during his whole reign, was very unhappy under his government; ſince he oppreſs'd his ſubjects, with exorbitant taxes and impoſitions; whilſt the people received no other benefit, in return for theſe prodigious ſums, than a little glory for their king, tho' they were contented with it, as it redounded to the honour of the Engliſh nation.

Remarks on the uſe of the croſs-bow.

It is obſerved, as a thing extremely remarkable, that this prince, who reſtored the uſe of the croſs-bow, loſt his life, by the means of that inſtrument; as if Heaven deſigned to puniſh him, for reviving that diabolical invention; but this remark does not ſeem to be built on a ſolid foundation. I have already taken notice, that the Engliſh made uſe of croſs-bows, in the conqueſt of Ireland, in the reign of Henry II. and it is not at all probable, that they ſhould diſcontinue it, in the few years that were ſince elapſed.

The arms of England.

Richard was the firſt king of England, that carried in his ſhield three lions paſſant, in which he was imitated by his ſucceſſors †.

1199. Reflections on John's right to the crown.

THO' Richard made prince John heir to all his dominions; yet it did not take off all exceptions againſt his title to the crown. Whatſoever abſolute power a prince may be poſſeſs'd of, whilſt alive, as ſoon as his eyes are cloſed by death, his laſt will is no farther regarded, than it is conſiſtent with the law, unleſs it be executed by compulſive methods. The late king, by his deceaſe, left two queries, in the affair of the ſucceſſion, not eaſy to be decided; the firſt of which was, whether, according to law, Arthur, duke of Bretagne, as the repreſentative of his father, Geoffrey, John's elder brother, had as much or more right than his uncle, who was one degree nearer? and, ſecondly, whether, provided the laws were in favour of the nephew, Richard might diſpoſe of his dominions, by a will, in direct oppoſition to them.

The diverſity of the laws of the ſeveral ſtates, concerned in the ſucceſſion, rendered the ſolution of theſe queries extremely difficult; and, beſides, in England, the largeſt and moſt conſiderable ſtate, there was no ſettled law, about the ſucceſſion to the crown, by which the kings were allowed, or debarred from, the power of diſpoſing of it, at their pleaſure; and, if the Engliſh Hiſtory had been ſearched, for examples, to eſtabliſh a precedent, this way of proceeding would have been equally intricate and perplexing. From the Norman conqueſt to the time of Richard's death, there was no occaſion to eſtabliſh, or exclude, the right of repreſentation, with reſpect to the crown; tho' there were ſeveral inſtances, during the Saxon monarchy; but, as there were others directly contrary, the deciſion of this matter would ſtill be far from being an eaſy task; moreover, the Saxon laws and cuſtoms had not been obſerved, for above a century, the Normans having introduced a new ſyſtem into the kingdom. The moſt valid argument, in John's behalf, was, that, as there were no eſtabliſhed laws, concerning this point, his title was as good as his nephew's; and he had alſo Richard's will, in his favour; but, on the other hand, in moſt of the provinces, belonging to the Engliſh, in France, the right of repreſentation, in the lineal deſcent, was generally received. This affair, then, muſt have been liable to great diſputes, were it to be determined in a court of juſtice, or in the general-aſſembly of the ſtates, by an impartial judgment; but John was reſolved to make uſe of a ſhorter and, at the ſame time, a more effectual method. He apprehended his right to be inconteſtable, or, perhaps, his ambition would not ſuffer him to be more ſcrupulous, with regard to Arthur than to the king, his brother; but, however that be, he had with him, abroad, Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and William Marſhal, afterwards earl of Pembroke, two lords, that were entirely devoted to his ſervice, and whoſe intereſt was very great in England; and, for the ſake

1199. of expedition, ſo neceſſary, at this juncture, he immediately diſpatched them into that kingdom, with orders to act in concert with the queen, his mother, and the chief juſticiary, who had, for ſome time, eſpouſed his cauſe. As for queen Eleanor, tho', it ſeems, ſhe was in ſuſpence, between her ſon and grandſon, a private reaſon byaſs'd her, in favour of prince John; for ſhe was afraid, that, if Arthur ſucceeded to the crown, his mother, Conſtantia, would come over and claim the adminiſtration of affairs, during her ſon's minority, who was then only 13 years of age; which would have given the greateſt uneaſineſs, to one of her lofty ſpirit and temper.

The zeal and policy of his friends.

The four perſons, whom John employed, as his agents, ſerved with him, zeal and ſucceſs. The juſticiary had great power, during the interregnum; and the archbiſhop was at the head of the clergy. Eleanor was exceedingly beloved and reſpected in the kingdom; and William Marſhal was a lord diſtinguiſhed by his merit, tho' not by his dignities. Having concerted the moſt proper meaſures, to bring about their deſigns, they attempted to gain the magiſtrates of the cities and towns, in order, by their means, to engage the people, that they might afterwards meet with leſs oppoſition from the nobles; and, their endeavours ſucceeding, according to their expectations, they imagined, that they were in a condition, to venture upon ſummoning the leſſer nobility, to take the oath of allegiance to John; and there were very few that refuſed it, becauſe it appeared to be agreeable to the general ſenſe of the nation, and they were ſtrangers to the duke of Bretagne, who had never been in England. Upon this, the biſhops and barons were ſummoned, on the ſame account; but theſe were not ſo inclinable to ſwear fealty to that prince. Many of them called in queſtion the juſtice of John's title; and, beſides, they conſidered themſelves, as the moſt proper judges in the affair, inſtead of being obliged to ſubmit to the deciſions of others. However, as the body of the people had declared for John, they judged it to be imprudent, abſolutely to refuſe the oath that was demanded; and, therefore, under the pretence of examining the laws of the realm, they requeſted a delay. In the interim, believing a civil war to be unavoidable, they began to fortify their caſtles, and make preparations, to ſupport the moſt juſt cauſe, or, at leaſt, that which ſeemed to be moſt conducive to their own advantage; and theſe ſteps alarmed the prince's adherents. As they knew, that he was not beloved, they were apprehenſive, that the barons had reſolved to oppoſe him; and, to prevent this deſign, they convened, at Northampton, an aſſembly-general; where they exerted themſelves, to bring over thoſe, whom they moſt ſuſpected. Among other things, they promiſed, in John's name, that he would fully reſtore all the rights and privileges of the nobility and commons; and, upon this promiſe, joined to others privately made to the moſt obſtinate, all the lords unanimouſly agreed to ſwear fealty to John, inſomuch that the whole kingdom was in his intereſt, before his arrival. The king of Scotland, in the mean time, ſent an ambaſſy, to demand Northumberland, which gave ſome uneaſineſs to thoſe that were at the helm; for they were afraid, that he deſigned to make a conqueſt of that country, which would have been very eaſy, at this juncture, England not being in a condition to maintain a war; yet they found means to content the ambaſſadors, with fair words, promiſing, that, as ſoon as John arrived, he would give their maſter entire ſatisfaction. 1199.

John becomes maſter of the late king's treaſure.

In the interim, John himſelf was not idle in France; where he was detained by two important affairs. In the firſt place, he was employed in a negotiation with Robert of Turnham, who had the cuſtody of Richard's treaſure, in the caſtle of Chinon; and, at length, he prevailed on that officer to deliver to him the money in his hands, and alſo to ſurrender the two important cities of Saumur and Chinon, of which he was governor. The other affair, about which John was ſollicitous, was to procure the ſovereignty of the provinces, the Engliſh held in France; but, tho', in England, he had all deſirable ſucceſs, the caſe was otherwiſe in the foreign parts; for his nephew created him great uneaſineſs. Beſides his natural right to theſe provinces, it was to be feared, that the king of France would aſſiſt him, with all his forces, to take poſſeſſion of them; and, indeed, nothing could be more advantageous to him, than to ſee them rent from the Engliſh monarchy. Moreover, every circumſtance ſeemed to concur in Arthur's favour; for the governor of Angers had already reſigned that place to him; and all the lords of Poictou, Touraine, Maine, and Anjou were reſolved to own him, for their ſovereign. John was, in a manner, excluded from a conſiderable part of his brother's dominions; and, therefore, as he was poſſeſs'd of Richard's treaſure, he determined to make the beſt uſe it, to gain the principal lords of Normandy. Accordingly, he levied an army and beſieged Mans, which had eſpouſed the cauſe of the duke of Bretagne; and, taking it, without much oppoſition, he believed it to be neceſſary to ſtrike a terror into the Normans, by an inſtance of ſeverity, to deter them from declaring war againſt him. To this end, he ordered the walls of Mans to be razed, and the chief burghers to be made priſoners; upon which, whatever inclinations they might have to Arthur, they apprehended it to be a piece of prudence, to ſubmit to his uncle, that they might avoid the impending evils; and they had no ſooner taken this reſolution, than John came to Roan, where he was crowned duke of Normandy, by the archbiſhop of that city, who had been extremely active, in diſpoſing the people in his favour.

It was in vain for prince John to think of reducing the other provinces in France, before he had aſcended the throne of England; for ſuch a delay might not only be prejudicial to his affairs, but the undertaking itſelf would be impracticable, without the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh. For theſe reaſons, he embarqued for that kingdom; and, arriving at London, the 1199. the 25th of May, he caused himself to be crowned, the next day, in Westminster-abbey; when, before the ceremony, Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, made the following speech to the lords and people assembled, on that occasion:

The archbishop of Canterbury's speech.

"No person can have a right to the crown "of this realm, unless, after an humble invo- "cation of God's spirit, he be, first, unanimously elected, for his extraordinary virtues, "and then solemnly anointed king, in imita- "tion of the example of Saul and David, whom "God was pleased to set over his people, tho' "neither of them was the son of a king, or "of royal descent. The former was chosen, "for his valour; and the latter, for his humility and piety; and it was the will of the "Almighty, that such, as were to be invested "with the regal power, should be eminently "distinguished by their virtues. For the same "reason, if any one of the family of the late "king excels the rest, we ought readily to "consent to his election. I speak this, in the "behalf of the noble duke John, here present, "brother to our illustrious king Richard, who "died, without issue; and this prince, being "endowed with all sorts of virtues, and espe- "cially great valour and prudence, we elect "king of England".

John's coronation.

After this short harangue, the archbishop placed the crown on John's head, having, first, administered to him the usual oath, tho' the bishop of Durham protested against this coronation, as being performed, in the absence of the archbishop of York; but this exception, as it had neither law nor custom, for its foundation, was entirely disregarded.

Remarks on the archbishop's speech.

Some pretend to prove, from the archbishop of Canterbury's speech, that the kings of England, in those days, succeeded to the crown, only by election; since the archbishop declared it, on so solemn an occasion, without the least opposition; and they farther insist on the silence of the prince elected, who must have been offended at such a bold assertion, if he had not been sensible, that the people had a just right to this privilege. However, I cannot apprehend, that this inference is conclusive; for, at this rate, Hubert took upon him to declare, that John came to the crown, only by election, tho' it does not appear, that the states were, first, consulted about it; nay, we do not find, that, even after he had ended his speech, he so much as ask'd the opinion of the assembly; but that he immediately proceeded to the coronation of the king, upon the acclamations of the people, who were assembled together, to see the ceremony. Moreover, if John was now elected, wherefore did the whole kingdom swear allegiance to him before? Was it customary to take the oath, before the election? Or, is there any precedent for it, in elective kingdoms? Besides, if the right of election was then established in England, why did the archbishop alledge the examples of Saul and David, when those of the former English kings would have been more to the purpose? Some authors do not scruple to affirm, that the whole assembly was exceedingly surprized at this prelate's discourse; and that, after the ceremony was over, being asked the reason of this extraordinary proceeding, he replied, "I foresaw, that John would embroil "the affairs of the kingdom, and, therefore, "judged it to be expedient to acquaint him, "that he ascended the throne by election, and "not by hereditary succession; in order to "lead him always to remember, that those, "who gave him the crown, had likewise the "power to take it away." If this particular was genuine, the right of election would be confuted by the very words of the archbishop; for what occasion was there for any private reasons, to justify the use of a right, that was certainly established; but it is highly improbable, that Hubert should have the gift of foreseeing events, that did not happen, till after the course of several years. 1199. M. Paris.

To set this speech in a true light, it will be sufficient to consider the circumstances of this pretended election. Hubert was entirely in John's interest; and his business was to put him in possession of a crown, to which the duke of Bretagne had plausible pretensions. However, as the English, either by promises or threatenings, were prevailed on, to swear fealty to John, it was, by no means, proper to say, that he ascended the throne, by hereditary right; since the question, between him and Arthur, had been neither examined nor decided; but it was very advantageous for him, to succeed to the crown, by a sort of election, as it gave him a title to his coronation, and also gained him the people of England, who were more likely to support their own choice, than maintain him, in his pretended hereditary right, which lay open to so many difficulties and objections.

The chief events in John's reign.

John was 32 years old, when he came to the crown, of which he was ardently desirous; but, by the just judgment of God, it render'd him more miserable, than ever; for his whole reign was a scene of the most terrible misfortunes, Philip Augustus, king of France, pope Innocent III, and the barons of his own kingdom being his most implacable enemies. The first deprived him of almost all the provinces, held by his predecessors in France; the second wrested from him the crown of England, tho' he afterwards restored it, upon the terms of a dishonourable homage; and the third forced him to give up all the prerogatives enjoyed by the kings of England, since William the Conqueror. These are the three most remarkable events of this reign, which I shall relate, as briefly as the nature of the thing will allow.

He rewards his friends.

John was no sooner crowned, than he rewarded those, who had been instrumental, in placing him on the throne; for William Marshal was created earl Pembroke; and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the justiciary, was honoured with the title of earl of Essex. Archbishop Hubert looked upon the office of high-chancellor, conferred upon him by the king, to be a sufficient recompence; tho', in the opinion of many, by accepting it, he disparaged his ecclesiastical dignity. It must be owned, that chancellors had been formerly made archbishops of Canterbury, as 1199. as in the case of Thomas Becket; but this is the first instance of an archbishop's being invested with the office of a chancellor.

John evades the king of Scotland's demands.

John, having secured an interest in the English, continued no longer in the kingdom, than was necessary to amuse the king of Scotland, who very urgently demanded the restitution of Northumberland and Cumberland, and threatened to invade those counties, unless he had speedy satisfaction; but, tho' the king of England did not intend to comply with his demands, he judged it to be imprudent to reject them, at the present juncture. He, therefore, rather chose to persuade him, by gentle methods, to be satisfied with a general promise, till his affairs in France permitted him to enter into a negotiation with him; and, indeed, this was the only course he could take, since, in relinquishing the English provinces in France, he endangered the loss of all his other dominions.

The dutchess of Bretagne puts herself and son, under Philip's protection.

Constance, Arthur's mother, perceiving, that John designed to seize on all the provinces in France, possess'd by Henry II. and Richard, as she was in no condition, to oppose it, she resolved to put the duke, her son, under the king of France's protection; and, with this view, she desired that monarch, to come and hold an interview with her at Tours; where she delivered the young duke into his hands, and, at the same time, surrendered the principal places of Bretagne, Touraine, Poictou, Anjou, and Maine, to hold them for Arthur.

Philip breaks the truce.

As Philip was, above all other things, desirous of recovering the provinces enjoyed by the English in France, it is no wonder, that he embraced such a favourable opportunity; tho', under the pretence of acting for Arthur, he now broke the five years truce he had made with Richard. He even became master of Evreux and the province of Maine, whilst the Bretons had surprized Angers, from whence Marchad, John's general, had expell'd them, a little before. The king of England, receiving intelligence of these proceedings, embarqued directly for France; and, upon his arrival at Roan, he mustered together an army of English and Normans, which was soon reinforced, by the lords of his party, from the other provinces. This great armament alarmed Philip; and, being unwilling to run any risque, he pretended to desire, to put an end to his differences with the king of England, by a negotiation, and, accordingly, demanded a truce, for 50 days. John, who vainly imagined, that the terror of his arms constrained Philip, to desist from his projects, instead of improving his advantages, being deceived by his enemy, consented to a truce; but, before it was expired, the two monarchs had a conference, between Butivant and Gaillon, to negotiate a treaty. Philip express'd himself, in such a lofty strain, as evidently shewed, that he was void of all fear, demanding the Norman Vexin for himself, and Poictou, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine for Arthur, for which provinces he had now received that prince's homage; but this demand was so opposite to John's designs, that there was not the least prospect of a peace between the two kings, who, upon the breaking up of the conference, renewed their hostilities.

1199. The death of Johanna, the king's sister.

Johanna, countess of Tholouse and queen dowager of Sicily, John's sister, died, in the beginning of this war, at Roan, where she came to visit the king, her brother; and she was interred, at Fontevraud, near Henry and Richard, her father and brother.

Philip disgusts Arthur.

Whilst John was employed about his sister's funeral, Philip was in Bretagne; where he subdued certain castles, that had declared for John, and, among others, the castle of Balun, which he ordered to be razed, as soon as he was possess'd of it; but William de la Roche, the young duke's governor, in the name of his pupil, complained of this proceeding, as a violation of the treaty made with Philip. Indeed, they had agreed, that all the places, taken from the enemy, should be surrendered to the duke, when he came of age; but Philip scornfully replied, "It was unreasonable to expect, "that the duke of Bretagne's interest should "hinder him from consulting his own"; and, without giving the governor any other satisfaction, he proceeded on his march, to besiege Lavardin. However, upon John's approach, with a powerful army, he retired into Maine; and, being afterwards obliged to quit that province, he shelter'd himself in his own dominions.

Constance and Arthur are reconciled to John.

In the interim, William de la Roche, who was a prudent governor, finding that Philip only made use of his young master, as an instrument, to promote his own advantage, removed Constance and Arthur from his court, and, after a reconciliation, brought them to the king of England; and this step might have proved fatal to Philip, if he had not by good fortune, or, perhaps, good management, recovered his loss. There were some in John's court, who, being bribed by the king of France, or out of affection to the duke, intimated to Constance, that she and her son were both in danger of their lives, near a prince, who would be so great a gainer by their death; which, at length, made such an impression on the princess and the young duke, that they privately withdrew from king John's court, and put themselves, again, under Philip's protection.

The good state of John's affairs.

As Arthur's return gave the king of France a pretence, for carrying on the war, it also defeated all the hopes that John had entertained, whilst the young prince was in his custody; but, as he had entered into an alliance with the emperor Otho, his nephew, who promised to make a powerful diversion, in his favour, and had likewise brought over the earl of Flanders, and, by a surprizing turn, all Guienne had just declared for him, he was in a condition to maintain the war, without dreading the enemy.

1200. Philip sues for a peace.

However, John chose rather to listen to the proposals of peace, which Philip insinuated to him, by the cardinal of Capua; for the king of England's numerous forces, his alliance with the emperor and the earl of Flanders, and the reinforcements he might expect from the Gascoigns, convinced him, that it was impossible for him to make any great progress, during the present posture of affairs; and, therefore, he attempted to procure, by a peace, what he had 1200. no proſpect of obtaining, by arms. As he had no farther regard for the duke's intereſt, than as it was ſubſervient to his own, he readily abandon'd that prince, for the ſake of an advantageous treaty with John; which, after a ſhort truce, was concluded, on the following terms.

The articles of the treaty between the two kings.

That Philip ſhould not give any aſſiſtance to the duke of Bretagne, but ſuffer John to take poſſeſſion of Poictou, Maine, Touraine, and Anjou, without interruption.

That he ſhould reſtore to John the earldoms of Evreux, Berri, Auvergne, and, in general, whatſoever was taken from the Engliſh, ſince Richard's deceaſe.

That, immediately after the reſtitution of Berri and Auvergne, John ſhould reſign theſe provinces, for a certain time, to prince Lewis, Philip's ſon, and pay him 20,000 marks of ſilver, for the dowry of Blanche of Caſtile*, his niece, whom that prince was to marry.

That, provided John died, without iſſue, he ſhould leave theſe two provinces to Lewis.

That John ſhould not aſſiſt, directly, or indirectly, the emperor Otho, his nephew, who was engaged in a war with France.

This treaty was fatal to the duke of Bretagne; for that prince, being unable to reſiſt the king, his uncle, without the aſſiſtance of France, ſoon loſt all the provinces, that had declared for him; nay, he was obliged to do homage to John, for Bretagne, as his predeceſſors had always done to the dukes of Normandy. Nevertheleſs, tho' the king of France had deſerted him, he choſe rather to remain at his court, than to truſt himſelf with an uncle, of whom he had entertained a ſuſpicion, that could not be effaced out of his mind.

Hoved.

Prince Lewis is married to Blanche of Caſtile.

The peace being ſigned, queen Eleanor ſet out for Spain, to conduct Blanche of Caſtile, her grand-daughter, who was betrothed to prince Lewis; and, the kingdom of France being under an interdict, ſhe brought the young princeſs to Roan, where the nuptials were celebrated; and, as all the articles of the treaty were executed, except the ſurrender of Berri and Auvergne, to the prince of France, John likewiſe made good this part of his engagement. Thus, the two courts parted, there being, in all appearance, a thorough underſtanding between them.

The emperor ſends an ambaſſy to John. Ann. Burt.

In the interim, the emperor ſent ambaſſadors to the king, his uncle, to upbraid him, on the account of his late treaty with Philip, and alſo to demand ſome jewels that Richard left him, in his will, with the earldoms of York and Poictou; but, as John had no farther occaſion for his friendſhip, he found reaſons, or pretences, to diſpenſe with giving him ſatisfaction.

John deprives Arthur of his provinces.

Philip was equally punctual, in the performance of his part of the articles; and he did not ſeem to be, in the leaſt, concerned at the king of England's proceedings, who diſpoſſeſs'd Arthur of all the provinces that were given him, Bretagne alone, to which John had no pretenſions, remaining in ſubjection to the duke.

However, whilſt John made ſuch a progreſs in his conqueſts, he was himſelf vanquiſhed by the charms of Iſabella of Angouleme, one of the greateſt beauties, in her time, who had been contracted to Hugh, earl of Marche; but, by reaſon of her youth, the marriage was not, as yet, conſummated; and ſeveral obſtacles afterwards intervened, tho' the contract was ſtill in force. Such was John's paſſion for this lady, that he was reſolved to poſſeſs her, in ſpite of all oppoſition; tho' there were no leſs than two marriages in his way, viz. his own with Aviſa of Glouceſter, who, in the courſe of nine years, had never diſobliged him, and that of Iſabella with the earl of Marche. As for the firſt, as Aviſa was related to him, within the degrees prohibited by the canons, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury had proteſted againſt his marriage, he requeſted the pope to diſannul it; and, whether his holineſs was diſpoſed to gratify the king's demand, or rejoiced at this opportunity, for exerting his papal authority, he appointed the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux and two other biſhops, to be judges of the caſe. The commiſſioners, after a ſlender examination, declared John's marriage with Aviſa to be null and void; upon which, the king demanded Iſabella of the earl of Angouleme, her father, who reſigned her to him, not ſcrupling to violate his promiſe, to procure a crown for his daughter.

1200. His paſſion for Iſabella of Angouleme.

He diverces Aviſa, and marries Iſabella.

This is the account, that moſt of the hiſtorians give of John's ſecond marriage; and they aſſure us, that his paſſion for Iſabella was the real motive of his diſſolving the firſt. Nevertheleſs, a certain author attempts to vindicate the king, by intimating that Aviſa was divorced, before he was enamour'd with Iſabella; but I queſtion, whether the authority of a ſingle hiſtorian can outweigh the teſtimony of all the reſt.

Diceto.

Conſtance marries Guy de Thouars.

Preſently after the king's marriage, Conſtance of Bretagne, who was married to Ralph, earl of Cheſter, having loſt her ſecond huſband, or, according to ſome, voluntarily quitted him, eſpouſed, for her third, Guy de Thouars; and ſhe died, about a year after, in 1201, leaving behind her, by this third marriage, a daughter, named Alice, who was dutcheſs of Bretagne, upon the deceaſe of Arthur, her brother.

The Engliſh have a mean opinion of their king.

John eſteemed himſelf to be happy, in obtaining, for a moderate ſum and the reſignation of Berri and Auvergne, the provinces in France, enjoyed by his predeceſſors; but the Engliſh conſider'd their king, as an indolent and cowardly prince, for meanly purchaſing a peace, when every circumſtance concurred, in promiſing him good ſucceſs, by the war. However, their murmurs gave John very little uneaſineſs; for he thought, that he was ſufficiently a gainer, in depriving the duke, his nephew, of the protection of France, and reducing him to Bretagne alone, which he likewiſe expected, hereafter, to have in his own poſſeſſion.

John returns to England.

Having ſettled his affairs in France, he returned to England, where, convening an aſſembly or parliament, he demanded a ſubſidy of three ſhillings on every hyde of land, for the

dowry

1200. dowry of Blanche of Caſtile, purſuant to his agreement with Philip; and this demand, at firſt, met with great oppoſition. They could not apprehend, that the Engliſh were under any obligations, to pay the dowry of a Spaniſh princeſs, upon her marriage to a French prince; yet, as it was the firſt ſupply that he had required, they conſented to grant it; but, with ſo much reluctance, that he evidently perceived, how difficult it would be, for the future, to raiſe money upon the people, unleſs he became abſolute, which, it is pretended, from that time, he was ſollicitous to effect.

The archbiſhop of York oppoſes the levying of a ſubſidy.

In the mean while, Geoffrey, his natural brother, who was archbiſhop of York, in ſpite of the conſent of the ſtates for this tax, forbad the collectors to levy it, within his dioceſe, tho' he had not the leaſt right, to oppoſe what was decreed by the body of the nation; but he was a turbulent and ambitious perſon. John was extremely ſurprized at Geoffrey's conduct, after the ſignal ſervice he had done him, during Richard's abſence, in releaſing him from priſon, and openly eſpouſing his cauſe againſt Longchamp; yet, being willing to uſe him, in a gentle manner, he only inſiſted on his attending him in France, believing that his abſence would put an end to this affair; but, that prelate refuſing to comply with his orders, he ſeized on his temporalities. This puniſhment was incapable of humbling the archbiſhop's imperious temper, who excommunicated James de Poterne, ſheriff of the county of York, with all his officers employed in levying the tax, and laid his whole dioceſe under an interdict, becauſe the people did not ſupport him; for he imagined, that all the kingdom would be forward, in declaring for him; but, when he found, that no body would ſtir in his favour, he made it his buſineſs, to promote his reconciliation to the king. The preſent juncture was very proper for his purpoſe; for, John being about to be crowned with his new queen at Weſtminſter, he was pleaſed, on ſuch a joyful occaſion, to grant his brother the pardon he deſir'd.

M. Paris. Hoved.

Immediately after this ſolemnity, Hugh, biſhop of Lincoln, died at London, with the reputation of ſanctity.

The kings of England and Scotland hold an interview at Lincoln, where the latter does homage to the former.

Ever ſince Richard's death, the king of Scotland was very importunate, for the reſtitution of the two counties, which he claimed; and, perceiving, at length, that he was only amuſed with general promiſes, he openly threatened, that he would do himſelf juſtice, by force of arms. John was, therefore, obliged to ſet about this affair, which gave him ſome diſturbance; but, inſtead of treating by ambaſſadors, he judged it to be moſt adviſable to hold an interview with William, and, accordingly deſired him to come to Lincoln, where he went himſelf, in order to meet him. Before they enter'd upon the negotiation, John, in the preſence of the great men of both nations, and before all the people, required William to do him homage; and, that prince conſenting to it, the ceremony was performed on a hill, ſince called Bore-Hill, without the city, when the archbiſhop adminiſtered the oath of fealty to the vaſſal-king. It does not appear, for what lands William did this homage; tho', as the Scotch hiſtorians have not poſitively determined the point, the Engliſh conclude, that it was for the whole kingdom of Scotland. But this inference is not altogether juſt; and, beſides, it is improbable, that this prince ſhould voluntarily ſubmit to a vaſſalage, from which he had been freed by the late king, before he went to the Holy-Land; and we do not find, that there was any alteration, in this reſpect, ſince Richard had, by an authentick charter, renounced his ſovereignty over Scotland. However that be, the homage being paid, the king of Scotland would have moved his affair; but John had the addreſs to defer it, alledging that he could agree to nothing, without the conſent of the ſtates; and he even obliged William to ſwear, that he would not diſpoſe of his daughter in marriage, without his approbation. 1200.

M. Paris. Hoved. Diceto.

Whilſt the two monarchs were at Lincoln, the corpſe of Hugh, late biſhop of that city, was removed thither from London; and, having both of them ſet out, to meet it, they, for ſome time, carried the coffin on their ſhoulders.

John reſtores the Ciſtercians to his favour.

It was here alſo, that the Ciſtercians, who refuſed to pay the late tax, ſent 12 abbots to the king; and, falling proſtrate at his feet, they implored his mercy. The king, pierced with the ſight, on his knees, asked their bleſſing, and promiſed, that he would found an abbey for their order; and, accordingly, ſome time after, he built the abbey of Bowley, or Beaulieu, in Hampſhire, which he endowed with the privilege of ſanctuary and large revenues.

The canons of Lincoln reject a biſhop nominated by the king.

John's reſpect to the biſhop of Lincoln's body, and his condeſcenſion to the Ciſtercian monks, did not, as he expected, gain him the affection of the clergy; for, ſoon after, when, the ſee, of Lincoln being vacant, according to the cuſtom of his anceſtors, he recommended a perſon to the canons of that church, tho' the prince's nomination, had been hitherto, regarded, it was now rejected, with outrageous contempt. Innocent III, then pope, having reſolved to deprive princes of their ſhare in the election of biſhops and abbots, had previouſly concerted meaſures, to ſuperſede the king's nomination; and, for this reaſon, the canons, being aſſured of the protection of the court of Rome, ſhewed ſo little reſpect to their ſovereign.

Hubert calls a ſynod, in ſpite of the king's prohibition.

Some time after, Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, tho' he had expreſſed ſuch a zealous attachment to the king's intereſt, on a ſudden, loſt it, when the rights of the clergy and the privileges of his ſee came to be ſupported; for, being given to underſtand, that Innocent, who aſcended the papal throne, at 35 years of age, formed a project of rendering the clergy entirely independent of the juriſdiction of their ſovereigns, by the pope's directions, not only held a ſynod, without asking the king's leave, but even in oppoſition to his poſitive prohibition, by Geoffrey Fitz-Peers, earl of Eſſex, his juſticiary. In all likelihood, John's not reſenting this daring preſumption was extremely prejudicial to his affairs; for the clergy plainly, apprehending 1200. prehending, that, being terrified by the example of the king, his father, he was reſolved ſtudiouſly to avoid any conteſts with them, made the worſt uſe of this knowledge, on more important occaſions. Hubert, not ſatisfied with deſpiſing the orders of his ſovereign, affected to equal him, in ſome meaſure, and even to ſurpaſs him, in magnificence; for, whilſt the king kept his Chriſtmas at Guilford, with great ſolemnity, the archbiſhop celebrated the the ſame feſtival at Canterbury, in ſuch a pompous and ſplendid manner, that the king conſidered it, as a ſort of bravado. John, to mortify the archbiſhop's vanity, cauſed himſelf to be crowned again at Canterbury, with no other view than to put him to very great expences; but this petty revenge only ſhewed, how much he dreaded to attack directly thoſe who were in credit and power.

1201. Hubert ſurpaſſes the king, in magnificence.

The diſcontents of the Engliſh barons.

If John's treaty with France gave his ſubjects an ill opinion of him, his proceedings, after his return into England, confirmed them in their ſentiments. Moſt of the barons entertained ſome ſcruples, about the juſtice of his title to the crown; and, if they had ſworn allegiance to him, it was upon condition, that he would reſtore the privileges of the nobility and commons; whereas they now found, that on the contrary, he daily uſurped an arbitrary power, which led them to believe, that he had a deſign upon their liberties. They were greatly diſpleaſed with the ſubſidy, that he had obtained, by a ſort of compulſion; and they afterwards obſerved, that, in a progreſs he took to the north, under the pretence of treſpaſſes on his foreſts, he had, contrary to the privileges of the people, in an arbitrary manner, exacted large ſums from the northern counties; and that, beſides, he debauched their wives and daughters, without the leaſt regard to their merit or quality. All theſe conſiderations prejudiced the minds of the barons againſt their ſovereign; and they held private conferences, at which they agreed to aſſiſt each other, in caſes of oppreſſion. They likewiſe reſolved to embrace the firſt opportunity of acquainting the king, that they would never ſubmit to an abſolute power, which offer'd, ſooner than they expected; for, the Poictevins revolting, John ſummoned all the barons to appear, with their horſes and arms, at Portſmouth, to attend him into France, in order to chaſtiſe the revolters. The barons, under ſome pretence, aſſembled at Leiceſter; and, a few days after, they ſent the following meſſage to the king, "That, before they went over with him, he "ſhould reſtore their privileges, purſuant to "his promiſe before his coronation". John was of an impetuous temper, more capable of being ſwayed by counſels that ſoothed his paſſions, than by prudent advice; and, therefore, tho' ſeveral of his miniſters adviſ'd him to give the barons ſome ſatisfaction, or, at leaſt, fair promiſes, till their heat was abated, without conſidering the dangerous conſequences of ſuch violent meaſures, he demanded of the barons their caſtles, as pledges of their fidelity. At the ſame time, marching at the head of ſome troops, he attack'd Beauvoir-caſtle, which he took in a few days; and this firſt ſucceſs ſtriking a terror into the barons, who had not, as yet, made any preparations for their defence, they made their ſubmiſſion; and, having delivered their children, as hoſtages, they came to Portſmouth. Whether the chaſtiſement of the Poictevins was only uſed by John, as a pretence, to raiſe money from the nobility, or he was afraid to leave the kingdom, at this juncture, he was pleaſed to diſpenſe with the attendance of the barons, for two marks of ſilver upon every knight's fee; tho' he diſpatched the earl of Pembroke with ſome troops into Normandy, and followed him, in perſon, as ſoon as he thought, that he might do it with ſafety. 1201.

John renews the treaty with Philip.

Upon his arrival at Roan, Philip deſired to have a conference with him; in which he gave him ſuch proofs of his eſteem and friendſhip, as might have deceived a prince of greater penetration. At this interview, the treaty was renewed, and ſeveral great lords of both courts were reciprocally made ſureties, who promiſed to ſerve againſt the aggreſſor, in caſe of a rupture between the two kings; but ſuch engagements, tho' very frequent in thoſe days, were ſcarce ever obſerved; and, therefore, princes have, long ſince, diſcontinued a cuſtom, that was often found to be uſeleſs and ineffectual. The two monarchs, before they parted, conſented to contribute the 40th part of their revenues to the holy war, and exhorted the richeſt of their ſubjects to copy after their examples; and Philip invited the king of England to ſpend ſome days at Paris, where he lodged him in his own palace, and, in a word, did all that was poſſible, to convince him of the reality of his affection for him *.

Philip's intrigues againſt John.

The alliance between the two kings was, indeed, likely to prove firm and laſting, ſince it was entirely voluntary; but it ſoon appeared, that Philip's careſſes to his pretended friend were only ſo many artifices, to enſnare him; for, in the very height of them, he was projecting to deprive him of all his dominions in France. Hugh, earl of Marche, was a very proper inſtrument, to promote his deſigns, who was highly incenſed againſt the king of England, for preventing his marriage to a lady, that was contracted to him, and taking her to himſelf; and, accordingly, Philip formed his ſcheme upon that earl's inclination, and uſed his utmoſt efforts, to excite him to revenge, giving him an aſſurance of a powerful aſſiſtance. The earl of Marche was no ſooner aſ-

* This year, Walter de Lacy, a powerful lord in Ireland, under the pretence of holding an interview with John de Courcy, earl of Ulſter, aſſaulted him, kill'd abundance of his men, and purſued him; and the earl, in his flight, being invited by Hugh, Walter de Lacy's brother, to take ſanctuary in his caſtle, was there detained as a priſoner. In the interim, his adherents waſted the lands of Walter and Hugh de Lacy, till the earl was releaſed; yet, on Good-Friday following, when the ſaid earl was going, unarmed and bare-foot, in pilgrimage to a church, he was perfidiouſly apprehended by his own people, for a ſum of money, and delivered to Hugh de Lacy, by whom he was ſent to king John, who, on this account, gave Hugh de Lacy the earldom of Ulſter and lordſhip of Connaught, which belonged to John de Courcy, who made a conqueſt of it, in the reign of Henry II. ſured

1201. ſured of the protection of France, than he attempted to corrupt the Poictevins, by ſeveral cabals; and ſuch was his ſucceſs, that, in a ſhort time, they were diſpoſed to rebel againſt John, for whom they had not the leaſt reſpect or affection. Upon this, Hugh accquainted the young duke of Bretagne, that he had now a fair opportunity, for recovering the provinces that the king, his uncle, had ſeized; which Arthur, at once, determined to embrace, finding that the king of France had engaged to ſupport him; and the Bretons, his ſubjects, readily joined in the conſpiracy, fancying that his name was an auſpicious omen, and, for no other reaſon, believing that he would acquire as great a reputation as the famous Arthur, Thus, the earl of Marche's love, jealouſy, and reſentment, Arthur's ambition, and Philip's avarice conſpired to the ruin of king John; whilſt he ſpent his time in diverſions and entertainments with his new queen, without the leaſt apprehenſions of danger. However, at a ſecond interview with Philip near Gaillon, he was alarmed, by the haughty treatment he received from that prince; for the French monarch, his project being brought to maturity, demanded, for Arthur, all John's provinces in France, with reaſonable ſatisfaction for the earl of Marche; and upon his refuſal, he ſummoned him to appear before the court of peers, and ſubmit to their judgment. John, who was extremely ſurprized to hear him talk, in ſuch an imperious ſtrain, ſo very different from that he uſed, at their late conference, refuſed to comply with his demands, and diſdained his citation; which furniſhed the king of France with the pretence he wanted to invade Normandy, where he took ſeveral places, before John could oppoſe his progreſs.

Arthur's marriage to the king of France's daughter.

Towards the middle of autumn, Philip, contented with his firſt campaign, returned to Paris, where he ſolemnized the nuptials of his eldeſt daughter with Arthur, duke of Bretagne; and his view in this was to juſtify his preſent undertaking, under the pretence of maintaining his ſon-in-law's cauſe. A few days after, Arthur departed, attended with 200 lances, to take upon him the command of the Poictevins that had revolted; and, when he came near Poictou, he received intelligence, that queen Eleanor, his grandmother, was in Mirabel, with a weak garriſon; upon which, he marched directly thither, and ſoon took the town, tho' the caſe was otherwiſe, with reſpect to the caſtle, where the queen had retired. The reſiſtance he met with convincing him, that it would be difficult for him to become maſter of the place, without a reinforcement, he called the earl of Marche to his aſſiſtance, who ran to the expedition, as to a certain victory.

In the interim, king John, being informed of his mother's danger, came to her relief, with ſo great expedition, that he approached the enemy, before they had made any remarkable progreſs in the ſiege, tho' it was ſtill in their power to make a retreat; but ſuch was the animoſity of both the leaders againſt John, that they reſolved to give him battle. The ſucceſs, however, was not anſwerable to their expectations; for, upon the firſt onſet, the king of England routed the Poictevin troops, forcing them back to Mirabel, where he made a terrible ſlaughter. To crown this victory, the duke of Bretagne, Eleanor, his ſiſter, who was called the beauty of that dutchy, the earl of Marche, and 200 knights were taken priſoners; but the ill uſe, the conqueror afterwards made of this ſucceſs, render'd it ſo fatal to himſelf, that it would have been better for him, if he had not prov'd victorious. Arthur was directly ſent to Falaiſe; and princeſs Eleanor was conducted to Briſtol-caſtle in England, where ſhe was confined 40 years. Some of the French authors repreſent this action, in another light, and affirm, that only Arthur was ſurprized in Mirabel, from whence it may be concluded, that he did not go out to fight againſt his uncle; but John's letter to England, after the victory, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, proves, that it was ſomething more than a ſurprize, and confirms the account of the Engliſh hiſtorians. Philip was ſo confounded, at the news of Arthur and the earl of Marche being in John's power, that he raiſed the ſiege of Arques, begun ſome days before, and returned to Paris.

His conference with Arthur at Falaiſe. M. Par.

John was extremely impatient to ſee the duke, his nephew, in order to prevail on him to renounce the protection of France; and, therefore, he inſtantly went back to Normandy, being confident, that Arthur, in his preſent condition, would joyfully embrace the opportunity of being reconciled to his uncle. Upon his arrival at Falaiſe, ordering him to be brought into his preſence, he aſſured him, that Philip, under the maſque of protecting him, only conſulted his own advantage; and that, from his paſt conduct, he might plainly apprehend what he was to expect from ſuch a protector. He endeavoured to perſuade him, that it was equally his duty and intereſt to adhere to his uncle, who would be a gainer in ſupporting him, and deſired nothing ſo much, as to live in amity with him, and give him convincing proofs of his affection; and, in fine, he intreated him to conſider, that, in his preſent circumſtances, his good or ill fortune entirely depended on the perſon, that was ſo ſollicitous for his friendſhip. The young prince, who was not well vers'd in the maxims of politicks, the principal of which is diſſimulation, inſtead of accepting the king's propoſals, upbraided him with uſurping the crown of England as well as the provinces in France; and, not conſidering that his life lay at his mercy, in his paſſion, he threatened, "That, to the "moment of his death, he would always in"duſtriouſly ſeek after an occaſion to be re"venged." Upon this open declaration, John ordered him to be conducted to Roan, and confined in the new tower, under the cuſtody of Robert de Vipont; and it is pretended, that, purſuant to the advice of ſome of his counſellors, the king deſigned to put out his eyes, and render him incapable of having any iſſue, but that he was diſappointed by thoſe, whom he employed, as his agents. However that be, a few days after, the young 1202. prince was brought to Roan, he diſappeared, on a ſudden; and it was never known, for certain, what became of him. The king's friends reported, that Arthur, attempting to eſcape out of priſon, was drowned in the river Seine; but very few gave credit to this report. On the contrary, it was generally believed, that the duke was murdered, by the command of the king, his uncle; and ſome hiſtorians give a particular account of the circumſtances of his death. They relate, that John himſelf, in a very dark night, came in a boat to the foot of the tower, where his nephew was impriſon'd; and that, cauſing him to be brought before him, he ſtabb'd him with his own hand, and order'd his body to be thrown into the Seine, ſome leagues below the town. Whatever was the manner of this prince's death, it is evident that John never fully acquitted himſelf from the charge of being the author of it; and there was ſo much the more reaſon to conclude him guilty, as he made no enquiry into this affair, which he ſhould have examined, with the utmoſt ſtrictneſs, had he not been concerned in the murder.

John is charged with the duke's murder.

M. Paris. The ſame year, the pope demanded a 40th part of the eccleſiaſtical revenues of England, towards the charge of the holy war.

Upon Arthur's death, John returned into England; and, being crowned, a fourth time, at Canterbury, he repaſſed into Normandy, where he found, that the report of Arthur's murder was every-where ſpread, with circumſtances highly reflecting on his honour and reputation. The Bretons, in particular, maintained, that, if John did not kill him with his own hand, it was, at leaſt, manifeſt, that this barbarous action could not be committed, without his conſent, or even his orders; and Philip did all that was poſſible, by his emiſſaries, to ſpirit them up to be revenged on John, for the tragical death of their ſovereign, giving them alſo to underſtand, that, provided they applied to him, as John's ſovereign lord, he would take care, that they ſhould have ample ſatisfaction; which was ſufficient encouragement to the Bretons, who were inflamed with reſentment. Guy de Thouars, husband to the deceaſed dutcheſs and guardian of Alice, her daughter, aſſembled the lords of Bretagne, at Vannes, on this occaſion; and it was unanimouſly reſolved, that application ſhould be made to the king of France, for juſtice, the biſhop of Rennes and another lord being commiſſioned to carry their complaints to Philip, who gave them a moſt gracious anſwer. He ſeemed to be more exaſperated againſt John, than the Bretons themſelves, and openly declared, that neither honour, juſtice, nor conſcience would permit him to let ſuch a parricide paſs with impunity; and, to prove that his menaces were not in vain, he himſelf demanded juſtice of the court of peers, before whom he diſplayed the barbarity of the murder committed on the body of the duke of Bretagne, in a place held of the crown of France, and of which the king of England, his vaſſal, was accuſed. The court, very readily complying with his demand, order'd John to appear before them, and anſwer to the accuſation exhibited againſt him; and that prince no ſooner received the ſummons, than he diſpatched Euſtace, biſhop of Ely, and Hubert de Burgh, as his ambaſſadors, to repreſent to Philip, that their maſter could not come to France, without a ſafe-conduct; to which the king replied, "He may come in peace;" but, when they demanded a ſafe-conduct, for his return, he roundly told them, "That depended on the ſen-" tence, which ſhould be pronounced againſt " him." The ambaſſadors then remonſtrated, that their maſter was not only duke of Normandy, but alſo king of England; and that, tho' he ſhould think it proper to hazard his perſon, the barons of the realm would never give their conſent. Philip anſwered, "What " is that to me, is not the duke of Normandy " my vaſſal? and, if he has procured a higher " title, ought I, therefore, to loſe my right " of ſovereignty?" Upon which, the ambaſſadors, without making any reply, returned, with all expedition, to inform king John, how the court of France ſtood affected towards him. 1202.

Philip excites the Bretons to revenge his death. P. Æmil.

As ſoon as the time, limited in the ſummons, was expired, Philip cauſed John to be condemned, for not appearing, and ordered all his dominions in France to be united to the crown; and it deſerves a remark, that, in the ſentence *, there is not the leaſt mention of the ſatisfaction due to the Bretons, for the murder of their ſovereign, though they were parties in the affair, and Philip pretended to engage in it, purely, on their account; from whence it is evident, that his view, in this proceeding, was not ſo much to do them juſtice, as to have an occaſion to diſpoſſeſs the monarchs of England. The Engliſh loudly complained of Philip's conduct; and the more, as John, being actually in war with France, was under an abſolute neceſſity of not appearing, eſpecially, as he was denied a ſafe-conduct, for his return; but, without any regard to their murmurs, Philip endeavoured to put the ſentence in execution.

John is ſentenced to forfeit his dominions in France. M. Paris.

In the mean while, John made no preparations for his defence; for he prepoſterouſly look'd upon Philip's ſentence, as no more than a bravado. However, when the ſeaſon of the year permitted, the king of France took the field, at the head of a numerous army; and, meeting with very little reſiſtance, he reduced the greateſt part of Normandy to his obedience. The progreſs of his arms was incapable of rouzing the king of England out of his ſlothful ſecurity; for, ſeeming to be altogether inſenſible of his loſſes, he purſued his diverſions as eagerly, as if his affairs had been in the moſt proſperous ſituation, When he received intelligence, that Philip had taken ſuch a place, 1203. Philip invades Normandy.

* According to Paulus Æmilius, in his life of Philip, the ſentence runs, thus: "That, John, duke of Norman-" dy, unmindful of his oath to Philip, his lord, had murder'd his elder brother's ſon, a vaſſal to the crown of France, " within the ſeignory of that kingdom; for which he is judged a traytor, and as an enemy to the crown of France, " to forfeit all the dominions, which he held, by homage, and that re-entry be made, by force of arms."

he

1203. he replied, with great confidence, "I will ſoon "recover it"; tho', continuing at Roan, he gave the enemy time not only to ſecure, but daily enlarge their conqueſts. In a word, ſuch was his indolence and ſtupid inſenſibility, that the people publickly reported, "He was be-"witched"; and, indeed, it is natural to conclude, that Philip would have met with mighty difficulties, in his undertaking, had he been concerned with a more vigilant and active enemy, ſince the caſtle of Gailliard alone, by reaſon of the vigorous defence of the beſieged, was not taken, in leſs than five months.

The Engliſh barons deſert him.

The Engliſh barons, who attended the king into Normandy, preſſingly importuned him to exert himſelf; but they no ſooner perceived, that all their remonſtrances were ineffectual, than they left him and returned to England. In the interim, Philip, making the beſt uſe of John's invincible ſloth, continually gained ground; and, not ſatisfied with what he had obtained, by his arms, he attempted, by his emiſſaries, to excite, in Normandy, a general defection. He cauſed it to be intimated to the Normans, that, as they could not expect any aſſiſtance from England, it would be more adviſable for them to make a voluntary ſubmiſſion to the crown of France, to which they originally belonged, than be forced to it, by arms; and that, by this means, they would infallibly preſerve their antient privileges; whereas a reſiſtance, which, of courſe, muſt prove ineffectual, would certainly deprive them of their liberties. Notwithſtanding John's profound lethargy, his preſence ſecured the allegiance of ſeveral of the principal cities in Normandy; but, the very moment they perceived, that he was preparing for his departure to England, they judged it to be lawful to provide for their own ſafety. He was ſcarce embarqued, before they concluded a treaty with Philip, obliging themſelves to own him for their ſovereign, provided they were not relieved, within the ſpace of a year; but, when they found, that no preparations were making in England, moſt of them came in, before the expiration of that term; and, thus, of all Normandy, the city of Roan only remained in ſubjection to the king of England.

John's ill treatment of his Engliſh ſubjects. M. Paris.

This unfortunate prince did not entertain the leaſt thoughts of aſſiſting the Normans; and, upon his arrival in England, inſtead of doing all that was poſſible, to gain the affection of his ſubjects, ſo neceſſary, at that juncture, he accuſed his barons of deſerting him and occaſioning the loſs of Normandy. Under this pretence, the moſt unreaſonable that ever was made, he extorted from them the ſeventh part of their moveables; and, tho' the clergy had not given him the ſame cauſe of complaint, he render'd them liable to the ſame impoſition. Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was himſelf his inſtrument, in oppreſſing the clergy; whilſt the juſticiary rigorouſly exacted the money from the laity. The king's indolence was matter of aſtoniſhment to all the kingdom; for they could not imagine, that a prince, who, till then, had not wanted courage, and ſeemed to be greatly attached to his own intereſt, could view the loſs of Normandy, with ſo much indifference; and, therefore, moſt of them concluded, that he was intent upon ſome great deſign, which would be diſcovered, at a proper ſeaſon. This imagination did not a little contribute to his obtaining, from the parliament, a ſubſidy of two marks and a half of every knight's fee; which was granted, in expectation that the money would be uſefully employed, in the recovery of the dominions he had lately loſt; whereas he miſapplied it, in idle expences, being contented with ſending ambaſſadors to France, to negotiate a peace. Philip, elated with his ſucceſs, was ſo far from leſſening his demands, that he farther required the princeſs Eleanor, Arthur's ſiſter, for his ſecond ſon, with all the provinces the Engliſh enjoyed in France, for her dowry. John could never reſolve to reſign his dominions, as a portion for his niece; and, beſides, it was of dangerous conſequence to deliver up to the king of France a princeſs, that, upon her brother's deceaſe, had the ſame pretenſions to the crown of England. Thus, the negotiation broke off; and the expectations of the Engliſh were entirely defeated.

1204. He obtains an aid for the war.

Philip ſends a champion into England.

Philip, ſoon after, ſent a perſon, as his champion, into England, who challenged all, that ſhould maintain, that the king, his maſter, had acted unjuſtly, in his proceedings againſt John; but the court of England did not judge it to be expedient, to commit an affair of ſuch importance to the deciſion of a ſingle combate; tho' they, at the ſame time, informed him, that, ſince he was ſo deſirous of fighting, a man ſhould be found, with whom he might have an opportunity of trying his ſtrength. There was then confined in the tower an Iriſh lord, namely, John de Courcy *, earl of Ulſter, of a gigantick ſtature, and famous for his intrepidity, who was conſider'd, as a very proper perſon, to quell the French Hector; and, the priſoner being brought to court, the king asked him, whether he would fight, in his cauſe? The earl fiercely replied, "No, not in thine; but, in "that of the kingdom, I will fight, to the laſt "drop of my blood." However, whilſt he was recovering his ſtrength, which was greatly impaired by a tedious impriſonment, the French champion, hearing of the prodigious ſtrength of his adverſary, privately withdrew into Spain, not daring to appear, either in France or England. The ſaid earl being afterwards in France, in the Engliſh army, Philip, at a conference with John, deſired to ſee ſome trial of his ſtrength; upon which, the earl, in the preſence of the two kings, ordered a large ſtake to be fixed in the ground, on which was placed a helmet; and then, looking round, with a menacing aſpect, he cut the helmet in two pieces, with his ſword. The ſword ſtuck ſo faſt in the ſtake, by means of the violence of the blow, that none, but himſelf could remove it; and, Philip asking him, why he looked round ſo fiercely, he anſwer'd, that, if he had miſs'd his Philip takes Roan.

If Philip could not compaſs his ends, by a ſingle champion, he was, at length, ſucceſsful, by the help of many. Towards the end of autumn, he beſieged Roan; and the citizens, having no proſpect of relief, ſurrendered, upon condition that they ſhould enjoy their antient privileges; but, as a famous author judiciouſly obſerves, "This precaution proved "as feeble againſt abſolute power, as parch-"ment againſt iron." Philip was no ſooner poſſeſs'd of Roan, than he order'd the walls to be demoliſhed; and, thus, all Normandy was reduced in ſubjection to the crown of France, and reunited to that monarchy, after it had been governed by 12 dukes of the Norman line, of which John was the laſt, for the ſpace of 320 years.

Mezerai.

He becomes maſter of the other provinces.

Philip afterwards attacked the reſt of the Engliſh provinces, which, at laſt, were obliged to ſubmit to the conqueror, after having, in vain, expected aſſiſtance from England; and nothing now remained in John's poſſeſſion, except the dutchy of Guienne, which Philip did not think it proper to invade.

Queen Eleanor's death.

Queen Eleanor, widow to Henry II. and John's mother, died, this year, in a very advanced age; who had the mortification, before her death, to ſee the decline of the Engliſh monarchy, to which ſhe had given ſuch a luſtre, by the addition of ſo many foreign dominions.

1205. John reſolves to carry the war into Poictou.

Theſe loſſes, joined with the murmurs of the Engliſh, awaken'd John out of his ſlothful ſecurity; and, when it was leaſt expected, he ſeemed to be firmly reſolved to exert himſelf, to regain both his reputation and his poſſeſſions. The Poictevins, being diſſatisfied with their new ſovereign, determined to revolt, and ſent to John, for aſſiſtance; and the king taking it for granted, that all the other provinces were of the ſame diſpoſition, he ſummon'd all the barons to meet him, with their troops, at Portſmouth, where he had order'd his fleet to be in readineſs; but, juſt as he was on the point of embarquing, the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the earl of Pembroke, throwing themſelves at his feet, intreated him to deſiſt from his intended expedition. They repreſented to him, that he had not, either in Poictou, or in any other neighbouring province, ſo much as a ſingle place to retire to, in caſes of neceſſity; that he could not expect any advantages from this war, ſince Philip was maſter of all the fortified towns; that it was evidently of dangerous conſequence for him to truſt the Poictevins, who had ſo often deceived him, and, perhaps, only invited him to aſſiſt them, in order to deliver him up to his enemy; and, in a word, they told him, that he ſo manifeſtly hazarded his life and the nation's honour, in ſuch an undertaking, that his faithful ſubjects were obliged to uſe their utmoſt endeavours, to divert him from it. Theſe remonſtrances proving to be ineffectual, they ſubjoined ſuch menaces, that he was conſtrained, at laſt, to regard their counſel; and, therefore, on a ſudden, altering his reſolution, he contented 1205. himſelf with ſending ſuccours to the Poictevins, under the command of the earl of Salisbury, his natural brother. He afterwards diſmiſs'd the army and fleet, who curſed the authors of this advice; but he was no ſooner returned to London, than he repented of his compliance with the counſel of the earl and archbiſhop. However, inſtead of quarrelling with them, he vented his indignation on the nobility, from whom he extorted large ſums, under the pretence that they had refuſed to attend him; for he ſuppoſed, tho' without the leaſt grounds, that the two lords had ſpoken, in behalf of the whole body. This was the ſecond time of his exacting, in an arbitrary manner, money from his ſubjects, without the conſent of the ſtates; but he did not do it, with impunity; for the ſequel will inform us, that, tho' vengeance was deferred, it only became more terrible, when the barons met with an opportunity, to make him feel the effects of their reſentment.

The ſecond part of John's reign.

Hitherto, we have ſeen the firſt ſcene of John's misfortunes, occaſioned by his own fault, as well as Philip's ambition; but theſe are hardly fit to be put in the balance with thoſe that ſucceeded; eſpecially, as he ſeemed to be, in a great meaſure, inſenſible of the former, whereas the others created him infinite vexation and uneaſineſs. It was not the ambition of an hoſtile prince, that involved him in a gulph of misfortunes, in the ſecond part of his reign, but the pride of him, who ſtiled himſelf the common father of all chriſtians; viz. pope Innocent III, who, for a very trivial cauſe, treated John ſo cruelly, that, ſhould a pope now preſume to act, in the like manner, doubtleſs, all Chriſtendom would riſe up againſt him. Let us deſcend to the particulars of this affair, which is the principal ſubject of this reign; but, without inſiſting on reflections, which the moſt common reader will naturally make, without our aſſiſtance, let us acquieſce in the relation of the facts, as advanced by the hiſtorians, that were moſt attached to the court of Rome.

Hubert's death.

John ſcarce had began to forget the loſs of the French provinces, when the death of the archbiſhop of Canterbury expoſed him to new troubles. The election of the archbiſhops had, for ſome time, occaſioned continual conteſts, between the ſuffragan biſhops and the monks of St. Auguſtin's; for the former claimed a right to be concerned in the election, as had been often practiſed; whilſt the monks aſſerted, that this right was peculiar to them, according to antient cuſtom, and uſed their utmoſt efforts, to keep poſſeſſion of it. Immediately after Hubert's death, ſome of the monks, combining together, whether they were afraid, that the fraternity would not inſiſt on their right, or for ſome other reaſon, reſolved to elect an archbiſhop; and, with this view, meeting at midnight in the cathedral, they choſe Reginald, their ſub-prior, in hopes of obtaining afterwards the pope's confirmation. The ſub-prior obliged himſelf, by an oath, not to divulge it, till he had himſelf acquainted his holineſs with it; and the electors made

uſe

1205. use of a pretence, for his being ſent to Rome, attended by ſome of their cabal; but, upon his arrival in Flanders, he aſſumed the title of archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the monks, his companions, had no more diſcretion than himſelf.

John threatens the monks. The news of it reaching the king's ears, he was apprehenſive, that the whole monaſtery was concerned in the fraud, and made preparations to chaſtiſe the monks, for their raſhneſs, in electing an archbiſhop, without his licenſe; but they convinced him of their innocence, and appeaſed him by their ſubmiſſions. The electors, finding, from the clamours of the monks who were not in the intrigue, that it would be extremely difficult to accompliſh their undertaking, thought it adviſable to deſiſt; and then, the whole ſociety proceeding to a new election, the king nominated 1206. John de Gray, biſhop of Norwich, who was unanimouſly choſen, placed in the archiepiſcopal chair, and inveſted with the temporalities. Preſently after, 14 monks were diſpatched to the pope, to demand his confirmation of the new archbiſhop; and, at the ſame time, the ſuffragan biſhops of Canterbury ſent a deputation to Rome, to complain of the monks engroſſing the ſole right of electing an archbiſhop, and to repreſent to his holineſs their reaſons againſt it.

John recovers part of Poictou. Whilſt the deputies were on the road, John led a conſiderable army into Poictou, and reduced the greateſt part of that province to his allegiance; but he ſuffered himſelf to be, once more, circumvented by Philip, who, being unprepared, ſued for and obtained a truce, for two years *.

The affair of the election is brought before the pope. In the interim, the ſub-prior of St. Auguſtin's, being arrived at Rome, ſtrenuouſly ſollicited the pope, to confirm his election; but Innocent, apprehending ſome irregularity in the affair, deferred his judgment concerning it. The other deputies alſo petitioned him, to confirm the ſecond election; and, on the other hand, the agents of the biſhops brought their complaints againſt the monks. To decide theſe differences, the pope ordered the deputies, to wait on him, on a day appointed, at Viterbo; where, in his preſence, this point was diſcuſs'd, with great warmth by the contending parties. Innocent, who was already reſolved, voided both the elections, and gave orders to the deputies of the monks, to proceed to a new choice; enjoining them likewiſe to elect cardinal Stephen Langton, an Engliſhman, then at his court; but the monks, ſurprized at this order, that was without any precedent, would, at firſt, have rejected it. They alledged, in vindication of their refuſal to comply with it, that they were not authorized by their monaſtery, and that, beſides, the king's conſent was neceſſary; but the pope had no regard to theſe reaſons. He told them, that, as deputies, they were the repreſentatives of the whole monaſtery; and that the conſent of princes was needleſs, with reſpect to elections made, 1206. in his preſence; and, without allowing them time for a reply, he commanded them, on pain of excommunication, to elect cardinal Langton. The monks, overawed by the pope's preſence and menaces, obeyed his command, tho' with great reluctance †; and there was only one, viz. Elias de Brantefield, who had the courage to withſtand it; but this extraordinary election was ſoon confirmed by the pope, who conſecrated the archbiſhop elect.

1207. John extorts a ſubſidy, by violence. M. Paris. As the pope authorized 14 monks, deputed by their monaſtery, to elect an archbiſhop, the ſuffragan biſhops of Canterbury muſt, of courſe, loſe their cauſe with the monks; and, accordingly, his holineſs prohibited the biſhops to interpoſe, for the future, in the election of their metropolitans.

The emperor viſits him. In the mean while, John entirely loſt the hearts of his ſubjects, by extorting from them the 13th part of their moveables; which was, in vain, oppoſed by the clergy, ſo far as they were affected by it; for the act paſſed in parliament, and the tax was levied, as well upon the clergy as laity, tho' the former never gave their conſent, and the latter granted it, in a manner by compulſion. This violence occaſioned many complaints and murmurs, among the clergy, who, till then, had enjoyed the privilege of not being taxed, without their conſent; but, ſince it was not in their power to make reſiſtance, they attempted to be revenged, by exclaiming againſt the king's conduct, in order to render him odious to the people. The archbiſhop of York, the king's natural brother, being a prelate of an impatient temper, excommunicated all the collectors of the tax, and left the kingdom; yet, tho' the clergy had reaſon to complain, the king's friends alledged, that it was ſurprizing, that they ſhould refuſe to aſſiſt their ſovereign, in his neceſſity; when, a little before, without the leaſt murmur, they had ſuffered a legate to exact, from all the beneficed eccleſiaſticks, large ſums, for the pretended occaſions of the holy ſee. If the money, which the king procured by this tax, had been expended in the ſervice of the ſtate, it would have given ſome ſatisfaction to the nation; but they had the mortification to ſee it ſquander'd away, in the reception of the emperor, who came to viſit the king, his uncle. His deſign was to prevail on him to break the truce with France; but it was impoſſible for him to bring John to this rupture; tho', to ſoften, in ſome meaſure, his refuſal, he made him a preſent of 5000 marks, which ſerved to defray the expences of his journey.

Innocent greatly ſuſpected, that John would be diſpleaſed with Langton's election; which was an unprecedented incroachment, and extorted by compulſive methods. Indeed, for ſome time after the converſion of the Engliſh, the popes choſe ſuch as were capable of wiſely governing the riſing church, and generally

‡ The French hiſtorians affirm, that John ſued for a truce; but ſuch contradictions are frequently to be met with, between the writers of both nations. Rigord relates, that, both armies being ready for an engagement, a truce was concluded, for two years.

1207. Italians; becauſe there were few eccleſiaſticks, in England, qualified for that exalted ſtation; but, ever ſince the time of archbiſhop Theodorus, who was the laſt that was ſent from Rome, the popes had never pretended to chuſe of their own accord, the archbiſhops, without the conſent of the kings. They were contented with confirming the elections, and obliging the archbiſhops to come and demand the pall at Rome; nor had they, ſince the conqueſt, ſo much as annulled the election of an archbiſhop. The pope, therefore, to induce the king calmly to overlook this incroachment, wrote him the following letter; which, on the account of its ſingularity, deſerves to be inſerted.

Pope INNOCENT TO JOHN king of ENGLAND.

Act. Pub. M. Par.

'AMong the riches that mortals eſteem, as the moſt valuable, and deſire with the greateſt eagerneſs, it is our opinion, that pure gold and precious ſtones hold the precedency; and, tho' we are perſuaded, that your royal excellence is in no want of ſuch things, we have judged it proper to ſend you, as a mark of our good-will, four rings ſet with ſtones. We intreat you to conſider the myſteries contain'd in their form, matter, number, and colour, rather than their intrinſick value. Their roundneſs denotes eternity; which, having neither beginning nor end, ought to induce you to tend, without ceaſing, from earthly to heavenly objects, and from things temporal to thoſe that are eternal. The number four, which is a ſquare, ſignifies firmneſs of mind, not to be ſhaken by adverſity, nor elevated by proſperity, but always continuing, in the ſame ſtate; and this is a perfection, to which yours will infallibly arrive, when it ſhall be adorned with the four cardinal virtues, juſtice, fortitude, prudence, and temperance. The firſt will be of uſe to you, in judgments; the ſecond, in adverſity; the third, in dubious caſes; and the fourth, in proſperity. Gold is an emblem of wiſdom; for, as gold is the moſt precious of all metals, wiſdom, of all other endowments, is the moſt excellent, as the prophet witneſſes, in theſe words, "The ſpirit of wiſdom ſhall "reſt upon him;" and, indeed, nothing is more requiſite in a ſovereign. Accordingly, Solomon, that pacifick king, only asked of God wiſdom, to enable him rightly to govern his people. The blue colour of the emerald denotes faith; the clearneſs of the ſaphire, hope; the redneſs of the ruby, charity; and the colour of the topaz, good works; concerning which our Saviour ſaid, "Let your light ſo ſhine before men, that they "may ſee your good works." In the emerald, therefore, you have what you are to believe, in the ſaphire, what you are to hope, in the ruby, what you are to love, and, in the topaz, what you are to practiſe; in order that you may proceed, from virtue to virtue, till you come to the viſion of the God of gods in Sion.' 1207.

The pope exhorts John to own Langton for archbiſhop.

Whatever was the deſign of this myſterious letter, whether it was only a witty conceipt of the pope's, or an intimation to John, that he would ſtand in need of all the virtues repreſented by the rings, to withſtand his attacks, leſt the king ſhould miſtake his meaning, he ſent him, ſoon after, a more intelligible brief*; exhorting him to own cardinal Langton for archbiſhop of Canterbury. He aſſured him, that he was a native of England, cardinal of the Roman church, and learned in all the ſciences; and, beſides, that his holy life and chriſtian virtues would be highly advantageous to England, in its ſpiritual, as well his prudence and political virtues, in its temporal concerns. However, he did not intend, that Langton's election ſhould depend on the good pleaſure of the king, or to ſubmit to his examination; for, in another letter, he ſent his commands to the monks of St. Auguſtin's, and the ſuffragan biſhops of Canterbury, to receive the cardinal, as their metropolitan.

The king expels the monks from the monaſtery of St. Auguſtin's.

No ſooner was John informed of the tranſactions at Rome, than he fell into a moſt furious paſſion. He accuſed the monks of St. Auguſtin's of deceiving him, as well in the third as in the firſt election; and, to be revenged on them, he ſent two knights, Fulke de Cantelou and Henry de Cornhelle, who, entering the monaſtery with drawn ſwords, commanded the monks, in the king's name, to quit the place immediately, and alſo depart the kingdom, within three days, unleſs they would have their monaſtery ſet on fire, and periſh themſelves in the flames. This dreadful menace ſo terrified the monks, that, without any reply, they withdrew into Flanders to the abbey of St. Bertin and other neighbouring monaſteries; but, this revenge not giving him all the ſatisfaction he required, he wrote Innocent a very ſharp letter; 'Upbraiding 'him with his injurious annulling the canoni'cal election of the biſhop of Norwich, with'out having the leaſt pretence for it. More'over he complained of his procuring to be

* The apoſtolical letters are of two ſorts. The firſt are ſtiled briefs, becauſe written after a compendious manner, and are ſealed on wax only, cum annulo piſcatoris; i. e. with the impreſſion of a ſignet ring, which the Romaniſts believe to be the ſeal of St. Peter, the fiſherman; the other ſort are called bulls, from the leaden bulla hanging thereon. Bulla is though, among the antients, to be a golden badge, which perſons, that triumphed over their enemies, wore on their breaſts, like a medal; and it was afterwards applied to ſignify a deed, inſtrument, or writing, deſcrib'd on parchment or vellum, with a piece of lead hanging to it by a ſtring; and ſuch a writing is ſtiled a bull, from the lead annexed to it. On this label of lead, the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul are impreſſed from the papal ſeal; and, when it is affixed to the pope's letters, they are ſaid to be compleatly finiſhed. Theſe bulls, becauſe they carried the papal thunder of excommunication along with them, for the non-payment of the pope's dues, became a terror to weak people, for ſome ages, till, at length, from their frequent demands, they were turned into ridicule; for they were ſtiled bull-beggars, and uſed, as words of ſcorn and contempt, to terrify children. Eybenius Cherubinus has made a collection of them in ſix folio's; which Puffendorf makes a good uſe, in his introduction to the Hiſtory of Europe. Vid. Parerg. Jur. Can.

'elected

1207. 'elected by violence, and contrary to all manner of right, a perſon educated in France, an entire ſtranger to him, and who had always carried on a ſtrict correſpondence with his enemies. He ſubjoined, that this incroachment was altogether inconſiſtent with the prerogatives of his crown, from which he was reſolved never to depart, nor from the election of the biſhop of Norwich; and then he roundly told him, that, if his demands were rejected, he would break off all intercourſe with the court of Rome, which was of no ſmall conſequence, ſince it was certain, that the holy ſee received more money from England than any other chriſtian ſtate; and that, therefore, greater regard ought to be paid to the king of England than any other prince. In fine, he ſaid, there were prelates enough in the kingdom, qualified to govern the church; and that there was no neceſſity for having recourſe to the popes, if they ſo manifeſtly abuſed their authority.

The pope's anſwer. Act. Pub. M. Par.

Innocent had not engaged in this affair, with ſo little reſolution, as to deſiſt from it, on the king's expoſtulation; and, tho' the anſwer he returned ſeemed to be mild and obliging, it was, in the main, more proper to irritate than appeaſe him. 'He, firſt of all, blames John, for 'anſwering his kind and humble letter, in ſo 'harſh a manner, that it appeared to be rather 'intended to affront him, than to require the 'reaſons of his conduct; and then he proceeds 'to extol the merits of cardinal Langton, aſ'ſuring him, that he was a prelate of great 'parts and profound learning, and had, for 'many years, ſtudied at the univerſity of Paris, 'where he had taken his degree of doctor of 'divinity. He adds, that the conſent of 'princes was not neceſſary to elections made, 'in his preſence; yet that, out of pure con'deſcenſion, he had diſpatched two monks, 'to inform him of it, who were detained at 'Boulogne, by contrary winds. In a word, 'after attempting to prove Langton's election 'agreeable to the canons, he repreſented to him, 'that Henry II, his father, and Richard, his 'brother, had renounced the right of nomina'ting biſhops and abbots; and that, therefore, 'he ought to receive, without examination, 'the prelates, whom the church judged to be 'capable of directing the ſpiritual affairs of his 'kingdom. He concludes with this remark'able menace, that ſubmiſſion to him would be 'more for his advantage, than an obſtinate re'ſiſtance againſt God and his church, in a cauſe, 'for which the bleſſed Thomas Becket ſhed his 'blood". Theſe laſt words were ſufficient to ſtrike terror into a prince, whoſe father was ſo great a ſufferer, on much the ſame occaſion; but John, far from being terrified, reſolved, at all adventures, to free himſelf from the galling yoke of Rome.

1208. M. Paris. M. Weſt.

The pope's letter was ſoon followed by an order to the biſhops of London, Ely, and Worceſter, to ſollicit the king to ſubmit to the orders of the church; and, provided he ſhould prove contumacious, to lay the kingdom under an interdict. The biſhops, being thus commiſſioned by the pope, acquainted the king with the orders they had received from his holineſs, and intreated him to prevent; by his ſubmiſſion, a ſcandal to which his ſubjects would be no leſs expoſed than himſelf; but John was inflexible. He ſwore, by God's teeth, his uſual oath, that, if the kingdom was interdicted, he would directly baniſh all the eccleſiaſticks, to ſeek their ſubſiſtence at Rome, and put out the eyes, and cut off the ears and noſes of all the Roman prieſts, that ſhould be found in his dominions; and then he commanded the three biſhops to depart his preſence. His paſſion was ſtill farther inflamed, by the inſolence of Simon Langton, the cardinal's brother, who importunately preſs'd him to own his brother for archbiſhop; but the king, at laſt, told him, it was very ſurprizing, that an Engliſhman ſhould urge him to renounce the prerogatives of the crown; to which Langton arrogantly replied, that nothing could be done, in his behalf, unleſs he would entirely throw himſelf upon his brother's mercy. Brady.

Henry and Richard born.

The laſt year, John had a ſon, by Iſabella of Angouleme, named Henry; and, this year, the queen was delivered of another, called Richard.

The interdict is publiſhed.

In the interim, the biſhops, perceiving the king to be contumacious, at length, pronounced the ſentence of interdict upon the kingdom, and retired abroad. Divine ſervice immediately ceaſed, in all the churches; and the ſacraments were no longer adminiſter'd, except to infants or dying perſons. Publick prayers and all other eccleſiaſtical functions were diſcontinued; and, as the church-yards were ſhut up, the bodies of the dead were thrown into the ditches, like dogs, no prieſt daring, or being willing, to aſſiſt at the funerals. It might reaſonably be demanded, why the people ſhould, thus, ſuffer, for the fault of their ſovereign; and, doubtleſs, it would be difficult to aſſign a reaſon, founded on juſtice or equity. The truth is, the policy of Rome required, that the ſubjects ſhould be liable to puniſhment, that, conſidering their king, as the ſole cauſe, they might the ſooner be inclined to force him to ſubmit to the papal yoke; and, indeed, it is certain, that kings have no more authority than private perſons, when abandon'd by their ſubjects. Accordingly, the popes, who deſigned to enlarge their authority, have generally taken the advantage of a time of diſcord between the people and their ſovereigns; and, if ſometimes they have launched out, at unſeaſonable junctures, they have, for the moſt part, found their pretended authority to be little regarded; of which there is a remarkable inſtance, in the preſent reign, as the ſequel will inform us.

The king uſes the clergy with ſeverity.

The pope's rigour was inſufficient to bring John to a compliance; for, on the contrary, he reſolutely determined to convince his holineſs, that he was able to withſtand him. Purſuant to this reſolution, he confiſcated the eſtates of all the eccleſiaſticks, that obeyed th-interdict, and ſent orders to the ſheriffs to make a ſtrict enquiry after them, and expel them the kingdom; but the ſheriffs, perceiving that they could not put them in execution, without uſing great violence, durſt not puſh matters to this extremity;

1208. extremity; insomuch that, notwithstanding the king's intention, none departed the kingdom, except such as, having too zealously espoused the pope's quarrel, chose rather to go into a voluntary banishment, than remain exposed to the king's indignation. However, they, who stayed, were in no better circumstances; for outrages were daily committed upon them, and they met with no redress from the magistrates, who always sent them to the pope, for justice.

M. Paris. An. Waverl. As there was scarce a priest, in those days, that did not keep a concubine, the king, under the pretence of causing the canons of the councils to be observed, ordered all their concubines to be imprisoned; and they were obliged to pay great fines, for their liberty. Among the vast number of ecclesiasticks in the kingdom, there were some, who, in spite of the interdict, administer'd the sacraments; but, as they were continually exposed to the insults of the zealots, John issued out his commands, that those, who committed any outrage upon them, should be hanged on the next tree. The pope no sooner received the news of this proceeding, than he excommunicated all, that disobeyed the interdict, or executed the king's orders. This was the miserable state of England; for the king's adherents fell under the pope's censures, whilst he took care to persecute those, who submitted to the orders of Rome.

1209. John sends money to the emperor. In the mean time, Henry, brother to the emperor Otho, came to king John, in the beginning of the year 1209; and the design of his journey was, to demand, for the emperor, an aid of money, which the king generously granted him, tho' he was himself in pressing want.

He levies an army, under the pretence of warring against Scotland. The calamities of the English made no impression either on the king or the pope; for they both resolved to run all hazards, rather than recede from their respective pretensions. John had not the least dread of the papal thunders, with respect to spiritual affairs; yet he could not, without the greatest uneasiness, see the generality of his subjects inclined to the court of Rome. This observation rendering him apprehensive, that, sooner or later, some conspiracy would be formed against him, he judged it to be expedient to prevent the designs of his enemies, by raising an army; and, for a pretence, he complained, that the king of Scotland, in opposition to the treaty of Lincoln, had married one of his daughters, without his consent. It was easy to foresee, that a prince, who had permitted so many provinces in France to be taken, without the least resistance, did not intend vigorously to prosecute this war, on so slight an occasion; and, accordingly, he accepted the first offers, made by the king of Scotland, to give him 15000 marks, and his two daughters, as hostages. In his return from the northern frontiers, where he had led his army, he ordered the hedges to be cut down, and the ditches to be filled up, in all his forests, that the deer might have liberty to feed, in all places; and it is highly probable, that his view in this was, to punish the people in those parts, for having too openly espoused the pope's cause, and, perhaps, to deter the rest of his subjects from acting in the same manner *. When he arrived at Northampton, he was met by the prince of Wales, who, being afraid that he designed to carry the war into his country, came, with all expedition, to prevent him by his submission; and this prince accompanied the king, as far as Woodstock, where he paid him homage †. 1209.

He causes all his vassals to renew their homage. John evidently perceived, from the continuation of the interdict, that the pope was resolved to persist in his pretensions; and that, as this means was ineffectual, he would use more violent methods. The king, therefore, to screen himself from his thunders, caused all his vassals to renew their homage; for nothing, in his opinion, was more proper to frustrate the designs of the court of Rome, than to secure, by this bond, the allegiance of his subjects.
